It was one of those stifling days in late August when all New York panted and closed blinds sought to shut in the shadow of the past night's relief. I had been summoned from Long Island into the city on a mysterious errand—I did not know for what, I was only told that I must come. In the apartment of my friend Mrs. Osgood Mason, well known for her warm interest in human problems and her charity of heart, we looked from the window at a crowd that had assembled without. Standing before the front door, in the midst of the crowd, we saw an old friend—Frank Mead—fresh from the West, with the breath of the Arizona desert still upon him. Behind him in the crowd was a darker face looking out above an enormous black-and-white Apache basket urn. This it was that had attracted the eager throng of small boys, for the man with the basket was an American Indian.

We ran to open the door. "My friend Pelia" (pronounced Pe-lee-a), said Mr. Mead, as the Indian followed him into the hall—"a Mojave-Apache chief. Come in, Pelia," and in they stepped, the Indian close behind Mr. Mead like a silent shadow. Pelia was awed—a little stunned by all the strange new things that he had seen and the curiosity that he had unwittingly evoked on his long journey eastward; he moved wide-eyed, as if in a dream; Mr. Mead was evidently his only link with reality—the reality of his native Arizona.

When the door was shut and Pelia had been induced to sit down—stiffly, his basket still in both hands—our friend began in his direct and straight-to-the-point way:

"I have brought him to see President Roosevelt. I found his people starving in the desert. They are homeless, they must have land, and they must have it before winter comes on. We must get straight to the President and tell him the whole story. I know that he will act, and act quickly." It was evidently to help in this mission that I had been summoned to the city.

"You see," Mr. Mead went on, "it was like this: Back in the '60's and '70's these Indians, like their neighbors the Apaches, were at war with the United States. Settlers were pushing through their territory, railways were being built, and the Indians were defending their country against what they felt to be invasion. At last, about 1874, the Mojaves were conquered and placed on a reservation with the Apaches in San Carlos County, since which time they've been called 'Mojave-Apaches.' Now the Mojaves were promised that if they would stay peaceably at San Carlos and send their children to school they would be allowed, when civilized, to go back to their lands in the Verde Valley. These were good lands—remarkably good for Arizona—near the Verde River and commanding a good water supply; a beautiful country. The Indians faithfully kept their pledge, complying absolutely with the Government's demands. When some ten years had passed, and the children were grown, they sent word to Washington asking to be allowed to return to their own lands. There was no reply. The years dragged on, the Indians sending repeated appeals for permission to go back to their homes. After twenty-nine years they picked themselves up and without assistance from the Government in any way they started home. On horseback, in wagons, and afoot, they set off across mountains and deserts. They reached the hills overlooking their fertile lands and gazed again on their beloved Verde Valley. But they hardly knew it. It was completely taken up by white settlers.

"Heartbroken, the Indians camped in the desert, sending appeal after appeal to Washington. But Washington was deaf. Four years, four whole years, that little band of faithful people waited, half-was not how to get land enough for the people but people enough for the land. Mr. Mead had been warned that if he tried to take an Indian out of Arizona to tell his grievance he would be "potted" and dropped into one of those receptive canyons that yawned so invitingly for caches of that kind; and no one would ever find him but a coyote.

How to get Pelia to the railway without the white people knowing it? The road from the Indians' camp lay straight through the settlers' land. But Mr. Mead did not hesitate. Everybody carries his Deeply in sympathy with the needs of the landless Mojave-Apaches, she at once took the matter up, and the next day I received a letter from Mr. Roosevelt's secretary—the President would see Mr. Mead and the Indian chief the very next week at Oyster Bay.

Meanwhile Pelia was persuaded to relinquish his basket and go about with Mr. Mead and Mrs. Mason to see something of the big Eastern world. Stunned and bewildered by the sights and sounds that beat like madness on his eyes and ears, he was narrowly saved from being run over when he stood, open-mouthed, under the elevated railway watching the trains pass over his head. He had seen trains on the ground, and that was wonderful enough. Now he saw them in the air. His gestures describing these layers of horizontal locomotion were unforgettable.

But on being taken to a sky-scraper his astonishment became acute. It was impossible to explain to him beforehand the nature of an elevator. Suddenly he was shot into the air! Most trains, even when they ran in the air, stayed horizontal, but this one was perpendicular! His eyes started, his knees bent limply, and with open mouth he laid his hand on the pit of his stomach and crouched back against the wall of the car. It was an alarming episode.

One day he came to my home on Long Island to see the Great Waters, "so big," we told him, "that a man standing on one side could not see the other side"—an incredible statement to offer an Indian from arid Arizona. But for once the white man had told the truth, and Pelia's whole being was hushed with reverence before what he felt to be a manifestation of the Supreme Power. We let him stand alone and apart, gazing upon that infinity of water; nor did we break in upon his quiet meditation, for we knew that in it lay a prayer to the holy mystery that, to the Indian, lies behind all life.

Later in the day we found him transfixed again, but this time with far different emotions. It was the fashionable bathing hour, and for once Pelia's poise, his quiet dignity, his self-control, and even his irreproachable Indian manners were swept out to sea. Each bather, as he or she waddled, minced, or capered to the ocean's rim, caused Pelia a spasm of new mirth. Why the white man should wear clothes into the water was the first comedy; and, if he must wear clothes, why such fantastic ones? I had always thought a group of bathers rather a pitiful than a comic sight; but to Pelia the slumping shoulders, the poor misshapen feet, the startling embonpoint in unexpected places, the surprisingly massive underpinning in thin people, and, on the other hand, the thin sticks that bravely upheld fat people—all the remorseless display of the effects of our false standards and of our unnatural methods of living and of dressing—this, that seemed to me nature's quiet way of pointing at her erring children the finger of scorn, was to the Indian the most excruciating display of humor starving and without help—waited with an Indian's faith that a promise made would be fulfilled. Four years! Meanwhile they starved. They lived on cactus fruit and field mice, but they starved.

PELIA'S WIFE THANKING MRS. MASON ON CHRISTMAS DAY FOR HER HELP IN GETTING BACK THE TRIBAL LANDS

"I heard about them while I was in California and went to see for myself. There they were, huddled on the desert overlooking their lands, now all white people's farms. Winter would be coming on, with cold in the hills. There was just one thing to do—to bring the Chief straight to Roosevelt. So here we are. And the next question is: Can you get us an appointment with the President?"

Here they were, indeed; but it had been no easy task to get Pelia safely out of Arizona. The settlers had heard that the Indians were waiting for the land. Perhaps they had sent their own side of the story to Washington, paralyzing action in behalf of the Mojave-Apaches. It was, after all, not altogether the white farmers' fault. They had found vacant lands with surprisingly fertile possibilities for Arizona, and, after the nature of West-bound settlers in the early days, they had squatted in the valley, irrigated and improved it, and they very naturally had no notion of giving up the fruits of their toil. The situation was a logical outcome of conditions born when the continent was young and when the problem at that time before the Government camp bedding in that rough country. It was not difficult to cover Pelia (a modern Cleopatra!) with a pack of blankets and drive with this animated though innocent-looking camp outfit to the railway. Once past the farms, all had been well.

While Mr. Mead talked Pelia had been silent. Indeed, he spoke little English. But we saw in his earnest face that there was just one thought which possessed all his being—land for his people! He was grave, quiet, and utterly self-controlled, but there was a wistful sadness in his eyes that tinged his face with a gentle stoicism. We examined with interest his beautiful basket, the work of his tribe. It was a present to the President. Pelia had carried it across the continent, and it seemed as though he would not set it down until he had placed it in the hands of the Great Chief in whom lay all the hopes of his people, the Chief who would give back to the Indians their most sacred right, the right to live in the land of their fathers.

The very next day found me again on Long Island, seated next to an old family friend, a cousin of Theodore Roosevelt.

"Could you get an informal letter immediately and directly to the President?" I asked. "Could you see that he gets it at once himself? Inclose it in a letter from yourself, and let me know his answer—how soon he can see the Indian chief?"

that had ever met his gaze. Of all the strange things that he had seen since he had left the Arizona deserts, the "tired business man" and his wife going in bathing was the most unbelievable.

At last came the fateful day for the climax of Pelia's Eastern drama. Mrs. Mason, the kind and motherly friend with whom the Indian stayed in New York, saw to it that the chief was well soaped and combed for his visit to the President. His new red necktie, the pride of his life, was tied with care. There was something touching in the fact that this Indian, whose faith in the white man had been so sorely tried, now trusted with such childlike simplicity his new friends. Pelia even submitted uncomplainingly to the strange administrations of a nail-file, and he was brushed from his shining black hair to his slender Indian feet.

But by this time the reader is asking, Who is Frank Mead? Mr. Mead is one of those practical idealists who possesses—as did Theodore Roosevelt—the faculty for seeing instantly what can be actually achieved in a given situation. An architect by profession, he has nevertheless given much of his life to unselfish, unrecognized, and unrewarded work for the American Indian. Again like Mr. Roosevelt, he has the power of quick, positive, and incisive action. Within two weeks of his decision in the Arizona desert to bring the case of the Mojave-Apaches to the President he stood with the Indian chief at Sagamore Hill, an arrow shot straight to its mark.

Pelia was grave, reverent, earnest. The beautiful big basket was quietly but solemnly presented to the Great White Chief, and then, in a few simple words, the pitiful tale was told.

"We believe," said Pelia, "that the Great White Father will not leave his Indian children helpless. We always believed. We still believe."

"Of course these people must be helped, and helped at once," said Mr. Roosevelt. "The only question now is, how to do it?"

Doubtless he knew as well as Mr. Mead that if the matter were submitted to the usual Government routine another generation of Indians might pass away before the land could be won back for the Mojave-Apaches! For Mr. Roosevelt was fond of narrating the instance of how a Government agent who had applied for a stove to warm the hospital for the winter acknowledged the final answer to his request with the words, "The stove is here. So is spring."

Mr. Mead knew Mr. Roosevelt's character. He knew that if he had a practical working plan to submit, the President would take it up at once, put his own shoulder to the wheel, and compel results. Before leaving Arizona with the chief, Mr. Mead had carefully investigated the whole situation. He had brought with him maps, drawings, and estimates. It was only just, he averred, that the settlers should be fully paid for all the improvements that they had put into the land and for the labor of their years of settlement. With this money they should be induced to move off and find homes elsewhere. The fertile tract in the Lower Verde Valley where the abandoned Camp McDowell military reservation had been situated could be secured for the Indians.

"Capital!" said Mr. Roosevelt, when all these accurate data were spread before him. With characteristic immediateness of vision, Roosevelt saw that the man who had such intimate knowledge of the whole situation would probably be the only person who could achieve quick results. The plan was soon formulated. Mr. Mead should return with the chief and should buy off the settlers. Mr. Roosevelt would see that the money was appropriated.

"You will act as my agent," said the President. "I will take this whole question up myself with the proper officials. Mr. Mead, you get the Indians' land. Chief, tell your people that the White Chief will see that they have justice."

Red tape? It never tied Theodore

Before long Pelia and Mr. Mead were on their way back to Arizona. The Indian, childlike, was full of quiet gladness. But for Mr. Mead the prospect was not an easy one. He did not know just what would be the temper of the settlers—or perhaps he knew only too well. He was determined that the Government should not be "gouged" in the estimate of the improvements. He was equally determined that there should be no bad blood between the white men and the Indians. It would make the story quite too long to tell the details of how Mr. Mead won not only the co-operation but also the positive good will of the settlers; of how he got back the Indian land for the Government at an even less figure than his original estimate; and how he was able to return quite a slice of the Government appropriation. Courage and tact, a thorough knowledge of the West and of Western men, and the fact that he knew how to "pull a gun" as quickly and aim as true as the best of them, drew

MOJAVE-APACHE DANCE-SONG (Circling Dance)

Indian vowel-sounds are pronounced as in Continental languages.

Recorded by Natalie Curtis.

Not too fast. Drum with each beat.  $\text{♩} = 92$ . From "The Indians' Book." Courtesy Harper & Bros.

MOJAVE-APACHE DANCE-SONG (Social Walking-Dance)

Indian vowels given Continental sound.

Recorded by Natalie Curtis.

Fast. M.M.  $\text{♩} = 116$ . Drum with each beat. From "The Indians' Book." Courtesy Harper & Bros.

Roosevelt's hands for one moment. The incisive power of his will acted like shears, cutting all semblance of red tape to shreds. Doubtless Mr. Roosevelt felt that if the United States had made a promise to its wards, some thirty-odd years was a long enough time in which to fulfill it. The expectant Indians, whose patience and whose faith had been put to such a weary test, should not now wait one hour longer than was necessary—not while Theodore Roosevelt was President!

forth the opinion, "He ain't no Eastern clerk. He's a real man."

It is a fact that life in the West does produce "real men." We may never know how much Theodore Roosevelt owed his power of action and his driving force to the stimulus of those early days on a cattle ranch. The exhilaration of the climate near the Great Divide keeps men awake and spurs them to deeds. (If Washington had been perched within the neighborhood of Pike's Peak instead of having been sunk in a sluggish, swampish flat, who knows but that red tape might unwind as steadily and swiftly as a stock ticker?)

As it was, Washington held up its hands in amazement at the speed with which Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Mead had put through the Arizona transaction. Rarely in the history of the Indian Bureau (I think this was the sweeping assertion) had a "deal" for the Indians been consummated so swiftly, so informally, and with so little expense. Roosevelt himself was "delighted!" He declared that Mr. Mead must be retained in some way in work for the Indian.

"I don't know if there's any vacancy that you could immediately fill in the Government Indian Service," said Mr. Roosevelt, "but I want you to go right on working for the Indians, and of course your expenses must be paid, you must have the proper authority, and you must have some kind of a salary, so that you will not be at a loss." For all Mr. Mead's efforts for the good of the Indian prior to this time had been made at his own personal expense.

Mr. Roosevelt did not ponder long. If there were no vacant office in Indian affairs appropriate to what he wanted Mr. Mead to do, he had no doubt that it lay in his prerogative to create one. He would make a new office and appoint Mr. Mead to it.

"You will be my agent," Mr. Roosevelt repeated to Mr. Mead, "and you will report directly to me."

He had again cut red tape into ribbons, and I think there must have been a twinkle in those keen though earnest eyes of his when the title of "Special Supervisor" was presented to Mr. Mead with the new office.

It was Christmas Day when Mrs. Mason and I drove in a canvas-topped cart through the Arizona desert to Camp McDowell, where was situated the new reservation of the Mojave-Apaches. Pelia and his wife had driven in to the railway at Phoenix to meet us. Mr. Mead was personally conducting us to the house of the missionary agent on the reservation, and our visit to the Indians had the warmth of a home-coming.

On the way we met a white man on a splendid black horse. "Say, Mr. Mead," he called, "if the ladies in your party want to ride while they're on the reservation, I've gentled two ponies in my string and they can have 'em to use as long as they like." This was the man who had threatened to shoot Mr. Mead if he took Pelia East!

That afternoon Mr. Mead rode with Pelia to each farm now turned over to the Indians by the settlers. The Mojave-Apaches could still hardly believe that the white men were really going. The Indians took the land in communal tribal ownership, and the portions were allotted to the different families by the chief. Mr. Mead noticed that Pelia had taken the worst parcel for himself.

"Why is this?" said Mr. Mead. "You're the chief. You should have the best land."

"I am the chief," said Pelia, "and therefore I must see that all my people are content. They are beginning a new life. If the whole band is to be happy, then every man in it must be satisfied. I give the best land to the growlers." I know of no better instance of far-sighted sagacity in leadership.

As the Indians moved across the reservation with Mr. Mead, looking over each abandoned farm, it seemed as though a miracle had indeed been wrought. It was the miracle of personality. Two dominant wills had turned the despair of the Indians into a great hope.

That night the Mojave-Apaches gathered for a great dance in honor of their "savior," as they called Mr. Mead. Indians of neighboring tribes had ridden over to rejoice with them. It was a ceremony of thanksgiving for their land. A huge bonfire burned on the open desert; its flames seemed to lick the deep blue-purple of the sky. Brilliant moonlight—such moonlight as Easterners have never seen—touched cactus and mesquite and lit the horizon line of hills. Around the fire the Indians moved with rhythmic step, a great circle of singing humanity silhouetted against the blaze. The song beat on the desert stillness with the pound of the drum till it seemed as though the heart of the "earth-mother" herself were throbbing in gladness for her children. Every now and then the rhythm changed, and men and women in groups of three moved backward and forward into the flare of the firelight and out into the peace of the moonlight in the social "walking-dance" of the Apaches. All night they danced and for three days they rejoiced. "We have our land," they said; "we are men again."

For once, the country's promise to the native-Americans had been rescued from the Nation's scrap-basket by Theodore Roosevelt.

AMERICA IN CAMBRIDGE

BY ARTHUR E. SHIPLEY

MASTER OF CHRIST'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, AND VICE-CHANCELLOR OF THE UNIVERSITY

"O name of Cambridge, O most pleasant sound!

Deep in my heart the love of thee is found."

—Abraham Cowley (1618-1667).

DURING last autumn, from Washington to Minneapolis and from Houston to Boston, I preached a crusade. Perhaps I might venture to quote from the speech, somewhat amended, which I made to the Faculty of the University of Chicago on Friday, November 8, 1918:

I am extraordinarily anxious to do something about demobilization in the American Army. Already we are receiving in England a considerable number of gentlemen from what we used to call the colonies, but we now use the longer expression, "from his Majesty's dominions beyond the seas," which means the same thing. A number of these gentlemen are already studying with us. We have prepared a number of short courses for officers, and we are prepared to give after a term or two terms' residence some sort of certificate signed by the teacher. I might remark that professors are comparatively rare in English universities. Most teaching is done by men who have not that title. The certificates will be signed by some accredited teachers, and we hope that American universities will recognize them as "credits" helping toward the final degree.

We at Cambridge want to get hold of your soldier boys. Peace has not come yet, in spite of the evening papers; but you won't want as many of your officers in France during the armistice period as you have now. Let them come to some one of our universities for a few months or, perhaps, years. The tragedy of these Allies' boys' lives—I know it because I live among them—is that they have lost their education. Many of them didn't really know what education was, and yet they told me that that was what they felt most in this war. So I do earnestly hope, as I told the War Office folk in Washington, that some provision will be made for your young men to come, whenever they can, to all the universities of the Allies, to get the education they seek.

Well, my crusade has succeeded. Some three weeks ago a couple of thousand American students came to our island, and a week later two hundred arrived in Cambridge. Their arrival wasn't, of course, exactly when or how they and we wanted. To begin with, they turned up at 3 A.M. on a cold March morning and had nowhere to lay their heads. Then, again, we should have preferred to have them dribbling in in small numbers, say ten a day, as accommodation is extraordinarily scarce at present in Cambridge. Finally, they arrived only a day or two before the commencement of the Easter vacation, and it required some "wangling," in which the Master of Emmanuel took a leading part, to persuade our University teachers to rise to the occasion. However, they did rise, as they always do rise, and short courses of lectures were arranged, which began on March 10, in a very great variety of subjects. These were

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

SOME OF THE FLAGS THAT WERE CARRIED IN THE PARADE

Photographs by Paul Thompson.

EX-SECRETARY McADOO AND "BIG BILL" EDWARDS MARCHING WITH BOY SCOUTS

"BOY SCOUTS' WEEK"—A TYPICAL PARADE OF THE ORGANIZATION, IN NEW YORK CITY

All over the country parades similar to the one shown in the above pictures were seen during the week's campaign for rousing interest in and helping the Boy Scouts.

International Film Service

SPEAKER GILLETT SIGNING THE SUFFRAGE BILL

The bill providing for a Constitutional Amendment granting the suffrage to women throughout the Nation was signed, as shown above, by the Speaker of the House of Representatives after it had been passed by the Senate

Western Newspaper Union

ETON WELCOMES HER GENERALS

Generals and other officers of the British Army who had spent their school days at Eton recently received a warm welcome from the present-day Etonians. General Plumer is seen addressing the school

(C) Keystone Service

A TRIUMPHANT POILU REPLACES THE STATUE OF WILLIAM I AT METZ

A sturdy French soldier is represented in this statue as trampling under foot a German helmet on the pedestal which was formerly occupied by a statue of Emperor William I

International Film Service

SCHEIDEMANN PROTESTING AGAINST THE TERMS OF THE PEACE TREATY

The photograph shows Herr Scheidemann speaking before a crowd in front of the Reichstag Building in Berlin, assembled to denounce the severity (from the Hun standpoint) of the terms of peace

(C) Harris & Ewing

DR. FREDERICK P. KEPPEL, DIRECTOR OF FOREIGN OPERATIONS OF THE RED CROSS
Dr. Keppel was at one time Secretary of Columbia University and later Dean of Columbia College. He resigns the position of Third Assistant Secretary of War to take up Red Cross work

(C) Press Illustrating Service

LIEUT.-COL. PHILIPPE BUNAU-VARILLA, ENGINEER, ELECTRICIAN, VETERAN
Colonel Bunau-Varilla is now in the United States in the interest of closer relations between our country and France. He was one of the engineers of the Panama Canal. He lost a leg in the war

(C) Underwood & Underwood

GENERAL JOSEPH PILSUDSKI, PRESIDENT OF THE NEW POLISH REPUBLIC
General Pilsudski, who with Premier Paderewski occupies a position of great responsibility in Poland's new history, begins his work at a time when alleged "pogroms" are disturbing the country

Bain News Service

JOHN ALCOCK AND ARTHUR W. BROWN, WHO CROSSED THE ATLANTIC IN A NON-STOP AIRPLANE FLIGHT

These daring aviators accomplished the feat which Hawker and Grieve had unsuccessfully attempted a few weeks before—that of crossing the Atlantic without a stop and unattended by assisting vessels. The flight of 1,932 miles was accomplished in 16 hours and 12 minutes—nearly two miles a minute. See editorial comment on this extraordinary achievement

Press Illustrating Service

Photographie Frillot, Metz

MONSIGNOR PELTIER, NOMINATED TO SUCCEED A GERMAN BISHOP AT METZ
M. Peltier, who is Vicar-General of Nancy, has, it is reported, been nominated by President Poincaré to be the new Bishop of Metz. This action marks a new departure from recent French practice

Gillman Service

DR. M. LOUISE HURRELL OF ROCHESTER, NEW YORK

DR. MARY MACLACHLAN OF PORTLAND, OREGON

DR. INEZ C. BENTLEY OF LYCOMING, NEW YORK

DR. CHARLOTTE FAIRBANKS OF ST. JOHNSBURY, VERMONT

FOUR AMERICAN WOMEN PHYSICIANS WHO HAVE BEEN DECORATED IN FRANCE

Fifteen American women physicians have recently received from the French Government the decoration of the Medaille de Reconnaissance for their help in combat typhoid fever and for other services during the war. We print the pictures of a representative group continued till April 11, when our guests left for a fortnight's Easter holiday.

Divinity was perhaps the subject that was best organized. Owing to the help of the Rev. G. A. S. Schneider, of Caius College, courses were arranged by Professor Bethune-Baker on "The Sermon on the Mount," by the Master of Selwyn on the "Galatians," by Dr. Tennant on "The Relation of Theology and Natural Science," by Mr. S. A. Cook on "Aspects of Comparative Religion," by Mr. T. R. Glover, well known in the New World, for he was professor for some eight years in Canada, on the "Progress of Religion in the Ancient World," and by other eminent divines on diverse topics. The divinity students were also happy in that they were housed in two or three of our graduate theological colleges and not in town lodgings.

It would be impossible to enumerate the very varied subjects which are being studied by the soldiers from the front, but one may pick out as typical Mr. Fay's lectures on "Economic History," Mr. Oldham's on "The History of Geographical Discovery," Dr. Marshall's on "Agriculture," Professor Prior's on "Architecture," Mr. A. B. Cook's on "Greek Sculpture." Dr. Cunningham, the Archdeacon of Ely—at one time exchange professor at Harvard—lectured on "The History of the County;" Dr. Holland Rose, on "Naval History;" and Mr. Coulton, on "Social Life in England." Eight courses on various branches of law were given, one by Professor Hazeltine, who was educated at Brown University and Harvard. A club for the lawyers has been established and here periodic papers are read. Opportunities were also given for hospital classes and medical work under Professor Sir Clifford Allbutt, Professor Macalister, and Professor Sims Woodhead. Modern and mediæval languages were also well represented, and included a course on "Dutch Literature" by Dr. Latimer Jackson. English was another favorite subject, and, although one would not have expected it, a certain number of our American Army students plunged into the study of elementary Hebrew. Besides these short courses, various single lectures were given by different authorities. The Master of St. John's lectured on "Undergraduate Life Thirty Years Ago," and Dr. Giles on the same subject in the Middle Ages. The Vice-Chancellor gave one or two lectures on "Insects and War." The various libraries and museums have also been thrown open to our guests.

The number of students from the armies in France who applied to come to British universities was 8,000. Of this number but one-quarter came to our shores, 1,200 men and 800 officers. Of the 2,000 selected, 1,200 applied for Oxford and Cambridge. The number actually sent to Cambridge amounts to just under two hundred. We understand that Oxford was unable to receive them during the vacation. Of the 200 students in residence, over a hundred are taking the arts course, 30 are taking law, and 30 science; 23 are taking theology, and 7 agricultural and technical courses. Practically every State is represented. New York State leads with 20; California is a good second with 13; Illinois, Massachusetts, and Ohio each have 10 representatives; Yale and Harvard each have 15; Cornell, 9; and California, 8. Of our student guests, 50 per cent have graduated, 17 per cent have post-graduate degrees, and 33 per cent have not yet taken their first degree. One or two colleges have been unable to receive any guests, as they are occupied by the nurses of the First Eastern General Hospital or by officers of the British army under special training. Among the remaining colleges they are distributed as follows:

Caius . . .	23	Jesus . . .	10
Cheshunt . . .	9	King's . . .	10
Christ's . . .	15	Magdalene . . .	6
Clare . . .	10	Queens' . . .	10
Downing . . .	6	Ridley Hall . . .	16
Fitzwilliam . . .		St. John's . . .	25
Hall . . .	15	Sidney . . .	6
Emmanuel . . .	15	Trinity . . .	20

One gathers from the conversation of our new friends that one of the features which struck them greatly was the narrowness and multiplicity of our winding streets. They all seem parallel to one another and they all run into one another. But our guests gradually overcame the difficulty of finding their way about our tortuous lanes, which are so different from the rectangular system to which they are accustomed at home.

I think what gave them the best impression of the beauties of the town as a whole were certain airplane photographs, in which the colleges and courts stand out like wedding-cakes and the multiplicity of green commons and open spaces in the heart of the town are revealed. For Cambridge is set in a flat area—flat as Louisiana—and there is no eminence to afford a bird's-eye view.

Our friends are learning a good deal about architecture. Our oldest churches and buildings date back a thousand years, and the difference between the good and the bad style of some of our more recent structures is readily appreciated. The custom of afternoon tea and after-dinner coffee appeals to our guests as an admirable opportunity of getting to know the students and also the naval officers, who lingered on through the vacation almost as long as the Americans, for the Admiralty has honored us by sending five hundred young naval officers for a kind of mental rest cure after four years of war strain. The absence of a gymnasium astonishes some of our friends, but they realize that, while athletics are not so intensive here as in America, they are far more general. The scattered disposition of the colleges is unlike anything they are accustomed to on their own campus, where university buildings are not separated from one another by all sorts of shops and houses. I think they have grasped the notion that the colleges stand to the University in pretty much the same relation as the individual States stand to the Federal Government in the Union, and they appreciate the fact that each college has its own treasures, its own beauty, and its own tradition. The "honors" system, again, is new to them. They think it strange that a student reading for honors may read for three years without any periodical university examinations, and they are interested to learn that oral examinations play a very considerable part in the placing of the students in the class list.

The existence of the external examiner is also a novelty to the American college graduates, and they recognize that it widens the scope of the examination. Where there are no external examiners the student can succeed in defeating the examiner by getting up his professor's lectures only, and not studying the subject as a whole. In fact, the outside examiner introduces fresh air into what may have been a somewhat restricted and professorial atmosphere. They note that our terms are shorter than theirs, but here I do not think they quite appreciate the fact that at Cambridge many of our abler students spend some six or seven weeks in residence in the long vacation. They are also interested to find that many of the students do a good deal of work at home during the vacations, and they are rather inclined to attribute this to the fact that our undergraduates devote a somewhat excessive time to social activities during term time in Cambridge. With regard to material things they note, as every American would note, the absence of baths in some of the colleges. These colleges are, however, in a minority, and the attitude of an elderly head of a house at the sister university who, after listening to the suggestion of some progressive young don that hot-water baths should be installed in the college over which he presided, exclaimed, with horror in his voice, "Why? The young men are only up eight weeks!" is rapidly passing away. England used to lead the way in sanitation, but undoubtedly the palm for plumbing has "gone West." Everything is so concentrated on the campus in an American university that our scattered and by no means adequate lecture-rooms, involving sometimes a walk of a quarter of an hour between one lecture and another, cause comment. On the other hand, the number and the wealth of the various museums has greatly impressed them. The "class" rivalry, which has so beneficent an effect in American institutions, one class vying with another in helping their university forward, is replaced as regards sport by intercollegiate tests. An Oxford or Cambridge man has a double allegiance, one to his college and one to his university, and between the two neither university gets the financial support which is so wonderful a feature of the universities of the West.

Every one of these American students has joined a college. They are matriculated and they are full members of it. They are going back to their own country as Trinity men, Jesus men, Caius men, Christ's men, and so on. They will go back, I hope, with something of the feeling of the following verses:

O fairest of all fair places,
Sweetest of all sweet towns!
With the birds, and the grayness and greenness,
And the men in caps and gowns.

All they that dwell within thee,
To leave are ever loth,
For one man gets friends, and another
Gets honor, and one gets both.

During the vacation the students have had ample opportunity of visiting the various University and college buildings. Small parties have been taken about by the ladies of Cambridge. The Bishop and Canons of Ely have extended hospitality to them, and most of them have by now visited our great East Anglian Cathedral. Colonel Harding has shown them over his historic hall at Madingley, where Charles the First is, rather mythically, said to have taken refuge for a few hours, and where Edward the Seventh undoubtedly lived while he was a student at Cambridge. Lady Sandwich has invited parties to visit the historic mansion at Hinchinbrooke near Huntingdon, a name that will ever be associated with that of Oliver Cromwell. There has also been, as seems to be the case everywhere, a great outbreak of dancing, in which the American students have played a large part, and bridge parties have been arranged for them on wet afternoons. Altogether, the ladies of Cambridge have risen nobly to the occasion.

Let me end with a most heartfelt wish, and a bit of a benediction:

On us, O sons of England's greatest daughter,
A kindly word from heart and tongue bestow.
Then chase the sunsets o'er the western water,
And bear our blessing with you as you go.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING

IN the Outlook of April 30 we published an article by Theodore H. Price which showed in an "Index Number Table" the increase in prices of the essential commodities of life since 1896. That article has attracted wide attention in the press throughout the country. It has, of course, elicited some criticism, as all original and suggestive articles on controversial subjects do. As a fair example of the objections that have been made to it we are glad to publish the following correspondence, with a table which has been worked out carefully by Mr. Price. It may be said, we believe, that the ablest financiers ascribe much of the increase of prices to the inflation of credits and currency growing out of the European war. The point about Mr. Price's original article that most interested us was that the increase of wages has necessarily followed the increased cost of living.—THE EDITORS.

Mr. Theodore H. Price,
Commerce and Finance,
The Outlook, New York:

Dear Sir—I cannot read and let pass without protest your article in The Outlook, April 30, 1919, both because it is not practically correct and because it gives the agitator an argument from statistics.

Any practical housekeeper knows that his living expenses have not advanced two hundred per cent since 1896. It is said that the price of whisky has advanced in Detroit two thousand per cent, but that would not materially increase the cost of living in a family when it is used only in Christmas pudding.

Paper may advance one thousand per cent. Who cares? What do householders pay? That's the question. A card index is a machine, not a human being. Again, you omit an item which takes forty per cent of the wage, Rent. This has not advanced.

Respectfully,
(signed) J. F. GEORGE,
1950 Summit Avenue,
St. Paul, Minnesota.

May 6, 1919.

My Dear Mr. George:

June 4, 1919.

Because of my preoccupation with other matters I have not been able sooner to reply to your letter of May 6.

You assail the figures published and the conclusions reached in the article that I wrote upon "The Index Number Wage" for The Outlook upon the ground that the former are not practically correct and the latter gives the agitator an argument from statistics. You say further that any practical housekeeper knows that his living expenses have not advanced two hundred per cent since 1896.

Inasmuch as I believe that the agitator is helped rather than hindered by any attempt to suppress or distort the facts and the truth, I shall publish this my reply to your letter in The Outlook and call your attention to the subjoined comparison between the wholesale prices of nearly all the more important staples of life on January 1, 1896, and the prices for the same articles on October 1, 1918. You will notice that with only six exceptions the advance recorded is well in excess of two hundred per cent, and the average is two hundred and forty-four per cent. The exceptions are coffee, No. 1 buff hides, structural steel beams, wire nails, cut nails, and iron bars. Since October 1, 1918, the price of coffee has advanced until it is now nearly thirty-six per cent above the quotations of 1896.

In view of these figures, I think you will admit that your strictures upon the accuracy of my statistics are undeserved.

No statistics as to the rents paid throughout the United States are available. Real estate values and rents are always the last factors in the cost of living to advance, and are generally the last to decline, but I am inclined to think that you will find that rents will have advanced fully two hundred per cent on the average before the present cycle of high prices has been completed.

Yours very truly,
THEODORE H. PRICE.

J. F. George, Esq.,
1950 Summit Avenue,
St. Paul, Minnesota.

	About Jan. 1, 1896	About Oct. 1, 1918	Per cent Increase Oct. 1, 1918 over Jan. 1, 1896
Wheat . . . . .	68	237½	249
Corn . . . . .	34½	158¾	364
Cotton, middling . . . . .	8.31	34.30	313
Live hogs . . . . .	4.00	19.00	375
Pork, mess. . . . .	9.00	43.50	383
Lard, Western. . . . .	5.55	26.55	378
Coffee, Rio No. 7 . . . . .	14¼	9¾	31 <sup>1</sup>
Hides:
No. 1 native steers . . . . .	8½	30	253
No. 1 Texas steers . . . . .	7¾	28	261
Colorado steers . . . . .	6½	27	315
Cows, heavy native . . . . .	7½	28	273
Branded cows . . . . .	6½	23	254
No. 1 country steers . . . . .	7½	24	220
No. 1 buff hides. . . . .	7¼	21½	196
No. 1 calf skins . . . . .	9	34	277
Cotton Goods:
Brown sheetings, standard . . . . .	5¾	20⅞	263
Wide sheetings . . . . .	20	75	275
Brown sheetings, 4-yard . . . . .	4¾	17½	268
Brown drills, standard . . . . .	5¾	21½	274
Staple ginghams . . . . .	5½	19½	254
Woolen Goods:
Clay worsted, 16-oz. . . . .	1.02½	4.15	305
Fancy cassimere . . . . .	1.10	3.50	218
Iron and Steel:
Bessemer iron, Pittsburgh . . . . .	11.40	36.60	221
Gray Forge iron, Pittsburgh . . . . .	11.25	34.40	206
Structural beams, Pittsburgh . . . . .	1.50	3.00	100
Wire nails, Pittsburgh . . . . .	2.25	3.50	55
Cut nails, Pittsburgh . . . . .	2.00	4.00	100
Iron bars, ref., Philadelphia . . . . .	1.30	3.73	187
			Average 244

<sup>1</sup> Decrease

NEW ORLEANS

AMERICAN industries are invited to consider the advantages offered by the New Orleans Inner Harbor or Industrial Canal, one of the really great engineering triumphs of national development.

This new Inner Harbor, now well on its way to completion, will rank with the half dozen greatest world canals, with a depth of water equaled only by those of Panama, Suez and Kiel.

It will provide a direct outlet to the sea for the largest ships from the Harbor of New Orleans via Lake Pontchartrain, reducing by approximately one-half the distance from the port to the Gulf via the Mississippi River.

It will provide miles of ideal factory sites, on a fixed navigable water level, and served on the land side by the New Orleans Public Belt Railway, directly connecting with all trunk lines entering the city; all this within the city limits of New Orleans, with trolley service to all parts of the city, and with all other public utilities immediately at hand. These miles of factory sites may be acquired on long-time leases by private enterprises—something that is impossible on the city's river front, for the reason that that frontage has been permanently reserved for public development of facilities that shall be open to all commodity handlers alike and without preference or favor.

Within the Inner Harbor will be a turning basin, ample in size to permit the free movement of the largest ships. At the River end of the Harbor will be a great lock, with a minimum depth of water of 30 feet over the sill, to facilitate the passage of ships at whatever stage the River may be and to maintain the fixed water level in the Industrial Canal proper.

At the River entrance of the Inner Harbor the National Government is completing three great depot warehouses, six stories in height and with a combined capacity of 178,500 tons of miscellaneous goods. Serving these is a wharf and wharfhouse nearly half a mile in length. Two of these warehouses will be turned over to the Board of Commissioners of the Port of New Orleans for public use, and the third will be retained for Government use.

The construction work on the new Inner Harbor is in the hands of the genius that made the Panama Canal a reality—the Goethals Engineering Company. The enterprise is under the direct supervision of the Board of Port Commissioners, or Dock Board, a state institution. In this connection it may be said that the harbor of New Orleans as a whole furnishes a striking example of successful ownership and operation of public utilities. Sixty per cent of the port facilities have been built or developed by the Dock Board, and in the seventeen years this Board has had charge more than $15,000,000 has been expended on wharves, steel sheds, elevators and warehouses on the east bank of the Mississippi. These, with terminals built by the railroads, give New Orleans almost eight miles of docks, capable of accommodating at one time eighty vessels each 500 feet in length. All are served by the Public Belt Railroad, another triumph of public ownership and the only one of its kind in the country.

(This is the Third of a Series of Advertisements.)

Google

INNER HARBOR

The Port of New Orleans is one of the safest harbors in the world, and provides practically unlimited anchorage space. The depth of water on the anchorage grounds is from 60 to 80 feet at low stage, and the River depth on the harbor front is as much as 190 feet at some points.

In normal times prior to the European war New Orleans had taken rank as the second greatest seaport in the United States. With the certain expansion of world trade and with the tremendous additional advantages to be provided by the new Inner Harbor and Industrial Canal, New Orleans may confidently anticipate, not only a return to her former position among the nation's great ports, but a new industrial growth surpassing the hopes of the most optimistic of her admirers.

Through me the progressive business men of New Orleans and of the South ask American Business, in planning new and greater enterprises for the future, to weigh carefully the extraordinary advantages of seaport, manufacturing center and distribution point offered by the Port of New Orleans.

Write today on your business letterhead for the 64-page book, "The Book of New Orleans and the Industrial South," which gives in greater detail the facts concerning developments in this region. A copy will be sent you free for the asking, and I shall promptly furnish any further specific information you may desire.

Mr. American Business Man, the first great international educational business congress following Victory will be held in New Orleans September 21-26—The Associated Advertising Clubs of the World.

Its worth to you and to your business may only be measured by your ability to adopt and absorb. Domestic business and foreign trade problems will be discussed by master minds.

Come—and come prepared to obtain your share of the benefits.

Martin Behrman

Mayor of New Orleans.

(Copyright 1919, by Ferry-Hanly Advertising Company
New Orleans—Kansas City)

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of June 18, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home; and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: Easing Germany's Burden; Austria Complains.

Reference: Pages 273, 274.

Questions:

1. Give several reasons why the Peace Conference should or should not ease Germany's burden. 2. Discuss whether the civilized world should ever forget that Germany was an enemy and a criminal. 3. The Outlook evidently believes that the amount of money required from Germany should not now be limited to a fixed sum, but should be determined by facts as they are gathered in the future. Tell which method you consider the better and why. 4. Would it be well to admit Germany to the League of Nations rather soon, if that would keep her from forming a rival league? Reasons. 5. Study the map on page 273. Discuss whether the Allies have treated Austria too severely. 6. Comment on the following reference to the Peace Treaty: "It is the same kind of peace as the peace concluded after any war of older time."

B. Topic: The Senate and the Peace Treaty; Making the League a Personal Issue.

Reference: Pages 273, 274; 278, 279.

Questions:

1. What leads The Outlook to conclude that the Senate has rendered a good service in voting to print in the "Record" the full text of the Peace Treaty and to investigate the question of the Treaty getting into the hands of private citizens? Tell why you do or do not agree with The Outlook. 2. The Outlook believes that "Senators have good reason to feel that all opportunities for performing their Constitutional duties have been denied by the President." Is The Outlook right in this matter? Discuss our treaty-making power. 3. Who is responsible for making the League a personal and partisan issue? Discuss at length. 4. Give several reasons why it is a grave duty for the American people "to hear a full and free discussion of the Peace Treaty's merits and defects"? 5. Read an excellent book by David J. Hill, "The Rebuilding of Europe" (Century).

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: Striking Against Everybody; A Division Among Radical Thinkers; Popular Fallacies.

Reference: Pages 274, 275; 280.

Questions:

1. Make clear what is meant by a sympathetic strike. Do you believe in this sort of strike? Reasons. 2. What are public utilities? Should those engaged in such activities ever strike? Tell why or why not. 3. Write out a set of principles which you think should guide American labor and capital. 4. Discuss whether whatever helps the cause of labor is moral. 5. How would you deal with those who believe in violence and utter threats of violence? 6. Distinguish between reasonable and unreasonable radicals and agitators. 7. Discuss the possibility of harmonious co-operation between capital and labor. Must the struggle between the two be never-ending? 8. Express in six sentences the substance of Dr. Abbott's comments on page 280. 9. Discuss why you think he wrote the editorial on "Popular Fallacies." 10. Would there be fewer strikes by those engaged in public utilities activities if such activities were owned and controlled by the Government? Compare and illustrate in answering. 11. You ought to read, in the new and revised edition of Bryce's "The American Commonwealth" (Macmillan), pages 613-654.

B. Topic: Impressions of a Modern Legislature; Party Leadership.

Reference: Pages 286, 291, 292; 278.

Questions:

(Read references in the order given.) 1. Express very briefly what you gather Senator Davenport's impressions of a modern legislature are. 2. Has he described fairly well the kind of men in and the methods of your own State Legislature? Illustrate. 3. What is lobbying? Should the present system or any other system of it be permitted? Reasons. 4. If a foreigner should ask you to describe some of the defects and some of the virtues in our governmental system, what would you tell him they are? 5. Discuss how these defects can be remedied. 6. Give reasons why a democracy cannot long survive without intelligent leadership. 7. You should own and study three impressive books: "The Citizen's Part in Government," by Elihu Root; "Conditions of Progress in Democratic Government," by C. E. Hughes; and "Popular Government," by W. H. Taft (all published by Yale University Press).

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. All peoples should support their governments whether right or wrong. 2. No President can seriously harm the United States.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for June 18, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Pretext, reason, argument (273); fiasco, sinuous, crafty, preconcerted, sinister (291).

A booklet suggesting methods of using the Weekly Outlines of Current History will be sent on application

THE NEW BOOKS

This Department will include descriptive notes, with or without brief comments, about books received by The Outlook. Many of the important books will have more extended and critical treatment later

FICTION

Across the Stream. By E. F. Benson. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Mr. Benson has never written with greater charm than in his picture of the child life of Archie in this story. There is a psychic element, delicately treated in its inception but as it grows to be the real theme less interesting to the imaginative appreciation of those who are not believers in psychic phenomena.

Gay-Donbays (The). By Sir Harry Johnston. The Macmillan Company, New York.

The author, a distinguished African explorer and administrator, has in this his first novel carried out the singular fancy of making most of his characters descendants of the characters in Dickens's "Domby and Son." Florence Domby and Walter Gay of the old story actually survive here and are prosperous and influential under the Gay-Domby name. Lovers of Dickens will enjoy the ingenuity and surprises in this queer plan—how it will strike those unfortunate moderns who know not Dickens is another question. But quite apart from that the story is a remarkable one—audacious in its references to actual people and the glimpses of traits of known persons under fictitious guises; absorbing in many episodes; permeated with knowledge of English society, politics, colonial policy, trade, and exploration, and much else—all presented with humorous touches. It is a fascinating book in some parts and an original book in all parts. Mr. H. G. Wells's prefatory note is a capital introduction; informal, keen, and frankly critical as well as laudatory.

King's Widow (The). By Mrs. Baillie Reynolds. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A supposedly widowed youthful Queen of Pannonia, a mythical Balkan state, has never seen her husband (they were married by proxy), but she soon knows or believes that he is alive, and the reader's game is to pick him out from among the numerous characters. There is plenty of incident and plot.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Jim, The Story of a Backwoods Police Dog. By Major Charles G. D. Roberts. The Macmillan Company, New York.

Here is a dog story with plenty of thrills in it. Jim is a wonderful dog and has remarkable adventures, which are not the less entertaining because they do not pretend to be merely matter-of-fact. A story or two about the war, included in the book, relate to the experiences that have given this well-known author his military title.

Rainbow Island. By Edna A. Brown. Illustrated. The Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company, Boston.

An out-of-door story for girls with a patriotic purpose.

BIOGRAPHY

Fifty Years of a Showman's Life. By Thomas F. Plowman. Illustrated. The John Lane Company, New York.

An American's psychological reaction to the title of this book will probably give him a mental picture of the circus; but the book has nothing to do with such a "show." It tells in somewhat discursive style of the experiences of the manager of that eminently respectable British institution, the agricultural show. "Country gen-

Forward—together!

FROM your country's rich mines, from fertile soil, from uncut forest, American Industry seeks raw materials to fashion into the myriad needs of modern life.

But our industrial greatness is only partly due to bountiful nature. Unless men and management, with hands joined, are backed by invested capital, the wheels of industry will clog and halt.

American Industry will need added capital to produce the foods and manufactured goods which the world demands. This forward movement will mean a prospering nation of full-time workers—resulting in more profit for all.

The needed money to "carry on" will be raised by industrial bonds which will be offered to the public.

Such bonds are the safe means by which the American people, their principal carefully protected, share in the earnings of American Industry and, therefore, in American prosperity.

If chosen under sound advice, these bonds are dependable income-bearing "promises to pay." Their soundness is backed by the actual properties themselves.

A thorough, painstaking analysis of each issue precedes our offering of bonds to the men and women of the country. Our recommendations are at the free disposal of everyone who has learned the habit of saving money and now wishes to put that money to work.

You will find a National City Company Correspondence Office in 47 of the leading cities of the country.

In each of these offices you can purchase Government, Municipal, Railroad, Industrial, and Public Utility Bonds of the highest character.

Each of these offices is equipped to render unusual service to investors generally, and to bond buyers in particular.

The National City Company
National City Bank Building, New York

BONDS
SHORT TERM NOTES
ACCEPTANCES

Digitized by Google

A Comparison of Costs

A graphic picture of the high cost of doing business is shown by the rise in a long list of commodity prices during the past five strenuous years.

By the exercise of unparalleled economies, telephone rates have been kept almost unchanged.

The fact is, the increase in the cost of commodities has resulted in what is equal to a decrease in telephone rates. In other words: The dollar which was spent for the telephone has bought more than twice as much as the dollar spent for the commodity.

The activities of reconstruction which are now upon the nation have put a great burden upon the telephone. This condition has made necessary an advance in telephone rates.

This advance does not exceed an average of eight percent; almost negligible as compared with the advances in other lines of industry, yet enough to cover the increase in the cost of operation.

Only through adequate revenue can there be assured the maintenance of a high standard of telephone service.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

One Policy

One System

Universal Service

The Greatest Reading Circle

YOUR boy joins the world's greatest reading circle when he takes The American Boy. Five hundred thousand boys read THE AMERICAN BOY. They like it best. Their parents approve its tone. It has more stories, departments and special features. Let him join this wholesome company today.

The Sprague Pub. Co.
3 American Bldg.
Detroit, Mich.

$1.00 a year
see a copy

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequalled for Social Center Work
Send 35c today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"
THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

"The Most Beautiful Hymnal in the American Church"

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett, Editors
The Hymnal for the New Social Era
Adapted to all Evangelical Denominations
Prices $92 and $112 per hundred.
Returnable copy sent on request
THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 702 E. 4th St., CHICAGO

The New Books (Continued)

tlemen" of both England and America will find Mr. Plowman's reminiscences interesting.

MISCELLANEOUS

Behind the Motion-Picture Screen. By Austin C. Leascarboura. Illustrated. The Scientific American Publishing Company, New York.

Here is a book that will delight the thousands of intelligent people who love the picture drama and yet are nonplused by many of its apparent mysteries. It can be thoroughly recommended both for its lucid and entertaining text and its exceptionally attractive illustrations.

Book of the Home Garden (The). By Edith Loring Fullerton. Introduction by Arthur D. Dean. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Industry and Humanity. A Study in the Principles Underlying Industrial Reconstruction. By the Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, C.M.G. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

Mr. Mackenzie King is an authority on industrial problems, both by reason of his practical experience in dealing with them as former Minister of Labor in Canada and by reason of his broad and intelligent human spirit. In discussing the desired union of labor and capital under the inspiration of a common ideal this volume deals rather more with the fundamental principles and the fundamental spirit of humanity underlying and embodied in those principles than with specific methods, and this fact gives to it a special value in these times of industrial and international unrest.

War Garden Victorious (The). By Charles Lathrop Pack. Illustrated. The J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

Last summer and the summer before we had millions of war gardens. They produced hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of food. As a result, last summer a billion and more jars of vegetables and fruits were put up. We had community canneries and dehydration plants; we had gardens established by great industrial and transportation concerns for their employees. The vacant lots in many communities were turned into war gardens. Many people who had never handled a hoe learned how. The prime agent for all this was the National War Garden Commission, with Charles Lathrop Pack as President. With characteristic prevision Mr. Pack foresaw that gardening would be a war necessity. A month before we entered the war he organized the above-mentioned Commission. It printed short lessons in gardening in the daily papers, and it printed a book, of which it gave away several million copies. It aroused enthusiasm for gardening, not only to save France and England and Italy and other countries from starvation, but for gardening's own sake. We are particularly glad to note that the author emphasizes in this volume the social as well as the economic side of gardening.

War Romance of the Salvation Army (The). By Evangeline Booth and Grace Livingston Hill. Illustrated. The J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

A stirring account of the war work of the Salvation Army, particularly with reference to the part played in the war by the American branch of the Army. The book is replete with anecdotes and pictures and will interest even people to whom the Salvation Army as a religious movement is uninteresting.

Whole Truth About Alcohol (The). By George Elliot Flint. Introduction by Dr. Abraham Jacobi. The Macmillan Company, New York.

THE FRANKLIN SEDAN

THE chief reason why men and women haven't insisted upon enclosed cars for all-around use before, is because they have wrongly supposed that none could be separated from limited use, hard-riding heavy weight, and excessive expense.

The Franklin Sedan has proved to motorists that the convenience and real protection that only a fine enclosed car can give are obtainable with unrestricted use, comfortable riding and economy.

Only through the exclusively Franklin combination of light weight and flexibility has there been achieved in the sedan type of car a road range, ease of control, safety and riding resilience superior to the average open car.

To this unrestricted roadability is added all-season usability, because Direct Air Cooling (no water to boil or freeze) permits motoring without fear of heat or cold. And the concrete evidence that the Franklin Sedan is unusual in every respect is its average of economy—

*20 miles to the gallon of gasoline
12,500 miles to the set of tires
50% slower yearly depreciation*

Not alone in performance does the Franklin Sedan lead. Its Wide Observation Windows giving unobstructed outlook, Single Wide Doors which increase view and aid accessibility, and the Slanting V-shaped Windshield with its fine lines and free driving vision make it structurally the leading sedan.

FRANKLIN AUTOMOBILE COMPANY, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

A PROMINENT CALIFORNIA BUSINESS MAN
WRITES CONCERNING HIS ENCLOSED FRANKLIN:

"For every purpose, especially long trips, it is the most practical car. In less than a year I covered 16,000 miles and twenty-one states. Despite weather and roads, summer and winter, I averaged 18 4-5 miles to the gallon of gasoline, and well over 12,000 miles to the set of tires."

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT

All legitimate questions from Outlook readers about investment securities will be answered either by personal letter or in these pages. The Outlook cannot, of course, undertake to guarantee against loss resulting from any specific investment. Therefore it will not advise the purchase of any specific security. But it will give to inquirers facts of record or information resulting from expert investigation, leaving the responsibility for final decision to the investor. And it will admit to its pages only those financial advertisements which after thorough expert scrutiny are believed to be worthy of confidence. All letters of inquiry regarding investment securities should be addressed to

THE OUTLOOK FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York

Now That the War Is Over—

And normal conditions are returning, it seems fitting to remind the public that the record of S. W. Straus & Co., without loss to any investor, has been maintained through the trying times of the last five years.

Every bondholder has been paid promptly in cash, both principal and interest, on the days due, without loss or delay.

Sound 6% July Investments

For July investment, we offer a widely diversified list of first mortgage 6% serial bonds, safeguarded under the Straus Plan.

Each bond issue has been purchased by us from the borrowing corporation, after careful investigation, and is offered with our full recommendation as a thoroughly safeguarded investment. Denominations, $1,000 and $500. Maturities, two to fifteen years. Every investor should write today for our

July Circular No. C -905

S.W. STRAUS & CO.

Established 1862

Incorporated

NEW YORK

CHICAGO

150 Broadway

Straus Building

DETROIT
Penobscot Bldg.

MINNEAPOLIS
Loeb Arcade Bldg.

SAN FRANCISCO
Crocker Bldg.

PHILADELPHIA
Stock Exchange Bldg.

Thirty-seven Years Without Loss to Any Investor

WHEN, AS, AND IF

BY dint of hard work and proficiency in the art of spending one accumulates a competence. But, having attained at last a sufficiency of capital above one's actual requirements, the majority run upon an unsuspected impediment—a snag of enormous proportions—as suddenly they are confronted by the query, "How shall we make our savings work for us at the greatest possible speed without jeopardizing our principal?"

The sagacious investor, small or large, gives consideration, often impulsive and transitory, to this specter, this bugaboo, of the world of finance; but the day's pace is so fast and the inclination to investigate for one's self so weak that the matter is passed over and the judgment of others relied upon; whereas by slight application and practice one may himself become skilled in making an analysis of his own investment needs and a selection, not merely of the type, but of the actual security adequate and appropriate to his capital and income requirements.

Many excellent works on this interesting subject are available for any one who will take the trouble to look for them, various courses of study are open at little or no expense, and any banker or attorney should be able to suggest readable books if you express an interest.

After having learned to make up one's own mind, perhaps the next greatest difficulty to be overcome is exploding the theory to one's own complete satisfaction that large fortunes are made overnight, by chance, and that the road to success is more quickly covered if one's income—necessarily temporary if it is out of all proportion to a fair return on capital—is obtained from questionable sources. Of what value is even a guaranteed interest return on a bond which will not be paid at maturity? Only the accumulated value of the interest, is it not? Industry, small beginnings, and patience overcome many obstacles which seem at first insurmountable, and of all the worth-while attributes for a successful investor, probably the greatest is patience—and how few of us have any! However, patience and four per cent will accomplish wonders if we only will give them the opportunity.

In attempting to acquire financial independence it is not so much a question of how much one earns, but how much one accumulates, and, no matter how frugal one's habits may be, the result of losses through injudicious investments may offset any accomplishment obtained by self-denial.

Man's period of accumulation is limited, and vigilance and study will have a great deal to do in preventing failure and financial dependency. The wisdom of the judgment of able bankers, combined with the knowledge a prospective investor has of his own requirements in the judicious investing of his surplus funds, will insure the greatest accumulation by the time a man reaches the age of forty-five. By the time a man reaches this age he has certainly had time to accumulate money, but the saving has been spasmodic and temporary, and statistics show that at the age of forty-five most men have lost or spent nearly all of what they have made up to that time, and the same statistics demonstrate that after fifty not one person in one hundred who has lost his financial footing can regain it, and at the age of sixty-five eighty-five per

A view of Commonwealth Edison Co. plant, Chicago, in whose First Mortgage 5% Bonds we have dealt for years

Back of Your Bond

TWO VERY DEFINITE ASSURANCES of safety stand behind every corporation bond which we recommend for the investment of our customers' funds:

First The assets and earnings of a well established and successful business of which the Commonwealth Edison Co. of Chicago is an example. We do not offer the bonds of companies in a promotional or construction stage, but only those of demonstrated credit and earnings.

Second Our own experience and judgment gained over a period of years in the selection and distribution of large amounts of such securities. Before any of our bonds are offered to our customers, they have first been purchased outright with our own funds and only after the most exacting investigations on the part of our own, and frequently independent, experts to assure ourselves of their safety.

If you are concerned with the safe investment of your funds—irrespective of their amount—you will be interested in our current list of offerings. Write today for circular O M 1

HALSEY, STUART & CO.

INCORPORATED—SUCCESSORS TO
N. W. HALSEY & CO., CHICAGO

CHICAGO 200 S. LA SALLE ST.	NEW YORK 40 WALL ST.	PHILADELPHIA LAND TITLE BUILDING	BOSTON 50 STATE ST.
MILWAUKEE FIRST NAT. BANK BLDG.	DETROIT FORD BUILDING	ST. LOUIS SECURITY BLDG.

THE FEDERAL INCOME TAX necessitates an accurate record of your bond and security holdings
Our LOOSE LEAF SECURITY RECORD will be sent without charge upon request for Book O M 2

PREFERRED STOCK

of a New York State Industrial NOW PAYING 10%

Unusual protection and safety
Business established 16 years
Earnings large

No bonds or notes outstanding
Product in demand everywhere
Company makes 1/4 World's supply
PRICE 101 1/2

A. D. CONVERSE & CO.

5 Nassau St., New York

PHILADELPHIA

BALTIMORE

DANFORTH FARM MORTGAGES

represent the highest type of investments. They have stood the test of wars and business depression since 1858—60 years, and always worth 100%.

Interest paid promptly at maturity.

FARM MORTGAGE BONDS in $500 and $1,000 denominations

For further information regarding our Farm Loans and Bonds write for Booklet and Investors' List No. 58.

A-G-Danforth-&Co

BANKERS
WASHINGTON

Founded A.D. 1858

ILLINOIS

Dividend Paying Stocks

of the country's leading industrial and oil corporations are reviewed in the latest issue of our fortnightly pocket magazine

"Investment Opportunities"

The present era of unexampled prosperity offers to the investor a unique opportunity to share in the record earnings now being made by the country's large industrial companies. Our booklet provides an easy method of systematic saving and investing so that dividends are yours from the start.

The Twenty Payment Plan

Upon request we will send "Investment Opportunities" to you regularly without charge together with our booklet "The Twenty Payment Plan."

Write for Issue OL-6-

SLATTERY & CO

Investment Securities

40 Exchange Place, New York

When you travel—take
Guaranty Travelers Checks

ACCCEPTABLE as money everywhere—yet safer than cash. They can be cashed in the United States and abroad at leading banks, and are accepted in settlement of bills by hotels and business houses, and at railroad offices for transportation.

Ideal for traveling and vacations—inexpensive—get them at your bank

Guaranty Trust Company of New York

New York London Liverpool Paris Brussels

Capital & Surplus $50,000,000 Resources over $700,000,000

WELL-SECURED STEEL BONDS NETTING 7%

First mortgage bonds in denominations of $500 and $1,000.

Security nearly 2½ to 1.

Favorably located.

Earnings 4 to 1.

Ownership unusually strong.

Profitable market for output.

Send for Circular No. 1037-Z

Peabody,
Houghteling & Co.

(ESTABLISHED 1865) (B496)

10 South La Salle Street
Chicago, Ill.

6%—Service—Safety

Our First Farm Mortgages and Real Estate Gold Bonds return 6% net. We look after collection of principal and interest without expense to you. Good agricultural lands as security. 35 years' experience without the loss of a dollar. Ask for descriptive pamphlet "8" and offerings. E. J. LANDER & CO., Grand Forks, N. D. Est. 1883. Capital and Surplus $500,000.00

In what to Invest

At no time has the market offered greater safety and high yield—in certain securities. Babson's Reports give you the facts on which investment values are based.

Avoid worry. Cease depending on rumors or luck. Recognize that all action is followed by equal reaction. Work with a definite policy based on fundamental statistics.

Particulars sent free.
Write Dept. O-39

Babson's Statistical Organization
Advisory Building Wellesley Hills, Mass.

Largest Organization of Its Character in the World

When, As, and If (Continued)

cent of persons still living are dependent upon relatives or charity.

Aside from the item of judicious investing there are other matters which have a broad bearing upon this state of affairs. Charge accounts are often opened with too great optimism, papers are signed without familiarizing one's self with their contents, savings are cut into because living expenses exceed income, and this last feature and the tendency to invest money on hopeful but dangerous hearsay, without knowledge of facts, are prime causes of indigency.

Speculative profits, if they come at all, come easily, and the money generally goes as fast as it comes, and the amount of money lost annually by small speculators who believe they are investors must be appalling. Investments of low yield, bonds that are legal for savings banks and trustees, and tax-exempt issues are too often ignored by the small investor, who in reality should make securities of this type his first choice. The thought of creating personal trusts or consulting with trust companies and obtaining their sound suggestions seldom occurs to the average man, and the fact that some one besides himself, although more able than he is, might have complete or partial control of his money does not, as a rule, appeal, but it is reasonable to assume that if the aid of a trust company had been sought and relied upon many men would be better off than if they had acted solely upon their own judgment.

The majority of traders will probably continue to make commitments on thin equities, although they perhaps realize that their stock in trade in old age will be today's savings, always hoping against hope that the "tip" that has just been given to them is opportunity knocking at their door. It has never knocked before and may never again, and they imagine that this is a chance which should be embraced. If it makes good, it may mean giving up a laborious job and may do away with the necessity of working for a paltry $25 or $50 a week. Although we realize that the farmer builds a granary to keep his corn safe and dry and banking institutions construct a strong vault, millions of owners of securities take many chances; and by no means the most dangerous and hazardous depository for our uninvested funds is the bureau drawer or the feather mattress, while the unscrupulous stock and bond dealers ply their trade. If we put up Liberty Bonds and other securities as margin to buy speculative oil stocks, and if we also fail to select a reliable and trustworthy broker, we have no one to blame but ourselves while the investment market is infested with bucket shops.

If your securities are now in the hands of unscrupulous dealers in securities, you may be able still to save some of your equity, and, although your speculative commitment has receded several points since the time you made your purchase, it will probably be worth your while to pay in cash your loss and demand your securities. If they are refused you and delivery is delayed to an unreasonable extent, you should obtain the services of your attorney, and, if he cannot recover your property shortly, take the matter up with the District Attorney. In short, find a place of safe-keeping for your securities; take them out of the bureau drawer and the bucket shop, and arrange a safe-keeping account or create a trust fund with some reliable institution, and in selecting from new and unseasoned securities remember that new issues of securities are offered When, As, and If delivered and issued, and at the bottom of a descriptive circular you will find a paragraph which reads as follows: "The above statements and statistics are derived from official sources or those we regard as reliable. We do not guarantee but believe them to be correct."

When, As, and If (Continued)

Can we ourselves not become capable judges? Isn't it well worth while to make an effort to learn?

THE TRACTION PROBLEM

The traction systems throughout the entire country are in a deplorable state. In the State of New York alone eleven companies are in the hands of receivers and many others are on the verge of bankruptcy. In general, the cause of this condition may be attributed to the great increase in the cost of operation and materials and the inability to obtain an increase in fare to offset these abnormal expenses. An auxiliary factor which has played its part in reducing the net earnings of many "tractions" is the jitney bus. The Public Service Corporation of New Jersey declares that the bus lines have affected their income to the extent of one and three-quarter million dollars during the past fiscal year.

The situation has gradually assumed the status of a National problem, and President Wilson recently appointed a Federal Electric Railways Commission to assist in finding a solution. This action has met with the decided approval of the public utilities officials. The Commission's plan of action has not been announced; few are hazarding guesses as to what it will be. However, all believe it cannot help improving existing conditions.

OUR NATION'S PUBLIC DEBT

The figures given below permit a quick comparison of our public debt subsequent to each of our great wars:

Revolutionary War.....	$76,781,953
War of 1812 .....	127,041,341
Mexican War .....	68,304,796
Civil War.....	2,844,649,616
European War.....	25,921,151,270

The European War figures were compiled by the Treasury Department at the end of May and do not represent our entire debt. New issues of certificates of indebtedness will be made in the near future.

LIMITING SPECULATION

During the past two weeks the stock market has received a rather drastic setback due in large part to the warning given by the Federal Reserve Bank regarding a possible over-extension in speculative commitments. We cannot look upon this warning in any other way than to feel that it has been a fortunate "happenstance," and as a result the stock market is in a healthier condition than it might have been had ruthless speculation been allowed to take its own course. There has unquestionably been a great deal of manipulation, and pools have been active in many of the shares listed on the Exchange and elsewhere and have been engaged in boosting prices of such stocks beyond their actual intrinsic value, and there is always a menace in such operations. These cliques have of course been assisted greatly by the great public buying and interest in the stock market, and on each reaction speculators have stood ready to make new purchases. The public is said to be in this market to a

Helping Europe Rebuild

Europe is struggling to rebuild what war has destroyed. The task is tremendous. Her granaries are almost empty, her resources are at the lowest ebb. Widespread dearth of reconstruction materials further impedes progress.

Naturally Europe turns to America as the chief source of supply. War hugely expanded production in this country without serious damage to general industry. Meeting the needs of Europe becomes, therefore, an opportunity of service as well as the means of extending and developing business abroad.

Manufacturers and merchants interested in European trade find the National Shawmut Bank of Boston particularly well qualified to render practical assistance. Our Foreign Department is manned by officers who know the business and banking methods of Europe from years of experience in the various countries.

Direct connections with leading banks of the Continent enable this Bank to finance shipments, arrange credits, and handle collections everywhere upon a recognized economic basis.

Shawmut Service is practicalized, answering every banking requirement of business men at home and abroad.

THE NATIONAL SHAWMUT BANK of Boston

Resources over $200,000,000

Correspondence invited. Our booklets on "Acceptances" and "The Webb Law" explain methods of financing and developing foreign trade. Write for copies.

We will pay you well for your spare time

As a Subscription Representative of The Outlook you can make a handsome income out of your spare hours—easily and pleasantly. We will gladly tell you how. Write to-day, asking for details about The Outlook's Co-operative Profit Plan. Address Representatives' Division, Desk B.

The Outlook Company
381 Fourth Avenue, New York City

If you are thinking about INVESTMENTS—

Our BOND DEPARTMENT may be of value to you through the INFORMATION ON INVESTMENTS that it can furnish.

Our AIM is to HELP INVESTORS by analyzing securities; thus enabling them to avoid making unwise investments.

Our POLICY is to offer to investors only SUCH SECURITIES as WE BUY for our own account.

Our PRESENT OFFERINGS, a description of which will be sent on request, include United States Government bonds, bonds of Foreign Governments, high grade municipal, railroad, public utility and industrial bonds, yielding from 4.40% to 6.50%.

If you are thinking about BANKING—

Our BANKING and FOREIGN DEPARTMENTS, with world-wide facilities established through the greatest banks in all countries, may be of value to you in many ways, for example:

- financing imports and exports
- handling commercial banking, domestic and foreign
- handling personal active or inactive deposits
- depositing funds for special purposes
- securing credit and trade information, foreign and domestic
- collecting foreign coupons
- transferring funds by telegraph and cable
- issuing travellers' credits in dollars and sterling
- issuing documentary credits payable in all parts of the world
- handling practically every kind of financial transaction

BANKERS TRUST COMPANY

Member Federal Reserve System

New York

Downtown
Office:
16 Wall Street

Astor Trust
Office:
5th Ave. at 42d St.

When, As, and If (Continued)

degree never before known in history, and this public has confidence in the great future of this country, for America has come out of this war with its resources unimpaired, with enormous sums owing to it, and the whole world in need of everything we can produce for a long time to come. The business man, the wage-earner, and the farmer are all prosperous, and, aside from a possible tightening of money or the failure of peace negotiations, we may expect the stock market to continue to discount future prosperity by a continued upward trend in prices with periodical recessions.

FOREIGN FINANCE

A new issue of $25,000,000 Swedish Government twenty-year 6 per cent bonds, brought out by a syndicate headed by some of the largest bankers in the country, is perhaps the most interesting occurrence in the world of finance since the signing of the armistice. This issue is the forerunner of the type of security we may confidently expect to see promulgated during the balance of this year, and probably through 1920. We well know that a great deal of foreign finance must be successfully accomplished in this country, and it is to be hoped that this Swedish Government issue may be as successfully placed as was the smaller issue of Rio de Janeiro bonds a few days ago.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENT

During the past two years railway equipment has deteriorated very rapidly because of neglect and rough handling. Unless action in the form of extensive buying of equipment is taken soon it is feared that we may face a car shortage. Accordingly there has been every reason to expect a large buying movement by the Railroad Administration before the Peace Treaty is signed, as at that time Europe and South America will probably enter the equipment market, and the needs of this country should be taken care of first. It has just been announced that a single issue of Equipment Trust Certificates to the amount of possibly $500,000,000 will be arranged for within the next few days. This would enable the Railroad Administration to purchase and pay for about 100,000 freight cars and 2,000 locomotives, and would place the equipment of the railways of this country in a very different position from that existing to-day.

How to Sell Your Real Estate

Any Kind—Anywhere

I got cash for my property in less than two weeks. Made sale myself so had no commission to pay. You can do the same with The Simplex Plans for Selling Real Estate. No matter where located, these practical, scientific plans will show you how to sell your property—quickly and for cash—without employing agents or paying commissions. Investigate at once. Learn how easily you can use the Simplex Plans, just as I did, to sell your real estate. Write today (a postal will do) to

The Simplex Co.

Dept. 66, 1123 Broadway, N. Y.

They will send you full particulars without cost or obligation.

Quick Results!

"Sold for cash in 10 days. Recommend your methods."—Wm. H. Cartland, Mass. "Your method sold my farm for cash."—Mrs. L. A. Childs, Minn. "Sold my property. Your plan is the best I ever saw."—Johnson String, N. J. "Sold my hotel for $5,375."—G. P. Stewart, Ill.

If you want extra money— The Outlook wants you

If you can use an extra $10.00 or $20.00 a week, and if you are anxious to earn this much or more by putting in your spare time conscientiously, The Outlook is in a position to offer you the opportunity of providing yourself a handsome annual income—an income that builds up, almost automatically, year after year.

The work consists simply in taking subscriptions for The Outlook in the homes of your community where this illustrated weekly journal of current events should be a regular weekly visitor—and this means practically all the good homes in your vicinity. You can give as much or as little time as you like, and your profits are immediate and generous, on new subscriptions and renewals alike. The more time you give, the more you will make.

The Outlook, as you know, is one of the fine old standard publications of this country, a publication which for fifty years has stood for everything that is best in the development of our National life. It would not have its hundreds of thousands of readers unless it filled a very definite need in their lives.

Intelligent people want The Outlook. They don't have to be induced or persuaded to subscribe to it. They want it.

This is a splendid opportunity for any man or woman who would like to earn extra money, and who is willing to work in a pleasant way to earn it. But The Outlook does not want everybody; there is no opportunity here for the person who is looking for "easy money" or something for nothing. The Outlook wants wide-awake, active representatives—and such people The Outlook will pay well.

Write to-day, asking for details of The Outlook's Money-Making Plan, addressing Desk B, Representatives' Division.

The Outlook

381 Fourth Avenue, New York City

THE OUTLOOK CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING SECTION

Advertising Rates: Hotels and Resorts, Apartments, Tours and Travel, Real Estate, etc., fifty cents per agate line, four columns to the page. Not less than four lines accepted. In calculating space required for an advertisement, count an average of six words to the line unless display type is desired.

"Want" advertisements, under the various headings, "Board and Rooms," "Help Wanted," etc., ten cents for each word or initial, including the address, for each insertion. The first word of each "Want" advertisement is set in capital letters without additional charge. Other words may be set in capitals, if desired, at double rates. If answers are to be addressed in care of The Outlook, twenty-five cents is charged for the box number named in the advertisement. Replies will be forwarded by us to the advertiser and bill for postage rendered. Special headings appropriate to the department may be arranged for on application.

Orders and copy for Classified Advertisements must be received with remittance ten days before the date of issue when it is intended the advertisement shall first appear.

Address: ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT, THE OUTLOOK, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

Tours and Travel

Hudson River by Daylight

In planning your summer vacation be sure to include the delightful daylight sail between New York and Albany

Direct rail connections to the Catskills, Berkshires, Adirondacks, Saratoga, Lake George, Lake Champlain, Niagara Falls and all points North, East and West

All through rail tickets between New York and Albany accepted

FOUR FAMOUS STEAMERS Service Daily, including Sunday

Hudson River Day Line

Desbrosses Street Pier, N. Y.

JAPAN CHINA

Limited Party Sailing
SEPTEMBER 21, 1919

EGYPT AND PALESTINE
Spring and Summer 1920

The Battlefields of France
in the Summer of 1920

H. W. DUNNING & CO.
6 Beach St., Boston, Mass.

"Canadian Tour Extraordinary"

July — Private Car — August

Cool northern route across continent. 1,200 mile cruise great Peace River, visiting old fur trading posts of the past. 1,000 mile cruise beautiful British Columbia coast, visiting Indian and totem pole villages en route. 1,000 mile motor trip in garden of American Continent. 2 weeks camping in Canadian Rockies; every comfort. Reasonable. Ideal tour—$250 up.

CANADIAN TOURS

Pouch Mansion, Brooklyn, New York

Summer in the National Parks,
California, Canadian Rockies

Motoring, camping, tramping, horseback riding, rafting. Booklet. THE TEMPLE TOURS, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

Tours and Travel

"Travel Without Trouble"

PACIFIC NORTHWEST NATIONAL PARKS ALASKA

Tours de Luxe leave during June, July and August, visiting all the attractions of the Pacific Coast, the National Parks, Land of the Midnight Sun, California, Canadian and Colorado Rockies, etc.

JAPAN, CHINA

Summer Tours leave June 23, July 10
Booklets on Request.

STEAMSHIP PASSAGES EVERYWHERE

Official Agents for All Lines
Tours arranged for Independent Travel Everywhere. Pullman and Hotel accommodation reserved in advance.

THOS. COOK & SON

245 Broadway, New York
Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Montreal, Toronto

YARMOUTH NOVA SCOTIA

NO HAY FEVER. Summer temperature averages 70 degrees at noon. First-class hotels and boarding houses. Boating, bathing, salt and fresh water fishing, shooting, golf. Excellent roads; direct steamer from Boston. Write for Booklet. J. BOND GRAY, Sec'y Tourist Committee, 243 Main St.

Hotels and Resorts

CANADA

"Highlands of Ontario" Canada

Millions of acres of pine and balsam with thousands of lakes and streams. The mecca for outdoor men and women. "Akosquin Park," "Muskegon Lakes," "30,000 Islands of Georgian Bay," "Timagami," "Kawartha Lakes," "Lake of Bays." Modern hotels. Good fishing and delightful climate. Altitude 1,000 to 2,000 feet above the sea. Write for illus. literature: C. C. Orthmayer, 907 Merchants Lane & Trust Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

W. R. Eastman, Room 510, 291 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

H. M. Morris, 1019 Chamber of Commerce Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.

J. H. Burge, 519 Dime Bank Bldg., Detroit, Mich.

A. R. Chown, 1270 Broadway, New York City, N. Y.

For adults', boys' or girls' camp sites apply to H. R. Charlton, General Passenger Department, Montreal

Hotels and Resorts

CANADA

MYRTLE HOUSE
Digby, Nova Scotia
Queen of Canadian Resorts
Ideal Climate
Golf, fishing, boating, bathing.
Cuisine the best. Booklet.
HERRICK & SELLMAN

CONNECTICUT

Kent, Litchfield Co., Conn.
Accommodations at moderate weekly rates.
JEAN GORDON, ANN HOPSON.

INTERLAKEN INN Lakeville, Conn.
Between two lakes: fishing, bathing, golf, tennis; excellent table. Write Manager.

THE WAYSIDE INN
New Milford, Litchfield Co., Conn.
In the foothills of the Berkshires. Open all the year. An ideal place for your summer's rest. 2 hours from New York. Write for booklet.
Mrs. J. E. Castle, Proprietor.

NORFOLK INN
Norfolk, Litchfield County. Elevation 1,500 feet. Ideal summer, fine auto roads, saddle horses, all modern improvements. Modern garage storage, 50c. HENRY R. SWERT, Prop.

MAINE

THE HOMESTEAD
Bailey Island, Maine
Open June 15 to Sept. 15. Air, scene and table all of the best. Illustrated booklet on application. Thomas E. Hazell, Summit, N. J.

Robinhood Inn and Cottages
Bailey Island, Me., opened June 15. Bathing, fishing, sailing. For circular, Miss MANSIE.

BELGRADE LAKE CAMPS

Modern plumbing, all conveniences, fine table. Bass, trout, salmon fishing. An ideal vacation spot. Moderate rates.
Francis D. Thwing, Belgrade Lakes, Me.

Ye Headland Inn
TREFETHEN, CASCO BAY, MAINE

Ideal situation within fifty feet of ocean; most attractive natural scenery, pine woods, rocky coast; boating, bathing, fishing, riding. Cool days, restful nights. Artistic simplicity, homelike comfort, excellent table. Gas, pure water, bath. Booklet. Owner management.
Address WM. H. SIMON,
355 Gowen Ave., Mt. Airy, Philadelphia

DEVEREUX COTTAGES, CASTINE, ME.
open July 1 to September 15. For further particulars write to FERDINAND DEVEREUX.

"THE FIRS" Deer Isle (Sunset P. O.), Me.
Penobscot Bay Resort Region. Inn, cottages, tents. A summer home of comfort and beautiful outdoors. Rates moderate.
B. B. KNOWLTON, Haverford, Pa.

Lake Parlin House and CAMPS
In heart of Maine woods on beautiful lake.
HENRY B. MCKENNEY, Jackman Station, Me.

YORK CAMPS LOON LAKE, MAINE
In famous Rangeley region in heart of mountains facing lake. Private log cabins with open fire and bath. Central dining-room. Golf within easy reach; garage. Boating, bathing, fishing, mountain climbing. Farm one mile from camp furnishes fresh vegetables, eggs, poultry, certified milk.
Booklet. J. LEWIS YORK, Prop.

OGUNQUIT, MAINE HIGH ROCK HOTEL

Cottages, Studios, Bungalows.

Hotels and Resorts

MAINE

OGUNQUIT, MAINE
I am now ready to receive applications for boarders.
Mrs. D. W. PERKINS.

SEBASCO ESTATES CO.
SEBASCO, ME.

On Casco Bay—opposite Portland, Me. Hotel Club with modern bungalows and camps. 500 acres of hills, pine woods; 4 miles shore line, ocean, bay. Deep sea and lake fishing; indoor, outdoor, and water sports. Fresh sea food and garden vegetables our specialty. Auto shelter free. Rates $3.50 a day, $15 to $22 weekly. All references.
FREDMAN H. MERRITT, WILLIAM A. MILLS.

THE OCEAN HOUSE, YORK BEACH, ME. Leading hotel. Fine location. All conveniences. Excellent cuisine. Comfortable and homelike. Golf, tennis, beautiful drives, bathing and fishing. Ideal spot for children. Booklet. W. J. SIMPSON.

MASSACHUSETTS

THE CHARLESGATE HOTEL

BOSTON, MASS.

Just outside the limits of the hot city and yet only a few minutes to the shopping district, theaters, etc., by the subway train. Located in the residential section of the beautiful Back Bay, overlooking the Park and Charles River. Cool and comfortable accommodations by day or week at attractive rates.
HERBERT G. SUMMERS, Mgr.

Also operating the

Cliff Hotel

and COTTAGES

North Scituate Beach, Mass.

25 Miles from Boston. "On the Ocean Front."

Brooks Mansion

89 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass. American plan. Select family hotel; quiet, residential section; excellent table; elevator; near theatres and shopping district; homelike. Tourists accommodated—$3.50 per day and up. Suites—Two rooms and bath; single and double rooms.

CAPE COD THE PINES

COTUIT, MASS.

Boating, bathing excellent. Cottages. Ideal place for summer. Own garden. N. C. Morse.

If You Are Tired or Not Feeling Well you cannot find a more comfortable place in New England than

THE WELDON HOTEL

GREENFIELD, MASS.

It affords all the comforts of home without extravagance.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little house by the sea. PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

ATTLEBORO COTTAGE

OAK BLUFFS, MASS.

Opens last week in June, closes September 2. Booklets. L. W. BABCOCK.

The Lafayette Lodge and Cottages

WORTHINGTON, MASS.

A large airy house with spacious porches, electric lights, open fire, running hot and cold water in all rooms. Two rooms with private bath. In the Berkshire Hills, 1,500 feet elevation. Golf, tennis, etc. (Write for Booklet C.)

Hotels and Resorts

MASSACHUSETTS

Rock Ridge, Wellesley Hills, Mass. Fine location. Large, breezy, screened piazza. Running water in bedroom. Private baths. Eggs, berries, cream, chicken. Rates moderate.

WILLIAMSTOWN

BERKSHIRE HILLS, MASSACHUSETTS

THE GREYLOCK

At the Western End of the Mahawk Trail
NOW OPEN
Send for copy of "Williamstown the Village Beautiful"

NEW HAMPSHIRE

NEWFOUND LAKE

Brookside Inn and Bungalows
Bridgewater, N. H. Excellent cuisine. Boating, bathing, fishing, tennis, etc. Rates and booklet on request. G. T. Young, Prop.

ALBAMONT

In the Beautiful Pemigewasset Valley
A genuine old time New England Hotel with all modern conveniences

Table bountifully supplied with certified milk and cream from our herd of thoroughbred Guernseys, poultry, eggs, vegetables and berries from our own farms of 1,000 acres. For Booklet and Full Particulars write CHARLES M. BIDDLE, Mgr., Campton, New Hampshire

THE OUTLOOK

GEORGE'S MILLS, N. H.
On Beautiful Lake Sunapee
1,300 feet above sea level. Mountain climbing and all water sports. Healthful and cool. Send for booklet. GEO. H. GOULD, Prop.

Dexter Richards Hall

A comfortable Inn on a hilltop. 1,000 feet elevation. July and August. Weekly rates $14 to $21. Booklet.

MERIDEN, N. H.

"The Bird Village"

Moosilauke Inn

Invites You to the White Mountains

Come and enjoy the pure air, water from bubbling springs, wholesome food and wonderful scenery. Play golf and tennis. (No charge for golf.) Ride, drive, fish, and climb. A place where you get the delightful change that makes a real vacation. Rates moderate. Season opens July 1st. Write H. E. MacKee, Manager, Box 16, Breezy Point Warren, N. H.

NEW JERSEY

Hotel Thedford Asbury Park
Situating near the ocean and accessible to all points of interest. First class Family Hotel. Special attention to table. Booklet. Broad, breezy piazza. HARRY DUFFIELD, Prop.

The ENGLSIDE Beach Haven N. J.

Opened June 30. The best combination of seasonal features on the coast. Matchless bay for sailing and fishing, perfect beach and bathing. Five tennis courts. The Engleside has all the modern conveniences, private baths with sea and fresh water. Booklet. R. F. Engle, Mgr.

SURE RELIEF FROM HAY FEVER

NEW YORK CITY

The Margaret Louisa

of the Y. W. C. A.

14 East 16th St., New York
A homelike hotel for self-supporting women. Single rooms $1.00 per night. Double rooms (2 beds) $1.40 per night. Restaurant open to all women. Send for circular.

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square
adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

Hotels and Resorts

NEW YORK CITY

Hotel Le Marquis

31st Street & Fifth Avenue
New York

Combines every convenience and home comfort, and commands itself to people of refinement wishing to live on American Plan and be within easy reach of social and dramatic centers.
Room and bath $4.50 per day with meals, or $1.50 per day without meals.
Illustrated Booklet gladly sent upon request. JOHN P. TOLSON.

NEW YORK

FENTON HOUSE Adirondacks
18 Cottages
Altitude 1,571 ft. A noted place for health and rest. Write for folder and particulars.
C. FENTON PARKER, Number Four, N. Y.

GOLDTHWAITE INN
On Great South Bay, Bellport, L. I.
Cool, comfortable, charming Family Resort. Table supplied from own farm. Sports—sailing, fishing, ocean bathing, golf, tennis.

BLUE MOUNTAIN HOUSE

Blue Mountain Lake, N. Y.
Now open. High elevation. Beautiful mountain and lake scenery. Boating, fishing, autoing, etc. Illustrated booklet. M. T. Merwin, Prop.

Hotel Champlain

Bluff Point-on-Lake Champlain, N.Y.

HIGHEST point on lake—fireproof
—every room a front room—800
acres—tennis—18-hole golf course—concrete garage—boating, bathing, fishing, motor highways in all directions. Excellent cuisine, American plan. Management Mr. J. P. Greaves, of Florida East Coast Hotel. Booklet on request.

Open June 25th

New York Booking Office,
243 Fifth Avenue

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of widest Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, saddle horses. Trips to surrounding mountain peaks, Lake George and Lake Champlain. Dancing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14. $15 and up. Private parties suitably isolated. References required. Manager, BOYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

"Bittersweet" on Lake George

Rooms in a homelike and attractive cottage or in a tent if desired. Fresh vegetables and milk from the farm. Canoeing and boating in abundance. Rates $17.50 per week per person. Only a few guests accommodated at a time. Send all applications to Miss Emily Kimball, Hulet's Landing, Washington Co., N. Y.

Come to Camp Sacandaga on Lake

A camp for the lovers of the out-of-doors. Refined surroundings. Good table. Large lounge-hall. Cottages and tents for sleeping. Boats and canoes. Black bass fishing. Hikes into the woods. Nights around the camp-fire. Everything comfortable and homelike. Folder and terms upon application. Address CHAS. T. MYERS, Lake Pleasant, Hamilton Co., N. Y.

HOW would you like to live for 3 or 3 weeks or months, in cottage or hotel, on a strip of land VIRTUALLY SIX MILES AT SEA?

Where there are congenial neighbors and all of the conveniences of home. Where the breeze seldom stops blowing; where boating, bathing and fishing are daily pastimes and where the cost is reasonable. Do you know that only 50 miles from New York, is such a place?

POINT O' WOODS, L. I.

Direct inquiries to C. W. NASH, Supt., Point O' Woods, L. I.

Southworth Villa, in the Switzerland of Delaware Co. 650 ft. elevation. Homelike, restful, comfortable. Excellent table. Fresh dairy products and vegetables. Charming walks and drives. Golf, tennis, croquet. Ad. E. B. Southworth, Prop., Trout Creek, N. Y.

THE PINES

Windham, Greene Co., N. Y.

Offers you nice clean accommodations amidst beautiful and agreeable surroundings, outdoor sports, and indoor entertainments. Paramount photo plays. Rooms with bath. Open fire, electric lights. Outdoor bathing. Glorious sunsets. Terms $15 up. Beautiful illustrated booklet. W. J. SOPER & SONS.

Hotels and Resorts

NEW YORK

Sunset Camp Cottages, Bungalows, and Tents
Modern improvements. Write for booklet and reference. R. Bennett, Raquette Lake, N. Y.

PENNSYLVANIA

Glen Garrieff, Mt. Pocono, Pa.
Special rates for June and September.
SUSAN T. CARSWELL

RHODE ISLAND

Ocean View
The Leading Hotel of Block Island, Rhode Island
C. C. BALL, Proprietor

Jamestown, Narragansett Bay
Opposite Newport, R. I.
Thorndyke Hotel opened June 1. Furnished cottages equipped with all improvements. Booklets. P. H. HORGAN, Prop.

VERMONT

CHESTER, VT. "The Maples." Delightful summer home. Cheerful, large, airy rooms, pure water, bath, hot and cold; broad piazza, croquet, fine roads. Terms reasonable. Refs. exchanged. The Misses SARGENT.

Heights House Lunenburg, Vt.
High altitude, no hay fever. In vicinity of the White Mountains. Modern conveniences. Farm products. Reasonable rates. Booklet. A. J. NEWMAN, Prop.

"The Dorms," Poultney, Vt.
Three modern buildings with all improvements, located in beautiful village in Green Mt. Fresh milk, fruits, and vegetables from farm. Attractive walks and drives. Mountain climbing. Box O, Poultney, Vt.

Health Resorts

LINDEN The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Doylestown, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LIPPINCOTT WALTER, M.D. (late of The Walter Sanitarium)

Mrs. Ford's Home for TUBERCULOUS PATIENTS. Private baths and sleeping porches. Rates $20 to $30 weekly. Booklet. WILKINSON HOUSE, Liberty, N. Y.

Dr. Reeves' Sanitarium
A Private Home for chronic, nervous, and mental patients. Also elderly people requiring care. Harriet E. Reeves, M.D., Melrose, Mass.

IDYLEASE INN

Newfoundland, New Jersey

A quiet, restful health resort among the hills of northern New Jersey. Large sunny porch; dry, exhilarating air. All forms of hydrotherapy and massage under medical supervision. Believing that there is a curable physical basis for most chronic ailments, we seek the underlying cause through a scientific study of each individual case. Booklet sent on application.

Apartments

WANTED—THREE APARTMENTS
unfurnished, in same building in New York City. No. 1. Containing living-room or studio, dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms, bathroom and maid's room. No. 2. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. No. 3. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. Location preferably out of the usual beaten paths, something not usually rented if possible, and preferably in a private house altered for such purpose. Nothing south of Greenwich Village nor north of 72d Street will be considered. Occupancy October 1, 1919. Address CHARLES H. DAVIS, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

To Sub-Let for Summer, leading Brooklyn apartment hotel, 2 furnished rooms and bath. References. 745, Outlook.

Country Board

COUNTRY BOARD
Colonial home on hilltop. Delightful view of country and Lake Ontario. Electric lights, bathroom, excellent table. On State road, three miles from Oswego. Miss ALICE E. PERRY, Fruit Valley, R. F. D., Oswego, N. Y.

Real Estate

MAINE

FOR RENT—FERNDEN

A charming country home, beautifully situated, combining unusual attractions of seashore and country life. Address: The Misses TALFOURD, Ferndean, Ogunquit, Me.

READY FOR IMMEDIATE USE.
SMALL COTTAGE, on Frenchman's Bay. Living-room, kitchen, 2 bedrooms, bath. Large piazza. Open fireplace, sleeping porch. Modern, fully furnished. Rent $175 for season. Golf, tennis, swimming pool. Apply to Mrs. L. E. Rowe, Barre, Me.

FOR RENT

A Summer Home

with grounds running to the ocean. Four master's rooms, two servants' rooms, bathroom, electric light, living-room, music-room, open fireplace. Apply to HAMILTON EASTER FIELD, Ogunquit, Maine.

MASSACHUSETTS

A Fine Farm or a Delightful Summer Home

About 90 acres, 40 tillable, bordering for nearly 5 miles on navigable river; only 4 miles to salt water, 3 miles to main station, on the N. Y. N. H., & H. R. R., between Fall River and Boston; 4 miles from city of 35,000 and 12 miles to one of 115,000. State macadam roads; both cities good markets for garden produce and milk. Farm includes 10-room Colonial house; good wharf in front; fine hardwood grove, overlooking river; hay barn; stock barn, calf barn; 2-story carriage barn; tool house; poultry house; 2 silos, apple orchard, etc.; good loamy soil, no rocks, produce asparagus, strawberries and small fruits, etc. Ideal for any market; can all be worked by machinery; up to two years ago kept 30 head of cattle and 4 horses; meadow now cutting 30 tons of hay; fine well water, cistern on hilltop above house and barn. This place is ideal for city business man and an equally fine bargain for a farmer; ready for immediate occupancy; easily worth twice the asking price of less than $500 per acre, including building and latest farm implements, wagons, etc., all nearly new. For full particulars write or phone G. H. HARMON, 449 Fourth Ave., New York City. Tel. Madison Square 7850.

FOR SALE, 50-ACRE FARM

Good location, all level land, 600 apple trees, 300 bearing. Good buildings. A money maker. J. F. RANDALL, Marshfield, Mass.

Beautiful Summer Home

in suburb of fine old city of 55,000 in Mass., on main line of N. Y. N. H., & H. R. R., between Newport and Boston. Estate consists of about 5 acres with Colonial house of 11 rooms; 5 master bedrooms, 3 baths, 3 servants' rooms, sun-parlor, piazza, etc. All year round house in perfect repair—all modern improvements. Large barn, garage, stable, poultry house, rose garden, asparagus beds, vegetable garden, shrubs and fruit trees. Ideal place for a city business man desiring a summer home, easy to reach week-ends on Fall River boats. Ready for immediate occupancy. For quick sale—a wonderful bargain. For full particulars write or phone G. H. HARMON, 449 Fourth Ave., New York City. Telephone: Madison Square 7850.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Chesham, N. H. Desirable COTTAGE TO RENT for Summer. 3 miles from R.R. station; 3 rooms, 2 bathrooms, a garage, and a large piazza. Apply Miss M. S. Bush, 23 Beacon St., Boston.

Chocoma, N. H. Fine view lake and mountains. 4 bedrooms, modern plumbing, garage, blankets, silver. $400. 1644 Cambridge St., Cambridge, Mass. Suite 12.

SUGAR HILL

New Hampshire
Bungalows for rent. Also board and room. Apply to HANNAH M. SMITH, Sugar Hill, N. H.

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential section, suburbs of New York City. Half hour Grand Central; also near subway. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 50 x 100. Garages. Price $20,000. Full particulars from owner, 9,613, Outlook.

NEW YORK

Essex-on-Lake Champlain

To rent for the season, an unusually attractive, charming, modern cottage in the Otter Club Colony, with lawn sweeping down to the lakefront, and an amazing fifty-acre view of Lake Champlain and the Green Mountains of Vermont. A homelike, roomy house; 5 master bedrooms; 3 baths; detached kitchen and servants' quarters. Rental $300. Mrs. L. C. MYATT, 65 Central Park West, New York City.

WHY HE DIDN'T RISE

1. He grumbled.
2. He watched the clock.
3. He was stung by a bad look.
4. He was always behindhand.
5. He had no iron in his blood.
6. He was willing, but unfitted.
7. He didn't believe in himself.
8. He asked too many questions.
9. His stock excuse was "I forgot."
10. He wasn't ready for the next step.
11. He did not put his heart in his work.
12. He learned nothing from his mistakes.
13. He felt that he was above his position.
14. He was content to be a second-rate man.
15. He ruined his ability by half doing things.
16. He chose his friends from among his inferiors.
17. He never dared to act on his own judgment.
18. He did not think it worth while to learn how.
19. Familiarity with slipshod methods paralyzed his ideal.
20. He tried to make "bluff" take the place of hard work.
21. He thought it was clever to use coarse and profane language.
22. He thought more of amusements than of getting on in the world.
23. He didn't learn that the best of his salary was not in his pay.

—From "Chesapeake and Ohio Employees' Magazine."

"Inner history of the war made public. England in uproar over sensational disclosures in Viscount French's book."
—Press Dispatch.

"1914," The Memoirs of Field Marshal Viscount French

Preface by Maréchal Foch

The complete, uncensored and authoritative account of the operations of the British armies during 1914, including the retreat from Mons, the battles of the Marne and Aisne, the siege of Antwerp, and the first Battle of Ypres. Here at last are the real facts of the war. America will be stirred as was England by the startling disclosures in this first war book by a commanding general of the Allies. Frontispiece and maps. $6.00 net.

THE LAST MILLION

Ian Hay

Major Ian Hay Beith describes the lighter side of life in the A. E. F. in a book that does for the doughboys what "The First Hundred Thousand" did for Tommy and Jack. $1.50 net.

THE GRIZZLY

Enos A. Mills

A fascinating account of the adventures and experiences of Mr. Mills with this most interesting of our native wild animals. Illus. $2.00 net.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Russell J. Wilbur

A notable volume of poems on Roosevelt's character and career. A friend called it "The very best composite portrait yet produced of that very composite person, Theodore Roosevelt." $1.00 net.

LABRADOR DAYS

Doctor Grenfell

"A delightful and engrossing volume. Dr. Grenfell writes out of the heart of his understanding of the people among whom he has moved so long."—Phila. Ledger. $1.50 net.

At All Bookstores HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY 4 Park St. Boston

Real Estate

NEW YORK

ADIRONDACKS Blue Mountain Lake, N. Y. Ideal island property. One or both large furnished cottages for season. Open fire. Wood and ice. The Rectory, Lyons, N. Y.

FOR RENT—CAMP ON LAKE PLACID

Including cottage and boat house, land, etc.; beautifully located, overlooking the lake; near Lake Placid, N. Y., in the Adirondacks. This camp is completely furnished and equipped with all modern conveniences, including electric light and gasoline launch. Full information will be supplied on inquiry to DUYKE & Co., Inc., Saranac Lake, N. Y.

Completely Furnished Summer Home

for rent with 8 rooms and bath. Large fireplace, lawn, garage and place. Good fishing near by. Good train service to New York morning and evening. Located on State Road, near Lake Mahopac. Address or phone H. I. MEKEEL, Yorktown Heights, N. Y. Price $250 up to Sept. 1, 1919.

VERMONT

For Sale, Camp. Stone-log bungalow, 6-foot fireplace, separate semi-open kitchen and dining-room; beautiful scenery; 51 acres of valuable timber, trout stream. $1,200. F. B. Bigelow, 100 University Place, N. Y. City.

Woodstock, Vt. "Appleboughs" for rent, furnished. Modern conveniences, cool, quiet, sleeping-tent. Charming. Inquire of Harold Dana, Woodstock, Vt.

BOOKS, MAGAZINES

THE Mecca of Negro history and literature. Distributors Scott's official history of the Negro in the World War. Send up your order. Young's Book Exchange, 125 W. 135th St. Price $3.50 and $4.75, post paid on all orders. Mention The Outlook.

FOR THE HOME

WILD strawberry jam, delicate, delicious. Supply limited. Alma Hubbard, Gansevoort, New York.
REMNANTS—Chambrays and percales. Samples submitted. Universal Co., Woodstock, R. I.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

WANTED—Office assistant in military academy. College graduate preferred. Box 4, Woodstock, Va.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

CHAUFFEUR wanted for summer to drive and care for Cadillac car. Easy work. College student desiring work during holidays preferred. State wages expected and references. 7,083, Outlook.

CUBAN woman, preferably trained in domestic science, to undertake educational work in Cuba for manufacturers of well-known food product. 7,073, Outlook.

EMBROIDERERS on infants' fannels; work sent out of town. Barring, 29 East 31st St., New York.

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CM2 Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

EDUCATED woman as mother's helper. 7,092, Outlook.

NURSERY governess in physician's family. References exchanged. Address Mrs. Henry Pleasant, St. David's, Pa.

WANTED—Matron and nurse in boys' military academy—100 cadets; also two instructors, one qualified to coach athletics. Box A, Woodstock, Va.

COMPETENT housekeeper to manage household including three children and do all work except washing. Salary, $30 per week. 11 Burchfield Ave., Cranford, N. J.

WIDOWER with three boys, ages ten, six, four, wishes well educated young woman or widow (Protestant) to assume the duties of housekeeper and care of the children. State qualifications and salary expected. References exchanged. 7,079, Outlook.

MOTHER'S helper, care small boys. Forty-five monthly. Pleasant home. 536 Page Terrace, South Orange, New Jersey.

WANTED—Matron of day nursery, $5 to 60 children, Philadelphia. State salary and experience. Address Mrs. Logan MacCoy, 64th and City Line, Overbrook, Pa.

OPPORTUNITY for teachers or others to earn part board as waitresses at small inn, managed by two college women. No servants. Box 34, Kent, Conn.

Teachers and Governesses

COMPANION-teacher to girl 12 years. $125 month; governesses, nurses, housekeepers, dietitians, male tutors. Hopkins' Educational Agency, 507 Fifth Ave.

GOVERNESSES, cafeteria managers, dietitians, matrons, housekeepers. Miss Richards, Box 5, East Side Station, Providence, R. I.

HELP WANTED

Teachers and Governesses

IF available for teaching positions anywhere in United States or foreign countries, write Ernest Olp, Steger Building, Chicago.

YOUNG, experienced nursery governess, English or French, for two little girls. Must be willing to travel and capable. Address P. O. Box 114, St. David's, Pa.

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

WANTED—Young lady (French) of pleasing personality, holiday June-September position in small family with attractive home, for lessons in French pronunciation and reading. State references and compensation desired. 7,052, Outlook.

TEACHERS WANTED. Men and women for all departments of schools and colleges at salaries of from $1,500 to $2,000. INTER-STATE TEACHERS' AGENCY, Macbeth Building, New Orleans, La.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Professional Situations

INVALID care by graduate nurse. L. Lane, 1221 Steuben, Utica, N. Y.

WANTED—Principals, partnership, or purchase of academic school U. S. A. by British graduate (arts and science) and American wife (music). Experience and highest credentials. 7,061, Outlook.

REV. Dr. Mottet has friend who desires position as organist and choirmaster. Rank among the foremost both as organist and trainer of boy, adult, and mixed choir. Above and beyond his notable professional achievement stands the man's fine personality—that of the inspiring Christian gentleman. Address 47 West 26th St., New York.

Business Situations

EXPERIENCED SECRETARY. Especially fitted for educational administrative work. Exceptional references. 7,076, Outlook.

WANTED—Opportunity to enter school work as principal, business manager of private girls' school. Man (and wife), mature, experienced, capable of building up school. Ph.D., 7,090, Outlook.

TRANSLATOR.—Scientific, literary, and commercial writings translated into French, Spanish, English. Proof-reading. Articles written, improved, and condensed. References given. 7,077, Outlook.

YOUNG man, 28, good family, careful, experienced driver, desires post as chauffeur to family traveling. Would act as secretary-companion elderly gentleman traveling. Wages no object. 7,084, Outlook.

YOUNG WOMAN, graduate bookkeeper, good sewer, efficient houseworker, wants position in home or institution. Burd School, 63d and Market Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Business Situations

CAPABLE young woman as social secretary. Well educated. Best references. 7,071, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

WANTED, by middle-aged gentleman, position as companion. Pleasant home main object. Highest references. Address "G," 502 E. Huron St., Ann Arbor, Mich.

YOUNG teacher desires summer position as companion or mother's helper with family going to mountains or seashore. 7,097, Outlook.

POSITION wanted in institution as house-mother. 7,063, Outlook.

WOMAN, educated, experienced, desires position in home, institution, or school for girls, as housekeeper, matron, or assistant superintendent. 7,072, Outlook.

COMPANION—Talented lady, age 25, cheerful, reliable. References. 7,075, Outlook.

GRADUATE nurse, companion to semi-invalid or children. Travel or country. References. 7,088, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

COLLEGE student desires position for summer as tutor, camp counselor, or first-aid man. 7,067, Outlook.

ENGLISH teacher desires position—companion, secretary, or tutor. Would travel. Louise Wiegand, 353 Hamilton, Trenton, N. J.

YOUNG lady, school teacher, primary grade, desires position with family going to mountains or seashore for months of July and August, as governess or children's companion. 7,041, Outlook.

EXPERIENCED lady teacher, college graduate, desires to instruct or chaperon young ladies or children. Mountains preferred. Would travel. 7,085, Outlook.

GRADUATE Williams, A.B., and Harvard, A.M., athletically inclined, six years' experience boys' private schools, desires position for summer as tutor in private family. English, French, German, Latin, history, elementary mathematics. 7,063, Outlook.

YOUNG student from Paris desires position during summer as French tutor or as governess. Address Dean of Women, Wooster College, Ohio.

MISCELLANEOUS

IDEAL home and food for vacation. 7,083, Outlook.

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Frances Parker Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

MRS. Guthman, New York shopper, will send anything on approval; services free. References. 309 W. 96th Street.

WANTED—Young women to take training as baby nurses at Orange Orphan Home. Salary while training, good position guaranteed on graduating. Apply 197 Harrison St., East Orange, N. J.

McCutcheon's

Dresses of Imported Dimity for Girls

MOTHERS who face the problem of providing Summer wardrobes for their daughters are invited to inspect our unusually attractive selection of Dresses of Imported Dimity.

For the little girls—White, Pink, Blue and figured. Many of the models are hand-smocked and ribbon-trimmed.

For the older girls—more “dressy” models for afternoon wear.

Infants' Outfits

IN this same Department mothers and prospective mothers will find dainty Infants' Outfits, both imported and domestic. We are always glad to help in making up practical Layettes.

Our Mail Order Department will gladly furnish full descriptions and particulars of any garments mentioned and fill orders to your complete satisfaction

James McCutcheon & Company
Fifth Avenue, 34th and 33d Sts., N. Y.

HELP WANTED!

Are you in need of a Mother's Helper, Companion, Nurse, Governess, Teacher, Business or Professional Assistant?

The Classified Want Department of The Outlook has for many years offered to subscribers a real service. A small advertisement in this department will bring results.

The rate is only ten cents per word. Address

Department of Classified Advertising,
THE OUTLOOK, 381 Fourth Ave., New York

BY THE WAY

Answering a question as to what became of the gold spike that was driven into the last rail laid in building the Union Pacific Railroad on its completion in 1869, a subscriber writes: “It was first photographed and then melted up and recast into very small spikes about fifteen-sixteenths of an inch long, and they were distributed to the more prominent railroad men present. Among the recipients was my father, now deceased, from whom I received one of the photographs mentioned and a miniature gold spike. There are probably very few of these now in existence. The original spike was full size and engraved with the officers' names and titles. The miniature was engraved with the date ‘May 10 1869’ and the words: ‘Last Spike of the Pacific Ry’ and ‘Presented by D. Hewes.’”

Another correspondent writes: “David Hewes, who gave the ‘golden spike’ to the railroad, was a wealthy man who had lived in California many years. Numerous souvenirs were made of the head of this spike and given to his friends, among whom was my father, Lansing Millis, of Boston. His souvenir was in the form of a seal ring, the back being made of gold quartz, set in gold made from this spike.”

“The great river Orinoco,” which was known to Defoe and was the scene of some of Robinson Crusoe's adventures, has, it is stated, never been explored to its source. Dr. Alexander Hamilton Rice, late of the United States Navy, is soon to leave this country on an expedition to discover the source of the river. The close of the war will doubtless liberate other adventurous spirits to the solution of the few great geographical mysteries that yet remain unsolved.

A wounded soldier's light-hearted joke is reported by an army chaplain. The soldier had lost both his hands by a bomb explosion. On again seeing his friend the chaplain, the doughboy remarked, “I can't shovel coal any more, but I can make a speech?” “What kind of a speech?” asked the chaplain. “Why”—waving his handless arms—“a ‘stump’ speech, of course!”

Reform is needed in the “cue-sheets” for the music that accompanies the movies, so a writer in the “Dramatic Mirror” asserts. He claims that the cue-sheets as well as the music are prepared by amateurs and that nobody can understand them without a code. He instances these directions for the players: “Hy. Dr. Desc., Hy. Leg. myst., sweet, pathetic, neutral sweet, light happy piece, sentimental sweet, winsome intermezzo; minor leg., Hy. rom. leg.”

“Has your husband a prosperous business?” a young bride was asked, as reported in the “Typographic Messenger.” “Yes, indeed,” was the reply; “why, he is taking in so much money that they had to give him help and appoint a receiver to assist him.”

The recent exhibition of the Society of Independent Artists in New York City closed with a deficit, according to “American Art News.” This result was in marked contrast with the Armory Show of the same society a few seasons ago, when a profit of $80,000 is said to have been made. Has the public lost interest in the “Modernist” art movement?

This subtle feminine “dig” is reported by the Dallas “News.” He—“I’ve just been introduced to Professor Smart. Such a charming man to talk to; he doesn't make one feel like a fool, in spite of his cleverness." She—"Ah, my dear, but that's because of his cleverness."

By the Way (Continued)

A collection of Prohibition Amendment jokes should include this one from the Kansas City "Star": "I'm afraid I'm stuck on this lot of pocket knives." "What's the matter with them?" "They've got corkscrews."

"The Song of the Open Road" is one of Walt Whitman's most inspiring tributes to the charm of the great outdoors. He tramped from Brooklyn to New Orleans. To-day he would probably go in a "flivver." That is what has been done by two devotees of the open road who recently arrived in New York from the Pacific Coast. Their trip occupied nine weeks, and neither hotel nor garage was visited during the entire time. The travelers slept in their car. They did this even in New York City before pointing their radiator back to the Coast.

Japanese students in America often make amusing mistakes in their attempts to write English. Sometimes, however, they strike a high note, as in this little lyric quoted by a contributor to the "Atlantic Monthly":

SELF-RELIANCE

I have my hands to work,
Which my mother brought them up;
They are my only reliance.
Whatever may it be,
I fear not.

I have my feet to walk,
Which my father strengthened them;
They are my only standpoint.
Whatever may it be,
I evade not.

I have my mind to think,
Which my Lord gifted me;
This is my only guidance.
Whatever may it be,
I stray not.

The two prime mysteries of the sea, according to a writer in the New York "Evening Post," are those of the disappearance of the naval collier Cyclops last year and of the brig Marie Celeste in 1872. Not a trace of the great collier or of the 290 people she carried has ever been found. The Marie Celeste was found in mid-ocean, with everything in perfect order and even the dinner ready to serve, but abandoned and with no trace of the crew's whereabouts. The theory is advanced that the Marie Celeste's crew feared an explosion from her cargo and hastily took to the boats and then perished in a squall.

The moving-picture famine that has afflicted Mittel Europa during the long years of war is to vanish as soon as the Peace Treaty is signed, a theatrical journal announces. At least one American picture corporation has contracted to send its stored-up films broadcast over Germany, Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Jugoslavia, and Poland; and others will no doubt soon follow this lead.

Inducements to domestic helpers are steadily rising, as in the following advertisement from a New York City paper. The "references" mentioned may possibly be offered by the advertiser rather than requested of the applicant:

Houseworker, plain cooking; no laundry; no children; small house; $50 month; references. Apply ———, Flushing.

Puffed Rice

Is whole rice in the form of airy, toasted bubbles

Puffed Wheat

Is whole wheat puffed to eight times normal size

Corn Puffs

Is pellets of toasted hominy puffed to globules

Try the Other Bubble Grains

Most of you delight in one Puffed Grain, we think. But there are three of them, each with its own enticements. Serve them all.

As breakfast dainties it is hard to choose. All are toasted, flavory bubbles—flimsy, crisp and delightful.

In bowls of milk Puffed Wheat is a favorite. And it means whole wheat made wholly digestible—the supreme supper dish.

With berries mix Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs. So in candy making or as garnish on ice cream. And so for between-meal tidbits, doused with melted butter.

All Are Steam Exploded

All are made by Prof. Anderson's process. All are shot from guns. All have every food cell blasted, so digestion is easy and complete.

All are food confections, delightful in their texture and their taste.

These are the queen foods, and summer brings you countless uses for them. No other way of serving cereals compares with this bubble form.

Use them to make whole-grain foods inviting, and to make the milk dish popular.

Puffed Wheat      Puffed Rice and Corn Puffs

Each 15c, Except in Far West

Summer Servings

Mix With Berries

Or serve with cream and sugar, or with melted butter

Float in Milk

Puffed Wheat and milk is a matchless combination.

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers

Digitized by Google

PRINCE ALBERT

the national joy smoke

SAY, you'll have a streak of smokeluck that'll put pep-in-your-smokemotor, all right, if you'll ring-in with a jimmy pipe or cigarette papers and nail some Prince Albert for packing!

Just between ourselves, you never will wise-up to high-spot-smoke-joy until you can call a pipe or a home made cigarette by its first name, then, to hit the peak-of-pleasure you land square on that two-fisted-man-tobacco, Prince Albert!

Well, sir, you'll be so all-fired happy you'll want to get a photograph of yourself breezing up the pike with your smokethrottle wide open! Quality makes Prince Albert so different, so appealing. And, P. A. can't bite or parch. Both are cut out by our exclusive patented process!

Right now while summer's young you get out your old jimmy pipe or the "papers" and land on some P. A. for what ails your particular smokeappetite!

Buy Prince Albert everywhere tobacco is sold. Topsy red bags, tidy red tins, handsome pound and half pound tin humidors—and that classy, practical pound crystal glass humidor with sponge moistener top that keeps the tobacco in such perfect condition.

R. J. REYNOLDS TOBACCO CO., Winston-Salem, N. C.

Dance any time — the Victrola is always ready!

Ready with lively one-steps and fox-trots and fascinating waltzes that make you forget every care and just want to dance on and on. Music that inspires you to dance your very best—the perfect playing of bands and orchestras renowned for their splendid dance music.

As enjoyable with a Victrola as though you actually hired the entire band or orchestra, itself. Loud and clear enough for a whole roomful of dancers—and yet easily adaptable when only a few couples (or even one!) want a quiet little dance all their own.

Victors and Victrolas $12 to $950.

Any Victor dealer will gladly play the newest Victor Dance Records and demonstrate the Victrola.

Victor Talking Machine Co., Camden, N. J., U. S. A.

Important Notice. Victor Records and Victor Machines are scientifically coordinated and synchronized in the processes of manufacture, and their use, one with the other, is absolutely essential to a perfect reproduction.

New Victor Records demonstrated at all dealers on the 1st of each month.

"Victrola" is the Registered Trademark of the Victor Talking Machine Company designating the products of this Company only.

Victrola XVII, $275
Victrola XVII, electric, $332.50
Mahogany or oak

© 1925 Victor Talking Machine Co., Camden, N. J.

GENESEO JAM KITCHEN

Jams and Marmalades

Peach, Pear, Plum and Black-berry Jams. Orange Marmalade and Grapefruit Marmalade.

In cartons containing  $\frac{1}{2}$  dozen 26 oz. enamel-lined sanitary tin cans, \$2.25 per carton.

These sweets were much enjoyed by our soldiers in France, and are of the same quality as those we put up in glass.

Write for price list of other delicacies put up in glass jars to

Miss ELLEN H. NORTH
Geneseo Jam Kitchen, Geneseo, N. Y.

Men's wear Mat McCutcheon's

Men's Shirts for Summer

White Cheviot Shirts—

Reg. Trade Mark

With soft cuffs for street wear; especially good value. $2.50 each. They are also being shown with collar attached, with band or French cuffs at $2.50 and 3.00

"For Golf"—

White Flannel Shirts with collar attached, $5.00 and 6.50

Special—

Khaki Flannel Shirts, collar attached, reduced to $5.00 each, regularly 8.50.

MAIL ORDER SERVICE: Any of the merchandise described above may be ordered with complete satisfaction through our Mail Order Service.

James McCutcheon & Co.
Fifth Avenue, New York

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122 July 2, 1919 No. 9

THE OUTLOOK IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE P. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. M. T. FULFORD, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. HOYT, TREASURER. ERNEST H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAYNOR D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER. YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION—FIFTY-TWO ISSUES—FOUR DOLLARS IN ADVANCE. ENTERED AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER, JULY 21, 1893, AT THE POST OFFICE AT NEW YORK, UNDER THE ACT OF MARCH 3, 1879

The Submission of Germany.....	357
German Honor.....	357
The Upset in Italy.....	358
Drawing the Lines Closer.....	358
Daylight Unsaved.....	358
Mr. Root's Suggestions for the League of Nations.....	358
A Visit from the President-Elect of Brazil.....	359
American Federation of Labor.....	359
Commencements After the War.....	359
The Renewal of Intercollegiate Athletics.....	360
Counsel to College Men After the War.....	360
The President Becomes a College Boy Again.....	360
Cartoons of the Week.....	361
Palestine as an International Spiritual Homeland.....	362
Healing the Scars of War.....	362
Should We Pay Colombia Twenty-five Millions?.....	363
Background Past and Present.....	363
Popular Fallacies: IV—That Labor is a Commodity to be Bought in the Cheapest Market.....	364
By Lyman Abbott
War Work in Honolulu.....	365
Special Correspondence by Helen Kimball
The League of Nations.....	367
By William G. McAdoo
Portrait of Josiah Royce, the Philosopher.....	372
By John Jay Chapman
Current Events Illustrated.....	373
Japan and the Peace.....	377
By Marquis Kimochi Saionji. An Authorized Interview with Gregory Mason, Staff Correspondent of The Outlook
Weekly Outline Study of Current History.....	380
By J. Madison Gathany, A.M.
By the Way.....	380
Trucks Move Food Crops Quickly and Economically.....	382

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents. For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage. Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.50.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY

381 Fourth Avenue

New York City

TEACHERS' AGENCIES

The Pratt Teachers Agency

70 Fifth Avenue, New York

Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools. Advises parents about schools. Win. O. Pratt, Mgr.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MASSACHUSETTS

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. Esenwein

Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Courses in Short-Story Writing, Versification, Journalism, Play-Writing, Photoplay Writing, etc., taught personally by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, especially valuable for its full reports of the literary market. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

150-page illustrated catalogue free. Please address

The Home Correspondence School

Dept. 58, Springfield, Mass.

ESTABLISHED 1897

INCORPORATED 1904

NEW YORK

Florence Nightingale School for Backward Children

Boarding and Day Pupils

238th St. & Riverside Ave., N. Y. C. Phone Elmhurst 316

SUMMER SCHOOL & CAMP

KATONAH, N. Y.

RUDOLPH S. FRIED, PRINCIPAL

GIRLS' CAMPS

CAMP OWAISSA On Indian Lake in the Adirondacks. A delightful mountain camp for girls. Membership limited to thirty-five. All land and water sports. For booklet address Miss Nellie Egerton Wilson, Sabal, Hamilton Co., New York.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

St. John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses

YONKERS, NEW YORK

Registered in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a general training to refined, educated women. Requirements one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the Directress of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

Geneseo Jam Kitchen HONEY

Pure extracted Clover Honey.

In 14 oz. glass jars,

$5.00 per doz.

In 5 oz. glass jars,

$3.85 per doz.

Write for price list of other delicacies put up in glass jars to

MISS ELLEN H. NORTH

Geneseo Jam Kitchen, Geneseo, N. Y.

The Outlook is the first magazine on the reading table of the substantial American home

because

The Outlook keeps you in touch with the world and its activities better than any other periodical in the United States.

The Outlook gives you a virile, vigorous summary and discussion of every one of the week's important happenings. It tells you what is going on, and tells it simply and entertainingly, so that you really know the things you ought to know.

From its own sources of information The Outlook points out the true and essential facts in the making of history. It rejects the doubtful and the trivial. What you read in The Outlook is doubly worth reading, both for itself and for the way in which it is presented.

Read The Outlook week by week and you may always be confident that you are soundly well informed.

because

The Outlook is brief and to the point. The Outlook gives you more information in less space than any other American periodical. The Outlook selects, and doesn't leave it to you to flounder about.

The daily newspapers give everything—important and unimportant. Most magazines try to give as much as they can. The Outlook condenses its information, at the same time giving everything that is worth your reading.

The Outlook puts events in their true perspective, selects the things in the week's news that mean something, and then tells you what they do mean.

You never have to wade your way through The Outlook. It is always crisp, concise. You read it from cover to cover—because you want to.

because

The Outlook is independent, absolutely so. It is controlled by no power, no interests, except the ideals and convictions of its own editors. The Outlook stands for what it conscientiously believes to be right, and for that only.

For exactly fifty years The Outlook has so stood.

because

when you read The Outlook you get an opinion—a fair, square, clean-cut, straight-from-the-shoulder opinion—upon every vital question of the day. You may agree with The Outlook or disagree, as you choose, but whatever your own convictions may be you are bound to respect and value The Outlook's. For The Outlook is virile and The Outlook is American.

The Outlook thinks.

For this reason The Outlook is perhaps the most frequently quoted paper in the United States to-day. Out of all proportion to its bulk it is one of the greatest powers now existent in the molding of American public opinion.

When you lay down The Outlook you are not confused by a multiplicity of opinions and views. You have read the truth about what is going on, the truth presented broadly, tolerantly, fairly; and you know your own mind.

because

The Outlook, in spite of the real seriousness of its purpose, is typically American enough to believe that the smile and the grin and the chuckle and the outright guffaw all have their place in life, and a mighty important place at that.

So you will find The Outlook entertaining and readable, with a simple human quality that is extremely delightful.

In addition to the topics of the week, the trenchant editorial comment and the splendid pages of news photographs, there are always special articles and cartoons, with frequent charming bits of fiction and worth-while verse, selected for pure merit, as well as many other items possessing a quality that can best be described by the one word human.

Yes, The Outlook is human—thoroughly human. That is why it appeals so deeply to its several hundred thousand readers. It reaches not only into their minds but also into their hearts.

because

of these facts The Outlook is what it is.

But no mere recital can adequately tell the story of this splendid old—and yet ever new—publication.

The only thing to do that is The Outlook itself—and not a mere single issue of the magazine, picked up, glanced over casually, and then laid down, but issue after issue, week after week.

The Outlook is like a friend. At first glance it is but another individuality—but the longer you know it the more it means in your life.

To more than a hundred thousand subscribers, most of whom have taken it for years and years, The Outlook is something more than a magazine, something more even than the most informative, most concise weekly journal of current events published in the United States. To these subscribers it is a living inspiration. We read their letters, and we know. They make us humble, but they make us exceedingly proud.

That is why we conscientiously believe The Outlook should be the first magazine on your home reading table.

You may want other magazines—for amusement, for your lighter moments, for whatnot—but if you take pride in your intelligence

you need
The Outlook
first

The Outlook Company
381 Fourth Ave.,
New York City

I enclose herewith $4 for one year's subscription to The Outlook.

Name _____

Address _____

If The Outlook is not in your home
—cut this coupon

Just sign your name, tear the coupon off, and mail it. Do it now, while it's on your mind.

Riviera Road, Toledo, Ohio. All during 1918 this road was traversed by Army trucks being driven to the Atlantic seaboard. Mudmen road treated with "Tarvia-X" in 1913 and treated with "Tarvia-B" in 1916 and 1918.

Total amount invested in this road for 18 years now saved every 10 months!

THIS is Wood County's heaviest traveled road. All automobiles and motor trucks in transit overland around the western end of Lake Erie from Detroit and Toledo to the East must drive over this highway. In fact, most of the overland motor traffic to the South also takes this route.

Mr. John F. Gallier, County Surveyor of Wood County, recently figured that this highway carries 2,000 tons per day for its entire length of 7.36 miles, or more than 5,330,000 ton-miles per year!

This road is a Tarviated highway, and in a very interesting article Mr. Gallier develops the fact that every ten months the saving in the cost of operating motor traffic over this highway, as compared with that on a well-drained clay road, equals the total investment in the road for the past eighteen years.

Space is too limited to give Mr. Gallier's figures in detail, but a copy of the article, which gives the history and maintenance figures of the road since 1900, will be sent to any interested road engineer or taxpayer upon request.

Briefly, the total investment in the road for 18 years, including three Tarvia treatments, is $99,367.63, or a trifle more than $13,500 per mile.

Figuring carefully and conservatively, Mr. Gallier has worked out the difference in cost of gasoline, tires and oil alone (not taking into account the saving in wear and tear on automobiles and trucks), for traffic over the Tarvia road as compared with the same traffic over a well-drained clay road. Reduced to totals, the figures are:

Total average daily cost of gasoline, tires and oil for motor traffic on clay road . . . . .	$714.62
Total average daily cost of gasoline, tires and oil for motor traffic on Tarvia road . . . . .	381.73
Daily difference in favor of Tarvia road . . . . .	$332.89
Difference for 365 days . . . . .	$121,475.85

This means a saving of $10,122.98 per month, or $101,229.80 every 10 months, which is more than the improved road cost to build and maintain for 18 years, including interest, engineering and drainage costs!

Tarvia is ready to serve other communities as it is serving this one, helping them to build and maintain mudless, dustless, automobile-proof roads at low cost—roads that pay for themselves—roads that are an asset instead of a liability.

Descriptive booklet telling all about this interesting proposition free on request.

Tarvia

Preserves Roads—Prevents Dust

THE BARRETT COMPANY, Limited

New York
Cleveland
Birmingham
Seattle
Youngstown

Chicago
Cincinnati
Kansas City
Peoria
Toledo
Montreal

Philadelphia
Pittsburgh
Minneapolis
Arkansas
Columbus
Toronto

The Barrett Company
Duluth
Richmond
Winnipeg
Milwaukee
Laird
Vancouver
Dallas
Bangor
Beilstein
St. John, N.B.

Boston
Detroit
Nashville
Washington
Elizabeth

St. Louis
New Orleans
Salt Lake City
Johnstown
Buffalo
Halifax, N.S.

Baltimore
Lebanon
Spring, N.S.

Special Service Department

In order to bring the facts before taxpayers as well as road authorities, The Barrett Company has organized a Special Service Department which keeps up to the minute on all road problems.

If you will write to the nearest office regarding road conditions or problems in your vicinity, the matter will have the prompt attention of experienced engineers. This service is free for the asking. If you want better roads and lower taxes, this Department can greatly assist you.

The Outlook

JULY 2, 1919

THE SUBMISSION OF GERMANY

PROTESTING to the last and putting upon its own action the worst possible interpretation, the German Government, supported by the National Assembly, has unconditionally surrendered.

What had generally been expected has happened. The alternative to unconditional surrender was the advance of the Allied troops into German territory. In some respects that alternative might have been preferable. It would have convinced the Germans, as they have apparently not been convinced, that their dreams of conquest are over. It might also have helped to rid the rest of the German states from the incubus of Prussia. But it was an alternative which no Government of Germany dominated by Prussia could be expected to accept. On the other hand, the Government which has been negotiating with the Allies at Versailles, securing in the process some important concessions, but undertaking to insist on concessions which were not and could not be granted, had so thoroughly committed itself to a policy of a peace made between equals that it could not sign a peace of defeat. So the Government was conveniently changed. Scheidemann gave way as Chancellor, and in his place was put Minister of Labor Bauer. The Cabinet which he formed, or which was formed for him, is not composed by any means of obscure men. On it are the Catholic leader and once Pan-Germanist Erzberger, the well-known implacable Noske, and the majority Socialist leader Dr. Hermann Müller.

Even this Cabinet attempted to make changes in the terms and to secure further postponement. They argued that the German people were defenseless, and appealed to the "conscience of mankind;" they averred that they could not acknowledge Germany's guilt or surrender the Kaiser and other accused persons, and would therefore sign the terms with reservations; and they pleaded for further delay on account of the change in the Government. The patience, however, of the leaders of the Peace Conference was exhausted. Nothing but a prompt decision to sign the peace terms unconditionally or reject them was accepted. The Germans explained that they made this protest because they wanted it fully understood what their attitude was, so that if later they were charged with not keeping their word they could point to this protest. Of course that is an obvious device. Only the credulous expect this present generation of Germans to keep their word to their own hurt except under compulsion, and a notification that they do not intend to keep their word is not enlightening. What the Germans were told was in substance that if they did not like the terms and did not intend to observe them they could reject them. They then decided to sign them.

In doing so, however, the German Cabinet virtually said that they were doing something dishonorable. These are their words:

It appears to the Government of the German Republic, in consternation at the last communication of the Allied and Associated Governments, that these Governments have decided to wrest from Germany by force acceptance of the peace conditions, even those which, without presenting any material significance, aim at divesting the German people of their honor.

No act of violence can touch the honor of the German people. The German people, after frightful suffering in these last years, have no means of defending themselves by external action.

Yielding to superior force, and without renouncing in the meantime its own view of the unheard-of injustice of the peace conditions, the Government of the German Republic declares that it is ready to accept and sign the peace conditions imposed.

The implication that this is a peace of violence comes with bad grace from the Germans. Whatever violence there is in this peace is German violence, ineffaceably recorded in Belgium and northern France. The Germans' complaint that they yield to superior force is the same complaint which the captured criminal might make against the police.

GERMAN HONOR

What do the Germans mean by honor? They say that they are being asked to sign away the honor of the German people, and then they proceed to sign. King Albert of Belgium was asked to sign away the honor of the Belgian people, and he refused to sign. If the Germans really meant what they said, they would much prefer to have German territory overrun by the troops of the Allies than sign the peace terms. They know very well that Germany would not have any such experience from French, British, and American troops as that of Belgium from the soldiers of the Kaiser. We can perhaps judge better what Germans mean by honor from their deeds than from their words.

On Saturday, June 21, German officers and sailors, intrusted on their honor with the care of the German war-ships which had been surrendered to the Allies and were interned at Scapa Flow, in the Orkney Islands off Scotland, opened the seacocks of the vessels and let them sink. One battleship, three light cruisers, and four destroyers were beached by British officers and sailors. A few of the Germans were killed. Some of these were sailors who were shot by their own officers when in response to the shouted orders of British officers in boats alongside these sailors started to shut the seacocks. Others were officers who were shot by the British for interfering with their orders to save the ships. The German officers and sailors, including the Admiral, von Reuter, were arrested and made prisoners.

What would have been a heroic and sailor-like act if it had been done during hostilities as an escape from ignominious surrender becomes an act of shame and dishonor after surrender. During hostilities there was nothing to stop the Germans from doing this except the British fleet, and even that could not have prevented it. But now there was something else that ought to have stopped the Germans, and that was their pledged word.

The loss of the ships themselves can be disregarded. Some of them can, and probably will, be raised, if for no other reason than to free Scapa Flow from the obstruction of their presence. Otherwise it really does not matter whether they are raised or not. Naval authorities say that, though they served the German purpose of a fleet that could keep in hiding, with an occasional sally at high speed for short distances, the German war-vessels would be of little or no use to a country that uses a navy as Great Britain or America or France does. Indeed, the British proposed sinking the vessels, anyway. The French and Italians wanted these vessels divided up among the Allies. The question is solved now, however, and solved, we believe, in a manner that leaves many compensations.

In the first place, there will be no further occasion for dispute on the matter. In the second place, the German navy is where it really belongs. In the third place, the act of the Germans in sinking their fleet, dishonorable though it was, reveals that there is in the Germans the vestige of a sense of shame and self-respect, even if it is atrophied and perverted. In the fourth place, this act serves as a fair warning of what we must expect from the Germans hereafter. The signature to the peace terms has the value only of the spirit and purpose behind it. What the Germans did at Scapa Flow is in thorough accord with what they have been doing for the past five years, and it is not unreasonable to assume that it will be in accord with what they will try to do hereafter. It is the business of the nations that joined to defeat Germany to see to it that the Germans do not make of the Peace Treaty of Versailles a scrap of paper.

THE UPSET IN ITALY

For being too lenient toward Italy's erstwhile enemies, Prime Minister Orlando has been turned out of office, and in his place appears a man representing a faction inclined to be more lenient still! If this is not exactly the truth about the situation in Italy, it is at least a brief statement of as close an approximation of the truth as we can reach at this time.

Italy has certainly not been altogether fairly treated by nations that she had a right to rely on. Her contribution to the winning of the war was vital. By the proclamation of her neutrality at once on the outbreak of the war she relieved the Allies of all fear that her weight would be cast on the side of her partners in the Triple Alliance. By her entrance into the war she did something more than cast her weight on the side against those partners; she utilized her geographical position to make a thrust toward the heart of Mittel Europa. In the critical period when her armies were poised on the slope toward Austria she received assurance of supplies from America which she did not receive. When the end came, it was the tremendous advance of the Italians under Diaz that sent the Austro-Hungarian forces reeling. Then came the Peace Conference. Whatever may be said about the claims of certain Italian extremists, the natural aspiration of Italians generally for what seems to them to be the fulfillment of Italy's dream of unity has not been sympathetically received by the representatives of other nations at the Conference. When the President of the United States pronounced his decision with regard to Fiume and Dalmatia, he stated the arguments for the Croats, but not for the Italians. There has been some adverse criticism of Italian propaganda; but if it had not been for this propaganda Italy's case would not have been known to the public at all.

When, therefore, Orlando refused to abide by President Wilson's decision, he was acclaimed at home. His reception in Italy disposed completely of the charge that Italy at the Peace Conference was represented by men who spoke not for the Italian people, but for Italian special interests. Returning to Paris with the assurance of popular support, Orlando apparently felt secure enough to be willing to make concessions on points which he did not regard as vital. Evidently he was not secure enough. Praised for standing firm, he is now blamed for yielding.

The irony of this all is that the new Government which supplants that of Orlando is regarded as a Giolitti Government. It is true that Giolitti himself is not Prime Minister. His pro-Germanism in the early months of the war is not yet forgotten; but there is a feeling that Giolitti himself is the god in that particular machine. At any rate, there are many Italians who believe that Francesco Nitti, the new Premier and Minister of the Interior, has a policy that is favorable to the renunciation of claims that were maintained by Orlando, and demonstrators in Naples, Turin, and Milan are reported to have cried: "Down with Giolitti! Down with Nitti! We do not want traitors to the country and to the Government."

Of course there may be questions of domestic concern that determined the character of the present Ministry. The Giolitti faction is apparently ready to cater to the extreme radicals who want for Italy what the Bolsheviks have given Moscow, and at the same time is ready to argue that Italy's failure at the Peace Conference should induce her to renew relations with Germany. Political maneuvering of this sort may have a temporary effect; but Italy is sound at heart. She deserves material help; but what she needs even more and ought to have is sympathetic understanding from her friends.

DRAWING THE LINES CLOSER

The circle of armies to the south and east of the relatively small part of Russia occupied by the Bolsheviks is being closed up. The recent victories of General Denikine and his Cossack forces are not only of consequence in themselves, but open up what seems to be almost a certainty of the future junction of forces between Denikine and Kolchak. Late despatches say that Denikine's Cossacks are driving the Bolshevik army almost in panic back from the river Don region and that they are within twenty miles of the Volga River. It is said also that both the anti-Bolshevik generals have lately received guns and munitions from British soldiers, and, what is more valuable, a number of British tanks—the like of which the soldiers of Trotsky probably never saw before.

Both Kolchak and Denikine have been charged with being reactionary, but there is no evidence of this. An American correspondent who recently talked with Denikine describes him as a patriot and a soldier, moved by single-minded devotion to Russia, unversed in political affairs but progressive in ideas. Ever since the overthrow of Kerensky the friends of freedom and enemies of mob tyranny in Russia have hoped to see a cloud of military forces gathered by the union of such leaders as Kolchak and Denikine.

Although Kolchak is said to have suffered some reverses lately, Denikine's reported capture of 22,000 prisoners, 150 guns, 350 machine guns, and several armored trains goes far to counteract Kolchak's losses. There is apparently good reason to hope that the All Russian Government at Omsk is building up an army which with proper assistance from the Allies will re-establish order in Russia.

DAYLIGHT UNSAVED

Most pressing of all business before Congress have been the appropriation measures. Unfortunately Congress has not been willing to confine those measures to the business of appropriating money. Each house has adopted the Agricultural Appropriation Bill with a rider repealing after next October the Daylight Saving Law.

Altogether apart from the merits of daylight saving, this method of legislation is thoroughly bad. While Senators were adopting this rider they were complaining because the Peace Conference had put the Covenant of the League of Nations as a rider on the Peace Treaty. In the case of the Covenant and the Treaty there is reasonable argument for the combination; but for combining agricultural appropriations with daylight saving there is no reasonable argument whatever.

If the repeal of the Daylight Saving Law stands, millions of people next summer will miss the long evening which this summer they are enjoying after the close of every working day.

MR. ROOT'S SUGGESTIONS FOR THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

In the Senate the discussion has continued over the Knox Resolution. The principal contribution to that discussion, however, has been made, not by a Senator, but by a former Senator, Elihu Root.

In a letter to the Republican leader of the Senate, Mr. Lodge, Mr. Root says that he should be glad to see the League of Nations Covenant and the peace terms separated. What he proposes, however, is nothing so drastic, but rather the ratification of the Treaty as it stands, with certain definite and in some respects far-reaching reservations.

He declares that the changes which were made in the Covenant subsequent to the suggestions made by several Americans familiar with public affairs are "very inadequate and unsatisfactory."

He criticises the League of Nations because it does nothing to provide for strengthening the system of arbitration or for developing international law. He objects to the uncertainty involved in the clause authorizing withdrawal from the League, since a charge that we had not performed some international obligation might keep us in the League against our will. The clause on the Monroe Doctrine he regards as "erroneous in its description of the Doctrine and ambiguous in meaning." He regards other American questions as being insecurely protected.

He suggests, therefore, reservations as follows: first, the exclusion from the consent of the Senate of Article X of the League Covenant, which is the article guaranteeing the territorial integrity of the League members; second, a statement that it is understood that a two years' notice of withdrawal will not be made ineffectual by any charge concerning the non-fulfillment of international obligations; third, a statement that nothing in the Treaty shall be construed to imply a relinquishment by America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions or require the submission of its policy concerning what it regards as purely American questions to the decision or recommendation of other Powers.

The larger part of his letter is an explanation of the reasons for his advocacy of these changes. Among these reasons are that America should not promise to do what in the future she may not be willing or able to perform; that Article X is not necessary to the League Covenant; that ambiguity should be cleared up in advance; that America should make it plain that she has no desire to dictate to European states. Mr. Root points out the merits of the Covenant as he understands them. He does not regard the Covenant as the final word in preserving peace, and he hopes for changes in the future which will lead to the development of the principle of arbitration and of international law. He thinks that changes in circumstances will permit material improvement.

A VISIT FROM THE PRESIDENT-ELECT OF BRAZIL

Something more than a formal or ceremonious welcome has been extended to Dr. Pessoa, the President-elect of the Brazilian Republic, who has just been visiting the United States. In his attitude and feeling toward this country Dr. Pessoa is a valuable and able ally. He has always, it is stated by those who know conditions in Latin America, opposed the insidious hostile propaganda against America. This injurious hostility has largely had its origin in the work of German or pro-German agents. In his reply to an address of welcome at Washington Dr. Pessoa emphasized the friendship between the two countries and pointed out that it was because of this friendship that the entrance of the United States into the European war had a decisive influence on Brazil's resolve to throw her power and sympathy into the same side of the conflict. He found that the two countries had as a fundamental trait feelings of national dignity and independence which would more and more bind them together in moral, intellectual, and political ties.

Epitacio Pessoa had been serving in Paris as the head of the Brazilian delegation to the Peace Conference, was chosen President while he was performing this important duty, and is now on his way back to Brazil to take up his new duties. He has a brilliant record in public life. He became Minister of Justice and Public Instruction at the age of thirty-three, having already served some six or seven years as a member of the Brazilian Congress. Probably no other statesman in his country advanced to Cabinet honors at so young an age. His services as a jurist and professor of law were notably distinguished. At the time when he was selected to represent Brazil at Paris he was a member of the Brazilian Senate. An American whose knowledge of South American matters is thoroughly to be depended upon says: "President-elect Pessoa is thoroughly representative of the new progressive generation that is coming forward in Brazil and Latin America, and believes in that kind of practical Pan-Americanism which stands for real and lasting friendship between the United States and its sister American republics."

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

The most noteworthy thing about the sessions of the thirty-ninth annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, which closed its sessions at Atlantic City last week, was the repeated evidence that the Federation had deep interest in National American social questions. It did not by any means confine itself to what are ordinarily considered as problems of labor and capital. In other words, the Federation took a sincere interest in many things relating to the welfare of the people and the advance of intelligence and enlightenment.

This was nowhere more notable than in the educational programme adopted by the Convention. It not only urged with all its power freedom for teachers in thinking and teaching, but it advised the local bodies of the Federation to work with Boards of Education "to secure a more democratic administration of our schools and to develop a spirit of cooperation." The Federation placed itself on the side of those who are willing to spend whatever money is necessary to make our schools stronger and better. Thus it recommended a revision upward of salaries, liberally encouraged an increase of the school revenues, hearty support to vocational guidance, the teaching of the privileges and obligations of intelligent citizenship, the better teaching of English, and especially to non-English-speaking pupils, physical education, ample playground facilities, the reduction of the sizes of classes, and (perhaps most notable of all) the establishing of public forums in the schools wherever possible. The Federation declared that one of the chief functions of the schools is preparation for active citizenship, and therefore the pupil should be "encouraged to discuss under intelligent supervision current events and the problems of citizenship."

In other ways this same spirit of American advance was shown, and with it a recognition of the fact that law is supreme. For instance, when a resolution was passed protesting against doubtful use of court injunctions in labor matters, the reason given was not that they were contrary to union policy, but that they were unconstitutional in that the courts were assuming legislative and executive functions. So the support of the telegraphers' strike by the Federation was based on the belief that the principles which the unions consider fundamentally just (such as collective bargaining) had found no recognition from Postmaster-General Burleson.

Among the other conclusions reached by this extremely active Convention were: The indorsement of a forty-four-hour week for all workers (eight hours for five days, four for Saturday) with double pay for overtime; refusal to commit the Federation to the idea of a National Labor party; opposition to opening the gates to immigration at this time; indorsement of the idea of a League of Nations and approval of the clauses relating to labor in the Covenant adopted in Paris. Finally, we note the total failure of all attempts to commit the Federation to anything un-American or to the efforts of those enemies of the true interests of labor who, as one speaker said, "were sneaking around poisoning the wells of internationalism and clutching at the throat of liberty."

COMMENCEMENTS AFTER THE WAR

No class of Americans can be singled out for highest honors in the war; but men of special education have corresponding responsibility. In that fact lies the significance of the service which was commemorated all over the country at this Commencement time. In colleges and universities, in technical schools, and in other institutions of learning the first thought in the celebrations at the close of the academic year was given to the graduates and undergraduates who had given their lives in the war. Because they had richly received they had been expected to give of themselves richly. These men did what was expected of them. Among the men who offered themselves for the cause in which their country enlisted but offered themselves in advance of their country, some of whom died without knowing that America was to follow them, a large proportion were college men. Faulty as American education is, the war record of the students and graduates of the higher schools and colleges in America is to a great degree a vindication of its essential soundness.

Since education is not merely for knowledge or scholarship, but for service, American colleges have a right to be proud of their record in the war; but they have recognized too that they have honors to bestow as well as training to give, and they have therefore at this time granted honorary degrees to many men who have rendered distinguished service in the fighting forces of the country. Admiral Sims, General Crowder, General March, General Wood, and a long list of other officers have been conspicuous among the recipients of honorary degrees. Harvard, besides honoring General Crowder and Admiral Sims, chose eight graduates as representatives of the thousands of Harvard graduates who had served usefully and gallantly in this time of strain and danger, and particularly of those eight thousand who had served in the uniformed forces of this Nation and its allies. Among the men whom Yale honored was the French painter Lieutenant Jean Julien Demordant, who in the war had sacrificed his eyesight.

Among the marks of honor at these Commencements was the smallness of some graduating classes. At Stevens Institute, for instance, four-fifths of the senior class had left for war service, and the number of graduates for this year is therefore the smallest since 1883.

THE RENEWAL OF INTERCOLLEGIATE ATHLETICS

With the return of peace there has come to the colleges also a return of the normal signs of undergraduate energy that for two years has been absorbed in the serious business of beating Germany. Once more the fantastic garbs were seen among the college buildings on the day when all returning alumni become undergraduates in spirit for the time being.

And intercollegiate athletics, culminating in the Commencement season, partook of something of their old-time animation and importance. If there is any proof needed that the war is at an end, it can be found in the real thrill that came when there were three men on bases and two men were out, or when the bow of one boat was creeping past the rudder-post of the other in the last half-mile.

In the East, Yale has started the new athletic era with a vim. She has beaten her two rivals, Harvard and Princeton, on the diamond and on the water, and has won all her matches in tennis, which is coming to be one of the major sports; and though she was submerged in the intercollegiate track and field meet (which was won by Cornell), she downed both Princeton and Harvard.

COUNSEL TO COLLEGE MEN AFTER THE WAR

If there was ever a time when colleges tended to monastic seclusion, it has certainly come to an end in these days. Not only have colleges been serving as barracks and camps, but now as hostilities have ended they are serving as forums for the discussion of the problems that the war has brought in its train. It is natural and right that the word which goes from institutions of learning should be a reminder that progress can be safely made when we know and understand the lessons from the past, but that it is folly to try experiments which the cumulative experiences of mankind have proved futile. It is the business of universities and colleges to bring the knowledge of the past into the service of the present.

Among the Commencement addresses that are peculiarly pertinent at this time is that which was given to the Class of 1919 by Dr. Charles Alexander Richmond, President of Union College. As our readers will remember, Dr. Richmond was among those who early saw the significance of the war. His verse setting forth the practical wisdom of Brother Jonathan on the war, which was published in The Outlook in 1916, has been likened to Lowell's "Biglow Papers." To the graduating class he gave warning against, on the one hand, too much idealism, and against, on the other hand, too little. He reminded his hearers that though this was a new era, it was an old world, that though there were new nations and new boundaries there were still ancient feuds. "We shall have need of armies and navies, and the strong nations will still control the weak as they are doing now in the very organization of the new League," he said. "There is nothing sinister in this; it only means that in seeking to obtain the things that should be we must take account of the things that are." That on the one hand; but on the other it is clearer than ever that we must hold to idealism; that we see that the strong arm shall be used only to smite the oppressor and protect the defenseless; that security and co-operation, which we are looking for in the new order, cannot be secured by any material processes; that Germany's experience proved once for all that the foundations of national greatness cannot be laid in cold-blooded self-interest. In applying these lessons, particularly to Bolshevism, Dr. Richmond made use of these aphorisms:

Thrift is not unthrift. Industry and idleness are not the same. There is no substitute for brains. Ability to govern is no man's birthright. A thousand fools do not make one wise man nor a thousand knaves a man of honor.

Vapors thrown off by an overfed fatuity of mind are sometimes mistaken for visions. We must beware equally of the idealism that spurns the lessons of experience and the materialism that ignores the life of the soul.

And, in conclusion, he applied these lessons to our relations with other countries in the following words:

What is the America of our dreams? Is it a red Republic that has thrown away all the rich gains of the past, where democracy has become a proletarian rabble, where liberty has become a madness and brotherhood a bloody compact of assassins? Such dreams are in the minds of some who call themselves idealists. Or shall it be an America that has set its heart on riches; a Nation that sees in the exhaustion of our friends as well as of our enemies only a chance to seize the golden prize of commercial supremacy?

We could not think so meanly of ourselves. We know that if they are left poor and weak while we are rich and strong it is because they have stood among the reapers in the harvest field of death through all the long hours of the day and we but an hour.

The America we are proud of is an America that sees in this a golden opportunity to pay a sacred debt; a Nation that rejoices in its strength because by that strength we can impart vitality and restore hope to four hundred millions of people brought low by the sacrifices they have made for us as well as for themselves.

THE PRESIDENT BECOMES A COLLEGE BOY AGAIN

One of the interesting features of the Commencement season at Princeton was the fortieth reunion of the class of 1879, of which President Wilson was a member. To one of the class committee who had the celebration in charge, Robert Bridges, editor of "Scribner's Magazine," the President sent a message by cable which, through the courtesy of Mr. Bridges, we are permitted to give to our readers:

Paris, May 20, 1919.

Robert Bridges,
Care of Charles Scribner's Sons,
New York City:

I am afraid I cannot get to Princeton by the fourteenth and that I shall miss

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

Cassell in the New York Evening World

Copyright 1919 by The Press Publishing Co. (The New York Evening World)

THE ONLY WAY OUT!

Harding in the Brooklyn Eagle

BOMBS AT THE BACK DOOR

Thomas in the Detroit News

AS THE 1920 RACE LOOKS

Harding in the Brooklyn Eagle

FUNGUS

Darling in the New York Tribune

Copyright, 1919, New York Tribune, Inc.

THERE ARE MOMENTS WHEN MARRIED LIFE SEEMS QUITE ENDURABLE EVEN TO A MAN WHO THINKS HE'S HENPECKED

Bronstrup in the San Francisco Chronicle

WATCHFUL WAITING

what would be the greatest possible refreshment to me in meeting the boys then, and so I beg you will give them the most affectionate messages from me and tell them how cheering it is to me always to think of their friendship and of the old days we spent together. It has been hard work over here, but has been lightened all the way through by the thought of the glorious country I was working for, which I love more and more every day. WOODROW WILSON.

The burdens which the President has been carrying, both of responsibility and of criticism, have been very great, and it is pleasant to think that he can turn for relief to the friendships of his college days. These friendships are among the most natural and intimate that a man can ever form.

PALESTINE AS AN INTERNATIONAL SPIRITUAL HOMELAND

In his recent volume called "A Pilgrim in Palestine" (the result of his travels through the country as the head of the Red Cross Commission), Dr. John H. Finley expressed, together with warm sympathy toward Jewish aspirations as to Palestine, the feeling that the interest of Christianity and of Mohammedanism also should not be disregarded in the future of Palestine. Thus he says, after speaking of the general theory of self-determination:

It is an essential complement of this that somewhere there shall be symbolized the supreme international planetary whole of which these are but confessed national fractions. And where in all the world can a place be found more fit for this visualization than this spot, where this civilization has had its greatest prophets and noblest teachers?

Thus he feels that "the old homestead of civilization, the abandoned farm of a widespread family of nations, should, in a way, be morally and spiritually internationalized." He feels that the Jew, because of the universality of his experience, is "fitted above others to help the nations reach that internationalism of practice as well as of spirit through internationality." This is to be attained, he believes, not by segregating themselves as "a peculiar people," but by accepting a mission "to internationalize, not to intensify and extend nationalism."

This view has been accepted in terms of praise by a Jewish rabbi, the Rev. David Philipson, in the Chicago "Israelite," and the fact that a rabbi writes in hearty favor of the idea is a strong indication that as regards conserving the world-interest in Palestine, it is sound philosophically and in the human spirit. Mr. Philipson says:

To make of Palestine by fiat either a Jewish state, a Christian state, or a Mohammedan state would be intolerable in the first-named instance to Christians and Mohammedans, in the second to Jews and Mohammedans, and in the third to Christians and Jews. The only tolerable solution is that suggested by Dr. Finley and by others before him, viz., the internationalization of this most international of all of earth's localities.

He further urges that it would be well if Palestine could be permanently internationalized, or "mutualized," to use the expression which Dr. Finley prefers, under the oversight of the League of Nations.

The idea of Palestine as a Holy Land for Christians, as well as Jews, is certainly one which may well take hold of the religious and historical sense of Christian churches. It should be borne in mind in all discussions of Zionism and the future of Palestine.

HEALING THE SCARS OF WAR

"Once more to be useful; to see pity in the eyes of my friends replaced with commendation; to work, produce, provide, and to feel that I have a place in the world; seeking no favors and given none; a man among men in spite of this physical handicap"—this is the "Creed of the Disabled" as given on the cover of "Carry On," a magazine devoted to the work of the reconstruction of disabled soldiers and sailors.

There are two phases of this reconstruction work—the physical rehabilitation of disabled men and vocational retraining. Upon the entrance of this country into the war the Division of Physical Reconstruction was created, the object of which was to return the disabled men to combat service or to civilian life as rapidly and as nearly physically fit as possible, and, where necessary, to start re-education. After investigation this work of re-education was delegated to the Federal Board for Vocational Education. Too much cannot be said in commendation of what is being done in the United States in rehabilitation work.

Up to date fifty-two hospitals have been designated for the work of physical reconstruction, and the treatment given includes the educational as well as the therapeutic. In all these plans for the reclamation of disabled men the idea has been not only to cure the men, but to help them to secure remunerative employment as soon as they are able to re-enter civilian life. Close co-operation is therefore maintained between the Division of Physical Reconstruction, with its work in the hospitals, and the Federal Board for Vocational Education, into whose hands the men who are entitled to compensation by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, after their discharge, go for further education.

Every effort is made in planning for this retraining to make use of the former trade or occupational knowledge of the disabled man. While he is under training his expenses are paid. After the completion of his training, employment is found for him by the Placement Division of the Federal Board, and his work is supervised for a time in order to see that he is able to make good under commercial conditions. During this period of probation his support is continued.

Some idea of the importance which the various Governments attach to this class of work may be judged by the fact that an international conference was recently held in New York City. France sent as a delegate Dr. Maurice Bourrillon, Director of the National Institute for War Cripples at St. Maurice and President of the Permanent Inter-Allied Committee on War Cripples. He has been called the grandfather of the movement for the rehabilitation of maimed soldiers, this work having been in operation in France for over four years. He states that the one hundred and twenty-four vocational schools which have been established there have not been sufficient for all those who have been desirous of learning a trade, and that these schools have had to be enlarged and new ones opened.

Incident after incident might be related to show what is being done in the way of healing these scars of war, and what it means to the soldier and to his family to know that the service and advice of a vast staff of experts—medical, psychological, sociological, and economic—are at his command.

In one of the hospitals devoted entirely to head cases a pathetic instance is cited of a boy who was horribly burned by liquid fire. His lower jaw was almost completely burned away, he had lost his nose, and there were other serious wounds about the face and upper part of the head. He had been operated on seven times. Up to the time of the third operation he had been unable to speak, but his brain was only too active when he thought of what life held for him. While undergoing the third operation, and while still under the influence of the anæsthetic, he spoke for the first time. And he voiced the thoughts that had been surging through his brain all those terrible weeks when he said: "This way, ladies and gentlemen; this way, please. Take a look at the human freak." And so it is with many of these young men. They do not wish to inflict the suffering which the sight of them would bring to their parents. Thus the Government is exerting every effort to mitigate such unfortunate conditions. The blind, the deaf, the armless, the legless, all are being helped in different ways, special attention being given to each kind of disability.

As Dr. Bourrillon has well said: "I firmly believe that just as our French have done, you will understand your duty both to America and to put into the reconstruction of our lives the same ardor and as if you gave evidence of when to the aid of France."

SHOULD WE PAY COLOMBIA TWENTY-FIVE MILLIONS?

IT is stated that the treaty with Colombia will, in a new form, be brought before the Senate; that it is to be favorably reported by the Foreign Relations Committee; and that it is expected that it will be approved. The reason for this expectation is found in the fact that, although the treaty provides for paying $25,000,000 to Colombia, it does not include an apology for anything done by the United States in connection with the establishing of the Republic of Panama and the building of the Panama Canal.

The question at once arises, What, if anything, do we owe Colombia? If we committed a wrong against that country, we owe her an apology as well as money; if we did not, it would appear that we recognize by the treaty that some injury was done to Colombia for which we now wish to make ourselves responsible although we committed no wrong. If we rightly owe anything to Colombia, it should be made as clear as day what we owe, and why. As a matter of fact, Colombia attempted to take advantage of the United States by extortionate demands after we were so far committed to the building of the Panama Canal by our purchase of the French rights that (as Colombia supposed) we had no alternative but to submit to being held up.

We earnestly advise the Senate, and any one who feels inclined to make this present of cold cash without compensation to Colombia after sixteen years of refusal on the part of the United States to do so, to read the two Messages sent by President Roosevelt to Congress in 1903 and 1904. In these the story of the whole matter is told fully and finally. It is often said that Mr. Roosevelt declared publicly as to Panama, "I took it." Over and over again, however, he declared that he resented the assertion that he had usurped authority or acted in an unconstitutional manner. What his attitude was in this and other similar questions was well expressed in a passage which we quote from an article by Mr. Roosevelt in The Outlook of October 7, 1911, on "How the United States Acquired the Right to Dig the Panama Canal:"

The simple fact was, as I have elsewhere said, that when the interest of the American people imperatively demanded that a certain act should be done, and I had the power to do it, I did it unless it was specifically prohibited by law, instead of timidly refusing to do it unless I could find some provision of law which rendered it imperative that I should do it. In other words, I gave the benefit of the doubt to the people of the United States, and not to any group of bandits, foreign or domestic, whose interests happened to be adverse to those of the people of the United States.

A few of the salient facts which should not be forgotten may be here briefly summarized: Colombia had negotiated a treaty with the United States, selling us the rights desired for the Panama Canal; technically the treaty had to be ratified by the Colombian Congress as well as by our Senate; practically the Congress was a mere tool of Maroquin, the Colombian Vice-President, who had seized the power, imprisoned the President, and dispersed Congress. He summoned a session of Congress for the express purpose of making it refuse to ratify the treaty the Colombian Government had negotiated. No Congress had sat in Colombia for five years before Maroquin called this Congress for the express purpose of rejecting the Canal Treaty. It meekly did so, and then adjourned without passing any legislation whatever. As Mr. Roosevelt pointed out, Maroquin, who had come to power by seizing and imprisoning the President, had the fate of the treaty entirely in his own hands. He had the absolute power of an unconstitutional dictator to keep his promise or break it. He determined to break it. Thus, he hoped, the United States would be caught in a trap and driven to accept a blackmailing demand.

But Panama had a great stake in the matter. To build the Canal was to benefit Panama immensely. It is no wonder that talk of revolution in Panama surged up instantly. Panama had seen fifty-three revolutions and outbreaks in fifty-seven years; twice she had tried to secede; several times marines had been landed from United States war-vessels to protect persons and property. The Panaman delegates in the Colombian Congress gave warning that Panama would not submit to this attack on its vital interests.

By the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty the United States had not only the right but the duty to keep peace on the Isthmus, and especially to see that transit by railway was kept open and free. It had exercised this right and duty several times at the request of Colombia and to its interest. The moment the Panama Republic was formed we intervened in the same way. If we had not taken prompt action, as Mr. Roosevelt often pointed out, the Panama Canal would not have been built. It would have been "leaning backwards" if on a demand to enrich Colombia we had ignored the plain interests of Panama, the Canal, and the United States. If the Panama Revolution had not sprung up, President Roosevelt was prepared to send a Message to Congress recommending that we should proceed with the work of the Canal in spite of Colombia's opposition.

It has been said, in effect, that we were in collusion with the revolutionists in Panama. The proof given is the fact that we acted quickly. In point of fact, every one knew that such a revolution was impending. A month before it broke out Army officers who had been on the Isthmus told Mr. Roosevelt that it was certain to take place if Colombia did not ratify the treaty, and that the people of Panama were in favor of it. President Roosevelt acted promptly and legally. He said in 1911:

To have adopted any other course would have been an act not merely of unspeakable folly but of unspeakable baseness; it would have been even more ridiculous than infamous. We recognized the Republic of Panama. Without firing a shot we prevented a civil war. We promptly negotiated a treaty under which the Canal is now being dug. In consequence, Panama has for eight years enjoyed a degree of peace and prosperity which it had never before enjoyed during its four centuries of troubled existence.

We notice that while all comments on the new treaty lay stress on the fact that there is no admission of wrong-doing, most of them indicate a feeling that there was wrong-doing. For instance, the New York "Times" entitles its leading editorial on the subject "Reparation to Colombia." If there has been no wrong-doing, why talk about reparation? And if Colombia threw away her golden opportunity through greed to get more than was offered, and thereby really did injure herself to the extent of $25,000,000, why, in the name of justice and common sense, should this country be called to make her a present of that amount?

BACKGROUND PAST AND PRESENT

MANY of us to-day have our little cures for the contemporary. When familiar creeds go crashing, and the daily foundations of our feet quake and rumble, we have our avenues of escape. Birds and books and babies are not yet infected with Bolshevism. Despite the portentous problems that oppress us, spring still pipes gayly through the greenwood and youngsters make merry with the violets. But while nature is still reassuring, that other familiar refuge, a book, has become an insecure retreat. A novel used to be a method of splendid forgetting, but to-day we have reason to complain that most of the people in contemporary fiction are unreal. They do not move with human abandon; they are puppets by which we refuse to be duped, much as we yearn for the release of romance.

Probably the novelist is as conscious of his inadequate portraiture as we are. It is not his fault if both his own hand and the characters he depicts lack the large, free gesture of older days. The real trouble is that to-day both artist and picture have no stable background. We know how hard it is to distinguish the movement of a train except by reference to stationary objects. Fielding and Thackeray drew men in action against the static landscape of an accepted social order. The present prevalence of earthquake both weakens the artist's hand and in any faithful picture of the times confounds the movements of the actor with the movements of the scenery, so that we cannot focus attention on him, being preoccupied with observing the roof about to collapse upon his head. Both in fact and in fiction background has become intrusive, so that by its engrossing interest it relegates the people in the drama to mere automata. No wonder that the old gusto of loving or hating an imaginary person has become impossible for either author or reader.

In earlier novels fiction-shapes stood out boldly against the surrounding stability; their actions and reactions showed forth vigorous and impressive. The background of any story may be resolved into several elements, each forming part of the foundation upon which fiction folk live and move and have their being. Of these foundation elements, actual place, with all its power to shape personality and to suggest atmosphere, is prominent. No less important is the period depicted, comprising the social conditions governing the career of any individual; the common workaday creed and convention of his time and his town must show forth as affecting a hero's behavior. These elements of background can be instantly recognized if one remembers the painstaking attention to each shown in Bennett's "Old Wives' Tale." Another part of background is less visible, namely, the writer's own philosophy of life, which consciously or unconsciously supplies the structure of selection beneath the external setting. Yet how is a story-teller to-day to find a stage-scene secure enough for contrast with a character's emotions and actions? Revolt has always been a fertile theme for fiction, but in a revolutionary period you cannot discover any condition solid enough for any one to rebel against. You could not to-day emphasize a man's atheism, as once in Edna Lyall's "Donovan;" too few men are sure of God. You could not emphasize a woman's divorce; too many women are divorced. You cannot depict revolt against any convention unless it is securely established.

Perhaps it is impossible to have confident and convincing portrayal of character when all the background of faiths and customs is being tossed and tested both for people in novels and for people out of them. Yet we who would find some poise in a reeling universe still hunger for the peace that is due us from books. A sharp line of cleavage may be observed to-day between readers who are so intrigued by the enigmas of the present that they cannot read any books of the past, and readers who are so oppressed by these same enigmas of the present that they cannot read any but books of the past. Susceptibility to background is the essence of both attitudes; the first that of people repelled by the smug security of former fiction, and the second that of people helpless with hysteria before our own volcanic present. For both classes no saner means of orientation is to be found than the attentive study of the background of earlier novels. With a sure instinct for equipoise, many a doughboy in his dugout demanded a deep draught of Dickens; we who are called on to hold the bewildering Front Line of Reconstruction should have the same brave detachment and sane appreciation. Both the readers and the writers of novels will return to a contemplation of real life with surer self-security after they have walked for a while along the unhurried farm-lands of George Eliot, or in the little villages of Jane Austen impregnable in provincialism.

In view of their conscientious attention to social and economic questions, it is perhaps unkind to say to many present-day novelists that a novel should deal primarily with persons, not with problems. If you are to portray characters that shall seem alive, you must subdue background to its proper subordinate function, you must impress enough firmness upon your landscape to contrast clearly with the action of your people. To attain this trick of seeming security when the actual contemporary scene is heaving, is a hard task for any story-teller. One way of success is by emphasizing those elements of background that are less subject to disturbance than the others. Specific place can be made so prominent that the actuality of mountain and moor may offset the flux of creeds and conventions unescapable in a transitional era. This is the supreme achievement of Thomas Hardy. His characters move across the pages with compelling vitality, not because either he or they possess the old security of faiths and codes unquestioned by Fielding and Smollett, but because their actions are silhouetted against the brooding immobility of Exmoor.

Another element of background that may be intensified to give the requisite of realism is harder to attain. The personal philosophy of the writer may supply security to the stage structure of his drama. This framework may be invisible to the reader's eye. Even the artist himself may not be fully conscious that he is employing it, and yet it will prove to be his own conception of the eternal scheme of things that establishes the perspective of his picture and gives it coherence. Just in so far as a novelist's own faith is sanguine and constructive rather than inchoate, will the background of his book appear to have solidity.

The requisite of a serene philosophy is to-day equally difficult for novelist and reader. Yet both might gain peace and poise by a glance at the backgrounds of past fiction and of present fact. The earth under our feet is perhaps far firmer than we perceive. There have been volcanoes before, but when the lava cooled, braver cities were built on buried ones. Creeds and customs slough their old externalities only to attain more vigorous new growth. At many a time before in history must the background of life have seemed to contemporary actors menacing to all tradition and to all confident behavior. Yet never yet has the sky that roofs all our faiths fallen on us, nor the earth that gives seed-space to our hopes been consumed. All the structures of custom built by progress have been preserved just so long as people have kept them sanitary. When the house of habit appears to be toppling, it does not call for panic, but for sturdier beams. One conceives one's background as ready made for one's entrance upon the stage; if the scenery quakes and threatens or even bruises by unexpected impacts, one thinks this not one's fault but one's fate. Yet perhaps there never was any period, however chaotic, when a man's background was not chiefly of his own making.

POPULAR FALLACIES

IV—THAT LABOR IS A COMMODITY TO BE BOUGHT IN THE CHEAPEST MARKET

A HOUSEWIFE goes marketing after breakfast. She wishes to get some fruit for the family dinner. She is spending the family money, and she wishes to get the most and the best she can for that money. There are three fruiterers in the village. She may go to one because he is an Italian, to another because he is a native American, to a third because he belongs to her church. But if she is a wise and a conscientious housewife the two considerations which will determine her choice are quality and price. She buys where she can get the best fruit for her household at the lowest price.

And the fruiterer will sell where he can get the best price for the fruit he has for sale. His customer may be a poor woman and he may be generous, or she may be a new customer and he may be politic. In either case he may sell below the market price. Otherwise he will get the most money he thinks he can get that day in that market.

When I was a boy in college, the orthodox doctrine of political economy was that labor is a commodity, like fruit. The workingman has labor to sell; the capitalist wishes to buy some labor, and goes into the market, like the housewife, to buy the best labor he can get at the lowest price for which he can get it. As the housewife is spending the family money, so the capitalist is spending the stockholders' money; and both are bound to make the best bargain they can.

There are many and serious objections to this economic theory. The fundamental and fatal objection is that labor is not a commodity. Commodity is a thing, and labor is not a thing; it is a service. Commodity is a product of the man's labor, but labor is the man himself for a certain number of days in the week or hours in the day.

If I am peddling apples in the street, the character of the man who comes to the door to look at my fruit is a matter of indifference to me. It is true that if I think he has made his money by a gambling speculation or by oppressing the poor I may refuse to sell to him. But this little boycott is only that I may satisfy my conscience—or my pride—by refusing to deal with a gambler or an oppressor of the poor. As the seller of a commodity my only question will be, Is his money good and does he offer enough of it to get my apples?

But if I am applying for a position as gardener, that is not my only question. It is not my principal question. I want to know what sort of a man the employer is. Does he pay promptly, or is he a screw who pays his debts only under compulsion? Is he generous, so that if my wife or children are sick I may expect some consideration from him in adjusting my work with reference to their needs, or is he a Shylock who will have his bond whatever the cost? Will he treat me with respect, so that I can maintain my own self-respect while in his employ, or shall I be to him a bit of agricultural machinery, like the plow or the spade, or a mere higher type of animal, like the horse, to be dismissed whenever as good a one can be had at a lower price? How does he treat his other servants? Shall I find myself in a happy family, or shall I have to live in an atmosphere of continual discontent?

If I am selling him apples, all he will need to know will be, Are my apples good and is the price reasonable? But if I am applying for a position as gardener there is much he will need to know about my character before he employs me. Am I a drinking man or a sober man? industrious or a shirk? decent in my conversation and behavior, or vulgar and profane, a man from whom his children will catch bad habits? Am I careful, so that he may safely intrust to me his animals and his tools, or careless, so that I may injure the tools and mistreat the animals? These questions do not concern him if he is buying my apples, but they are fundamental if he is hiring my service.

If the bargain is between a corporation and a workingman, the questions will be different, but they will be equally personal and equally vital. The workingman ought to know whether the corporation will treat him as a man or as a piece of machinery; whether the foremen and superintendents under whose orders he will work are gentlemen or merely driving-wheels; whether his employers will have consideration for his health and his home life, or will be disregarding of both. And the corporation ought to know whether its employee will regard its interests as his own or is one who will stir up strife and discontent in his fellow-workmen and who perhaps is coming to the factory for that very purpose.

If an objector says that sobriety and honesty are qualities of the labor sold, as ripeness and soundness are qualities of the apples sold, the answer is that the qualities of the apple do not depend on the qualities of the seller, but the qualities of the labor do depend absolutely on the qualities of the laborer. And this fact distinguishes radically a commodity from a service, and the relations of employer and employed from the relations of seller and purchaser.

The relations between employer and employed are those of collaborators in a common enterprise. The mistress and the maid are together engaged in keeping house; the banker and the porter are together engaged in protecting the property of the depositors; the president of the railway and the switch-tender are together engaged in transporting freight and passengers. If their joint work is to go on peacefully and prosperously, the relation between them must be one of mutual confidence and respect. This is the postulate of the new political economy. And all schemes of collective bargaining, profit-sharing, and the like are valuable only as they are the products of this spirit or tend to promote it.

LYMAN ABBOTT.

WAR WORK IN HONOLULU

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

IN the peaceful isles of Hawaii, surrounded by leagues of the blue Pacific, we have felt comparatively little of the stress of war, except through our mental vision. It is true that with our cosmopolitan population we have been akin to probably all the fighting nations through their sons who had sojourned here until the war cloud darkened the world. Then they heard the call of country, and, leaving their homes and families here, journeyed far to answer the call. Thereafter their letters, or stories we heard of their deeds of valor, brought the war spirit so close that the women of every nationality have also "carried on." Their work has been varied: in all departments of the Red Cross and other allied organizations; in helping Hawaii go "over the top" in every campaign for Liberty Bonds, War

Savings and Thrift Stamps; and in supplying both service and funds in all organizations which looked after the morale of the Army, Navy, and the "folks at home."

After the armistice was signed, and the western front was no longer the chief objective point of the world's interest, we of Hawaii have felt nearer to the next most interesting front—Siberia—and our interest in war work has been kept up through supplies sent to the army and refugees there.

Occasionally we have been able to extend Hawaiian hospitality through Red Cross canteen work to troops which were being sent to Siberia via this port, well named "the crossroads of the Pacific." There have been French aviation corps, American engineers, and Red Cross medical units. Hawaii has sent to Siberia its own Red Cross unit of doctors, nurses, camp service men, secretaries, and refugee workers, all of whom send back to us most vivid pictures of the crying needs in that vast country.

By ones and twos, and sometimes in larger numbers, Hawaii's sons, and daughters too, have come home to thrill us with tales of their experiences. As we are such a "melting-pot" of all nations, we have had representatives of nearly all the Allied armies; also representatives of nearly every nationality who, born here on American soil, have served under the "Stars and Stripes." The roll of honor contains many names marked with the gold star which means the supreme sacrifice; but the list is comparatively small, thank God, of boys who have returned without the full complement of arms, legs, and eyes.

So it remained for the contingent of one hundred Czechoslovaks and some forty of our own boys in khaki who came to Honolulu from the Siberian battle-front to show the people of Honolulu the terrible ravages which modern warfare makes upon human flesh. When these men came down the gangplank of the transport Sheridan on a beautiful Hawaiian Sunday (May 18) and lined up to march to the waiting motors, I'll venture to say there was not a dry eye in the group these men should be written by some one with the epic pen of Homer, for mine fails in doing justice to the subject. I can only tell, as I learned from them bit by bit, a few of the tragic stories I heard. One man, with face lined and seamed as by old age, and yet with such a kindly expression, told me that he had lived in New York many years before the war, and had a wife and six children, whom he left in the spring of 1914 to go home and see his old mother in Bohemia. Then came war; his entry, perforce, into the Austrian army; surrender to the Russians after not eat another bite, and as I probably showed in my face surprise at his whisper, he told me he had not been able to speak aloud since last December, as the intense cold had paralyzed his vocal chords. Another American had been a painter by trade, but the cords of his hand were paralyzed and some of the flesh had dropped off as a result of frostbite, so he will go with the whispering soldier to a hospital on the mainland for treatment.

We learned through Professor Chez, who is accompanying the six officers and ninety-four men, that nearly all who had undergone amputations had not even had the blessing of anæsthesia, because the supply of chloroform and ether gave out. Professor Chez is himself a Czech; he was formerly a member of the faculty of the University of West Virginia, and well known as an athlete and a football coach. He has had wonderful experiences, too numerous to relate in this short space, as he has been in every warring country except Mesopotamia. He was asked by the Czechoslovak Staff in Siberia to accompany this band of wounded heroes as their official interpreter and friend on their long journey from Siberia via Japan, the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, the United States mainland, and across the Atlantic until they finally reach their homeland, the new Republic of Czechoslovakia. Professor Chez is quoted as saying: "These men are sent by the Czechoslovak Staff in Siberia in order that they may be seen and talked to by their compatriots who are now American citizens; that the latter may know the heroes who defended the Trans-Siberian Railway, the longest front in this war, against ten times their number, and who have done more than any other army of equal size in winning the war, principally by keeping Germany from entering the rich territory of Siberia and capturing the food supplies."

When some of the men refused butter for their bread, it brought home the fact that to them white bread probably seemed quite delicious without butter in comparison to the black bread and thin soup diet they had subsisted on for so long. At one time they had not even had tobacco as a solace for their hardships, and had actually smoked leaves as a substitute. One poor chap who had lost both hands from a bomb explosion did not lack for willing helpers, because his comrades on either side saw to it that he had all he wanted to eat and drink; later, when we passed around cigarettes and postcards, there was always some one near who would light the one or tuck the other into a uniform pocket.

After they had finished a substantial lunch, which was served out of doors, with long tables covered with snowy white cloths, "just like we used to have at home," as one buck private remarked in an awe-struck tone, the Czechs gathered under one of the trees and sang several songs in their native tongue. Their voices were good and the harmony more than good, and as they sang the sad faces lighted up and the eyes glistened, for they felt that they were among friends. Their

THE CZECHOSLOVAK DELEGATION AT LUNCHEON IN HONOLULU

Diamond Head, an extinct volcanic crater, is seen in the background of Red Cross and War Camp Community Service workers come to greet these men when the crutches swung along in marching time, or one arm and an empty sleeve kept rhythm with the step.

After a motor ride to the Pali, which is Honolulu's greatest beauty spot, destined to become world famous, the drive continued around the city of Honolulu, so that the men might enjoy the trees and shrubs in full flower—such an antithesis to the bleak Siberian wilds. Then to the Seaside Hotel, where some enjoyed a dip in the ocean, while others preferred to sit "On the Beach at Waikiki" and talk to the first American girls and women that they had seen.

The conversation was carried on in some instances through an interpreter, sometimes in French, and—yes, even in German, for no one cared what the language was, provided it showed these Czechs that they were among friends. The language of the eyes was used too, and the boys seemed content merely to look and smile at the women who felt it a privilege to be with them. And their eyes! What suffering and sadness they showed, even in the youngest faces! The American boys of course welcomed the opportunity to talk to the young girls hovering around, and their tongues made up for lost time spent among people who understood not their language.

The history of each and every one of his officers were killed in battle; then the Bolshevik uprising after the Russian Revolution; and, finally, they were driven like hunted beasts into Siberia, after they had been the defense of the Trans-Siberian Railway against the Bolsheviks. He said that since he had entered the Austrian army he had never heard a word from his wife and children, nor even from his mother in Bohemia. He had written to them for three years, and, discouraged then, finally gave up writing to them, as he felt that the letters were never sent from the point where he mailed them. The one bit of news he had gleaned in regard to them was once when he stood near the railway in the vast Siberian plains and a train stopped for a moment. He recognized a friend who lived in the same town in New York State, and, frantically calling to him for news, this friend gave him the information that his two eldest sons were in the American Army, and then the train went on! These were children only fourteen and sixteen years old when he left home. Well, his story is doubtless no sadder than thousands of others, but I was so interested to hear whether he finds the wife and children still awaiting his return in the little village in New York that I gave him my address, and I hope he will remember his promise to let me know all about it.

One big American private to whom I offered dessert whispered that he could afternoon was spent in a trip to the Aquarium, in which Honolulu has one of the finest collections of tropical fish in the world, to quote David Starr Jordan, an authority. The Army-Navy Y.M.C.A. was of course thrown open to all the men on the transport and continuous entertainment offered.

Their stay in port lasted till Monday noon, and when I went to the dock to take some magazines and postcards to some of my new-made friends they greeted me with much more happy and smiling faces than when they sailed into this port, unknown to them, just a little over twenty-four hours previous. When the whistle blew and the Hawaiian band played its customary farewell song, "Aloha Oe," the hearty yell that went up from Americans and Czechs alike showed that they realized that here in this "Paradise of the Pacific" they were leaving many friends who had given them the first of the cordial greetings which every American city they visit will give to this band of heroes when the opportunity comes to show the appreciation that we all feel for what they have done for us.

HELEN KIMBALL.

Honolulu, T. H., May 25, 1919.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

BY WILLIAM G. McADOO

FORMER SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES TREASURY

A FUNDAMENTAL error into which opponents of a League of Nations have fallen is the assumption that by staying out of such a League the United States can maintain a "splendid isolation" which will keep us out of future wars. The great war from which we are now emerging shows the magnitude of this illusion. We were not drawn into the world war voluntarily. We tried to maintain our traditional policy of isolation, but failed, for the reason that America has grown so great in material, moral, and political influence and is now such a vital factor in the family of nations that no great war involving the leading Powers of the world can take place without involving the United States inevitably in the conflict.

For almost three years after the war broke out in Europe we strove, in pursuance of our traditional policy, to maintain a neutral position. But as the struggle between the belligerents progressed and it became more and more to their advantage in fighting each other to disregard our neutrality and to violate our rights under international law, they proceeded to do so with indifference.

America's economic status in the family of nations makes it essential that freedom of ocean transit for American life and property shall always be maintained. For many years we have produced much more than we can consume. Our overproduction, stimulated by war, is the greatest in our history. Foreign markets for our surplus are indispensable to the welfare and prosperity of our people. In furtherance of our foreign commerce, it is necessary that American citizens, as well as American products, shall be transported upon the high seas without molestation. Germany found it to her interest to use the submarine in defiance of international law to destroy American lives and American commerce in her effort to defeat England. The sacred obligation which every government owes to its citizens to protect them against wrongful aggression forced the American people finally to drop the rôle of a neutral and to assume the character of a belligerent. If we had failed to defend our rights which had been challenged by an arbitrary foe, we should have been respected neither at home nor abroad; we should have found our moral influence destroyed and our legitimate commerce injured to such an extent as to bring distress and suffering to our own people. First of all for liberty, humanity, and our sacred ideals, and next for the vindication of our vital rights, we entered the fight and fought the war to the finish and to victory. We shall have to fight again unless the nations of the earth now organize an instrumentality through which the peace of the world may be preserved, for we shall find ourselves confronted again with aggressions upon our vital rights by one combatant or another or all the combatants who may be engaged in some future European war.

Our isolation has been destroyed forever. Three thousand miles of the Atlantic are no longer a protection. They are not even a formidable barrier. Gallant men of our Navy have already completed the conquest of the Atlantic in airplanes; and two gallant representatives of Great Britain have just made a non-stop flight across the Atlantic in sixteen hours. What the future development of the world is to be one can picture with reasonable certainty—swifter communication by improved methods as revolutionary in their character as the steam-engine was a century ago, and capable perhaps of infinitely greater and more remarkable development. More than ever America is interwoven into the very warp and woof of the fabric of the world.

Our only escape from war in the future is therefore to join our power to that of the leading nations of the world and create such a preponderant force capable of benevolent, orderly, and prompt exercise in the interest of peace that war shall be made remote, if not impossible.

Under the peace settlement new nationalities are taking form and vitality. Self-government of the people, for the people, and by the people bids fair to become the organic system in each of the new nations which will be born of the Peace Conference now sitting at Versailles. This very democratization of the peoples of Europe will prove one of the most potential influences for the future peace of the world. Self-governing peoples, democratic peoples, do not want war. They are pacific in large degree because of the very responsibility which self-government imposes, and they are receptive, therefore, to counsels of peace when autocratic despots are never willing to listen. With autocracy destroyed and democracy ascendant America has the opportunity of bringing into existence the greatest charter of human rights and of doing a greater service for humanity than any nation has ever been able to do in the history of all the world.

No League of Nations can be created without America. Her influence is essential, not alone to its creation, but to its success. Her power, her moral influence, her unselfishness, and her ideals must be thrown into the balance all the time.

No argument should be required to show the need of a League to secure the future peace of the world; but if it is, five million dead soldiers and sailors sleeping in the soil of Europe and in the trackless waters of the vast deep, millions of maimed and wounded fighters, millions of dead and outraged women and children needlessly sacrificed, and millions of civilian men too old to fight but forced to die from starvation and want, cry out in a mighty but inarticulate chorus for the abolition of war. Humanity, Christianity, civilization, and every noble thing America has professed and fought for demand guarantees of future peace. The masses of men and women everywhere, who must bear the burden of debt and toil and sacrifice for years to come to repair the senseless waste of five years of brutal and unnecessary war, with one voice demand that the statesmen of the world who now have the responsibility of ameliorating the burdens of humanity shall not fail to provide a remedy.

It is for these reasons that a League of Nations has been proposed as a part of the Treaty of Peace. The plan suggested is practical and workable. It represents undoubtedly the compromise of many conflicting views and ideals, which is inevitable where the interests involved are so extensive and intricate. But it is amazing to have achieved so much at the start. If the plan is adopted and put into effect, resort to war will be made so difficult as to encourage the hope that the greatest scourge of humanity, with the exception of disease and poverty, has been conquered at last. It is not my purpose to attempt an exhaustive analysis of the League Covenant, nor to make a technical or legalistic argument. It is my hope to give a general outline of the plan and touch upon those important features of the Covenant which relate directly to the prevention of war.

Thirty-two nations, representing the greatest part of the population of the world and the largest part in area of the soil, are signatories to the plan, which, in general outline, provides for an Assembly or Congress of the Nations, in which each has three representatives and in which each nation has one vote.

In addition to the Assembly, a Council of nine is created in which five of the Great Powers—namely, the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan—are permanently represented. The other four members of the Council are to be selected by the Assembly. The Council is an executive body and will have in effect the general direction of the affairs of the League. With the exception of matters of procedure at meetings of the Assembly or of the Council and the appointment of committees, effective action by the Council or the Assembly requires unanimous vote. This unanimity of action completely annihilates the objections raised by some opponents of the League, that small nations are given the same voting power as large nations. What difference does this make so long as unanimous vote is essential to action? This provision makes conferences, and not legislatures, of the meetings of the Assembly and of the Council, and destroys completely the argument that the United States will be disadvantaged because it has one vote and is therefore in a minority. Where unanimous vote is essential to action, one vote is as potential as all the other votes.

The first meeting of the Assembly and of the Council will be called by the President of the United States. A permanent Secretariat is established, which is the administrative arm of the League, and all positions under or in connection with the League are thrown open equally to women and men. This recognition of women is a great victory in their fight for equality of opportunity and of civil and political rights everywhere.

The prevention of war is sought to be accomplished by eliminating as far as possible the causes which lead to war, through

- (1) the limitation of armaments,
- (2) guarantees of territorial integrity and political independence,
- (3) the abolition of secret treaties,
- (4) compulsory conferences to discuss questions of common interest that may from time to time arise and thereby to bring about co-operation among the nations concerned.

One of the most serious causes of wars in the past has been the creation of vast armaments and great standing armies which have been a constant temptation to aggression by that nation which was possessed of a preponderant force. So long as the policy of any one Power was to build up great military and naval establishments, other Powers had to enter into competition as a matter of self-defense. The result was that the leading nations of Europe have been for generations past great armed camps ready to spring at one another's throats and precipitate wars upon slight provocation or for causes which no impartial tribunal would, upon investigation, consider adequate.

One of the most important purposes of the League is the reduction of armaments upon an established scale, which will put all the members of the League upon an equality as near as may be in the matter of organized force. Plans for such reductions are to be prepared by the Council and submitted to the several governments concerned, but no plans are to become binding on any nation until adopted by it. Congress is not deprived of any of its prerogatives in this matter, but, on the contrary, retains the sole power to determine what armed forces, military and naval, shall be maintained by the United States. If, however, our Congress should adopt the recommendation of the League for reduction of armaments, then no increase in such armaments may be made without the consent of the League for a period of ten years, at the end of which time the plan will be subject to reconsideration and revision.

In order to enforce this provision the Council is to advise as to how the evil effects of the private manufacture of arms and ammunition can be prevented, with a view to the adoption by governments of the policy of manufacturing for themselves instead of through private interests such war materials as are required for their safety. All members of the League are to interchange full and frank advices as to their military and naval programmes in order that each member of the League may know what the others are doing in respect to armaments. This is the first step toward the prevention of war—the limitation of armaments—so that no nation will have a preponderant armed force and be tempted to use it to attack another in the execution of some selfish aim or purpose. The United States is not disadvantaged, but advantaged, by this provision, because it is in line with our historic policy of limited armament and puts all other nations on an equality of armed strength with us.

Throughout all history one of the greatest incentives to war has been the lust of ambitious rulers to extend their power and dominion over other peoples and to absorb the territory of other nations. After every great war the map of Europe has been changed and peoples have been transferred from one sovereignty to another without regard to their feelings or interests. The results of the present war are not different from those of all other great wars so far as changing the map of Europe is concerned, although the motives for such change are this time quite different from those which have heretofore controlled. We are now trying to restore to the different peoples of the world the territories which of right belong to them and to set them up once more as politically independent sovereignties, with the added right of self-government. The magnitude of this task is exceeded only by its difficulties. There are so many races in Europe and the intermingling of populations along their borders has been so continuous that there are many areas which cannot with accuracy be ethnologically defined. There are, so to speak, twilight zones of populations which are neither predominantly one nationality or another, and therefore the new nations which are to be established under the Peace Treaty are in some instances given boundaries which must be tested for a reasonable length of time under conditions of stabilized government before the wisdom of such boundaries can be demonstrated. Moreover, some of these nations will be stronger, of necessity, than others. Their peoples are unaccustomed to self-government and must create a political organization and a status for themselves. This is notably true of restored Poland and Czechoslovakia, which will need for some time guarantees against external aggression which will enable their people to work out their destinies without fear of aggression from their neighbors and under favoring conditions of peace. No less important are these guarantees against external aggression and of political independence to the larger states of Europe than to the smaller. Once it is firmly and clearly established that no nation may commit aggressions upon its neighbors, all may settle down to peaceful pursuits and build up again the prosperity and happiness of their peoples under stable and well-ordered government.

Article X of the Covenant, therefore, wisely provides that each member of the League shall respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League. It must be borne in mind that this Covenant does not permit the League of Nations to interfere in any uprisings or disturbances within a state itself. The right of revolution against oppressive internal authority remains unaffected and unimpaired, and every people is left to determine for itself what its form of government shall be and how its internal or domestic affairs shall be conducted.

Mr. Root, in his admirable essay on the first draft of the League of Nations, said in support of Article X: "I think, however, that this article must be considered not merely with reference to the future, but with reference to the present situation in Europe. Indeed, this whole agreement ought to be considered in that double aspect. The belligerent power of Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey has been destroyed; but that will not lead to future peace without a reconstruction of eastern Europe and western Asia. The vast territories of the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, and the Romanoffs have lost the rulers who formerly kept the population in order, and are filled with turbulent masses without stable government, unaccustomed to self-control and fighting among themselves like children of the dragon's teeth. There can be no settled peace until these masses are reduced to order. Since the Bolsheviks have been allowed to consolidate the control which they established with German aid in Russia, the situation is that Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, with a population of less than 180,000,000, are confronted with the disorganized but vigorous and warlike population of Germany, German Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Turkey, and Russia, amounting approximately to 280,000,000 fast returning to barbarism and the lawless violence of barbarous races. Order must be restored. The Allied nations in their Council must determine the lines of reconstruction. Their determinations must be enforced. They may make mistakes. Doubtless they will; but there must be decision, and decision must be enforced. Under these conditions the United States cannot quit. It must go on to the performance of its duty, and the immediate aspect of Article X is an agreement to do that."

Mr. Root suggested an amendment to this article providing that after the expiration of five years from the signing of the convention any nation might terminate its obligation under Article X by giving one year's notice in writing to the Secretary-General of the League. Since Mr. Root's suggestion a provision has been incorporated in the revised draft of the Covenant which is even more favorable to the termination of the obligation than Mr. Root proposed. Any member of the League may, under the revised draft, withdraw from the League after two years' notice of its intention to do so, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under the League Covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal. The effect of the revised Covenant, therefore, is to enable any nation to terminate its obligation to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the other members of the League after two years' notice of its intention to do so, instead of being bound for five years, as Mr. Root suggested. Certainly the United States could not do less than join in this guarantee, which eliminates one of the most fruitful causes of war, and at the same time gives the new nations to be established under the peace treaty the opportunity to organize and erect stable governments, especially when we can relieve ourselves of this obligation at any time upon two years' notice. It is our duty to help these struggling people back to life, and to help all the nations of Europe to establish ordered government without fear of external attack.

The argument that this guarantee will involve us in every European quarrel is far-fetched, for the following reasons:

(1) We can't be drawn into any war unless our Congress first authorizes it.

(2) After all European armaments are reduced practically to an internal police force basis, any war or attempted war will be a small affair because of the small forces available.

(3) The control by governments of the manufacture of war munitions and the destruction of great war plants like the Krupps' will prevent would-be belligerents from getting the necessary supplies of arms and ammunition.

(4) In case of conflict in Europe the near-by Powers would be called on first to provide the necessary forces, just as in case of conflict on the American continent the United States would be asked to take the matter in hand. But, and I repeat it, in no case is the United States bound to go to war or supply an armed force without the authorization of the Congress.

Another fruitful cause of war between nations has been secret treaties under which nations attempted to get advantage of their rivals and under which intrigues and private understandings of all kinds have worked for distrust, suspicion, and enmity. Article XVIII of the revised Covenant provides that "every convention or international engagement entered into henceforward by any member of the League shall be forthwith registered with the Secretariat and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered."

Certainly no nation imbued with good faith toward its neighbors and genuinely interested in preserving the peace of the world can object to this article of the Covenant. When treaties are published just as are the laws of the United States and of the several States of the Union, so that all may read and understand, the selfish aims and private advantages which have heretofore accrued to nations and to individuals through these pernicious and mischievous secret treaties will become abortive.

If any one thing has been demonstrated by the great war, it is that conference and counsel between the leading nations is one of the most certain means of preventing international misunderstandings and of making war impossible. Heretofore such conference could not be held except by the voluntary action of all the parties. In 1914, before Germany precipitated the great war, an urgent effort was made by Sir Edward Grey to bring about a conference of the Powers to consider the dispute between Austria and Serbia. Germany refused to enter that conference. She had determined to bring on the war in the execution of long-considered plans, and she knew that if she joined a conference of the Powers where a full and frank discussion of the issues involved would be necessary war would be averted and her ambitions would be thwarted.

One of the most powerful arguments for the League of Nations is the requirement that the Assembly, which consists of the representatives of all the members of the League, and the Council shall meet at stated intervals and from time to time as occasion may require, at the seat of the League or at such other place or places as may be decided upon. This provision is mandatory. It provides that the Assembly shall meet at stated intervals, and that the Council shall meet from time to time as occasion may require and at least once a year.

Suppose that this League had been in existence in 1914, and that upon a threat of war a meeting of the Assembly or of the Council had been called. Germany would have been obliged to attend. A discussion of the dispute would immediately have followed, and there is no doubt that the terrible war would have been prevented; that five million dead men would be alive to-day and twenty million wounded men would have been spared; that the horrors and indescribable sufferings of the civil populations of all the nations concerned would not have occurred; and that $200,000,000,000 of treasure would not have been wasted.

It is a well-known fact that Germany has admitted that she expected Great Britain to keep out of the great war, and that if she had known that Great Britain would make common cause with France, Belgium, and Russia she would never have precipitated the disastrous conflict. If even a conference of Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, and Russia had been held in 1914, Great Britain would have made this clear to Germany and the war would not have occurred. If the proposed League of Nations accomplishes nothing more than to make certain a conference of the members of the League and of the Council at stated intervals for the purpose of discussion and conference, it will have a potential influence upon the peace of the world; it will promote international co-operation instead of international antagonisms and suspicions, which have been the characteristic evil of the old system of secret treaties and artificial balances of power so long maintained in Europe.

If, however, after limitations of armaments have been secured and guarantees of territorial integrity and political independence have been given, and secret treaties have been eliminated, and conferences of the Powers have been provided for, disputes between nations should arise and take on such an acute form as to threaten war, then the League Covenant makes other provisions which almost certainly will result in maintaining the peace of the world. What are those provisions?

They are, first, for arbitration of the dispute if it is of a character which contending nations recognize as suitable for submission to arbitration. Mr. Root's admirable definition of disputes suitable for arbitration has been inserted in the Covenant, namely: "Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach." Thus the character of disputes suitable for arbitration is clearly defined in the instrument. But if the matter should not be considered suitable for arbitration, then the contending nations agree that an inquiry into the merits of the dispute shall be conducted by the Council, which shall make such recommendations for a settlement as it thinks just and proper, which recommendations must be made within six months after the submission of the controversy. In case either of arbitration or of inquiry by the Council, the parties affected agree that they will not go to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the recommendation of the Council.

Without going into further details about these admirable provisions of the Covenant, it is sufficient to say that they postpone war until there can be a complete discussion of the dispute either through the medium of arbitration or through the processes of inquiry, and that after award by the arbitrators or a recommendation by the Council which makes the inquiry neither party shall go to war until three months thereafter. During that time opportunity for mediation and conciliation is offered, and in any event it is provided that the parties affected will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the unanimous recommendations of the Council or accepts award of the arbitration.

Suppose any nation refuses to accept the award of the arbitration or the unanimous recommendation of the Council which makes the inquiry and proceeds to make war against the other party to the dispute, which has accepted the award or the recommendations of the Council, or suppose any nation goes to war, as Germany did in 1914, without notice to anybody, as the case may be. What then happens? The offending nation will be deemed to have committed an act of war against all the other members of the League, and thereupon the other members of the League will (1) sever all trade or financial relations between the members of the League and the offending nation; (2) prohibit all intercourse between the citizens of members of the League and citizens of the offending state; and (3) prevent all financial, commercial, and personal intercourse between the citizens of the offending nation and the citizens of any other state or nation throughout the world, whether a member of the League or not. This is what is called an economic boycott. It is a terrible weapon which the same representatives of no nation would defy with impunity.

Let us suppose again that Germany had been faced in July, 1914, with this terrible economic boycott by Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, Belgium, and the United States. Is it conceivable that she would have entered upon the mad career of war with certain defeat staring her in the face at the very outset? No nation is strong enough to resist the combined economic pressure of the greatest Powers of the world and the moral influence and reprehension of the public opinion of the world. But economic pressure is not the only consequence which a recalcitrant nation would incur, because if war should actually result the League Covenant provides that the Council shall recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military or naval forces the members of the League shall severally contribute to be used against the offending member.

I wish to repeat, however, that the United States, as a member of the League, could not be forced into war by the recommendation of the Council or by any action of the League without its consent. The Congress of the United States would have to say whether or not such recommendation shall be adopted. The entire subject would have to be submitted to the Congress by the President for appropriate action in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, which vests in the Congress the sole power to declare war.

But if arbitration and inquiry fail, if mediation and conciliation prove impotent, if nine months of discussion and conference do not cool the hot passion for war, if every agency and influence of the League is exhausted in vain, then our opponents say that war will happen and the League Covenant therefore recognizes and sanctions war. It is possible, of course, that war might happen in these circumstances, but it is scarcely conceivable. If it should happen, how could it be said that the League Covenant sanctions war because it undertakes to prevent it, any more than it can be said that the State sanctions murder because it enacts laws to prevent that crime. In either case the evil is recognized to exist, and, because every effort is made to destroy it, by no exercise of the imagination can the attempt be distorted into a sanction of the offense if, after all is done, murder is committed or war occurs.

We do not abandon the Monroe Doctrine by entering the League of Nations. That policy is expressly reserved from the operations of the Covenant. We cannot be made a mandatar of any foreign colony or territory except with our consent, and no amendments to the League after its adoption will be binding upon the United States unless accepted by it.

In case of attack upon the United States we can immediately repel the attack and defend ourselves. Nothing in the League Covenant deprives us of that right, notwithstanding the false claim of our opponents to the contrary. The League has nothing to do with immigration, naturalization, or any of our internal or domestic affairs. We shall control these matters just as fully with membership in the League as without it.

The extent to which the world has been involved in this greatest of all wars makes the terms and conditions of the peace more complex and difficult than any other peace which has been made in the history of the world. Never have such intricate problems been faced and never before has the human mind undertaken to grapple with so many of them at one time. A readjustment and a reconstitution of the world are in progress and the terms of the peace must effect the settlement. There must be some constituted authority or tribunal to which appeals can be made for interpretation of the peace document in cases of dispute or uncertainty and to which resort may be had for the settlement of the innumerable questions which will inevitably arise out of the Treaty or Treaties of Peace.

The League of Nations has in this respect an essential and important service to perform. The peace cannot be interpreted and enforced without the League of Nations as the necessary instrumentality and authority.

The economic problems growing out of the war are a powerful argument for a League of Nations. It is estimated that two hundred billion dollars have been expended by all the belligerents in this war. The greater number of these expenditures constitute national debts of the various belligerents, and impose a burden upon the masses of their people which is difficult for them to bear. For generations to come the working men and women of all of the belligerents will be paying with the sweat of their brows for the needless destruction of this war. The oppression of this debt will be felt by the people everywhere, because it is always the masses who suffer most from war. They bear the bulk of the burden because they are the producers, and it is only by production or the creation of wealth that war debts, like other debts, can be paid. Unless some means are found to prevent war, what hope is there for the masses of men and women in the Old World? If we are to have no League of Peace and the Great Powers must again engage in competition with one another in preparations for war, which will inevitably eventuate in new wars, then the people of Europe are condemned to unspeakable misery and poverty for the future. They cannot support the burdens imposed by the great war and assume, in addition, the heavy expenditures required in preparations for new wars. The only hope for the masses is to turn the fruits of their industry into productive channels. The savings of the future must not be wasted upon war preparations, but must be devoted to improvement of the conditions under which men and women live.

Can we not learn a lesson from this and by a League of Nations make it unnecessary to load upon the backs of the already overburdened masses an additional burden in preparation for future wars? Can we not leave in the pockets of the people the money which will be wasted in future preparation for war, thereby easing their burdens and contributing to their happiness and prosperity? This is one of the great benefits we may expect from a League of Nations. If statesmen of the world fail now to give relief to the suffering masses in Europe, there can be no certainty of future peace.

The terrible excesses of the Russian revolutionists are due to the fixed conviction in the minds of the masses of men and women in Russia that the ruling classes have given them nothing but suffering, poverty, and war; that they have failed utterly to serve the people; that statesmanship has been found wanting; that their misery and their poverty are due to these causes as well as to the fact that property has been accumulated in the hands of the few; and in their groping for a new system which will distribute the benefits of society more equally and save them from the horrors of poverty and of war which they have endured for centuries they are striking out blindly and desperately in an effort to find a remedy. What is happening in Russia will repeat itself in Europe unless the combined statesmanship of the world is equal to the situation. The League of Nations will do much to lift the masses of men and women in the world to a higher plane of contentment and prosperity and give them a larger opportunity to participate in the benefits of organized society.

Another phase of the problem is worthy of consideration at this particular time, especially by America. We are now the dominant financial power of the world. All nations needing capital for governmental use or for their internal development through enterprises of every character must look increasingly to America for the necessary assistance. The history of enterprise in foreign lands is filled with injustices to foreign citizens, representing in many instances a denial of justice or such arbitrary action as to be practically confiscatory. There has never been any properly constituted agency for dealing with international disputes arising out of these matters, and they have frequently led to war or have almost precipitated war between nations. The lack of protection of such investments has discouraged American citizens from making ventures in foreign lands. Such ventures, if legitimately undertaken and justly protected, would operate greatly to the benefit of American commerce and influence. The lack of such protection has operated adversely also to the best interests of those countries which constantly need capital for their development.

It seems to me that the League of Nations offers the agency through which disputes of this character may be taken up and considered in an orderly manner and legitimate investments in foreign countries given adequate protection without resort to force. If this can be accomplished, a great incentive will be given to American enterprise in foreign countries, and those nations which need capital will be able to command the requisite supply once it is demonstrated that through the League of Nations a forum has been created where disputes about foreign investments may be promptly considered and disposed of. America's opportunity to assist Latin America, for instance, would be immensely enhanced in those circumstances, and the League of Nations would be able to confer benefit of incalculable value upon the people of all of the Central and South American republics, the people of the United States, and, in fact, upon the citizens of every other country who engage in enterprises in foreign countries. For the future of American commerce, therefore, looking at it for a moment from the purely materialistic standpoint, the League of Nations would have a stimulating and protecting influence of the greatest possible value. Our business men and bankers who are taking such a keen interest in foreign trade and enterprise should not overlook the advantages of this instrumentality of the League.

The League of Nations is created not, as some suppose, merely to hold Germany down. It is created to hold all of the Allied Powers, as well as Germany and all of the Central Powers, down to a peace basis in the future. The League is made necessary, not because any number of nations seek to combine their power to oppress some other nations, but because the whole European system of balances of power, secret diplomacy, and competitive armaments, as practiced heretofore, has failed utterly to preserve peace and to save the masses of people from the burdens and horrors of war. If this old system is not destroyed, but is deliberately re-established now, the same bloody wars which have marred European history for centuries will be repeated in the future. A concert of the nations for peace is the only remedy, and the League of Nations represents the effort to organize the world for peace instead of for war.

What will happen if the League of Nations is not ratified by the United States Senate? The League is an essential part of the machinery for peace. It cannot be separated from the Peace Treaty because the Peace Treaty cannot be enforced without the League. If no League is created and a simple Treaty of Peace is attempted, there can be no stability in Europe. A continual ferment of turbulent populations, already overburdened by debt and struggling in poverty, will precipitate new wars in the near future, and we shall have to remobilize the army we are now demobilizing, and do the job all over again merely to satisfy the views of narrow partisans and visionless men. Why should the people of the United States and of the world suffer because these men or any set of men are unwilling to have any sort of peace unless they can write the formula? The opponents of the League can't agree among themselves as to the kind of a League or the kind of peace that would satisfy them. They offer no alternative to the present plan. There is a counsel of chaos and confusion and continuance of the present state of war.

The League of Nations has taken a stand for social justice upon an international scale which will have a profound effect on the future of all of the peoples concerned. I refer to Article XXIII, which provides that the members of the League will:

(1) Endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men and women, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organization;

(2) Undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control;

(3) Intrust the League with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs;

(4) Endeavor to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease.

What a godsend to humanity an organized effort along these lines will be! All of these objects are of imperative importance. The prevention and control of disease is one of the most serious problems confronting the peoples of the world in the immediate future, because the unsanitary conditions in Europe and Asia, growing out of the war, threaten the health of all of the peoples of the world.

I was struck with the statement of Mr. Henry P. Davison, who has done such splendid work for the Red Cross, and who, just returning from Europe, says: "Right now there are 275,000 cases of typhus in a line stretching between the Baltic and the Black Seas, and the wave is rolling in our direction. I tell you the distress in the world is frightful, unspeakable. If the people of the United States knew the distress in Middle Europe, they couldn't sleep!"

I know the significance of Mr. Davison's statement, because as Secretary of the Treasury I was for six years the head of the Public Health Service of the United States, which has control of the quarantine stations in most of the ports, and whose duty it is particularly to fight the spread of contagious and infectious diseases. International co-operation for the control of communicable diseases and for their prevention is absolutely essential to the health of the peoples of the world. And we in the United States are in daily jeopardy so long as there is an inadequate organization in Europe and Asia to fight these diseases. Every ship that comes into our ports may be a messenger of death through some evil germ concealed in its hold or in the clothing or baggage of its passengers. International co-operation will greatly diminish this danger, and the machinery which the League of Nations will provide is the most practicable plan yet suggested for making effective the measures which are essential to protect, not alone ourselves, but all the peoples of the world, against the dangers and ravages of communicable diseases.

Is the United States unwilling to join with the other Great Powers of the world in an effort to preserve peace when it can withdraw from the League at any time on two years' notice? If we are unwilling to use our great power as a victorious and civilized Nation to secure the future peace of the world as the chief fruit of our sacrifices, then 90,000 American boys have given their lives merely to restore the old system of feverish and secret preparations for war in Europe, for conscienceless profits to private makers of war materials and machinery, for the continued imposition of grinding and impoverishing burdens on the suffering men and women in Europe who must pay with the sweat of their brows, the flower of their health, and the very blood of their bodies to keep the old European system alive. Shall we not rather turn our eyes to the beautiful and inspiring picture of peace and by joining a League of Nations get what our sons fought and died for—a new era of burdens lightened, a prosperity unfettered by the fear of war, and of a peace which will give the masses of the world a chance to realize at last the light of happiness and security?

PORTRAIT OF JOSIAH ROYCE, THE PHILOSOPHER

BY JOHN JAY CHAPMAN

THERE is no such thing as philosophy. But there are such things as philosophers. A philosopher is a man who believes that there is such a thing as philosophy, and who devotes himself to proving it. He believes that behind the multifarious, contradictory, and often very unpleasant appearances of the world there is a unity which he can put into type-writing. Probably there is; but certainly he can't. Let us take an example: A poet is walking down the street; perhaps it is Robert Browning. He wears a wide-awake hat, a new tie, and a handsome theater coat. The scene is the Chelsea Embankment in London. The poet seizes a bystander by the lapel of his coat, stands very close to him, and, holding him against a tree, breathes very hard, speaks very rapidly, grows red in the face, perspires, and continues to talk to the victim for thirty-six hours in blankety-blank verse. Then the poet gives the stranger a dig in the ribs, and passes on down the street, smelling his geranium. The stranger-victim totters to his home, powerfully affected by the experience. But how has the thing been done and what does the victim know now that he didn't know before the interview? These are the questions which the philosopher undertakes to answer; and I have never known a philosopher who wasn't delighted with the task. The poet, the stranger, and the geranium are mere grist to the philosopher's mill. He turns all into type-writing.

It is wonderful to have known a philosopher; and I don't believe that many of the readers of this article have ever seen a real one. I honestly don't think there ever was but one real one on this continent, and that was Josiah Royce. All the rest of them have had doubts and weaknesses and backslidings. There were moments when they suspected the type-writer, and examined its keys, and wondered if there ought not to be more question-marks in the machine. But Royce never faltered. He was spherical, armed cap-a-pie, sleepless, and ready for all comers. He did what no other modern has ever dared to do—he held seminars where any one was welcome. You could loaf down the avenue in Cambridge after supper and enter a little arena of wisdom, where a small company was sitting in eager silence; and you could join in the discussion and challenge the champion if you had the brains. Royce was the John L. Sullivan of philosophy.

I shall never forget the first time I saw him. It was at an oyster-house called Park's, in Boston. I was then a freshman or sophomore at Harvard, and it was the custom to visit Park's at about 10:30 P.M., after the Symphony Concerts. The extreme simplicity of this resort, its bare walls, plain square tables, and very limited bill of fare, gave it a great reputation for lobsters and musty ale.<sup>1</sup> I looked across the table where I sat, and was startled to see a kind of fairy sitting opposite me. It was Josiah Royce. He was a miniature figure, well compacted, with an enormous red head which had a gigantic aspect, as if he were Kant or Beethoven, and also an infantile look like that of an ugly baby.

He began to talk to me about Beethoven, and he was talking exactly as if he had known me all my life. Royce was the only human being I have ever seen who had no preliminary social consciousness, no door-mat of convention. You were inside, though you didn't know how you got there; and I remember wondering how I had got there and where I was. We talked for half an hour, and then he insisted on walking out to Cambridge, though it was a bitter night, with a deadly east wind, and I felt sure he would catch pneumonia, for his overcoat was as thin as paper. I forget the rest, except my strong impression that he was very extraordinary and knew everything and was a bumblebee—a benevolent monster of pure intelligence, zigzagging, ranging, and uncatchable. I always had this feeling about Royce—that he was a celestial insect. If left alone with him, any one would be apt to turn into a naturalist through the effort to catalogue him.

The legend about him among the students was that he was the first man born in California; and it was a strange place for him to choose, for his appearance suggested Asia. No country in Europe seemed old enough to have produced this type of superman, the gnarled cavern sage who was wiser than Europe, more abstract, more Himalayan. I believe that if only he had never been taught to read Royce would have been a very great man. This is not said in disparagement of education, which is very good for most people. But there is a type of person to whom books are injurious; books mean too much to them. And even men of enormous natural talent sometimes belong to the type. But, unfortunately, they did not know this in California; and as soon as Royce saw print he took to philosophy, and mastered all the formal philosophy of the world before he was thirty. There was nobody in Germany who knew German philosophy so well as he, and he held all this wisdom in solution in his mind. He could sit down and dictate a book on, say, the history of free will or the influence of Thales; a book which it would have taken the next most competent man in the world six months to compile. He could give it to you in a popular form if you preferred. He could do it in conversation, illustrating his theme with jests, humor, and astounding analogies drawn from passing events and from current fiction. But in order that he should do these things you had to let him alone; he needed time, he needed eternity. Time was nothing to him. He was just as fresh at the end of a two-hours' disquisition as at the start. Thinking refreshed him.

<sup>1</sup> People nowadays seem to have forgotten that lobsters should be eaten in the simplest surroundings. Louis XV decorations, soft music, and flowers destroy their flavor and destroy the romance of them. The lobster is the most easily vulgarized of all eatables. If luxury approaches him, virtue goes out of him. He is like justice, piety, and truth, which shine brightest at poor men's tables. Plain living gives to the lobster his glory.

The truth was that Royce had a phenomenal memory; his mind was a card-indexed cyclopædia of all philosophy. To him everything was philosophy; nothing else existed but philosophy; and if—only he had been obliged to state the thing in his own words, instead of having his head filled with other people's ideas, he would have set the problems of philosophy to a music of his own, and left behind him works that qualified the age.

I cannot claim a close acquaintance with his writings; but I once made an attempt to read one of his most important books. It was a large book. It was about as big as Boswell's Life of Johnson, and it concerned—well, I never found out what it concerned, because after reading twenty pages without being able to discover the plot I bethought me of turning to the last page to see if I could understand at least something about the landing-place of the argument. On the last page my eye caught the words 'Lamb of God,' the lamb being spelled with a capital; and I said to myself: "If Royce has been obliged to resort to that capital letter in order to express his main idea, there must be something faulty about his vehicle. His vehicle is incompletely expressive; though I think I see what he is driving at more clearly now than I did before."

The obscurity of Royce's writings is the obscurity to be found in all technical philosophy. The reason such writings are hard to follow is that they are done in a lingo; and it takes years to learn the lingo, and the lingo is apt to destroy one's own mind, like emery powder blown into an engine. By the time one has learned the alphabet one may have be-

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

International Film Service

SECRETARY BAKER AWARDED DIPLOMAS TO WEST POINT'S GRADUATING CLASS

A noteworthy feature of the exercises this year at West Point was the fact that for the first time in the Academy's history the class members appeared in khaki uniforms

Digitized by Google

International Film Service

WAR VETERANS HONORED AT HARVARD'S COMMENCEMENT

The procession of the men upon whom Harvard conferred honorary degrees includes, as seen above: Leading (military uniform), Col. A. T. Perkins; Lieut.-Col. Theodore Roosevelt; following him, Major George C. Shattuck; the third man to the rear of Major Shattuck is Lieut.-Col. Charles W. Whittlesey

Western Newspaper Union

THE "COUNCIL OF FOUR" AT PARIS

The vigorous-looking statesmen, Lloyd George (left), Orlando, Clemenceau, and Wilson (right), seen in the above picture have been described by an unfriendly critic as "four pitiful old men." The reader may be left to draw his own conclusions as to the correctness of the phrase

Paul Thompson

RECIPIENTS OF HONORARY DEGREES AT PRINCETON UNIVERSITY

Left to right: Dean West, General Crowder, Admiral Goodrich, Frank A. Vanderlip, Charles W. Parker, William M. Johnson, William T. Manning, John M. Clark. Commencements this year are memorable for the Army or Navy uniforms that in many cases may be seen appearing beneath the academic gowns

Paul Thompson

PRINCETON'S COMMENCEMENT—THE CLASS OF 1913

This was Princeton's one hundred and seventy-second Commencement. Only three colleges in America antedate Princeton in their origin—Harvard, William and Mary, and Yale. At Princeton as elsewhere, with the end of the war, the gay and the grave were again mingled

(C) Underwood & Underwood

REAR-ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. SIMS HONORED BY YALE
Admiral Sims (left) is seen in the picture accompanied by his aide, Lieutenant-Commander William Edwards (right). The degree of LL.D. was conferred on Admiral Sims by Yale

International Film Service

FRENCH OFFICER WINS LAWN TENNIS CHAMPIONSHIP
Lieutenant André H. Gobert, of the French Army, recently defeated Captain Watson Washburn, American, and Captain O'Hara Wood, Australian champion, in Paris, in a championship match

(C) Underwood & Underwood

ORPHANS OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION BEING CARED FOR IN MOSCOW

The terrible conditions of life in Russia, consequent upon the war, the Revolution, and Bolshevism, have resulted in unprecedentedly large numbers of destitute orphans. They are being cared for, as far as possible, in benevolent institutions. A group of these unfortunate waifs, happily rescued from neglect and starvation, are seen in the photograph come an imbecile. A philosopher with an ink-pot at his side and no one to guide him runs straight into this trade jargon—cube roots and quaternions. Now Royce's peculiar merit was that he could in conversation modulate his pipes and shift his stops to suit the auditors. He was a great and wonderful talker.

His extreme accessibility made him a sort of automat restaurant for Cambridge. He had fixed hours when any one could resort to him and draw inspiration from him. A year or two before his death one of my sons was at Harvard and was taking a course on the "Prometheus" of Æschylus. I wrote to him that he must certainly go to see Royce at once. I told the boy to find out the proper hour, present himself, and ask Royce some question, any question, about Prometheus. The thing was done, and Royce lectured to this single student for half an hour with the same fervor and gravity as if he had been talking before the French Academy. What a wonderful man was that!

A year later, when I was passing through Cambridge, a New York woman, who was a worshiper of sages, expressed a wish to see some one who was remarkable. Several of us went to the room of my undergraduate, who by this time had become a pious disciple of Royce, and we said to the boy: "We shall sit here and make preparation for tea and cakes. Do you take a taxi and go and fetch Royce. Track him down. If he is engaged, wait till he is free, no matter how long it takes. Explain to him the exigencies of the occasion; but don't come back without him." In three-quarters of an hour—it seemed a century—the boy returned, breathless, saying, "Get ready, get ready; he's coming up the stairs behind me!" The philosopher entered in coat and muffler, took his stand next a grandfather chair whose high back was on a level with his shoulders, and some one asked him a question about Germany, for this was during the war. Royce would not remove his coat or sit down; and he talked for an hour. He began with the Norse legends, to illustrate the German spirit. He recited with wonderful skill a poem of Edgar Allan Poe's, and he must, first and last, have mentioned about everything that could be thought of between Odin and Poe. The rest of us sat rapt and happy. There was a weight and atmospheric pressure in the room. In our minds floated memories of the great talkers of history. Perhaps Coleridge may have talked like this, or Bacon.

The older Royce grew, the more sacred he became, smaller, more and more wise-looking, more and more like a very ancient Chinese saint. Moreover, he seemed to stand in a tabernacle; and it must be added that he was indeed, as perhaps any one knows already, a heroic character. He passed through family griefs, and misfortunes to his children, a great sickness (perhaps a stroke) himself, and from them all he emerged the more perfected.

There was a period in my life when something about Royce used to make me angry with him. The spirit of political reform, born in the early nineties, sent the young agitators of that day about the land smiting the rocks to get water for their mills. Royce, when smitten, did not respond. I remember a dinner party in Boston in about 1895. Toward the end of the feast I fell into a conversation with Royce as to the duty of the philosopher toward practical politics. Royce immediately constructed a cabin for the philosopher, crawled into it, and maintained that he would never come out of it. Our discussion continued, Royce doing most of the talking, till he was obliged to go home; and I remember following him out as he went and shaking my fist at him over the banisters, crying: "There's no philosophy in the world, anyway. It's a question of power, whether I can get your attention to my ideas, or you mine to yours. Now I won't think about your ideas, and you shall think about mine!"

Of course I was right. But it took the invasion of Belgium to convince Royce of the thesis. He had been all his life drenched in Germany; he was a spokesman for Germany, an interpreter of Germany, and the German villainy of 1914 appeared to him almost in the light of a personal insult. He rose up against it. He threw off Germany. He took the stump. He made a magnificent short speech at the first Boston war meeting, where this frail and aged philosopher appeared in the rôle of the young patriot. He was all righteous rage, and his lifelong voluminous metaphysical ideas were expressed in the flames and burning periods of denunciation. Oh, if this man had been kept away from books in his youth he would have been one of the greatest!

JAPAN AND THE PEACE

BY MARQUIS KIMMOCHI SAIONJI, FIRST DELEGATE OF JAPAN
TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE<sup>1</sup>

AN AUTHORIZED INTERVIEW WITH GREGORY MASON,
STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

AMONG no people in the world, unless it be among some Indian tribes, has age so much dignity and so much power as among the Japanese. Japan is ruled by old men. Behind the Government and above it is always that peculiar institution known as the Genro, or Elder Statesmen. The position of Elder Statesman is not an official position. Those who hold it are endowed with its peculiar influence by courtesy and general recognition alone. The position of the elders of a Hebrew nation or the Wise Old Men whose counsel directed the destinies of a tribe of North American Indians is more analogous to the position of the Genro of Japan than anything in modern life.

Of the Genro of to-day, Prince Yamagata, who is eighty-one years old, is perhaps the strongest political influence in Japan, not excepting even the Emperor. Marquis Okuma is also eighty-one, as is Marquis Matsukata. The fourth member of the Genro, Marquis Kimmochi Saionji, is seventy. Twice Premier of Japan, and at present considered the most active of her great statesmen, Marquis Saionji holds to-day the honorable position of senior member of the Japanese delegation to the Peace Conference. Of all the interesting faces around the Peace Table none appeals more to the imagination than the countenance of the senior Japanese delegate, with its ample brow, steady brown eyes, and small, firm mouth. On the faces of statesmen of Western nations you can see the passing of emotions like the play of sunlight and clouds in the sky. But Marquis Saionji never puts off that look of solid and inscrutable astuteness.

At first glance you might say it was the face of a confirmed conservative. But in the whole group of the elderly men who direct the destinies of Japan Marquis Saionji stands out as a liberal. With a lineage as proud as any in his land behind him, he has always been a democrat. After commanding an Imperial army and being governor of a province at the age of nineteen, young Saionji first showed his liberal strain when he protested against the exclusion of the Samurai from the original Imperial Council. He won his fight, and the state was benefited by the admission to the Council of these representatives of a great yeoman class.

In 1869 Marquis Saionji made his first trip to France. In Paris for eleven years he studied law and letters, cultivating the tastes which later made him known as a poet of no mean ability, and which have also been expressed by his encouragement of the novelists of Japan, whom he has formed into a sort of private club which meets with him occasionally for mutual advice and assistance. When the young Marquis went back to Japan, he founded a democratic paper called the "Tokyo Jiyu Shimbun," or Tokyo Liberty Journal. The extreme democracy of his opinions alarmed the influential conservative class, and his paper was suppressed. But the late Prince Ito, perhaps the most brilliant political leader Japan ever produced, whose mantle Saionji was destined to inherit, recognized the good qualities of Saionji and took the young man to England and America to study constitutionalism and parliamentary government. Later, after he had been successively and secured it for his friend and aide, Mr. Hara, who had become the leader of the Seiyu-kai when Saionji resigned from that position in 1915.

<sup>1</sup> In The Outlook of last week appeared an interview by Mr. Mason with Dr. C. T. Wang, China's Delegate to the Peace Conference.—THE EDITORS.

A Japanese who ought to know says: "Of all the great statesmen of Japan, Marquis Saionji best understands the stands the present world movement and is in full sympathy with it. He has been a bitter opponent of the now fast-waning spirit of chauvinism, which appeared from time to time in the past among certain of the older régime. His declared policy towards China has been consistently one of desire for friendly co-operation and increase of good understanding.

I recognized Marquis Saionji as a cosmopolitan the instant I saw him at the Headquarters of the Japanese Delegation in Paris. There is still about him something of the air which led the friends of the young nobleman on his return to Japan in 1880 to twit him as "almost more of a Frenchman than a Japanese." The first question I asked was:

"Your Excellency, are you Japanese satisfied with the outcome of the Peace Conference?" When this was interpreted by Mr. Y. Matsuoka, himself a diplomat and publicist of no slight distinction, the Marquis countered with:

"Are you satisfied with the outcome of the Peace Conference yourself?"

I parried this somehow and returned to the attack.

"Of course there is probably no nation which is entirely satisfied with the Peace," the Marquis answered, with just enough twinkle in his eye to remind me that Marquis Okuma had once called him "a cool and breezy poet." "The very essence of such an arrangement, affecting so many nations, must be give and take, a sacrifice here for a gain there. But personally I am satisfied."

"The Chinese say, your Excellency, that Japan expects to keep all the best things in the province of Shantung which have been awarded to her by the Peace Conference as a reward for wresting them from Germany. That is, they say that Japan will keep the oysters, returning to China only the shells."

"I have a great admiration for many Chinese," remarked the Marquis, "but unfortunately some of the Chinese statesmen have a way of saying things for effect which they cannot mean. Japan has solemnly promised to give back the leased territory of Kiaochau and to restore Shantung to China in full sovereignty, except a little land at Tsingtao for establishing a Japanese settlement, and Japan will keep her word. I do not need to defend that word from any innuendo. Japan has always kept her international agreements, and her honor is above reproach."

"It is not necessary for me to take up other ridiculous Chinese pretensions, such as the pretension that Japan is aiming to gain military and economic control of China and build up a gigantic power with which to try for the hegemony of the world. Any intelligent man can see that China is much more of a danger to Japan and to the world than Japan is to China. Whatever steps we have taken or may take in China are aimed merely to protect our just interests there and to preserve the peace of the Far East."

I questioned the Japanese statesman-poet about the famous Twenty-one De-

THE MARQUIS KIMMOCHI SAIONJI

This autographed portrait was presented by Marquis Saionji to Mr. Gregory Mason

Japanese Minister to Austria and to Germany, Marquis Saionji was twice given the portfolio of Minister of Education in Cabinets headed by Prince Ito. When in 1900 the great Ito organized the Seiyu-kai, or Constitutional party, Marquis Saionji became President of the Privy Council and Ito's avowed lieutenant. Three years later Saionji succeeded to the leadership of that great party. In 1905 Marquis Saionji was made Premier of Japan, which post he held until 1908. In 1910 he was again appointed Premier, resigning in 1912.

When the Cabinet of Field Marshal Count Terauchi fell last autumn, there was a widespread demand in Japan that the veteran Saionji be given a third term. In spite of this testimony of the remarkable esteem in which he is held by his countrymen, Saionji declined the honor real spirit of western Europe and the conditions existing between class and mass. . . . In the interests of Japan, and indeed of all the nations concerned in the future readjustments, Marquis Saionji is best fitted to undertake the difficult task involving so much of give and take, the surrender of so many fixed or conventional policies, and a recognition of the new conditions created by the war. His knowledge of the West was shown throughout the last four years, for he consistently declared his firm conviction that to save the world from debasement German militarism must be destroyed. Even in the darkest hours of the struggle he continued openly to declare his faith in the final victory of the Allies. A great aristocrat and a great democrat, Marquis Saionji to-day wields a vast influence in Japan; furthermore, he under-mands which Japan made on China in 1915. Dr. C. T. Wang, one of the Chinese peace delegates, had told me that China will do everything in her power to get Japan to give up these demands on the contention that they were agreed to under duress, and that the later acceptance by Japan of President Wilson's Fourteen Points abrogates and is inconsistent with such a secret treaty.

"It is childish of China," said Marquis Saionji, "to keep dragging up the Twenty-one Demands. Japan has dropped the fifth group of the demands. The rest of the demands, modified in order to meet as far as possible the views and wishes of China, are in the status of a concluded—open, not secret—agreement between Japan and China, and there is no reason why China should appeal to the foreign Powers for their support in breaking her troth with Japan."

The fifth group of the Twenty-one Demands asked, among other things, that the Chinese Government should employ influential Japanese as advisers in political, financial, and military affairs, that the police departments of important places in China should be jointly administered by Japanese and Chinese, and that China should purchase from Japan at least fifty per cent of all the munitions of war needed by her. It was this group of demands which caused the most protest among foreigners as well as among Chinese, and which even many wise citizens of the Island Empire say ought never to have been put forth by their Government.

When he was asked about China's pretension that the Allies, and particularly the Japanese, prevented China from entering the war as early as she would have liked to enter, the Japanese nobleman said:

"Any one who knows anything about China is aware that the Chinese were not particularly anxious to risk their necks in this war. It is true that there were certain elements favorable to fighting Germany as early as 1914, but to have let China into the war then would have been to enable Germany to capitalize Chinese weakness. German propaganda would have run rife; disorder and revolutions fomented by German gold would have made the country even more than ever a disordered beehive. Before the Allies could make any use of Chinese help whatsoever it was necessary that they organize China."

"What is going to be the future of China?" I asked Marquis Saionji. "Is she ever going to be capable of governing herself?"

The face of the Japanese statesman grew gravely pensive, like the face of a Buddhist priest looking into the future. The name Saionji, by the way, suggests a Buddhist temple (ji means temple in Japanese), and rumor has it that the founder of the Saionji family was a priest.

"Well, it is a very difficult question to answer," was the reply, after several seconds of reflection. "And it seems best for me to observe the golden rule of silence on this point—for the moment, at any rate. Only I would say that I persist in hopes that, with friendly assistance from outside, China will be able in time to put her house in order."

"Do you believe that the formation of the League of Nations will have a good or bad effect on Far Eastern affairs, your Excellency?"

"A very favorable effect, I believe," was the immediate response. "We Japanese believe that the League of Nations will mean a freer and more effective civilization in practice as well as in theory. At such a time and in such a world it is the duty of men of every class, creed, or color to help in perfecting an indestructible barrier against the forces which have hindered the progress of the world."

I expressed my admiration for the magnanimity of the Japanese in waiving their demand that a clause formally guaranteeing the equality of all races be included in the Covenant of the League of Nations.

"Japan decided not to press that demand now," said the distinguished Elder Statesman, "but she trusts that she will be rewarded with a formal recognition of the principle of this equality of all races in the near future."

"Knowing your reputation, Marquis Saionji," I said, "as a foremost Liberal and a leader of constitutionalism among the experienced statesmen of your country, I am anxious to have your opinion on the future social development of Japan. Do you expect this development will be in the direction of Socialism, or what will it be?"

"Now we are on a subject on which I have been doing a great deal of thinking lately," he replied, with his quiet smile. "If by Socialism you mean the sort of thing we see to-day in Russia, then I am sure that Japan will not have Socialism. Neither will she have exactly the German form of Socialism. And yet there is an unmistakable liberal, democratic, and, if you like, Socialistic, movement going on in our country. How far it will go one cannot say, but to observe it will be interesting because it is apt to be something entirely new in the social development of man. With all our apparent readiness to obliterate our individualism in the interests of the state, we Japanese are in reality zealous of preserving individuality; not even our strong sense of patriotism has prevented the assertion of this phase of our character. Therefore we can never have such docile subservience of the individual to the state as you have seen in Germany. The Japanese people can never be melted up and poured into a mold; they will never consent to put on a tight-fitting armor of military discipline such as the Germans wore. I would like to live another lifetime in order to watch how the compromise between our strong social sense and our equally strong respect for individuality will work out."

"Won't the rapid increase of your population complicate that social development, Marquis Saionji? Are you going to find a sufficient outlet for your growing population in Korea and Manchuria?"

"Certainly our increasing population intensifies the social problem with us, tending as it does to make unrest more acute. As to the second part of your question, Japan certainly cannot consent to be confined to Korea and Manchuria as outlets for her population, which is growing at the rate of six to seven hundred thousand a year."

"Would the Japanese, then, contend for emigration even to California, your Excellency?"

The Marquis smiled. "Japan has not the slightest intention of ever attempting to dictate to another country how it should regulate its internal affairs. The gentleman's agreement between our countries is a complete guarantee that you will have no more Japanese in California or in any other American State than you welcome on their own account. But our normal human pride will always be irritated by specific legal discrimination against us as Japanese. The war has brought about much more cordial and sympathetic relations between Japan and America than have ever before existed. We hope it will be possible before long to remove the last possible source of irritation between the two countries."

The Marquis paused to light an American cigarette. "There is a large field," he continued, "in which America and Japan can do a great deal of good by the right kind of co-operation. I understand you know this field yourself. I refer to Russia, or, to be more accurate, to the great task of assisting Russia to her feet. What do you think of the future of Russia?"

When I had answered him as well as I could, I told him of having just met a distinguished Russian statesman who had said that he could not remember when the Russians had had so much friendly regard for Japan as they have to-day. This new friendliness, the Russian had said, was due mainly to the restrained and considerate conduct shown toward the native population by the members of the Japanese expedition which was sent against the Bolsheviks in Siberia. This compliment for his country seemed to please Marquis Saionji very much.

"Well, I must say," he remarked, "I think our soldiers behave on the whole with admirable prudence. Russia is like a great slow-moving glacier. You can do nothing with it unless you respect its size, believe in its power, and study the causes which make it move."

In thanking the Marquis for the interview I made some pleasantry about his youthful appearance (he looks fully ten years younger than his threescore and ten).

"I appreciate your compliment about my age," he said, laughing, as we shook hands, "but I am much too young to know what ought to be done about Russia. I am only certain of one thing in regard to that country, namely, that the management of the world's relations with Russia forms the most vital political problem of the present day."

Paris, May 26.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of June 25, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Senate and the League of Nations; The Last Word at Versailles.
Reference: Pages 313; 319, 320; 322, 323.

Questions:

1. What are the main provisions of the Knox Resolution? Tell why some in Congress are for this Resolution and others are against it. 2. Discuss whether the Senate should vote on this Resolution before President Wilson returns. 3. Explain how the country could "rally to the support of the President and force a ratification." 4. The Republican party is in control in Congress, and that party seems to be in the control of such men as Lodge, Knox, Penrose, Warren, Mann, and Cannon. In such hands, do you think the Republican party will be an instrument of genuine social and international progress? Discuss. 5. What reasons does The Outlook give for hoping that the League of Nations will be adopted by the Senate? Tell why you do or do not consider these good reasons. 6. The Outlook mentions (page 319) several facts in support of its statement that "the Americans are an adventurous people." Using these particular facts, show more in detail than does The Outlook that each one of these steps in American history was an adventure. 7. "These perils were never so imminent as they are to-day," says The Outlook. What perils? Why "never so imminent"? 8. Discuss The Outlook's definition and interpretation of democracy as found in this editorial on the League in the Senate. 9. Give reasons why you like or dislike what is said under the caption "The Last Word at Versailles." 10. Discuss whether the Congress or the American people should accept whatever the Executive proposes, no matter who he is, Republican or Democrat. 11. One writer speaks of peace with Germany and the League of Nations as "two logically separable matters." Criticise this idea. 12. Buy David Jayne Hill's new book, "Present Problems in Foreign Policy" (Appleton).

B. Topic: The Case of China.

Reference: Pages 324–326.

Questions:

1. What reasons does Dr. Wang advance in believing that "the peace of the whole world is endangered by the decision of the Peace Conference to give Japan the special rights and privileges in Shantung formerly held by Germany"? 2. Discuss whether, in your opinion, the Conference should have made this decision. 3. From reading this interview, what can you say about Chinese characteristics and the national temperament of China? 4. What opinion does this article show that the Chinese have of Japan and the Japanese? 5. Study a modern map of China. Report as many significant observations as you can. 6. Dr. Wang says that America has always been a sympathetic friend of China. Give a summary of Chino-American relations justifying Dr. Wang's opinion on this matter. 7. "China wants to get out of the stage of semi-dependence on foreign Powers," and "we desire on our part to bring about reforms," says Dr. Wang. Point out how these desirable ends can best be effected. 8. What is a civilized nation? Give your opinion, with reasons, as to whether civilized peoples will find a permanent way, other than war, of settling such disputes as are always apt to arise between them. 9. Discuss whether Japan should be made to get entirely out of China. 10. Read an important contribution to world politics—"Japan and World Peace," by K. K. Kawakami (Macmillan).

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: Popular Fallacies.

Reference: Page 321.

Questions:

1. What is a fallacy? A popular fallacy? Give several reasons why we have the latter. 2. Most Americans without doubt believe that government by consent of the governed is just government. Has Dr. Abbott proved this popular belief not well founded? Reasons. 3. Restate Dr. Abbott's argument that "government is just only when its laws conform to the eternal laws of the moral world." Is he right? 4. Repeat Dr. Abbott's definitions of justice, liberty, peace, and democracy. Discuss each one of his definitions. 5. Some problems of popular government are suggestively discussed in Laughlin's "Latter-Day Problems" (Scribners).

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. A treaty is more than a law. 2. The masses know better than the classes what is best for a nation.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for June 25, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Covenant, inimical (313); barbarism, statesmen, inalienable rights (320); arbitrary, plebiscite (322); reaction (324); derogate (325); anomalous (326); epitomize (321).

BY THE WAY

The street gamin of Paris is—or was—famous for his ready wit; but in this respect he perhaps never excelled his more cosmopolitan congener of New York City. A recent example of the latter's quickness in rising to an opportunity may be quoted: A house-mover was laboriously climbing up a high stoop with a huge "grandfather's clock" on his back, while the neighborhood boys were looking on. One of them thus hit off the situation: "Say, mister, why don't ya git a wrist-watch—it 'ud be a lot easier to carry!"

In an article about personal recollections of Walt Whitman in "Scribner's Magazine," Mr. W. R. Thayer says that he once asked Whitman how he explained the terrible reality of evil. The poet replied almost testily: "Oh, you can't tackle it that way! This ain't a matter to be settled by yes or no. What you call evil is all a part of it. If you have a hill, you've got to have a hollow. I wish some one—I've often thought of doing it myself—would crack up the good of evil—how it helps us along—how it all fits in." Mr. Thayer concludes: "I doubt whether he had ever felt the problem poignantly."

The "silly season," when copy is short in the daily papers, produces this story, credited to the Mason City (Iowa) "Globe Gazette":

Seven years ago a farmer living west of this city hung his vest on a fence in the barnyard. A calf chewed up a pocket of the garment in which was a standard gold watch. Last week the animal, a staid old milch cow, was butchered for beef, and the timepiece was found in such a position between the lungs of the cow that the respiration—the closing in and the filling of the lungs—kept the stem-winder wound up, and the watch had lost but four minutes in the seven years!

Château Thierry is expected to become a mecca for American tourists when touring is re-established as an international pastime, and it is announced that to meet the demand for accommodations in this "Gettysburg of France" a new hotel, one of the largest in the country, will soon be built. It will be under the management of an American hotel man.

The sign "Fresh Paint" is sometimes seen too late, and then comes the question, "What will take it out?" An engineering magazine gives this answer:

To remove paint from cloth, lay a pad of blotting paper on the side of the material on which the paint fell, and rub the other side gently with a soft piece of flannel dipped in chloroform or benzol, both of which are paint solvents. As the paint dissolves it naturally passes into the most absorbent material in contact with it—which is the blotting paper—not into the adjacent cloth. Deep stains can be completely removed by this method.

War bets are now being paid by the people who were wont to say, "You can't beat Germany." Morgan J. O'Brien, former Judge of the Supreme Court of New York, recently gave "the best dinner that money could buy" to General Coleman Dupont and twenty-five of the latter's friends, because of a difference of opinion as to German prowess. The Justice thought the Allies could not get into Soissons last year by a certain date; the General was sure they could. They did; and the outcome, for which Judge O'Brien paid a heavy bill, was called the "Soissons Dinner."

The celebrated saltcellar made by Benvenuto Cellini for Francis the First while the artist was in the service of that royal patron of art is to be given up to France by Austria, so a New York "Tribune" correspondent states. Italy is to get from Austria, it is said, Titian's "Ecce Homo," "Entombment," and "Diana," Correggio's "Christ and the Samaritan Woman," etc. Thus ancient wrongs by old-time looters are to be undone. The same correspondent, however, says that it seems as if some modern looters were to keep their plunder: "Most of the loot carried off by Germany has been placed for safe-keeping in neutral countries such as Switzerland, and it will be difficult to recover these art treasures."

By the Way (Continued)

What is the oldest restaurant in the world now open for business? Paris has at least one restaurant—the Café de la Régence—that is more than two hundred years old; the Mitre Hotel at Oxford, England, is said to be five hundred years old; the Rathskeller at Bremen, which holds what is regarded as the finest stock of Rhine and Moselle wine in the world, was built in 1405; the curious little restaurant known as the Bratwurstglocklein, in Nuremberg, which is part of a church, has, it is believed, been serving roast sausages since the year 1400; and the Capello Nero restaurant in Venice traces its beginnings back to the year 1376.

Apocryphal of restaurants, a pleasant story is told in that entertaining book, "The Gourmet's Guide to Europe," which illustrates the aphorism that you generally get what you pay for. At Monte Carlo, says the author, most of the restaurants adapt their prices nicely to the purses of the winners at the Casino, who want the best and don't care what it costs. Before one of the smartest of these restaurants an economical stranger paused and asked the liveried porter who stood at the door whether it was a cheap restaurant. "'Not exactly cheap,' replied the Machiavellian servitor, 'but really very cheap for what you get here.'"

The "Journal of the American Medical Association" quotes, under the head of "Poor Charlie," this paragraph as appearing in the Palmyra (Missouri) "Spectator": "Mrs. K— came to see her son Charlie, who had been ill for eleven weeks and has had several attacks of appendicitis. . . . His relatives have very little hopes of his recovery, and if it is necessary to operate on him, none whatever."

John McAllister was an artist. Falling from grace, he became a convict in Sing Sing. When he tired of captivity, his art training enabled him to construct the most lifelike "dummy" in the history of prison escapes. He made a head, resembling his own, from soap, dough, putty, and odds and ends of hair, and a body from a pillow, straw, and waste. Each time the guard looked into McAllister's cell he saw this lifelike figure on the bed, and said "All's well." Meanwhile the prisoner was making good his escape. This ruse has been tried many times in prison history—the most famous occasion, probably, being when Napoleon III left a dummy in his prison cell at the Castle of Ham and went off to become Emperor of the French.

"A man with a weak wing should never try to cover one of the garden positions." This advice is not given to aviators or farmers, as the phraseology might indicate, but to baseball players, with special regard to the outfielders. Interpreted, it means that good arms are necessary for the long throws from the outfield to the home plate.

Visit
Your National Playgrounds
Out West This Summer

The National Parks suggest a vast region of peaks and canyons, of glaciers and geysers, of big trees and volcanoes, and other natural wonders.

You can fish, climb mountains, ride horseback and camp out, You can motor and golf. You can "rest up" in resort hotels.

Complete information, including illustrated booklets, describing the National Parks and the West, will be furnished free. Ask your local ticket agent to help you plan your trip—or apply to the nearest Consolidated Ticket Office—or write to the nearest Travel Bureau.

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION

Travel Bureau 143 Liberty St. New York City	Travel Bureau 646 Transportation Bldg. Chicago
Travel Bureau 602 Healey Building Atlanta

Twenty-five Cents

Nobody ever changes from
RAMESES
CIGARETTES
Nobody!

RAMESES

STEFANO BROS
RAMESES CIGARETTES
EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES
TURKISH TOBACCO

THE NATION'S INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS

Believing that the advance of business is a subject of vital interest and importance, The Outlook will present under the above heading frequent discussions of subjects of industrial and commercial interest. The department will include paragraphs of timely interest and articles of educational value dealing with the industrial upbuilding of the Nation. Comment and suggestions are invited.

TRUCKS MOVE FOOD CROPS QUICKLY AND ECONOMICALLY

FROM AN ARTICLE BY ROBERT E. JONES
IN THE "COMMERCIAL VEHICLE"

WE sat on the broad veranda of a pioneer home in the Sacramento Valley, California, watching a string of motor trucks, pyramided with bags of rice, pass by bound for the river docks at Colusa. It was last fall. Overhead a squadron of airplanes from Mather Field, at Sacramento, had just flown, headed for the old Glenn homestead, domicile of a bonanza wheat farmer of the early days, where a Red Cross fête was to be held in the evening.

"It seems almost unreal—a weird dream," said my companion, the daughter of one of the first settlers. "I can remember when there were no roads and no rail-ways here, not to mention motor trucks, concrete boulevards, and airplanes. During the wheat harvest father used to set off for the river in a buckboard dragging a chain to mark a trail in the grass for the teamsters, with their loads of wheat, to follow. Those wagon trains crept along through that clump of oaks yonder—there were no fences—going to the river in one day and returning the next."

"And now it's motor trucks, almost an army train of them, carrying from five to nine tons of rice at a load, moving swiftly over hard-surfaced roads," I put in.

"We are living in a wonderful generation," she mused.

Of course it was a trite remark—so because many people have realized the truth of it and voiced it.

Motor-truck transportation in California has grown as the State's system of hard-surfaced highways has been extended, and this has been rapidly. Trunk-line roads, connecting the county seats—more than fifty of them—are being built under a $33,000,000 bond issue, and the work is more than fifty per cent completed. Counties have followed the example and are building similar concrete roads to tie up with the State system. The shortest routes between shipping points were selected when the State system was laid out for the sake of through tourist travel and freighting.

ONE OF THE EXCELLENT CALIFORNIA STATE HIGHWAYS IN THE FERTILE SACRAMENTO RIVER VALLEY. IT IS ROADS SUCH AS THIS WHICH MAKE MOTOR TRUCKING ON A LARGE SCALE BOTH POSSIBLE AND PRACTICABLE

A form of rural motor express has existed in California almost since the beginning of motor trucks. It followed closely upon their appearance in cities. But the most recent development has been in crop-handling on a large scale. In this service the motor truck has played a tremendous part in getting food under cover before stormy periods of the year, for even California has some wet weather.

Rapid transit from field to warehouse is vital to such crops as rice, beans, and hops, and growers of these goods never realized before how much they were losing to the weather. Of course there has been a saving, too, in cost of moving, but that is a second consideration with them.

Trucks for crop moving were first tried by a community of hop-growers in the Sacramento Valley, where the fields are twenty miles from the railway and the river. A progressive truckman offered to carry their hops to the steamer landing at thirty-five cents a bale and got the business. Eight-mule teams with three wagons had been carrying these hops, making a trip from the country in eight to ten hours, three round trips a week. The trucks made three trips daily, carrying fifty bales each.

Most of the trucking on a large scale is by individual truck-owners or companies in the cities who go into the country after the harvest and contract to move the crops. While the summer and fall are busy periods in California, it is almost a year-around business.

Hardy vegetables, such as lettuce, celery, and spinach, begin to move in the early winter to railway stations for shipment East or to canneries and dehydrating plants. Thousands of truck-loads of spinach grown in fields that produce tomatoes in summer are hauled to canneries and drying plants at Sacramento through the winter. A truck with a large flat bed has almost the capacity of a box car, for spinach is light in proportion to its bulk. The plant is stuffed into crates, which are piled high on the truck.

A LINE OF MOTOR TRUCKS WAITING TO MOVE UP TO THE DOORS OF THE SACRAMENTO RIVER WAREHOUSES AT PRINCETON, CALIFORNIA

Trucks Move Food Crops Quickly and Economically (Continued)

With asparagus and artichokes in the early spring, the vegetable season keeps many trucks busy until the first deciduous fruit is ripe. Fruit-growers usually are established farmers operating on their own land, and many of them own trucks. But the canneries, obtaining fruit from a distance even up to fifty miles, contract with truck-owners for hauling fruit to their plants, for it not only saves in the actual cost of moving, but the boxes are handled only twice. If shipped by rail, boxes would have to be handled four times.

The fruit season lasts through summer and winds up about November 15, so that a large extra force of trucks is necessary when grain ripens. While wheat and barley farmers have not taken to trucks as readily as the rice and bean growers, still the truck is handling a great deal of these cereals, particularly for large operators.

Rice is a comparatively new crop in California, and, with beans, ripens late in the fall. The quantity of both has increased so greatly in a few years that the transportation problem has been multiplied.

The main problem of both rice and bean men is to avoid the early fall rains. They may grow a wonderful crop, but if the rain comes while sacks are piled in the field, losses may amount to thousands of dollars in a single night.

In Colusa, the center of the rice district, fifty trucks were operating last fall through the town, from the rice-fields beyond to warehouses on the river levee. While the trucks on the land and big barges in the river form an admirable combination for moving the quantity of rice, the total yield has become so large that all rail lines get their share of the through business. Trucks do not venture onto the wet and boggy rice-fields, but pick up their loads along the concrete roads where the bags have been piled from wagons.

Beans are handled in similar fashion, though most of the bean-fields are nearer the river and the haul is shorter. Trucks can go directly into the bean-fields, where the soil is on a more solid foundation.

Manager George Maddock, of the great Armour project involving 70,000 acres of rich river-bottom land in the Sutter basin, is planning a gridiron of concrete roads for motor trucks to carry vegetables to canneries and dehydrating plants.

All railway expansion in California now takes the motor truck as a crop mover into consideration. One electric line in the Sacramento Valley is in the curious position of fostering the building of a hard-surface road, for it would make a certain large producing district tributary to its line by motor truck.

Tours and Travel

Hudson River by Daylight

In planning your summer vacation be sure to include the delightful daylight sail between New York and Albany.

Direct rail connections to the Catskills, Berkshires, Adirondacks, Saratoga, Lake George, Lake Champlain, Niagara Falls and all points North, East and West

All through rail tickets between New York and Albany accepted
FOUR FAMOUS STEAMERS
Service Daily, including Sunday

Hudson River
Day Line
Desbrosses Street Pier, N. Y.

Tours and Travel

Summer in the National Parks, California, Canadian Rockies

Motoring, camping, tramping, horseback riding, fishing. Booklet, THE TEMPLE TOURS, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

Hotels and Resorts

MAINE

THE HOMESTEAD

Barley Island, Maine
Open June 15 to Sept. 15. Air, scene and table all of the best. Illustrated booklet on application. Thomas E. Hasell, Summit, N. J.

DEVEREUX COTTAGES, CASTINE, ME.

open July 1 to September 15. For further particulars write to FERDINAND DEVEREUX.

"THE FIRS" (Sunset P. O.), Me.
Penobscot Bay Resort Region. Inn, cottages, tents. A summer home of comfort and beautiful outdoors. Rates moderate.
B. B. KNOWLTON, Haverford, Pa.

THE OCEAN HOUSE, YORK BEACH, ME. Leading hotel. Fine location. All conveniences. Excellent cuisine. Comfortable and homelike. Golf, tennis, beautiful drives, bathing and fishing. Ideal spot for children. Booklet. W. J. SIMPSON.

The Grindstone Inn

BRISTOW TYLER, Manager

Winter Harbor MAINE

Cooldest Summer Resort in the United States.

Average Maximum Temperature During Summer 72°.

Contains 125 Rooms En suite and Singly with Baths

A NINE-HOLE GOLF COURSE.
FIVE TENNIS COURTS.

MOTOR BOATS, SAILBOATS, CANOES.

BOWLING ALLEYS, BILLIARDS, SHUFFLEBOARD.

LARGE SWIMMING POOL OF SALT WATER.

AMERICAN PLAN—$40 per week up
For reservations or information wire or write.

Send for booklet.

A few desirable cottages for rent
Cottage residents may get their meals at the Inn.

Permanent Address,
601 Morris Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

Hotels and Resorts

MAINE

YORK CAMPS LOON LAKE, MAINE

In famous Rangeley region in heart of mountains facing lake. Private log cabins with open fires and baths. Central dining-room. Golf within easy reach; garage. Boat-riding, bathing, fishing, mountain climbing. Farm one mile from camp furnishes fresh vegetables, eggs, poultry, certified milk. Booklet. J. LEWIS YORK, Prop.

MASSACHUSETTS

THE CHARLES GATE HOTEL

BOSTON, MASS.
Just outside the limits of the hot city and yet only a few minutes to the shopping district, theaters, etc., by the subway train. Located in the residential section of the beautiful Back Bay, overlooking the Park and Charles River. Cool and comfortable accommodations by day or week at attractive rates.

HERBERT G. SUMMERS, Mgr.

Also operating the

Cliff Hotel and Cottages

North Scituate Beach, Mass.

25 Miles from Boston. "On the Ocean Front."

HOTEL PURITAN
Commonwealth Ave. Boston
THE DISTINCTIVE BOSTON HOUSE
Globe Trotters call the Puritan one of the great homelike hotels in the world. Your inquiries gladly answered. 67-Corridor and our booklet mailed.

CAPE COD | THE PINES Cotuit, Mass.

Boating, bathing. Booklets. N. C. MORSE.

If You Are Tired or Not Feeling Well
you cannot find a more comfortable place in New England than

THE WELDON HOTEL GREENFIELD, MASS.

It affords all the comforts of home without extravagance.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little house by the sea
PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Dexter Richards Hall

A comfortable Inn on a hilltop. 1,000 feet elevation. July and August. Weekly rates $14 to $21. Booklet.

MERIDEN, N. H.

"The Bird Village"

PENNSYLVANIA

Glen Garriff, Mt. Pocono, Pa.
Special rates for June and September.
SUSAN T. CARSWELL

Hotels and Resorts

NEW YORK CITY

The Clendening

200 W. 103d St., New York

Short Block from Broadway Subway Station. A Hotel of Quality and Refinement.

Single room, use of bath.....$2 Day
Parlor, Bedroom, Bath, for two.....$3-$4
Parlor, two Bedrooms and Bath.....$5-$6
These rooms at attractive summer rates, with Breakfast included.

Phone Academy 3510.

Write for Booklet C and Map of N. Y. City.

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square
adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

Hotel Le Marquis

31st Street & Fifth Avenue
New York

Combines every convenience and home comfort, and commands itself to people of refinement wishing to live on American Plan and be within easy reach of social and dramatic centers.
Room and bath $4.50 per day with meals, or $2.50 per day without meals.
Illustrated Booklet gladly sent upon request.
JOHN F. TOLSON.

NEW YORK

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of wild-Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, saddle horses. Tramps to surrounding mountain peaks, Lake George and Lake Champlain. Dancing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $18 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

RHODE ISLAND

Vaill Cottages, Block Island, R. I.
"A Summer at Sea." Surf bathing, golf and tennis on the premises. Dancing. Salt and fresh water fishing. Tuna, swordfish, bluefish, bass, etc. Delightful sea air. Never hot. Boats daily. Children benefited. Hay fever relieved. Refreshed patrons. Booklet. Vaill Cottage Community, Inc., Block Island, R. I.

VERMONT

Heights House Lunenburg, Vt.

High altitude, no hay fever. In vicinity of the White Mountains. Modern conveniences. Farm products. Reasonable rates. Booklet.
A. J. NEWMAN, Prop.

Country Board

COUNTRY BOARD

Colonial home on hilltop. Delightful view of country and Lake Ontario. Electric lights, bathroom, excellent table. On State road, three miles from Oswego. Miss ALICE E. PERRY, Fruit Valley, R. F. D., Oswego, N. Y.

"Travel Without Trouble"

PACIFIC NORTHWEST NATIONAL PARKS ALASKA

Tours de Luxe leave during July and August, visiting all the attractions of the Pacific Coast, the National Parks, Land of the Midnight Sun, California, Canadian and Colorado Rockies, etc.

Booklet on Request.

STEAMSHIP PASSAGES EVERYWHERE

Official Agents for All Lines
Tours arranged for Independent Travel Everywhere. Pullman and Hotel accommodation reserved in advance.

THOS. COOK & SON

245 Broadway, New York
Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Montreal, Toronto

Health Resorts

Sanford Hall, est. 1841

Private Hospital

For Mental and Nervous Diseases
Comfortable, homelike surroundings; modern methods of treatment; competent nurses. 15 acres of lawn, park, flower and vegetable gardens. Food the best. Write for booklet.
Sanford Hall Flushing New York

"INTERPINES"

Beautiful, quiet, restful and homelike. Over 25 years of successful work. Thorough, reliable, dependable and ethical. Every comfort and convenience. Accommodations of superior quality. Disorder of the nervous system a specialty. Fred. W. Seward, Sr., M.D., Fred. W. Seward, Jr., M.D., Goshen, N. Y.

Crest View Sanatorium
Greenwich, Ct. First-class in all respects, home comfort. H. M. Hitchcock, M.D.

ALDERBROOK A Summer Camp for Adults—Physical culture. Physician's care. Leaflet on request. Alderbrook, Norwalk, Ct.

LINDEN The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Doylstown, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LEFFINGWORTH WALTER, M.D. (late of The Walter Sanatorium)

Dr. Reeves' Sanitarium
A Private Home for chronic, nervous, and mental patients. Also elderly people requiring care. Harriet E. Reeves, M.D., Melrose, Mass.

Real Estate

MAINE

FOR SALE ON UNION RIVER BAY, MAINE
Attractive six-room cottage, completely furnished. Porches, fireplace, telephone, boat, water, and mountain views. One-half acre of land. Near Ellsworth and Bar Harbor. Delightful summer colony. Price twelve hundred dollars. 733, Outlook.

NEW JERSEY

SUMMIT, N. J. 87 New England Ave.
$50,000 Suburban Residence FOR SALE. Lot 150 x 400 ft. 12 rooms, 3 baths, basement and attic. For circular apply W. H. GRANT, 156 Fifth Avenue, N. Y.

Real Estate

LOUISIANA

School for Sale A flourishing, long-established girls' college in the South. Personal reasons for owner's retirement. Address the Interstate Teachers' Agency, Machine Building, New Orleans, La.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

FOR RENT Cottage near Bethlehem, N. H.
Six rooms and bath. All modern improvements. Pure artesian water. For particulars address E. E. BISHOP, Littleton, N. H.

Chesham, N. H. Desirable COTTAGE TO RENT for Summer.
1/2 mile from R.R. station; 9 rooms, 2 bathrooms, fireplace, garage. Rent reasonable. Apply Miss M. S. Bush, 233 Beacon St., Boston.

WHITE MOUNTAIN FARM HOUSE, for rent $100, or sale $1,000. 7 rooms, 10 acres; vis-a-vis Presidential Range. Address Rev. J. K. Johnson, Littleton, N. H.

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential section, suburbs of New York City. Half hour Grand Central; also near subway. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 50 x 100. Garages. Price $9,500. Full particulars from owner, 2,513, Outlook.

NEW YORK

FOR RENT, Catskill Mountains, Furnished COTTAGE. 5 rooms, bath, fireplace, tennis. $300 for season. Mrs. Wakeham, 315 Whalley Ave., New Haven, Conn.

Near Goshen FOR SALE
Owner leaving for California.
Country Summer or All Year Residence and four acres garden, woodland, and stream. One and one-half hours from New York. Eight-room house and garage, modern in every respect. On trolley line. Very attractive. Address A. B. WOOD, owner, Middletown, New York.

Shelter Island Heights, L. I. FOR SALE—10-Room House
Two bathrooms. All modern improvements. Well furnished throughout. In perfect order. Large porches. R. FECHTETER.

Money-making farms. 17 States. $10 to $100 acre. Stock, tools, crops often included to settle quickly. Write for big illustrated catalogue. E. A. Strout Farm Agency, 225 B. M., Sun Bldg., New York.

VERMONT

Here's Your Country Home 100-ACRE VERMONT FARM

Located on Main Street of Westfield, a most picturesque and delightful region of the State. Scotch town. Two houses. One 2 1/2 stories of 11 rooms finished in early brick, cherry, bird's-eye maple and ash, contains bath, toilet, set tubs, fireplace, etc.; other house 1 1/2 stories of 5 rooms. Two barns—one has 8 stalls and 15 stanchions, other has 15 stanchions, bams, etc.; poultry house for 200; building contains milk room, coal storage, electric light plant, etc. All buildings in excellent condition. Fifteen head fine Jersey cows, pair horses, swine. Small wood lot with some soft timber about 1 1/2 miles from farm. Fruit orchard, flowers and shrubbery. Fine shade trees, concrete walks and good driveways. Ample farm machinery. Price $10,000. Write at once, Batchelder & Brown, Burlington, Vt.

Woodstock, Vt. "Appleboughs"
for rent, furnished. Modern conveniences, cool, quiet, sleeping porch. Charming. Inquire of Harold Dams, Woodstock, Vt.

Apartments

WANTED—THREE APARTMENTS

unfurnished, in same building in New York City. No. 1. Containing living-room or studio, dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms, bathroom and maid's room. No. 2. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. No. 3. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. Location preferably out of the usual beaten paths, something not usually rented if possible, and preferably in a private house altered for such purpose. Nothing south of Greenwich Village nor north of 72d Street will be considered. Occupancy October 1, 1922. Address CHARLES H. DAVIS, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

BOOKS, MAGAZINES

THE Mecca of Negro history and literature. Distributors Scott's official history of the Negro in the World War. Send us your order. Young's Book Exchange, 135 W. 133th St. Price $2.50 and $3.50, post paid on all orders. Mention The Outlook.

FOR THE HOME

WILD strawberry jam, delicate, delicious. Supply limited. Alma Hubbard, Gansvoort, New York.

REMNANTS—Chambrays and percales. Samples submitted. Universal Co., Woonsocket, R. I.

HELP WANTED

Professional Situations
FOR WOMAN PHYSICIAN: OPPORTUNITY AS RESIDENT IN PRIVATE FAMILY OF MEANS—preference: younger graduate with several years' hospital training; research type of mind; not without nursing experience. Case problem touching respiratory diseases—not T. B. Applicant should state qualifications and desires in her own hand. Address CARTESIAN SOCIETY, Ardmore, Pa.

Business Situations

WANTED—Office assistant in military academy. College graduate preferred. Box A, Woodstock, Va.

WANTED—Competent woman as stenographer and private secretary to manager of large hotel. Year round position with good pay to competent person. Address, with references and experience, 7,112, Outlook.

EMBROIDERERS on infants' garments: work sent out of town. Barringer, 29 East 31st St., New York.

RAILWAY traffic inspector. $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CMT Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

WANTED. In Worcester, Mass., experienced social worker to carry through summer an experienced Americanization in a community work. Apply Robert Shaw, 35 Monachnock Rd., Worcester.

Companions and Domestic Helpers
WANTED—Matron and nurse in boys' military academy—100 cadets; also two instructors, one qualified to coach athletics. Box A, Woodstock, Va.

WIDOWER with three boys, ages ten, six, four, wishes well educated young woman or widow (Protestant) to assume the duties of housekeeper and care of the children. State qualifications and salary expected. References exchanged. 7,079, Outlook.

WANTED—Woman of refinement as nursery governess. H. R. C. House, 103 W. Moreland Ave., Chestnut Hill, Pa.

Teachers and Governesses
GOVERNESSES, dictators, managers, dietitians, matrons, housekeepers, Miss Richards, Box 5, East Side Station, Providence, R. I.

INQUIRIES already coming in for teachers in all subjects for D.B. International Musical and Educational Agency, Carnegie Hall, N. Y.

WANTED—Young woman of refinement as governess. W. O. Budget, 180 William St., N. Y. City. Phone 945 John.

RESIDENT teacher for backward little girl of five. Summer in Virginia. Good salary. Special training required. 7,009, Outlook.

HELP WANTED

Teachers and Governesses
TEACHERS wanted. All subjects, all over the country. National Teachers Agency, 310 Museum Building, Washington. General offices, Evanston, Ill.

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

HOPKINS' Educational Agency, 601 Fifth Ave. Governesses, nurses, housekeepers, matrons, dietitians, companions, secretaries; teachers $1,000 year.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Business Situations

CATALOGING private libraries, College, library, medical, business experience. Indexing. 7,119, Outlook.

SECRETARYSHIP in boys' school wanted by widow with boy of seven where child will have privilege of education as part of compensation. Ten years' secretarial experience and highest references. 7,100, Outlook.

MAN, thoroughly experienced in business management and office work, desires position as secretary of private estate or as private secretary. References. 7,113, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

COMPANION. Gentlewoman, middle-aged, desires quiet country home, light duties. Small compensation. 7,117, Outlook.

WOMAN, capable of managing gentleman's home where servants are kept or as matron of institution, seeks either of these positions. References both as to character and ability furnished. 7,088, Outlook.

COLLEGE girl, kindergarten, desires summer position as companion or governess. 7,101, Outlook.

WANTED—Supervising home elderly gentleman. South winters. References. 7,101, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

THIS advertisement is published in the interest of a Russian lady, the story of whose escape from Russia was told anonymously in The Outlook of April 23. She is a widow with a little girl eleven years of age. She is of aristocratic parentage and as a girl attended a fashionable school in America when her father was for some years in this country on a diplomatic mission. Her property, which was considerable, has been practically confiscated by the Bolsheviks and she must now support herself. She speaks four languages fluently, namely: English, Russian, French, and German. She is also an accomplished pianist. Because I believe that she will be a valuable addition to the faculty of some American school as a teacher of French and music, I take this method of bringing her case to the attention of the many educators who read The Outlook in the hope that some of them may be able to offer her a position that will enable her to support herself and day help her and daughter. While she has had no experience as a teacher, she is a woman of alert intelligence, great adaptability, and attractive personality, and I feel that she would be a valuable addition to the faculty of almost any girls' school or college. I am publishing this advertisement over my own name because I am anxious to help her and because she is reluctant to attempt any self-exploitation. I shall be pleased to receive and answer any inquiries that it may elicit. Theodore H. Price, 65 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

HARVARD student desires summer position as camp counselor (2 seasons) Canadian work, companion, or tutor. Musical. References. 7,120, Outlook.

YOUNG woman of experience, character, and refinement desires position as governess to one or two children under 8 at seashore or country for July and August. 7,115, Outlook.

YALE graduate, experienced tutor and athletic coach, also understands automobile, desires summer position. 7,116, Outlook.

MISCELLANEOUS

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Frances Parker Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

MISS GUTHMAN, New York shopper, will send anything on approval; returns free. References. 209 W. 99th Street.

M. W. Wrightman & Co. Shopping Agency, established 1835. No charge; prompt delivery. 44 West 23d St., New York.

IF YOU WANT EXTRA MONEY

you can earn $1.00 an hour and more in your spare time taking subscriptions for The Outlook. Write for details of The Outlook's Co-operative Profit Plan, addressing Representatives' Division, Desk C, The Outlook, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Say it with flowers

IN joy or sorrow they express your thought. Life will be sweeter for you and your friends if you show your thoughtfulness in messages of flowers. Your local florist within a few hours can deliver fresh flowers in any city or town in the United States or Canada through the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Service. They will serve you.

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequalled for War Camp Community Work
Send 35c today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"
THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

Don't Wear a Truss

Brooks' Appliance, the modern scientific invention, the wonderful new discovery that relieves rupture, will be sent on trial. No obnoxious springs or pads.

Brooks' Rupture Appliance

Has automatic Air Cushions. Binds and draws the broken parts together as you would a broken limb. No salves. No lies. Durable, cheap. Sent on trial to prove it. Protected by U. S. patents. Catalog and measure blanks mailed free. Send name and address today. Brooks Appliance Co., 471D, State St., Marshall, Mich.

[Advertisement]

Worn-Out Stomachs Renewed in 48 Hours

POOR RICHARD said: "Many dishes, many diseases."

And in these four short words he summed up the reason for almost every human ailment. It is a well-known fact, recognized by scientists and physicians, that 90% of our every-day complaints can be traced directly to some disorder of the stomach, and that our stomach trouble is caused by what we eat.

Your body can be compared to an immense apartment building; your stomach to the boiler which is providing steam to keep all the tenants warm and alive. The steam it supplies, of course, is blood; the tenants, your various organs of life and intelligence. You are the fireman.

Now then, if you were firing such a boiler you would put into it only the best coal available—the coal best suited to burn correctly and evenly and to supply the most steam. And as a result you would have plenty of steam, your tenants would be warm and happy, and there would be no complaints from any one.

But, suppose a bag of powder, such as is used to fire our big guns, got mixed up in the coal. Suppose there were several sticks of dynamite and three or four cans of gasoline in the coal. What would be the result? Shoveled into the boiler, they would sputter for a second, and then—BANG!—your boiler would go flying, your flues would be ripped and twisted, your steam would escape, and your tenants, being without steam, would start a clamor that would shake your apartment building from basement to roof. Yet dynamite, powder and gasoline are all good fuels when properly used.

EUGENE CHRISTIAN

Twenty years ago Eugene Christian was at death's door; for several years previous he had suffered all the agonies of acute stomach and intestinal troubles, until his doctors—among them some of the most noted specialists in the country—gave him up to die. As a last resort, he commenced to study the food question himself. As a result of what he learned, he succeeded in literally eating his way back to health without drugs or medicines of any kind, and in a remarkably short space of time.

Eugene Christian is today nearly sixty years old—or shall I say young? For he has more vitality, more ginger, more physical endurance than most youngsters in his teens. For almost fifteen years he has not even had so much as a cold.

What Eugene Christian has done for himself he has also done for thousands of others. Is it any wonder that some of his rich pupils have sent him checks for $500 to $1,000 in addition to the amount of his bill in token of the wonderful results he has secured for them?

THAT'S a direct parallel to what happens in your stomach when the wrong food combinations creep in. It is a well-known fact that some chemical properties found in our every-day foods, if mixed in a chemist's retort, will explode. The same action takes place in the stomach. Very often, two perfectly good foods, when eaten at the same meal, form a chemical reaction in the stomach, and, figuratively, explode, liberating dangerous toxic poisons which are absorbed by the blood and circulate throughout the system, forming the root of all or nearly all sickness.

The natural condition of the stomach is good. As long as it is not interfered with it will function efficiently and well—supplying the body and brain with vigor and energy. But when foods which do not properly combine are put into it, its ability to convert them into blood is destroyed. The first indications of this condition are acidity, fermentation, gas, constipation, and many other sympathetic ills leading to most serious consequences.

If these wrong food combinations are used over and over again, the stomach will very soon become chronically bad—will refuse to properly digest the food given it, and become the base for any number of complaints. When the stomach is not functioning properly, every organ, heart, liver, lungs, brain, kidneys, nerves, muscles, will become sluggish and weak, and the entire system will become susceptible to any kind of infection that may happen along.

The Proof is Free

If you have stomach trouble you don't have to be told the symptoms. You know you have it. But do you know how to get rid of it? Here is the way by which thousands of worn out stomachs are being renewed in 48 hours. And it won't cost you a penny to prove that it will do the same for you.

As startling as this statement may sound we will prove it to you, entirely without cost or obligation. Read about this wonder-working method and take advantage of this Free Proof.

Now as I have said, if it is not interfered with the body will keep itself healthy and will maintain an energetic, vigorous condition at all times. Therefore, it is only logical to believe that if the stomach is again given the proper food to digest, it will quickly become strong. With the fluids which are automatically secreted in the stomach for digestive purposes nature will quickly bring the system back to normal. Therefore, if you give your body the proper food—give nature half a chance—your stomach trouble and all the associated ills will soon disappear.

THAT is the simple secret of the whole thing. Eugene Christian, the eminent food specialist, has treated over 23,000 cases with this method. In some cases where constipation and indigestion have been chronic for five years, he has induced a natural passage in 48 hours. His methods make gas, acidity, fermentation, and indigestion disappear. And it is all done without medicines, exercise, or instruments of any kind.

With Eugene Christian's method of treatment you eat the things you like. You are not told that you must not eat the good nourishing foods to which you are accustomed. You are not bound up with a lot of ridiculous rules for expensive diets. You can go right on eating the foods you like—so long as they are properly combined with other foods.

This sounds so simple that many people will be incredulous. Many will think that a thing so obvious and so easy could not possibly cure so terrible an affliction as a bad stomach. And the idea that you can positively start yourself on the road to a new stomach, good health, and strength in 48 hours may seem far-fetched.

Therefore, it will take unusual methods to back it up. Here's our offer. Here's the way we propose convincing you that you can give yourself relief from any kind of stomach trouble—chronic or acute—in 48 hours.

Don't send a cent. This is going to be a free proof. Merely mail us the coupon. We will send you the 24 little lessons in Corrective Eating, written by Eugene Christian and published by the Corrective Eating Society of New York. These lessons contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon, and dinner; covering every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age and for all occupations, climates, and seasons.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist, because every possible point is so thoroughly covered that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered.

Remember, this is without a penny from you. Now we're going to ask you to follow very carefully the instructions that come with this set of lessons. You won't be asked to abstain from foods you like. You can eat anything you want so long as it is properly combined with other foods. All we ask is that you follow these menus religiously for 48 hours. Just give them a fair trial for your own sake.

You can start eating the very things that will produce the increased physical and mental energy you are seeking the day you receive the lessons. And you will find that you secure results with the first meal. This, of course, does not mean that complicated illnesses can be removed at one meal, but it does mean that real results can nearly always be seen in 48 hours or less.

ALTHOUGH we are willing that you judge results from a 48-hour trial of the lessons, we want you to use them Free for five days. Then, if after 5 days of delicious health-building meals, you are not convinced that this method of correcting a bad stomach is good—if you are not convinced that your stomach can be made over—renewed—and kept in a natural, vigorous state by eating the proper food combinations, send the whole set back to us and you won't be out a cent. We won't send any solicitors or any letters to annoy you. You're not putting yourself under any obligation whatever.

But if you are feeling better—looking better, if your brain is acting quicker, your stomach functioning better; if your general physical condition is greatly improved, and you want to keep it in condition; if you realize that this set of little lessons in Corrective Eating is invaluable to you as a health-builder and health-keeper, just keep them and send us only three dollars in full payment for the entire set.

This is the easiest, quickest, and surest way we know of. We don't ask much of you. Just a 48-hour trial at our expense, that's all. You keep them Free for five days, but we stand or fall by what the little lessons do for you in 48 hours. Surely you owe it to yourself to at least investigate this method and give this society an opportunity to prove its real worth.

The reasons that the Society is willing to send the lessons on free examination without money in advance is because they want to remove every obstacle to putting this knowledge in the hands of the many interested people as soon as possible, knowing full well that a test of some of the menus in the lessons themselves is more convincing than anything that can possibly be said about them.

You don't risk a cent and you may, through following these simple methods, gain complete relief from stomach trouble forever. This is a real chance for you. Mail the coupon now with your name before the impulse is cold. Action is what counts. Give your stomach a fighting chance.

CORRECTIVE EATING SOCIETY

Dept. 157, 443 Fourth Ave., New York City

You may send me prepaid a copy of Corrective Eating in 24 Lessons. I will either return them to you within five days or send you $3.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

Digitized by Google

TEACHERS' AGENCIES
The Pratt Teachers Agency
 70 Fifth Avenue, New York
 Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools.
 Advises parents about schools. Win. O. Pratt, Mgr.
SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES
ILLINOIS

Northwestern University School of Commerce

A University Professional School

OFFERS

1. To high school graduates a four-year combination course (with the College of Liberal Arts) leading to the degree B. A. or B. S.
2. To students who have had two years of college, a two-year course leading to the degree B. A. or B. S., and a three-year course leading to the degree Bachelor in Business Administration.
3. Opportunities to specialize in Business Administration, Accounting, Banking and Finance, Merchandising and Advertising, Factory Management, Traffic and Transportation, Foreign Trade, Labor Administration, etc.
4. A location which enables the school to utilize the opportunities of Chicago for the scientific study of business.

Write for booklet of courses

Northwestern University School of Commerce
 412 Northwestern University Building
 Lake and Dearborn Sts. Chicago, Illinois

INDIANA

ELMHURST for GIRLS

Eleventh year. Incorporated. A non-sectarian college preparatory school, on a large country estate, 800 to 1,000 feet above sea level. Excellent water supply. Building brick and cement. New hot water heating plant. Electricity. Modern plumbing. Facilities for all outdoor sports, including saddle horses. Pupils limited to twenty-four, so that much individual attention can be given and a fine home life developed. Tuition $1,100. Address: ELMHURST, R. F. D. No. 3, Connersville, Indiana.

MARYLAND

Teach Your Child at Home

from the time he is four years old, by the latest scientific methods, and put him ahead of his friends. THE LEADING CHILD SPECIALISTS in the country will show you how to progressively train your child from the age of four till twelve so that you will be proud of him and it will be possible for him to enter school a year ahead of those without his advantages.

Write stating age of child for information and sample free lesson to Calvert School, Dept. C, 2 Chase St., Baltimore, Md.

MASSACHUSETTS

DEAN ACADEMY, Franklin, Mass.

83d Year

Young men and young women find here a homelike atmosphere, thorough and efficient training in every department of a broad culture, a loyal and helpful school spirit. Liberal endowment permits liberal terms, $350-$400 per year. Special Course in Domestic Science.

For catalogue and information address
 ARTHUR W. PEIRCE, Litt. D., Principal

WALNUT HILL SCHOOL

23 Highland St., Natick, Mass. A College Preparatory School for Girls. 17 miles from Boston.
 Miss Conant, Miss Bigelow, Principals.

Crane Theological School

Tufts College, Mass.

Progressive in spirit, democratic in purpose, scientific in method. Modernized curriculum—emphasis on needs of the world today. Trains men to be community leaders and to make the church a constructive, religious and social force.
 Address LEE MCCOLLESTER, Dean.

MASSACHUSETTS

SHORT-STORY WRITING

A course of forty lessons in the history, form, structure, and writing of the short-story taught by Dr. J. Berg Knapp, for years Editor of Lippincott's 150-page catalogue free. Please address

THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
 Springfield, Mass.

MICHIGAN

BATTLE CREEK NORMAL SCHOOL

of Physical Education. Summer Course—July 7. Six weeks. Normal Course—September 10. Three years. Broad, powerful training for a dignified profession of wholesome and happy service. Unrivalled facilities and equipment.
 C. Ward Crampton, M.D., Dean, Box 38, Battle Creek, Mich.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

AUTUMN SCHOOL OF ARTS AND CRAFTS

September 1 to November 1, 1919

Including courses in Drawing, Painting, Outdoor Sketching, Modeling, Theory of Color, Theory of Design, Leather Work, Gesso, Block Printing, Metal Work and Jewelry, Weaving, Basketry and Bead Work.

For Descriptive Booklet, address

MANCHESTER INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES
 MANCHESTER, NEW HAMPSHIRE

NEW YORK CITY

The Clark School for Concentration

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS

Prepares for any college. By an intensive system of individual instruction, enables a bright pupil to complete a course in much less than the usual time, and trains pupils who have been backward elsewhere to cultivate alert, retentive minds and qualify in all subjects.
 Write for records made by pupils at this school and for full descriptive catalog. Summer sessions.

Boys' School, 72d St. & West End Ave.

Girls' School, 301 West 72d St.
 New York City

A School Where Records Are Made

A School that Studies Life

The Training School for Community Workers
 Reorganized on the Cooperative Plan
 John Collier, Director

In an eight months' course the School prepares students to meet the demand for trained workers and organizers in Communities, Industrial Welfare Organizations, Public Schools, Churches and Colleges. Also offers short courses for trained workers already in the field and for volunteers. Address, for full information,

A. A. FREEMAN, Room 1001, 70 Fifth Ave., New York City.

PENNSYLVANIA

SCHOOL OF HORTICULTURE FOR WOMEN

Ambler, Pennsylvania

18 Miles from Philadelphia

SUMMER COURSE—Vegetable gardening, floriculture, fruit, canning and preserving. August 4th to 30th.

Vegetable and flower gardens, greenhouses, orchards, ornamental trees and shrubs, demonstration kitchen, apiary, poultry plant, live stock. Lectures and outdoor practice. Two year diploma course beginning Jan., 1920.

ELIZABETH LEIGHTON LEE, Director

SWITZERLAND

Les Fougères, Lausanne, Switzerland

This well-known school for girls, with commodious modern buildings and beautiful surroundings under the experienced direction of M. and Mme. Chaubert, offers thorough training in languages and other studies, as well as exceptional facilities for riding, lectures, concerts, the drama and Alpine excursions. Best American references on application to Mlle. Chaubert, who will sail with a party from New York in August. Temporary address:

48 Hillhouse Avenue, New Haven, Conn.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

MIDDLESEX GENERAL HOSPITAL TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES

New Brunswick, N. J., offers a course in training to refined young women having had one year high school or its equivalent. Monthly allowance. Apply to SUPERINTENDENT.

St. John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses

YONKERS, NEW YORK

Registered in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a general training to refined, educated women. Requires one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the Directors of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

Be a TRAFFIC Expert

Traffic Experts stop big shipping losses. Thousands needed. Big pay. Learn at home in spare time. Our Action Principle Method makes it easy. Write today for our Free Book Read what YOU can do. Mail us a Postal or Letter NOW. Address American Commerce Association, Dept. 367, 208 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122 July 9, 1919 No. 10

THE OUTLOOK IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. H. T. FULFORD, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. BOTT, TREASURER. HERBERT H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAYNES D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER. YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION—FIFTY-TWO ISSUES—FOUR DOLLARS IN ADVANCE. RETURNED AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER, JULY 21, 1893, AT THE POST OFFICE AT NEW YORK, UNDER THE ACT OF MARCH 3, 1879

Versailles and After.....	389
Protests.....	389
The Return of the President.....	390
War-Time Prohibition Goes into Effect.....	390
The Law and the Citizen.....	390
Cartoons of the Week.....	391
The End of the Winnipeg Strike.....	392
Judge Lindsey's Refusal to Betray Trust.....	392
The Reconstruction of Protestant France.....	393
Not Propaganda.....	393
Ratify the Treaty.....	393
Industrial Democracy on Trial.....	394
North Dakota's Rash Adventure.....	396
Common Sense About Ireland.....	397
By Everett P. Wheeler
Some Homely Economics.....	398
By Theodore H. Price
The Connor Charge.....	400
By Elsie Singmaster
The Cardinal's Gatekeeper.....	402
By Elbert Francis Baldwin
Current Events Illustrated.....	403
Needed—A League of Churches.....	407
By His Eminence Dorotheos, Patriarch of the Greek Church. An Authorized Interview with Gregory Mason, of The Outlook Staff
Weekly Outline Study of Current History.....	410
By J. Madison Gathany, A.M.
A Link Between America and England.....	387
By the Way.....	411
Financial Comment.....	413
A Correction.....	415

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents.
 For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage.
 Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.50.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY

381 Fourth Avenue New York City

A LINK BETWEEN AMERICA AND ENGLAND

During the time that I lived at Roundkey, near Leeds, Yorkshire, England, I, about the year 1880, in company with the vicar, the Rev. Thomas Davis, met at Elmete Hall, the residence of Mr. James Kitson (grandfather of Lord Airedale), a daughter of Longfellow. In course of conversation Miss Longfellow informed us that Queen Victoria had expressed to Dean Stanley her concern about the bald expression in the English national anthem, "confound their knavish tricks," which her Majesty felt was not quite in keeping with refined thought or Christian ideal. That thereupon the Dean proposed that Tennyson might perhaps be able to make some appropriate emendation. The Poet Laureate, however, seemed disinclined to deal with the point raised, but ventured to suggest that Longfellow might be approached, which was done. Longfellow, in turn, did not see his way to alter the offending expression or tamper with the second verse, but suggested that the third verse of the international ode "Our Fathers' Land" (published in a book of poems entitled "Songs in Many Keys"), written by his friend O. W. Holmes on the occasion of the visit to Boston, Massachusetts, in 1860, of Edward, Prince of Wales, might meet the case. Mrs. Sheridan, a daughter of the celebrated historian J. L. Motley, who was a very great friend of Longfellow and Holmes, corroborates this authorship. We here at Giggleswick-in-Craven Church have adopted the verse of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, and sing the following version of our national anthem. Even during this present stress many must feel that this is, after all, the right uplifting note of spiritual aspiration for a Christian nation. Vicar Davis further added that the original first line was, "God save our Lord the King," which on the accession of Queen Victoria was altered, for pure scansion reason, to "God save our gracious Queen."

May I take this opportunity of publicly stating how refreshing and educative I find The Outlook, and how much I admire the justice of the policy of its worthy editor?

THEODORE P. BROCKLEHURST,
Vicar of Giggleswick-in-Craven,
Yorkshire, England.

GOD SAVE THE KING

(The version as sung in Giggleswick-in-Craven Church)

God save our Lord the King,
Long live our noble King,
God save the King.
Send him victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the King.

Thy choicest gifts in store
On him be pleased to pour,
Long may he reign!
May he defend our laws,
And ever give us cause
To sing with heart and voice,
God save the King.

Lord, let war's tempests cease,
Fold the whole world in peace
Under thy wings,
Make all the nations one,
All hearts beneath the sun,
Till thou shalt reign alone,
Great King of Kings.

Irritability Decreases Efficiency

WHEN a man is irritable and annoyed by little things his efficiency is greatly diminished, because under these conditions he cannot do his best work, nor can he get the best work out of those about him.

Generally, indigestion in some slight form is the "makings" of a grouch.

In most cases of this sort, the routine use after meals of my Original Pepsin Chewing Gum will relieve the indigestion and restore the temper of the individual to a calm, normal condition.

AMERICAN CHICLE COMPANY
New York Cleveland Chicago Kansas City San Francisco

If you admired Theodore Roosevelt

then there is something for you in the next issue of The Outlook. If for nothing else, you will want to save this issue for the frontispiece alone—a splendid painting of Roosevelt by the noted Dutch artist Adriaan Martin de Groot, reproduced in full color, and really worth framing. Then there will be an article on "Roosevelt as a Practical Politician," by Brander Matthews, and an account by Travers D. Carman of the dedication on July 4 of Mount Roosevelt, at Deadwood, South Dakota. And much more besides!

Watch for the July 16 Outlook

Digitized by Google

SILVERWARE

Silverware should be used only at breakfast, lunch and dinner and only on these days: Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

The only permissible variation from this schedule is in the case of a late supper at which silverware is also an addition to the table.

Indeed it is never too late to use silverware.

Buy it to use

Gorham Sterling Silverware is sold by leading Jewelers everywhere and bears this Trade-Mark  STERLING

THE GORHAM COMPANY

Silversmiths and Goldsmiths

NEW YORK

WORKS PROVIDENCE and NEW YORK

The Outlook

JULY 9, 1919

VERSAILLES AND AFTER

WITH practically no ceremony, two Germans, in the Hall of Mirrors at Versailles, set their names and seal to the Treaty that records Germany's defeat in the world war. There were two coincidences—one planned, the other probably not planned. The Hall in which the signing took place was that in which Bismarck chose to crown Wilhelm I German Emperor, and thereby established the German Empire. The day on which the signing took place was the fifth anniversary of the assassination of Franz Ferdinand, which Germany chose as the pretext for beginning the world war. In the place of men with titles of nobility and royalty there stood commoners and plain citizens. There were soldiers in uniform, but they were guards and not participants. Among the distinguished spectators was a group of French poilus—common soldiers wounded in the cause of France and civilization. There were no speeches, no sermons, no martial or ecclesiastical music. There was simply the stern invitation uttered by M. Clemenceau to the German delegates to come forward and sign.

June 28, 1919, will be recorded in history as the date on which began the Peace of Versailles. As a matter of fact, however, there is no more peace to-day than there was before those two Germans and the representatives of all the nations in the Peace Conference, with the exception of China, signed the Treaty. The United States to-day is still at war with Germany. Not merely technically at war. It is as true now as ever that there is no peace without victory, and victory over the spirit of Prussianism has yet to be won.

Just before the signing of the Treaty the German Government made it very clear that they were signing with their hands but not with their wills or their hearts. There is no indication that Germany intends to keep any more of that Treaty than she is required by outside pressure to keep. Those Germans that were nearest to the guns of the Allied armies on the Rhine were most anxious to see the Treaty signed. Men who come from Germany testify that the German people are still unable to understand, not merely that they have been defeated, but that they deserve to be defeated. The men of our Army of Occupation, like the men in the armies of France and Britain, were eager to advance into Germany and were waiting the word that would have come to them if the Germans had not signed. This eagerness was not bloodthirstiness. We know our men better than to think that there is anything bloodthirsty about them. They were eager to go on because they knew from their experience that the Germans still need a tangible demonstration that they have failed in what they tried to do.

It is hard for the Germans to understand what has happened. Their territory is undevastated, undamaged, while the lands of France and Serbia and Poland have been made into deserts. It is not yet certain, at least in their minds, that they did lose the war. They do not understand why they should be short of food, and much less do they understand why they should fail to command the world's respect.

Of course, therefore, as the Treaty was signed there were disorders in Germany. There still persist reports that the reactionaries and Junkers are plotting to regain power.

The "Tageblatt" of Berlin expresses a characteristic German view when it says of the Treaty of Versailles: "Despite the fact that it was written on parchment, it remains a scrap of paper." There are men in Germany who know the truth, and a few of them say it, but it will take a long while for the German people to realize that their nation has been a criminal nation and that it has been treated with magnanimity and lenity.

Under these circumstances, if this peace is to be a peace of justice, it must be a peace of vigilance.

PROTESTS

Nobody is fully satisfied with the Treaty of Versailles. This dissatisfaction on the part of many was to be expected. There was certain to be complaint that the Treaty is too severe. Sympathizers with Germany were bound to express outrage at any terms that treated Germany as a defeated nation. There was also bound to be some complaint because the terms are not severe enough. Indeed, it was not possible, even if it were desirable, to express in terms of reparation the magnitude of Germany's crime. There has also been dissatisfaction, some of it unavoidable, because of the allotments of territory. And there has been severe criticism of the Treaty because of provisions it contains for the League of Nations.

On the occasion of the signing two protests were voiced. One of these was that of Jan Smuts. Representative of South Africa at the Conference, he worked early and late for the framing of a League of Nations. He belongs to the group commonly called idealistic. He believes that the terms of the Treaty are too severe, that they contain seeds of future disturbance and revenge. Nevertheless he signed the Treaty. His example has been commended to those who think as he does.

The other protest was expressed by China in the most emphatic way possible—the Chinese delegates refused to sign. They were not willing to be parties to an agreement which transfers what they believe to be Chinese territory from Germany to Japan. China, therefore, has not yet taken the preliminary step necessary in order that she may become a member of the League of Nations. The Chinese have the courage of their convictions. They are not willing to be forced into the League at the price of what they consider vital to China's integrity and China's honor. It has been pointed out, however, that China can adhere to the League of Nations by signing the Treaty with Austria.

Among those who have as much right as any one else to protest against certain of the terms of the Treaty are the French. It has been stated that the war and the Peace Treaty have left France with a tax burden twice as great as that of Germany. Germany's lands are undisturbed, her factories intact, her commercial organization all ready for peace, and, it is stated, a vast merchant marine concealed under neutral flags, while France has suffered devastation the extent of which even those who see it find it quite impossible to conceive. From Germany France has not yet received a franc, and she will not receive anything, according to the Peace terms, until after two years, and then every year for five years. As a Frenchman states it in an interview printed in the New York "Evening Post," France is "to get from Germany less than you Americans are to receive on your sequester and submarine account, and not as much as the British get on their ship-damage account, and scarcely one-half of what France paid each year on the indemnity exacted from her by Germany after the war of 1870;" and then after those five years Germany will be less willing to pay, and other nations less willing to make her pay. And there are Frenchmen, not alarmists, who feel that France is very insecurely protected against a still united and Prussianized Germany. But France has signed, and in presenting the Treaty to the French Chamber of Deputies Clemenceau has said: "At the hour when is to close the greatest drama of history . . . the first impulse of our souls should be of hope for France as much as for humanity—the French ideal, the humanitarian ideal."

THE RETURN OF THE PRESIDENT

Without regard to party or section, the people of the United States welcome the President's return from France. Though there has been criticism of his absence, for the most part Americans have acquiesced in the view which he held that his absence from this country was essential to the country's interests. The disadvantages which the country has suffered because of his absence the people have taken with good humor. One of the newspaper "colymists," Roy K. Moulton, expresses the common spirit when, in quoting the news item to the effect that President Pessoa, of Brazil, is making a tour of the United States, he comments: "The only President we have had in some time."

Thousands of Americans will take a measurable degree of satisfaction in the fact that just before sailing for the United States, while awaiting the signing of the Treaty, President Wilson visited Belgium and saw something of the devastated region there in the neighborhood of Ypres. There is ground for believing that if he had visited the devastated region of France last December he would have done both himself (that means his country) and France a good service. Such a visit might have given him a clearer idea than he otherwise could have had of the peril to which victory, and therefore peace, was exposed, and still is exposed, and it certainly would have convinced the French, as they were not convinced, that he understood their reasonable concern for the future. His visit to Belgium at this time does not serve that double purpose; but it has been appropriate and useful and highly appreciated in Belgium.

On his way home the President broke a precedent, as he is accustomed to doing every once in a while. He signed certain measures while on the high seas. Bills which Congress had passed a few days before were hurried to him by an east-bound transport, the Great Northern, which met the George Washington on June 30 in mid-ocean, thus enabling the measures to become law. One of these laws authorized the expenditure of funds which were needed by July 1.

WAR-TIME PROHIBITION GOES INTO EFFECT

At midnight of June 30 (or, to be accurate, an instant later, when July 1 began) the War-Time Prohibition Law became operative throughout the United States. Congress began its recess for the Fourth of July without passing legislation defining the terms of the law or giving detailed directions as to its enforcement. This was regrettable. In view of the long notice Congress had of the need of such legislation, it seems inexcusably dilatory. A bill has been reported in the House of Representatives by its Judiciary Committee which provides such interpretation and means of enforcement both for the War-Time Prohibition Law and the Constitutional Amendment. In some form legislation of this kind should certainly come from Congress as quickly as the importance of the questions involved may allow.

A statement of the Attorney-General of the United States made on June 30 goes far to define and simplify the situation. Unlike the Prohibition Amendment, the law which is now in effect provides a penalty (not over $1,000 fine or imprisonment for not over a year, or both), and its statement that "it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits," except for export, is explicit. But questions have been raised as to the further declaration that "after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export."

President Wilson has properly and rightly pointed out that until actual facts justify him in proclaiming that demobilization has terminated he cannot remove the inhibition of the law. As regards the latter part of the clause quoted above a genuine dispute exists. Does it mean that everything known as beer and wine are to be regarded as intoxicating, or does it mean that only such beer and wine as are intoxicating are prohibited? The court decision so far favors the latter interpretation. If the latter, what precisely does "intoxicating" mean? So far there has been no court decision defining that word.

Attorney-General Palmer's statement recognizes this difference of interpretation. While he declares that the law will be enforced by the Federal authorities as other National laws are enforced, and while he states that the Government contention has been that the Act prohibits the manufacture and sale of beer containing as much as one-half of one per cent of alcohol (the bill now before Congress fixes the amount of alcohol allowable at the same percentage), Mr. Palmer states that the course of the Department of Justice as regards beer containing less than two and three-quarters per cent of alcohol will depend upon the rulings to be made by the United States District Courts in cases brought before them. This is generally taken as equivalent to saying that prosecution will not be made for the present in such cases, although any one who sells what is called 2.75 beer takes his chances of future prosecution. A decision has already been rendered by a United States Circuit Court of Appeals. In this case Judge Ward continues an injunction order in the lower Court restraining an Internal Revenue Collector from interfering with the manufacture or sale of 2.75 beer.

There may be an interval between the end of the operation of the law now in force and the day in January when the Amendment goes into force; at the present rate of demobilization the interval is hardly likely to be more than two or three months and may very probably be even less.

THE LAW AND THE CITIZEN

Apart from the points just noted the inhibitions of the law are clear. Any citizen who violates them—for instance, a retail dealer who sells whisky—is liable to prosecution and punishment. It is obviously the duty of all citizens to obey the law precisely as they would obey any other newly enacted law. It is true that if a large number of retail dealers should, whether by agreement or by spontaneous individual act, disregard the law, it might be difficult for the Federal District Attorneys and the officers at their disposal to arrest every violator. The Federal officials rightly declare that they will do their utmost to enforce the law. It is too soon to judge how large a proportion of dealers in intoxicating beverages will defy the law, but it is certain that large numbers of them will obey it.

The bill favorably reported to the House of Representatives deals separately but in one bill with the matter of Constitutional prohibition and the war-time prohibitory legislation. In both sections the definition of intoxicating liquors is elaborate, but it practically means anything containing more than half of one per cent of alcohol and capable of being used as a beverage. Both sections provide pains and penalties for violation of law and Amendment, respectively, and both elaborately provide for enforcement and application of the law directly or to thwart any of many subterfuges or evasions. Naturally the section referring to the Amendment is more detailed in its provisions, because the Amendment has no enforcing or defining legislation be-

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

Kirby in the New York World

TRUE TO FORM

Watts in the London World

IF ONE GOES, BOTH GO!

From De Amsterdammer (Amsterdam, Holland)

THE PEACE TREATY
Germany: "Will this horse medicine bring a complete recovery?"

Forain in L'Avenir (Paris)

WITHOUT RANCOR!!
Fritz: "After all, I bear you no ill will!"

hind it, while the War-Time Prohibition Law has.

Of course no interpretation of the law which has just gone into effect lessens the force of any prohibition laws already existing in States. Thirty-two States in the Union have either some form of State prohibition or of local prohibition under local-option laws. The Federal law may, and usually will, strengthen prohibition where it exists in States, but it cannot weaken or take away from laws already existing.

In the places where prohibition is a new thing, as in New York City, for instance, there has naturally been the most perturbation about what is to take place. If the daily papers are exact in their indication of what has been going on, the result has been a temporary increase in the amount of drinking, a large amount of storing up of intoxicating drinks against the time of need, and a tremendous amount of facetiousness and jocosity about the subject, of which most people, we fancy, are heartily tired.

In a way, the new law is temporary and experimental. What happens under it may be of value in shaping action and conduct when the Eighteenth Amendment goes into effect. The present law will soon cease; but the Amendment has been deliberately adopted by a two-thirds majority in Congress and the ratification of over three-fourths of the States. Short of annulment by precisely the same process it will remain permanently the law of the land. It is therefore right and necessary that Congress (with the concurrence of State legislatures when desirable, as provided in the Amendment) should pass practical and intelligible legislation for enforcing the Amendment; that the courts should decide any questions raised; and that citizens, including even those who were opposed to Federal prohibition, should join honorably in obeying the law.

THE END OF THE WINNIPEG STRIKE

Winnipeg's big strike ended finally in the unconditional surrender of the strikers, in the crushing defeat and abject humiliation of the small revolutionary element that was responsible for the outbreak.

The struggle lasted exactly six weeks, but within two weeks the failure of the strike leaders was apparent to all disinterested observers. By that time their revolutionary aims could no longer be hidden from the thousands of their dupes who had been led into the conflict only through deliberate misrepresentation of the issue. As a result, many workmen who saw how grossly they had been deceived were returning to their employers and begging for reinstatement. Others continued on strike because they were ashamed to return to work, but they were keenly conscious that their misplaced confidence in their leaders had put them in the wrong, and they were seeking anxiously for some easy way out of their difficulties. The Red leaders had lost the confidence of all but a few of their followers.

At any time after the first two weeks of conflict all that was needed to bring it to an end was the offer of any sort of pretended compromise that would have served as an excuse for surrender. Winnipeg citizens were determined, however, that there should be no semblance of compromise with Bolshevism, that the battle must be fought out to the bitter end, no matter what the cost. It was well understood that Winnipeg was fighting the battle of all Canada, if not of the whole continent; and no peace by negotiation could be satisfactory. The price that had to be paid by Winnipeg business men, and citizens in general, for the unconditional surrender upon which they had set their hearts was a heavy one; but in the end they had their reward. The sympathetic strike commenced at 11 A.M. Thursday, May 15; it ended in unconditional surrender at the same hour on June 26, six weeks later. It is believed that the defeat of this revolutionary movement in Winnipeg means the end of Bolshevism in Canada. Any indecisive result would have meant further trouble.

A few days before the strike ended the city discharged its entire police force. The policemen's sympathy with the strikers had been undisguised. They had remained on duty only by instructions of the strike committee. The discharge of the police force was followed by the arrest on charges of sedition of the principal leaders of the Reds, including two members of the City Council. It was then that the revolutionary element lost their heads. On the last Saturday of the strike there was a serious riot in which one alien enemy lost his life and scores of people were wounded by the revolver shots of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. This riot was the last despairing effort of the Reds, and it was followed within five days by the utter collapse of the strike.

It was said by the younger Pitt more than a century ago that England had saved herself by her exertions and Europe by her example. It may with equal truth be said that Winnipeg citizens have saved their own city from the menace of Bolshevism by their stout-hearted resistance, and all Canada by their example. Against the strong determination and stubborn resistance of the same elements of a community no attempt at a Bolsh-evist revolution can succeed on this continent. Should there be similar trouble in other cities on this continent, Seattle and Winnipeg have shown the way to meet it.

JUDGE LINDSEY'S REFUSAL TO BETRAY TRUST

Four years ago the story was told in The Outlook of the refusal by Judge Lindsey, of Denver, to betray on the witness stand a confidential communication between himself and a boy with whom he had talked in his capacity as Juvenile Judge. That Judge Lindsey was right morally and from every consideration of justice seems beyond question. But the Colorado Supreme Court has lately rendered a decision that his refusal to betray this child's confidence was legally contempt of court. It is thought by Judge Lindsey's counsel that the matter may be brought before the United States Supreme Court and that the question is properly a National one, as it may involve the rights of Juvenile Courts in all States.

The circumstances of this particular case made Judge Lindsey's refusal clearly right, apart from legal technicalities. The boy's mother had been accused of killing her husband, a brutal and drunken man who ill treated both his wife and the child. The twelve-year-old boy made statements intended to exonerate his mother. Afterwards he came before Judge Lindsey in the Juvenile Court and talked with the Judge confidentially about it. Judge Lindsey on the stand was asked to relate this conversation, and refused absolutely to do so and has to this day. The mother was acquitted, and we are informed that both the mother and the boy have prospered and lived honorable lives since that time.

The contention of Judge Lindsey's opponents was that the only confidential relations recognized by the law as of such a kind that communications would be privileged, as it is called in court, are those of husband and wife, lawyer and client, doctor and patient, and priest and penitent. The principle that leads to these exemptions from the duty of testifying obviously applies to the relations between a Juvenile Judge and a child with whom he talks. It is not remarkable that the laws have not specifically declared this to be so, but if it is ever proper to apply the theory and purpose of the law to cases not specifically named, certainly it should be done here. Incidentally, it may be added that the legislatures of States in which Juvenile Courts exist should take this matter into consideration.

There was a dissenting opinion in the decision of the Colorado Supreme Court. In fact, three judges out of the seven agreed in dissent. The principle involved was clearly stated by Justice Morton S. Bailey as follows:

The relationship between the judge and the child is brought about by legal process for the purpose of aiding and uplifting delinquent and wayward children, in an effort to make them assets of the State rather than liabilities. This is a humane field, of boundless possibilities for good, in which plainly the element of confidence between the judge and the child is essential to the success of the effort.

That this jurisdiction should be upheld and the relationship created thereby fostered is manifest from the mere fact that, with general approval, the law creating such tribunal has been enacted and provision made for its support and maintenance. Plainly, to destroy this relationship would be, in effect, to nullify and set aside the chief end and purpose of the enactment itself.

Judge Lindsey has no intention of abandoning this long legal fight. He has even expressed his purpose to accept the alternative of imprisonment rather than to pay the fine fixed for his alleged contempt in refusing to betray the confidence of a child when the life of his mother was at stake, and after the Judge's solemn promise that he would not disclose the statement made by the child.

THE RECONSTRUCTION OF PROTESTANT FRANCE

There is to-day an unequalled opportunity for a great broad-minded Christian work in the restoration of the disorganized church life in both France and Belgium. To meet the need for such endeavor the Committee for Christian Relief in France and Belgium, in which all Protestant denominations are co-operating, has been organized, and what is known as the "Three Million Dollar Campaign" has been instituted to furnish funds for this work. The headquarters of this Committee are at 289 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

A budget for the disbursement of this fund has been prepared, and the money is to be used for certain specified objects. Food and clothing for the sufferers in the invaded areas are to be supplied, houses furnished, and renewed family life made possible.

Churches and manses are to be restored, and emergency relief extended to the pastors, some of whom are sick and crippled, many of whom lost their homes and all their possessions during the war. There are two million wounded and disabled soldiers who need re-education in order to be made self-supporting, and work along this line is planned. At Nantes there is already a Protestant school engaged in this work. These are only a few instances of the methods of relief included in the programme of the Committee.

The Methodist Church will devote a part of its Centenary Fund to the erection of schools, to the establishment of community centers, and to co-operation with other evangelical forces.

The Episcopal Church is planning a similar work.

The Presbyterian Church will spend $500,000 this year to restore Protestant churches in the devastated regions of France, Belgium, and Italy. About half the funds will be spent among the Protestant bodies which are accredited agencies in France and Belgium, one-fourth among denominations other than Presbyterian, and the remainder will be contributed to the Waldensian Church of Italy. A special committee of Presbyterians has been appointed to confer with committees from other evangelical churches contemplating similar work in Europe, with a view to co-operating and avoiding duplication.

NOT PROPAGANDA

The plans of the Protestant Churches for the spending of such vast sums in France have been the cause of considerable criticism on the part of Archbishop Hayes and other members of the Roman Catholic Church, who claim that the Protestant Churches are organizing a proselyting campaign abroad. Authorities of the Methodist Church have met this with a denial, and Dr. Foulkes, of the Presbyterian Church, has issued a statement definitely refuting the idea that the Protestant Churches have in mind the establishment of these funds for proselyting purposes. He says: "It is proper to reaffirm the definite purpose of the Presbyterian General Assembly's Committee, which is not to build up a fallen church in France, but to assist all the needy Protestant churches of France that are already there, and that have as much right to existence and support as has the Roman Catholic or any other church."

Dr. Henry van Dyke, the Vice-Chairman of the Committee for Christian Relief, in a sermon recently delivered in New York City in behalf of the French and Belgian Protestant churches—"the people of our own household of faith"—gives some facts which show the pressing need for the work that is being undertaken. He states that "one hundred and thirty Protestant churches—more than one-eighth of the total number—were under enemy fire," and that "more than two million dollars' worth of actual destruction was inflicted upon them." And he goes on to say that "out of a thousand French Protestant pastors, more than five hundred—fifty per cent—were enrolled in the army of liberty as chaplains, stretcher-bearers, officers, and privates. Nearly half of them received citations for bravery and self-sacrifice on the field of honor. Of these Christian soldiers more than fifty per cent were wounded, more than twenty per cent were killed." After acknowledging the fine record of the Catholics in France and Belgium, England and America, during the war, he adds: "But what I want you to understand to-day is that our Protestant brethren have borne an equal part in the honor and suffering of this righteous war. They have seen their homes demolished, their churches wrecked, their households broken and scattered. . . . They cannot get upon their feet again unless we hold out our hand to them."

RATIFY THE TREATY

WITH the signing of the Treaty of Versailles the United States Senate is weighted with the responsibility of deciding whether to ratify or not.

Originally in the Constitutional Convention the negotiation of treaties was left to the Senate, but toward the close of the Convention it was provided that the President should have power to negotiate treaties "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," while in the same sentence it is provided that the President "shall nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors," etc. Professor Willoughby in his work on Constitutional law calls attention to the difference of phraseology as indicating that the Senate should participate in the negotiating of treaties though not in the primary selection of ambassadors, and he shows that it has been the common practice of Presidents to take the advice of the Senate in the negotiating of treaties from the days of President Washington, who in several instances took the advice of the Senate in conducting treaty negotiations, to the days of President McKinley, who in 1898 selected from the Senate three of the five commissioners appointed to negotiate the Treaty of Peace with Spain. It is true that Presidents have not infrequently negotiated treaties without previous conference with the Senate, and The Outlook has affirmed that the President has a Constitutional right to pursue this course, as President Roosevelt did in negotiating the treaty with Santo Domingo. As to what is not Constitutional but advisable in negotiating treaties there seems to us to be no parallel between the Santo Domingo situation and the situation in Paris. In the case of Santo Domingo there was a simple treaty between two nations. In this case there is a complicated treaty involving the covenant and arrangements for future world peace that entail changes in the practice and obligations of the United States which come near to being changes in its organic law. We have expressed the hope that those changes will be made and the Treaty will be accepted, but it seems to us that the process would have been simplified and made easier if the advice of the treaty-ratifying power had been consulted in advance. Professor Willoughby notes the fact that the Olney-Pauncefote Arbitration Treaty and also the Hay-Pauncefote Canal Treaty failed in the Senate partly because the Senate was not consulted in preliminary negotiations. If President Wilson had followed the wise course pursued by President McKinley, he would not now have to face an irritated Senate and a divided people.

Nevertheless we hope that the Senate will approve the Treaty and we believe that the people of the country will approve it.

What, stated in the simplest terms, will this treaty do if ratified by the nations which were united in defending civilization against the Huns?

It is the confirmation of the overthrow by war of the autocracies of Germany, Austria, and Russia.

With the peace which it inaugurates, it will probably put an end to the domination over subjugated peoples of the unspeakable Turk.

It secures against foreign despotism the peoples of Czechoslovakia, Jugoslavia, and Poland.

It secures a considerable reparation to Belgium and France from the injury inflicted on them by the crimes of Germany. It so weakens Germany that no immediate attempt to repeat her crimes is possible.

It provides a protectorate for the colonies which have been wrested from Germany during the period of their self-development.

And it unites the civilized nations in a pledge to protect each other and the people under their guardianship from future aggressions and to compel Germany to fulfill her promises to make reparation for the wrongs she has committed.

What is the alternative? If we refuse this Treaty and refuse to enter the League of Nations, what would be the consequences?

We should be left at war with Germany. She would be free to carry on an unscrupulous propaganda in Mexico to the south of us, in Japan to the west of us, and among the discontented and restless elements in our own borders. It would leave us in the midst of that propaganda without allies; without co-operation from the fleet of Great Britain, which has done so much to protect our merchant marine and our coast in this war; without aid or sympathy from the other civilized nations, perhaps with their secret, if not avowed, satisfaction at all which our proud isolation would be bringing to us.

If, on the other hand, we made a separate peace with Germany, we could not expect alone to compel Germany to make better reparation or afford to her neighbors better protection than could be secured from her by the united action of all the civilized nations, including America.

If, as is highly improbable, we could secure another conference of the Powers for the purpose of agreeing upon a revised Treaty, we should be represented in that conference by the President whose action at the previous conference we had disavowed, unless the new conference was not convened until March 4, 1921, in which case the world would be left in its chaotic condition for nearly two years longer, a peril not to be lightly hazarded.

So much for the immediate effect on America's interest. What would be the effect of America's rejection of the Treaty on the world's interests and on America's reputation abroad?

The absence of America from the League would deprive the League of one of the richest and most powerful of the civilized nations, and would perhaps lead to the disruption of the League altogether and the indefinite postponement of all hope of realizing that international brotherhood which has been the dream of poets and prophets from the days of Isaiah to those of Alfred Tennyson.

However we might justify our action to ourselves, it would not be and could not be understood abroad. A Government-directed press in Germany would exult in our refusal to join with her enemies, which it would interpret as a victory for pro-German sentiment in America. The people in England, France, and Italy would be discouraged, if not dismayed. The people of South America, a people of noble if sometimes dangerous idealism, would be alienated. Our policy would be attributed to National pride and National selfishness in the thoughts of other nations. We should have resigned our position as leaders in the world movement for Justice, Liberty, and Peace.

May we ratify this Treaty with reservations? Doubtless the Senate may accompany ratification with reservations that give America's definition to ambiguous articles. If, for example, there is a serious question whether Article X pledges the United States to protect other members of the League against revolutions, it is entirely legitimate for the Senate in expressed terms to disavow that interpretation. But a reservation which had the effect of abolishing any clause of the Treaty in its plain and well-understood meaning would be an amendment to the Treaty and equivalent to the rejection of its present form.

It is true that there are no precedents for the League of Nations. But there are times when we cannot follow precedents, but must make them. True also that it is easy to overrate the League. It does not end the old and intolerable order nor give liberty to before-enslaved peoples. It is a promise of the nations, and its efficacy depends wholly upon the fidelity with which those promises are fulfilled. But if they are not made they cannot be fulfilled, and if they are made and fulfilled the fulfillment will do more than any one international act in the past to bring in an era of Justice, Liberty, and Peace.

INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY ON TRIAL<sup>1</sup>

THE phrase "industrial democracy" came into vogue something like forty years ago. We believe that it was first used in the columns of The Outlook. It represented an ideal sometimes confounded with, but really quite different from, Socialism.

The political and educational systems of America are democratic; the industrial system of America is autocratic. Our education as well as our Government is of the people, having in them its source and its inspiration; by the people, administered and controlled by them; and for the people, maintained for the benefit of all, not for an especially educated class. But our industrial system is not of the people; it is not a voluntary expression of their energy; nor by the people, they have no share in its control; nor for the people, they do not participate, except indirectly, in its profits. This conflict of ideals is the cause of industrial unrest. The remedy for that industrial unrest is to make our industrial system democratic. Mr. Leitch, in his volume, tells how organized industries have been made democratic in twenty large corporations, and what have been the results. This volume furnishes an answer from the workshop to those who have smiled indulgently at industrial democracy as an impossible dream of impracticable visionaries.

The Packard Piano Company, of Fort Wayne, Indiana, had successfully met and overcome a strike. The men returned to their work, but dissatisfied. The work suffered. The workmanship was careless, the pianos deteriorated, sales fell off, and Mr. Leitch was called in by the president as an industrial engineer. He called a mass-meeting of the men and told them that things were not going well—that they knew already—and that he had a plan to propose to better conditions. He said:

<sup>1</sup> Man-to-Man. By John Leitch. The B. C. Forbes Company, New York.

I am not going to give you a policy—I am going to ask you to adopt one for yourselves. It will have four corner-stones and a capstone, but I am going to suggest only one a week. We will take one to-day, talk it over, and then vote on it. If you vote "Yes," we will lay the second corner-stone a week from to-day and then you can vote on that. But if this corner-stone or those which we may talk about on any later day does not suit you, I expect you to vote "No" and we will quit.

The four corner-stones explained at four successive mass-meetings were justice, co-operation, economy, and energy. The capstone was service. Mr. Leitch writes with both clearness and vigor; he must also have some personal magnetism, for at the end of the fifth meeting his plan was adopted with enthusiasm. The resolution adopting it was type-written and bound and "every man in the entire organization—every officer, every director, every workman—signed it." Copies were hung about the shop and a copy was given to every workman and to every agent of the company. Mr. Leitch explained that by justice, co-operation, economy, and energy in service for the common welfare more work would be done and more money would be saved than under the old régime. The men were henceforth to work not for the company but with the company; "that it would not be a square deal for the company alone to take the money that they had saved, but instead that we would split up the savings 50-50—that is, as the books of the company showed savings in the cost of operation, the amount saved would be divided into two parts; one would go to the company and the other would be distributed every two weeks to the men as a dividend on wages."

At the end of the first month the men had cut the cost of production five and a half per cent, which meant a dividend both to the workers and to the stockholders. They voted to reduce the hours of labor to nine hours a day, with the result that they turned out more work in the nine-hour day than in the ten-hour day, saved expenses by the shortened day, and earned for themselves and the company a larger dividend. Next some one proposed an eight-hour day. The conservatives among the workingmen objected, while the company approved it. The men finally resolved to try the experiment for two months, with the result of both better work and more work, and as a consequence larger dividends to both the company and the workers. The quality was so much better under the new system, or rather, let us say, with the new spirit, that the company could not keep up with its sales. The savings in one year obtained by democracy as applied to industry in this piano factory was in figures $4,656.24. When the war broke out and the sales of pianos fell off, the men in their mass-meeting proposed to work four days in the week instead of seven, and the foremen volunteered to reduce their own wage twenty-five per cent for the time being.

It is not clear from Mr. Leitch's account whether this mass-meeting, which is now only held once a month, has legislative or only advisory power, but that this power is effective is illustrated by a rather amusing incident. The men investigated the president, decided that he needed a vacation, and passed a resolution granting him one of three weeks. He declared "that the company could not function without him. They came back with the assertion that they would do better without him. He took the three weeks' vacation. When he came back, he found that all previous production and sales records had been beaten."

The conservative reader will say that a piano factory requires men of a high degree of intelligence; that industrial democracy would never work in a factory with a large body of constantly shifting foreign workers. The next story which Mr. Leitch tells answers this conservative objector. At the factory of William Demuth & Co., on Long Island, where smokers' pipes are made, there were nine hundred working people employed, men and women. "About one-half were Italians, a fourth were Poles, and the remaining fourth covered all other nationalities with a very slight sprinkling of Americans. Many of the force could not speak English." Mr. Leitch had great difficulty in getting his simple ideas of justice, co-operation, economy, energy, and service into the closed minds of these foreign-born workers. But apparently difficulty intensifies Mr. Leitch's energy and raises his standard. In this company of foreigners he organized a government on the same lines as that of the United States:

We formed a Cabinet consisting of the executive officers of the company with the president of the company as president of the Cabinet. The legislative bodies were a Senate made up of department heads and foremen, and a House of Representatives elected by the employees. The elections to the House were by departments—one representative for each twenty-five employees, or, in the case that a department had less than twenty employees, it combined with another small department. The various bodies elected their own officers and adopted by-laws covering their procedure.

The ideal of democracy did not appeal to these foreign-born workers, but the idea of making more money did appeal to them. "The workers ventured into industrial democracy searching for cash; they stayed because they liked the idea. They saw and learned but slowly." When half a dozen men who could not speak English took affront at some incident and walked out, the House appointed a committee to investigate, discovered the cause of the trouble, and induced the discontented men to return. The House took up the matter of language, resolved that only English should be spoken in the shop, and that any one who did not understand the language should learn it. Various complaints of individual workers or groups of workers were taken up by the House, investigated, and where occasion required corrections were ordered. The foremen gradually learned that they could get better work, and therefore make more money for themselves and their co-workers, by leading, not by driving, the people under them. The removal of one foreman was recommended by the House because he was incompetent, and he was removed. The training of raw men—generally "boys ranging between eighteen and twenty-five"—was taken up by their co-workers, with the result of the saving of something like fourteen thousand dollars, one-half of which of course went to the workers. In one or two cases new devices were invented by the workmen. The workers discovered by the cash dividend paid to them every two weeks that the quality of work was as important as the quantity of the output. Consequently the quality improved. Labor used to come and go in this factory; "now, with labor even scarce, it has a waiting list."

Mr. Leitch adds an account of the introduction of industrial democracy in the Shelton Looms, a velvet factory in the Housatonic Valley, and in an iron foundry near Cleveland, Ohio, and says that he might have recited fifteen more stories of equal interest, "for industrial democracy is no longer an experiment." "It was not born full grown. It grew out of my own long experience as a worker." The four typical industries which he describes, with their contrasted types of workers, are sufficient to demonstrate the practicability of industrial democracy as he describes it, if not in all organized industries, certainly in industries of very different types. The remainder of Mr. Leitch's volume—about one-half—is taken up with an elucidation of the fundamental principles, and, what is more important, the essential spirit of the democratic industry which he advocates.

Industrial democracy is not merely a new form of organization; "in its broadest sense it is a state of mind." It is the substitution of co-operation for competition, or, to speak more accurately, the substitution of competition between industrial organizations for competition between hostile classes. Something like half a century ago Arnold Toynbee said that industry should not be an organization of all capitalists in competition with an organization of all workingmen, but a competition of co-operative organizations of workingmen and capitalists with other co-operating organizations of capitalists and workingmen. What the first method brings us to is now being illustrated on a large scale in Russia; what the second method would bring us to Mr. Leitch's experiment illustrates on a small scale. Its object is to substitute good will in place of ill will, a working with the corporation in place of working for the corporation. It is based on the "axiom that without good will within the works one cannot have good will outside the works." Thus from start to finish it assumes that "manufacturing consists primarily in making men—they will attend to the product." It inspires in the workingman pride and interest in his work; nothing else can: "A worker will no more perform at his best solely for money than will any other human being."

We add to Mr. Leitch's five words: "Justice, co-operation, economy, energy, and service," a sixth word—"reality." A fake democracy is not a democracy at all. Unless the spirit of mutual respect for one another's opinions and mutual interest in one another's welfare can be introduced into the factory, the organization of a House, a Senate, and an Executive will be worse than useless, a fact which Mr. Leitch illustrates by one incident of failure which he narrates. If the owners of any plant organize a mass-meeting of their workmen and give them only advisory power, they must take the advice seriously and customarily follow it; if they give it legislative power, they must not attach to it a string and snatch the power away when they think it is being unwisely executed. This has been sometimes done in introducing what has been called democracy into our schools and colleges, and always with disastrous effects. Better leave bad enough alone than make it worse by false pretense.

There is no better description of industrial democracy in Mr. Leitch's book than in this paragraph in which Mr. Bond, President of the Packard Piano Company, defines it. He says:

We used to build pianos. Then we stopped building pianos and began to build men—they have looked after the building of the pianos. We have adopted as a slogan for the Packard Company, "If there is no harmony in the factory there will be none in the piano."

Industrial democracy involves profit-sharing, but it is much more than profit-sharing. It promotes harmony, prevents strikes, improves quality, increases quantity, adds to the profits of both employer and employed. But it does much more:

it promotes good will between employer and employed; it develops interest, intelligence, economy, and efficiency in the workers; it transforms the factory from a military to a family organization; and it educates the foreign-born worker in the American language, the American spirit, the essential political principles of America, and so in a practical and abiding patriotism.

We should like to see Mr. Leitch's book in the hands of every captain of industry, and we commend it as a required reading in all school and college classes in sociology.

NORTH DAKOTA'S RASH ADVENTURE

ONE reason why it is interesting to be an American is that Americans are always trying experiments. Their country is built in such a way as to make experiments comparatively safe and simple. If somebody has a new idea for promoting what he regards as the welfare of the people, he does not have to persuade a hundred and ten millions of people to adopt it. All he has to do is to select one of the forty-eight States for his experiment and persuade the people of that State to try it. If it works, other States will imitate it; if it does not work, the other States will avoid it and the State that tried it will ultimately get rid of it, and no very great harm is done. In this way the United States forms a collection of social and political laboratories. Any explosives that are by mistake touched off do their damage in only one of the laboratories. One of the problems of statesmanship in the past has been that of localizing war. In the United States we have succeeded in localizing social and political experiments. This is one of the reasons why the American form of government has adapted itself alike to a little fringe of population along the Atlantic seacoast in the eighteenth century and to a population extending in the twentieth century from ocean to ocean and from the Rio Grande to the Lakes. There is nothing quite like this anywhere else in the world. Because of this arrangement of social and political laboratories Americans have been able to keep alive an adventurous spirit and at the same time live securely.

One of these characteristic American experiments is to be tried out now in the State of North Dakota. It is an experiment in what some people call Socialism. In order to put this experiment into operation the Legislature of the State adopted seven measures. A great many of the people believed that the experiment was dangerous, and so, in accordance with their rights under the State law, they petitioned to have these measures submitted to the voters, with the hope that they would be rejected. Consequently, on June 26 the voters of North Dakota cast their ballots in a State-wide referendum. Most of the towns gave their majorities against the experiment, but the farming regions voted so largely for it that the measures were carried and the experiment is going to be tried.

Briefly, these measures provide for a State bank, owned by the State, to be the depository of State, county, municipal, and school district funds, and to make loans secured by property of twice their value; for an Industrial Commission that will arrange for the conduct of this bank and appoint its managers, and also arrange for the operation of the Terminal Elevator and Mill Association and the Home Building Association; for an Immigration Commission to advertise the advantages of the State and induce settlers to come in; for a newspaper, to be owned and operated by the State, in every county; for making certain changes in the judicial system; for the concentration of State control over the public school system and over penal and charitable institutions; for a one-man tax commission.

Under the authority of these laws, the State of North Dakota is going to enter upon what is generally regarded in America as the field of private business. It is going to handle grain, manufacture flour, operate a bank, finance farm credit, and may go even further, for it has the power to operate various kinds of utilities, enterprises, and industries, particularly those having to do with the manufacturing and marketing of farm products. Indeed, under these laws the State has certain powers that are generally regarded as paternalistic. By its control of the Home Building Association the State, which has wide powers of eminent domain, may provide houses for city workers and farms for farm-hands.

This North Dakota experiment is a wide departure from the individualism that has characterized America. And, strange to say, this experiment is undertaken by the kind of people whom we are accustomed in America to regard as most individualistic—farmers. North Dakota is overwhelmingly an agricultural State. Even its cities are the product of its agricultural industries. And it is not a State where poverty or distress has engendered discontent. It is prosperous and wealthy. Its farms average about four hundred acres each. No one who visits North Dakota can think of it otherwise than as a land of plenty, or can think of its people otherwise than as strong and stalwart Americans. Why, then, has North Dakota launched upon this adventure?

It is the natural consequence of past blindness on the part of political leaders. Because our city populations are compact and easily organized, and because our farmers are scattered and unorganized, political leaders in America have largely ignored the interests of our rural folk. As a consequence, there has been every now and then an uprising. The Farmers' Alliance, the Populist party, the Bryan campaign of 1896, and now the Non-Partisan League that has brought about these changes in North Dakota have all been examples of the revolt of farming communities against a political system or policy that has favored the cities and towns and the manufacturing interests. Farmers in the West particularly have felt themselves to be at the mercy of men who were engaged in the manufacture, transportation, and distribution of the raw material which they, the farmers, produced. So fertile is our land, so rich in resources, that in spite of real grievances the farmers have been able to make a living, and in many instances to prosper; but they have had real grievances to which they have not been generally able to induce those in authority to listen. Now, because they are prosperous in such places as North Dakota, they feel themselves able to assert themselves.

As in many such instances where injustice has been unheeded by authority, those who have had grievances have listened readily to the arguments of agitators who appeal to prejudice and class hatred. The organization by which their campaign has been carried on has fallen, not unjustly, under the suspicion of being tinged with something like pro-Germanism, or at least disloyalty. In the course of the campaign the opponents of the League have been called vile names, of which the least obnoxious is "leeches." Naturally, such methods have aroused bitterness and created in the minds of many no little foreboding of evil. The Non-Partisan League has been called Bolshevik. Its form of organization has been likened to the Russian system of soviets.

Americans may be reassured. They need not fear the growth of Russian Bolshevism in this country. The evils of Bolshevism do not lie in any mere economic theory; they lie in its essential lawlessness. The Bolshevik doctrine that all democracy, that all law, that all morals, are null and void because they are all bourgeois, has no place in America and can find no adherents in such an American population as that of North Dakota. What has been done in North Dakota has been done by process of law, in accordance with political methods and under the belief that it will promote justice, morality, and democracy. Those who believe in this programme may be mistaken; but they are not doing it in defiance of the moral and legal standards which are the essence of Americanism.

The danger of the experiment in North Dakota does not lie in its being too advanced, but in the danger that it may be reactionary. Its evil consequences are not likely to be economic so much as political. It is not nearly so likely to introduce a new and unheard-of system as to restore an old and discredited system.

In brief, there lurks in these laws the old evil of bossism. At the basis of the new system in North Dakota is a triumvirate—the so-called Industrial Commission. It is this small and powerful body that will manage and conduct the new State industries. It is this body that will acquire property by purchase or lease or the exercise of eminent domain, that can put an industry here or there or elsewhere in the State, that can conduct investigations, and that will control the powerful State bank. It is this Commission that will have the power to create and dispose of an unknown number of jobs. As a part of this system, there will be a chain of official State newspapers, all provided with means for propaganda and liable to become in the worst sense a "kept" press. As we understand it, this system also includes the control of elections by county commissioners, which virtually puts the party in power in the position of inspecting and judging elections. This system also provides for such control over the public schools of the State that the political machine can control the teaching in the public schools to its own benefit. And behind and underneath this legalized system there is what amounts to a political organization which is controlled by caucuses against which minorities are helpless.

There is nothing essentially new in this. It is as old as Tammany Hall, as neatly organized as the Philadelphia machine.

The risk in North Dakota's adventure lies in the possibility of the Non-Partisan League becoming one of the most strongly entrenched of partisan bodies, and the establishment in the name of liberty and justice of a system capable of exercising extreme political tyranny.

COMMON SENSE ABOUT IRELAND

BY EVERETT P. WHEELER

THE declaration of an Irish republic, independent of Great Britain, the advertisements of an Irish committee, and the delegates sent to Paris to present the case for Irish independence have drawn American attention anew to the Irish question. It is very important to remember a few facts which the advocates appear to overlook. The first of these is that there never was a united Ireland, independent of Great Britain. To quote from Justin McCarthy:

The island was divided among native chiefs, who concerned themselves mainly about their local interests, and had, no doubt, their natural rivalries.

There were four petty kingdoms: Ulster, Munster, Leinster, and Connaught. For a brief period in the eleventh century the Danish invasion led them to unite under Brian Boru, who defeated the Danes in the battle of Clontarf in 1014. He was killed in the battle, and the condition of Ireland became the same as it was before Brian.

Then comes an episode which reminds one of the Iliad. The King of Leinster carried off the wife of one of the other chiefs. An army was raised which drove the King of Leinster from the country. He sought help from England, which was given, and the Norman Conquest ensued. As McCarthy says:

Many of the Irish chiefs had sworn allegiance to the Conqueror and accepted his support, while others held out to the last against him. The hatred of those who accepted the new conditions for those who refused to acknowledge them must have been as intense as the hatred of the conquering Normans for the native chiefs who resisted their rule.

The English then established an Irish Parliament, but "it was fenced around by so many limitations that it became merely a convocation of those openly hostile to the claims of the native population."

When the Reformation came in the time of Henry VIII, religious strife became "the source of new enmities and new struggles in Ireland."

Then came the period of religious persecution. O'Neil, who claimed to be King of Ulster, proclaimed himself the champion of Irish national independence, visited Queen Elizabeth, and negotiated an agreement which on his return to Ireland he claimed had been obtained by force. He insisted that "his ancestors were Kings of Ulster, and that Ulster was his kingdom and should continue to be his." In this condition he sought for aid from France, which he did not obtain. The Scottish settlers in Ulster turned against him and he was killed in an affray.

The partisans of independence soon undertook another revolution, and actually did procure assistance from Spain, but the rising failed. In the time of Cromwell many settlers from Great Britain were established in Ulster, and Ulster became a province entirely devoted to the English Government and opposed to the independence of Ireland. The rest of the country followed the cause of the Stuarts, and took up arms for James II. They also were defeated and the religious persecution continued.

Then arose a new group of leaders who sought the repeal of Poyning's law that prevented the Irish Parliament from effective legislation, and sought also for Roman Catholic emancipation. The first was accomplished under the leadership of Grattan, and the Irish Parliament gave the elective franchise free from religious restrictions. But a full measure of Catholic emancipation was denied by the new Irish Parliament.

Then came the movement for legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland. Any one reading the life of Grattan and his speeches will find that this union was favored by a great many Roman Catholics, who hoped for more liberal treatment from the Parliament at Westminster than they had received from the Parliament at Dublin. At any rate, an act of union was passed and became a law in 1801. This gave to the Irish people as full representation in Parliament as New York has in the Congress of the United States, and under it the two kingdoms have been united ever since. Catholic emancipation was granted in the time of Sir Robert Peel. Restrictions on Irish trade which had been a grievance were removed. The land laws were reformed, the Irish Protestant Church was disestablished, and finally, in July, 1903, a bill passed and was approved by the King "creating a commission to buy estates from landlords and sell them to tenants, thus creating a peasant proprietary, and to assist the tenants by means of a Government loan."

During all this period there were occasional insurrections against the United Kingdom. All of them failed. But all the old grievances which had naturally aroused resentment were removed, excepting the lack of local self-government. That finally was conferred by the Home Rule Bill, which was to have gone into effect in 1914. Unfortunately the old jealousies between Ulster and the other three Irish provinces continued. It is impossible by legislation to make people fond of each other. The people of Ulster preferred to continue the union with Great Britain, and were satisfied with the legislation of the British Parliament. They protested vigorously against applying the Home Rule Bill to Ulster.

Then came the world war. The people of Ulster threw themselves loyally into the struggle. But many of those who had come to favor Irish independence endeavored to obtain aid from the Germans, received from them money and arms, and tried to achieve an insurrection, which proved futile. Sir Roger Casement was tried, convicted of treason, and condemned to death.

The lesson from these indisputable facts, which are taken entirely from Irish sources and mostly from that impartial historian Justin McCarthy, is plainly this. The situation of Ireland with reference to Great Britain is such that it is just as impossible for the British to permit the independence of Ireland as it was for the Northern States to permit the Union to be dissolved and the Mississippi to become the property of a hostile confederacy. The English have followed our example. So long as the so-called Irish Parliament at Dublin confines itself to talking, they have been left alone, as the Confederate Congress was when it met at Montgomery. But it is perfectly certain that if this Parliament should undertake warlike measures and fire upon the forts or troops of the United Kingdom the insurrection would be suppressed, as every previous one has been.

Again, it is just as impossible for the British to relinquish Ulster and put that province under the dominion of a Dublin Parliament as it would have been for the United States to return West Virginia to Virginia after the fall of the Confederacy. The loyalty of Ulster during the great war has established a claim upon Great Britain which she will never ignore. On the other hand, what the rest of Ireland ought to have, and what the British are willing to concede, is a local Parliament which shall have the same power as the Legislature of New York has with reference to the Federal Congress. Very possibly if this local Parliament should govern well, Ulster might be glad to come into union with it.

In American history we find that the State of Rhode Island was unwilling at first to ratify the Constitution and did not join the Union until more than a year after President Washington was inaugurated. It would have been a crime if the other colonies had sought to compel Rhode Island to join the Union. It seems to me it would be equally a crime for Irish leaders to compel Ulster by force to come under their rule.

We hear much about self-determination. But self-determination was never applied to the case of a portion of a country which had been united to the rest for more than a century, and had participated in all the legislation of that period; especially when it had in the main obtained all that it claimed. Even if the case for self-determination were as broad as some of our Irish friends argue, it is applicable to Ulster as well as to the rest of the Emerald Isle.

We have given our Irish citizens every opportunity that we claimed for Americans. They have risen to places of distinction in both Church and State. We honor their many sterling qualities, but we cannot, and ought not, to sympathize with the attempted secession from the United Kingdom, and still less with the attempt to coerce Ulster into joining the Irish republic.

Let us, in conclusion, call the attention of our Irish friends to the words of one of their greatest statesmen, Edmund Burke, written in the last year of his life:

My poor opinion is, that the closest connection between Great Britain and Ireland is essential to the well-being, I had almost said, to the very being, of the two kingdoms. For that purpose I humbly conceive that the whole of the superior, and what I should call imperial politics, ought to have its residence here [in England]; and that Ireland, locally, civilly, and commercially independent, ought politically to look up to Great Britain in all matters of peace or of war—in all those points to be guided by her—and, in a word, with her to live and to die. At bottom, Ireland has no other choice—I mean, no other rational choice. . . . Little do many people in Ireland consider how much of its prosperity has been owing to, and still depends upon, its intimate connection with this kingdom.

SOME HOMELY ECONOMICS

BY THEODORE H. PRICE

WITH permission of The Outlook's editors and to the relief probably of its readers, I am going to allow myself a couple of months' holiday this summer. It will be the first vacation I have had since the commencement of the war in July, 1914, and is taken because I feel that I am going a little "stale."

This is therefore the last article that I shall write until next autumn, and I am going to take the liberty of making it a little personal and saying something that is very much on my mind. During the five years that it has been my privilege to write for The Outlook I have come to feel very near to its family of readers. With many of them I have become acquainted personally or by correspondence, and I have learned and profited much by my intercourse with them. I realize that, as a group of intelligent men and women, they exercise a wide influence upon public opinion in this country, and I want to ask their assistance in checking and restraining an American tendency that has latterly given me great concern. It is the tendency toward unbridled extravagance among those who cannot afford it that has become so manifest within the last three or four months. The very rich are cutting down their expenses because the income tax has compelled them to retrench, but I am really alarmed by the recklessness with which those who cannot be earning or making more than from $3,000 to $10,000 a year are spending money, and the standards of living to which they are habituating themselves and their families.

The wealth and resources of the United States have been so much exploited and glorified, and the higher wages generally paid have induced such a general feeling of elation, that people seem to have come to the conclusion that our prosperity will never end, and have forgotten that if we fail in the duty of saving when we are making more than we need we are certain to be in want when the hard times come, as come they will. This state of mind is always the result of inflation, but it is, I think, unusually general just now. In an article I published in my own paper, "Commerce and Finance," last week I called it "the Anæsthesia of Inflation," because it renders us insensible of the economic distress that war involves, and creates an illusion of wealth by depreciating the value of money and increasing the apparent value of the property we have left.

Those of us who have been under the influence of ether realize, however, that great weakness and nausea generally follow the withdrawal of the anæsthetic, and the doctors know that if too much of it is administered death may be the result.

It is against the exhaustion that must follow the artificial stimulus of war prosperity that I am anxious to provide, and I am greatly impressed by the thought that the present expenditure for luxuries and unnecessary things is the poorest way to provide for it and the surest way to aggravate it.

It may be that I am generalizing mistakenly from what I see in New York and the other larger cities that I have recently visited, but the dealers in jewelry, expensive apparel, and food delicacies tell me that there was never such a demand for those articles, and that people "simply don't care what they pay."

While the war lasted patriotic considerations restrained people and economy was more or less fashionable, but now that there are no more Liberty Loans to subscribe to, the idea seems to be that a Nation that could furnish the Government with $25,000,000,000 for war in two years can easily afford to spend $12,500,000,000 a year for unnecessary things when the war is over. Sight is entirely lost of the fact that the debt we have incurred must be paid, that it amounts to about $1,000 per capita for every male money-earner in the country, and that until it is paid there can be no substantial reduction in the taxes now imposed. There is a widespread idea energetically fostered of late that National prosperity is increased by liberal spending. This is not the case. It is our investment in productive enterprises, not our expenditures for useless or needless things, that makes for prosperity.

The Scotch, probably the most thrifty and, in proportion to their numbers, the wealthiest people in the world, are the best proof of this statement that I can offer. In Scotland and wherever else a Scotchman is to be found he generally lives frugally, works hard, and saves his money. The result is that in both the Eastern and Western Hemispheres Scotchmen or their descendants wield an influence that is remarkable. It is said that eighty per cent of the bank officers in the British Empire are Scotchmen or of Scotch descent, and a glance through the "Bankers' Directory of the United States and Canada" leads one to think that nearly the same proportion of Scotchmen is to be found among the bankers on this side the Atlantic. The investment capacity of the Scotch is due to their avoidance of unnecessary expenditures. The things they don't require they don't buy, and it results that they have always a "mickle" sum at hand when an attractive opportunity for its constructive use is offered. Now we Americans are going to have many attractive opportunities for investment in Europe within the next few years.

If we are to maintain our prosperity, it will be necessary that we shall take advantage of them, and this we cannot do if we spend all the profits of this extraordinary era in things we don't require. And what do we really require? The list is a short one. It includes only—

- (1) Food that is healthful and nourishing.
- (2) Shelter that is hygienic.
- (3) Clothing that will protect us.
- (4) Fuel that will keep us warm.
- (5) Education that will make us efficient and philosophical, and therefore happy.
- (6) Medical attention that will preserve our vigor while we live.
- (7) Transportation.
- (8) Amusements that are rational but not demoralizing.
- (9) Tobacco—at least in my own case.

All of our expenditures, except those that we make for our personal adornment or the decoration of homes, our public buildings, and our cities, come under one of these heads.

Our trouble is not so much that our wants have multiplied as that our vanity leads us to try and satisfy them in unusual and expensive ways.

Take food, for instance. Is it not true that most of us really find more enjoyment in a simple and inexpensive meal than in things which are exotic, out of season, and costly? If we are dining alone or where we are not likely to "be seen," are we not contented with a few well-cooked and homely dishes?

But if we are with a friend, or even our family, do we not feel a sense of embarrassment if we are unable to order more than any of us needs and at least one or two things that are expensive and indigestible?

It requires moral courage to ask your guest to lunch with you at Childs'. I have tried it, and I know, and I recommend it as a salutary form of self-discipline to those whose conscience accuses them of extravagance. The food was good, but I found myself apologizing for what I feared would be regarded as my niggardliness.

And as to clothes. Is it not true that a very large portion of what we spend for them is due entirely to our vanity? Many of us deceive ourselves into believing that we dress for the effect that our costume will have upon other people. As a matter of fact, what we wear makes very little impression upon those we meet, provided we are not in tatters or uncleanly. If you doubt this, try to describe the costume of the last man or woman you were talking to and the effect that it had upon you.

Unless you are a woman and an epicurean in the matter of clothes, you will find that you are unable to do it. The truth is that most of the money that clothes cost us is spent entirely for our own satisfaction and is unnecessary.

And so it is with most of the other items on the list. I know a very successful merchant who says that when he finds a man who has lived in a modest house on "Cash Street" moving into an expensive mansion on "Mortgage Avenue" he immediately curtails his credit, because he knows that his pride is getting the better of his pocketbook; and I am convinced that in the vast majority of cases a pretentious home is nothing but vanity and vexation of spirit.

To suggest that we are extravagant in the education of our children may shock some Americans, but I am convinced that many of us are making this very mistake by sending our boys and girls to expensive establishments in the hope that they will make acquaintances among the rich and fashionable instead of having them taught at public or private schools where they would learn just as much and be much better fitted for the democracy in which they are to live.

Of our extravagance in the matter of amusements it is hardly necessary to say anything, because it is self-evident with theater seats at $2 and $2.50 each and nearly every playhouse in our larger cities crowded.

And so it is through the whole category of our expenditures. We go to fashionable and expensive hotels to be seen there, when we could be just as comfortable at places that cost less.

We ride in Pullman cars because we are just a little ashamed of traveling in an ordinary coach that is often more comfortable.

We men pay five or six dollars for a hat because it has a fashionable maker's name in it when we could buy the same article elsewhere for half the money. We ride in cabs rather than street cars to the station because we don't like to "be seen carrying a bag," and in a hundred other ways we are spending money all the time simply to gratify our foolish vanity.

It is said that "a frank confession is good for the soul," and it is because I realize that I am the victim of the very weakness that I am preaching against that I ask the readers of The Outlook to join me in trying to make sensible economy a National habit in America so that we may be provided with the financial reserves that we are certain to require in the not distant future.

THE CONNOR CHARGE

BY ELSIE SINGMASTER

GENERAL CONNOR entered the train at New York about three minutes before it started. A porter preceded him, found his chair, put his coat and umbrella into the rack, gave him his paper, and received his fee, doing all smilingly, as though there were involved other than mere business obligations.

All the passengers stared at Connor. Their gaze was not like the furtive inspection of a beautiful woman who may be made uncomfortable by stares, or the still more covert glance at a disfigured face or a misshapen body; all looked frankly, openly, measuring his great height, admiring his erect shoulders, his dark eyes, his flowing white beard. He wore a dark-blue suit and the button of the Legion of Honor; he was, it was clear, a veteran of the Civil War, and probably a veteran of note.

When he had settled himself, the train started with dramatic promptness, and he opened his paper. The stares of fellow-travelers, like the stares of passers-by on the street, had long ago become commonplace; his magnificent age attracted no more attention than had the amazing beauty of his youth. He believed, on the whole, that his good looks had been a disadvantage to him rather than otherwise; the affection of women which it had so easily gained was of far less value, in his eyes, than the more hardly won friendship of men.

He did not read beyond the first page of his newspaper, but let it slip to the floor forgotten. He was at the present time not in the least interested in domestic news: either in a civic house-cleaning in New York which was badly needed but which was being conducted, he believed, in a fashion sure to result in harm rather than good; or in the more than usually revolting details of a murder; or in the grossly unpleasant description of a divorce case. He was still less interested in the prominent headlines describing a small gain of the Allied armies in France. He was an authority on tactics, and had been all his life a student of war and all that related to it, and he was aware that at present no reliable information was to be had through newspapers. That which the censors permitted to appear connoted to him only disaster. He shivered as he looked out at the passing fields. He knew the dreadful sound of the guns of an advancing and triumphant army; he had heard it at Chancellorsville, on the first day at Gettysburg, and uncounted times in his dreams.

He believed that now, after two years of struggle, but one event could win victory for the Allied armies—the support of the United States—and in terror by day and in dreams by night he anticipated too long a delay. He had striven by all possible means to influence public opinion, and though he was not an orator, he had spoken wherever he was invited to speak. He had all his life avoided notoriety; even the just acknowledgments of his services to his country had embarrassed him, and he had never claimed or believed that his opinions were more valuable than those of other men; but in this cause he allowed his name and fame to be made use of.

He wished now that he might rise and stride up and down the aisle of the car, but he sat still, his arms folded, staring out at the green meadows of New Jersey. It was the impotence of age which was so impossible to bear. If he could only fight, if he could only take some active part—no matter how small! He held his life to be of little enough consequence, but, alas! it was of no value whatever.

When a traveler who sat with his wife near the end of the car could no longer restrain his curiosity about General Connor, he summoned the porter and questioned him.

"George, that old gentleman in the blue suit has a familiar air, but I can't place him."

"It's General Connor. He often travels from here to Philadelphia. He's a great general."

"Of course!" said the traveler. "I knew I'd seen him before."

"He's going to Gettysburg now," offered the porter further. "I saw his ticket. I guess he probably won that battle."

The eyes of the man and his wife met. General Connor on his way to Gettysburg! The thought thrilled them both.

"That's where he made the charge about which there's always been so much discussion," the man explained. "No point has ever been quarreled about so fiercely. Magazine articles, letters to newspapers, open debates, whole books, have been written about it." He took a pencil from his pocket and began to draw on the back of a time-table. "Here is the Union line. He was here at this spot, and he moved his troops across to that. They were cut to pieces, absolutely slashed up. His critics have accused him of a wanton sacrifice of life; his defenders don't question the sacrifice, but they contend that if he hadn't thrown his men in there quickly the line would have been completely cut through."

"What does he say about it?"

The traveler returned his pencil to his pocket.

"Nothing. The criticism was chiefly lay. Military authorities have never given a final judgment. The civilians for the district from which his troops came—Michigan, I think it was, or some other Western State—denounced him bitterly."

"Mothers, I suppose, and young wives, who believed their men had been slaughtered unnecessarily?" The eyes of the woman darkened. She had two boys at home—the one twenty, the other twenty-one—and it was a time when mothers thought often of their boys. There was no longer in her heart any admiration for General Connor.

Near Trenton the express train was held on a siding while another express train passed on the track which it had left. General Connor was conscious of an interruption to his vision of green fields, and he was aware that at each window of the passing train there appeared to be a blue object. He remembered the troop trains of war times with soldiers at the windows. But this was a lighter blue—more like the gray of the enemy—and it was, he believed, too evenly placed to be on the bodies of men. Besides, there were no blue-clad soldiers traveling about in 1916. It must have been a reflection of the clear sky in the window-panes.

When his train started once more, he returned to his meditations. He had learned so many lessons which the younger generation did not know; for example, that the shedding of blood in a righteous cause was the glory of a country, and safety in certain crises her shame. It was not the youngest generation which was slow to see this truth, but the important, influential men of middle life who had forgotten youth in the pressure of affairs and had not yet gained the broader vision of age.

At Philadelphia he changed trains, and there again he saw the color which recalled the past. This time it was not a reflection repeated in many train windows, but a flash of blue on the platform. Two West Point cadets with shoulders set back and fists clinched in the attitude of the runner who must make rapid progress hurried to catch a train. They ran swiftly and lightly like hares, and there was in their haste a little of the terror of the hare.

General Connor smiled as he leaned out of the window to watch them.

"On furlough," said he. "And late."

At Harrisburg he saw again what he believed to be the same pair. It was evidently not the end of their furlough, but the beginning, since they were going in an opposite direction from West Point, and another train threatened to elude them. He frowned, questioning the wisdom of furloughs of any sort at this time.

But he thought of the cadets only for a moment. He did not often go to Gettysburg, and he was already regretting this suddenly planned journey. His last visit, which had taken place twenty-five years ago, had not been productive of happiness, and he was going now chiefly because it had become awkward to know so little about the avenues and markers and monuments of the field.

It was curious that, while he seldom thought of his achievement at Lookout Mountain and Cold Harbor, where he had risen to a position of first magnitude, he could remember and did remember constantly each detail of Gettysburg—the burning sky, the contour of the hills, the roar of sound—the shouts of rage and agony, the odor of blood. He recalled even lesser sounds, the ping of a certain bullet which had passed his head as he stood by a certain tree, the neighing of a cruelly torn horse, the frightened cheeping of a little bird. But most distinctly he remembered the faces of his orderly and of many young officers whom he had loved and whom he had sent to death. He could have visited Cold Harbor without a shudder, though the scenes were equally terrible, but at Gettysburg each smallest recollection affected him painfully.

He had had on his last visit an almost intolerable encounter. There had returned unfortunately on that same day a soldier who had served under him on the field. This soldier, who had lost an arm and a leg, had denounced him privately many times, but the old habit of respect kept him silent before Connor himself. His wife, however, had no restraining recollections. Informed by a guide of Connor's identity, she came and stood before him. Her angry eyes traveled with unmistakable meaning down the magnificent body which had issued unscathed from four years of battle. She had no comprehension of spiritual wounds, and she hated him, it was clear, for his soundness. She pointed to her crippled husband.

"That is what you did," she said, and walked away crying.

Another reason for staying away was that he was called upon at Gettysburg by friendly persons to explain his tactics. The guides believed in him and praised him in their addresses as the most glorious figure in the battle. They asked him a hundred questions, and he knew that they would quote or misquote him for years to come. He did not like to answer questions; this was a military and not a lay matter. It was the misfortune of the military executive that the material with which he had to work was human material, and that success as well as failure involved the destruction of human life.

As a matter of fact, he had been compelled to take but little part in the discussion of his strategy. For twenty years after the war he had served as consul, first in Quebec, then in London, and had thus been absent during the heat of the quarrel.

It was not to him alone that Gettysburg was the most vivid battle of the war, but to all the Nation. The field was most elaborately marked, most visited. In the minds of the present generation, he and many others were known alone by what they had done there. By it popularly not only he, but Underhill and Thompson, Hannan and Fife, would unfairly stand or fall.

He saw, to his surprise, as he entered the hall of his hotel at Gettysburg, the same blue-clad youngsters whom he had seen at Philadelphia and at Harrisburg. It was to this district, then, that they belonged, or they were coming here to pay a visit. He nodded to them, and they nodded back, staring frankly. He did not anticipate that their paths were converging, that they would create for him and he for them an unforgettable situation. He passed and went to his room.

The two lads asked the clerk who he was and the clerk, a newcomer, pointed to the register.

"'A. T. Connor'!" cried one, indicating the name to the other. They had studied about him, as they had studied about Napoleon and Blücher and Wellington. He was a great warrior, and they had seen but few in the flesh. They ran rapidly upstairs, as though to impart this thrilling piece of information.

In the morning General Connor rose early and looked out upon the little square. There was from here nothing to be seen which savored of battle; even the house where Lincoln slept had no mark upon it. The space before the hotel was crowded with long wagons awaiting the day's tourists. There must have been a later train; the passengers in his train could have been accommodated in one wagon.

At the door of the dining-room the old man halted, astounded. The room was filled with boys in blue uniforms: the pair of which he had caught glimpses were multiplied a hundred times. He understood now the train with its uniform spots of blue—they were not, after all, the reflection of the sky! He smiled as the boys rose suddenly and stood at attention, and he guessed who they were and why they had come, before one of the officers in charge stepped forward.

"This is the Senior Class of the West Point Military Academy, sir. We bring each class to learn from you. How fortunate that we can see this year, not only the scene of your achievement, but you as well!"

General Connor found himself in another moment at the officers' table. He demurred at the honor shown him, but he could not help enjoying the quick turn of young heads, the tribute of so many pairs of young eyes.

He accepted the invitation of the commanding officer to join the party, and sat with him and the junior officers in the first carriage. He heard the story well told, and he stepped out with the boys to read inscriptions, to examine old breast-works, to explain to them the old muzzle-loading cannon.

Once or twice he addressed them all, passionately elaborating the guide's story.

"When the armies advanced, they tried to protect the town, they even changed their line of fire so as to avoid destroying it. They warned the citizens, they protected little children, they compelled, sometimes by force, venturesome boys to get into places of safety."

And again:

"One woman was killed by accident, and mourned by both sides. One woman, and she the only civilian!"

The officers looked at one another, understanding him perfectly; the cadets understood a little more slowly, but the brighter minds helped the others to interpret. The officers smiled; neutrality was as yet enjoined, but this was simply a statement of truth, the question of neutrality was not involved.

But, though he stepped so lightly and spoke so clearly, and though the morning air was so clear and fresh and the scene so beautiful, General Connor was gravely disturbed. He sensed dimly now the strange convergence of his path and the path of these young soldiers.

The guide who had seen him long ago was on his side, and did not even suggest that there was a dissenting opinion when he described the Connor charge. The cadets knew that there were two sides, but they smiled at envious historians who could for a moment have decried him. They believed in him and respected his judgment as they would have believed in the goodness of their mothers. The support of two hundred ardent young souls—what better earnest for future glory could human fame desire?

At last, on little Round Top, General Connor was persuaded to address them as a body. He stood on a flat rock, the officers beside him, the lads grouped below him. He looked down upon the Valley of Death and Devil's Den and across to the opposite slope. The great field was spread out before him as on a map; he could see it in its entirety, not merely in its physical outlines, but in its historical significance. But the lads could see only him, in his dark-blue suit, reminiscent of the past, his great beard blown about by the morning breeze. He was like a divinity to them. They wished to emulate him, but they despaired while they aspired.

He began to speak at once, outlining for them briefly the course of the battle from the tactician's standpoint. In short, sharp sentences he brought them to the engagement of his own troops.

Then suddenly he paused. The converging paths had met. The question of his wisdom in ordering his famous charge had been until this moment an academic one, it was of the past, it had become a point of history, it seemed no longer vital.

But now all was changed. It was vital, it was of momentous consequence. He must describe it, explain it, justify it. He heard again a dull roar, and knew that it was not the guns of Gettysburg, but the guns before Verdun. His country could not fail, and upon a lad before him might suddenly be thrown in dear knows what threatening catastrophe—as had been thrown upon him in youth—a responsibility of consummate importance.

It was perhaps cruel that his fame should hang to so great a degree upon the impression made upon these boys. But fate takes strange courses. He had longed so intensely and so despairingly to "do something" for his country. He knew suddenly that there was one hard, hard way in which he could serve her. He had not during all these years deceived others, still less had he deceived himself. There had been room for doubt until he saw the field at this moment anew through keen and anxious eyes.

He looked down into the young faces. "I want you to listen very carefully," he said, slowly. "The charge which is called by my name has been both commended and condemned." He straightened his massive shoulders. "Those who commend it are wrong, those who condemn it are right. It was a mistake. Listen to me very carefully and I will tell you why."

THE CARDINAL'S GATEKEEPER

BY ELBERT FRANCIS BALDWIN

I MONSIEUR, I, Hubert Billaudel, porter of the palace in this Rue Cardinal de Lorraine, of his Eminence Monseigneur Luçon, am at your service.

You see a ruined palace but for this room in which I and my wife live. For years, except a few months a year ago, we have been doorkeepers in the house of the Lord.

For four years and more we lived under a rain of shells. Our worst times were in the autumn of 1914 and then a year ago.

On September 4, 1914, the Germans entered Rheims. Some days later they were defeated at the Marne. They thirsted for revenge. They knew that nowhere in France could they wreak vengeance where it would hit harder than here. They decided to destroy our Cathedral and city.

In retiring from the city to bombard it they informed us by notices pasted on our walls that if we were not perfectly calm, that if we tried to fight them, that if we raised barricades in our streets—in a word, if we did anything at all that might harm them—they would hang the one hundred hostages whom they had already taken from our citizens. There you have Prussian militarism.

In two days they let more than fifteen hundred bombs drop on Rheims, not counting the incendiary bombs charged with picric acid, mostly directed, so we thought, against our Cathedral. It was on a Saturday morning, I remember, when we noticed that their batteries at Nogent l'Abbesse, about eight kilometers [five miles] away to the east, were apparently making the Cathedral their objective point. When a bomb struck the church, voilà, there was a noise as of thunder from falling stone. But the Cathedral resisted far better than we supposed possible—indeed, it is unbelievable that it should be still standing. It shows that the architects of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when they built churches, built better and solidier than do the people of our times. Is it not so?

On September 19 the picric bombs set fire to some wooden staging which had been put up to repair one of the eastern walls of the Cathedral, and this fire eventually spread to the roof and interior. The long flames licked the towers themselves.

This act was not one of those acts of sudden violence done in the rage of combat. It was the voluntary, cold-blooded act of a Prussian who could say, as he did say, against the better and outspoken testimony of another part of Germany: "We are in no need of justification or excuse. All that our soldiers do to injure the enemy is well done and is justified in advance. If all the monuments, if all the masterpieces of architecture, situated between our cannon and that of the enemy went to the devil it would be all the same to us."

The Germans claimed that there had been a post of observation on one of the Cathedral towers and that this explained the efficacy of the French artillery fire on the Boche infantry. Our Marshal Joffre at once denied this allegation, Monsieur. He declared, what we here know was the truth, that the French military command had never, at any moment, placed a post of observation in or on the Cathedral. But the Germans were glad to have any excuse, even one they made themselves. They were smarting with the defeat General Joffre had inflicted upon them at the Marne.

In comparison with the rest of the church, those towers seem much higher than they did when you saw them before the war, Monsieur, do they not? The high roof is now gone, you see, from the nave, transepts, and choir; only some of the small chapels have their vaultings. Worse still, the splendid twelfth and thirteenth century glass is gone from the windows. And the stone figures of the saints in the doorways and on the façade will always bear the brutal gashes of the Boche.

And this was our Cathedral? Do you know what that means to us Rémois, Monsieur? Why, all our people, even the Protestants here, love to pray there where Joan of Arc once prayed, where our early Christians prayed. You might say that this was the religious cradle of France.

And look at the Cathedral, Monsieur. Is it not the most beautiful you ever saw anywhere in this world? Is it not a masterpiece of our national art? Ah, the Boche knew if he could destroy it he would strike at the soul of France.

Every one was sad here when the Cathedral was attacked; every one was crushed in spirit. Why, the Protestant pastor wrote to our Cardinal that the Cathedral belonged to Christianity as a whole. His Eminence replied in agreement and also with an expression of his sympathy because the Protestant temple, too, had been destroyed. And the Jewish rabbi wrote to Monseigneur that the attempt to ruin the Cathedral was an odious blasphemy against God, the Father of us all. To the rabbi Cardinal Luçon replied in a grateful and cordial letter.

As to the bombardment a year ago and more, which really began the great German drive, we were warned beforehand, and we all felt that this time Rheims would be completely annihilated. With this prospect in view, his Eminence said to my wife and me: "As you have two sons in the war, who are always exposed to enemy guns, why should you stay here any longer to meet the certain death now upon us? Go, I command you. I will follow you." Eh bien, we went early in March, but he did not leave until the 17th. He and the Mayor were the last to leave Rheims.

Then the city had no citizens. We thought that the Boche would raze the whole place and not leave one stone on another, and he tried to do so. Yet here we are back again, and, what is more, our two boys fought through the whole war and came out without a scratch.

Deign to enter through the gate, Monsieur. Here is the court. You behold the palace before you. It is, you see, completely gutted. There is no more a first story, a second story. Only the façade is left. To the right there was the Cardinal's chapel, where he said Mass every morning. Here was his study. Back of all is the garden. To the left was a monumental staircase leading to the second story. One morning up there his Eminence was dressing. A shell struck close to him. He moved to one side, and in that instant another shell hit the place where he had been.

You say you are an American, Monsieur. My wife and I are proud to make your acquaintance. You Americans have saved France. Yes, yes, without you we might have had a German-made peace—who knows? And not only that, you saved, in particular, us Rémois from hunger and want. When my wife and I were flying from Rheims, it was the Americans who gave us food; and not only food, but sometimes clothes too. And when I was hurt it was the American Dr. Hupkeens who cured me, and who did it for nothing too.

The porter excused himself for a moment or two, and his wife had a chance to have her say. When he returned, he slipped a little piece of broken but richly colored glass into my hand, with the remark: "Pray accept this, Monsieur. It is of the twelfth century and came from our rose window. See the mark of the fire in the corner. It shows what the old France has had to suffer."

It was indeed the symbol of the spirit of faith and beauty which brought into being those noblest monuments of the Gothic age—the cathedrals of France.

And because of this, when we see the evidences of their barbarous destruction, shall we not cry for justice? Why, these very stones cry!

And yet Rheims Cathedral in its pristine beauty was never as impressive as it is now in the majesty of its mutilation. Always a monument of the first rank in history, art, and religion, it seems now more impressive than ever in its woe. "You should see the ruin by moonlight," the gatekeeper had said. Would that I might! But in this Pompeii of France, where almost every block is but a shapeless heap (nothing could be more melancholy than the completeness of the devastation of a city which had 125,000 inhabitants before the war), there is no inn remaining, and the last train leaves before the moon rises.

From the Cardinal's palace I walked away towards the choir of the Cathedral and came to the first shade of a tree I have found in Rheims. As I stop to write down what the porter has been telling me I

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

(C) Keystone Photo Service

THE SURRENDERED GERMAN FLEET TREACHEROUSLY SUNK IN SCAPA FLOW BY THE GERMAN CREWS DURING THE ARMISTICE

Paul Thompson

A FRENCH OFFICER HONORED BY AN AMERICAN UNIVERSITY

Lieutenant Jean Julien Lemordant, artist and soldier, whose picture appears above at the left, received an honorary degree from Yale University at its recent Commencement. He lost his sight during the war

(C) Underwood & Underwood
STATUE OF EZRA CORNELL, FOUNDER OF CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Cornell's semi-centennial was signalized by the unveiling of this statue of its founder in the presence of a vast throng. Ezra Cornell began life as a mechanic; his wealth was acquired in developing the telegraph

(C) Underwood & Underwood

A SCENE IN THE WOMEN'S NATIONAL LAWN TENNIS CHAMPIONSHIP MATCH AT PHILADELPHIA

The picture shows two famous players, Mrs. George W. Wightman (left) and Miss Marion Zinderstein, as they competed in the finals for the championship, on the courts of the Philadelphia Cricket Club. Mrs. Wightman proved the victor. Miss Zinderstein had previously defeated Miss Bjurstedt.

International Film Service

MISS ZINDERSTEIN, WHO DEFEATED THE FAMOUS NORSE LAWN TENNIS PLAYER Miss Bjurstedt, the Norse player who had won unexampled success in this country, was defeated by Miss Zinderstein at St. Martin's, Pa.

(C) Western Newspaper Union

THE FINISH OF THE DERBY

The English public this year turned out in vast numbers to see the great horse race at Epsom, the famous "Derby." The winner was Lord Glanely's "Grand Parade," who won by half a length.

International Film Service

REVIVAL OF YACHT RACING ON LONG ISLAND SOUND

The first yacht race in four years over the Larchmont course occurred recently. The Sirene, the winner of one of the races, is pictured above.

(C) Paul Thompson

THE YALE VARSITY EIGHT WINNING FROM HARVARD IN THE ANNUAL BOAT RACE

This race, the fifty-second between these two great universities (the race was intermitted in 1917 on account of the war), was won by Yale; this places the two universities on an exact equality as to the number of races each has won. Each institution now has twenty-six victories to its credit.

Digitized by Google

Press Illustrating Service

BRAND WHITLOCK, NOMINATED AS AMBASSADOR TO ITALY
Mr. Whitlock's splendid service to the cause of humanity versus the Hun while Minister to Belgium during the war makes his promotion to this important post a matter of gratulation to all Americans

International Film Service

FRANCISCO S. NITTI, THE NEW ITALIAN PREMIER
Signor Nitti, who succeeds Orlando as head of the Italian Ministry, was in America in 1917 as a member of the Italian Mission. He has been Professor of Finance in Naples University, and has held many public positions

(C) Underwood & Underwood

GUSTAV BAUER, PRESENT HEAD OF THE GERMAN MINISTRY

Herr Bauer, it is announced, is a Socialist. He has held the post of Minister of Labor, and recently brought about a settlement of the general strike in Berlin

HERMANN MUELLER, THE NEW FOREIGN MINISTER OF GERMANY

Dr. Mueller has been one of the leaders of the Majority Socialists. He is said to be opposed to any plan for restoring the Kaiser to his throne. He was one of the signers of the Peace Treaty notice that a piece of shrapnel had embedded itself in the tree. By that much the tree saved the church.

In front and above me, over the choir and chapels, is a double row of flying buttresses. One might think that this airiest architecture would be presumably the first to be destroyed, yet the buttresses are mostly intact.

But the general destruction is far more vivid and impressive than photographs indicate. For instance, the Boche shot away two of the long, slender, apparently two-story-high, tentlike caps to the niches (themselves two stories high) on either side of the great rose window, while at the corner of the towers he shot away one of the delicate clusters of the almost miraculously slender, exceedingly beautiful, apparently six-story-high pilasters.

A stone high up inside a gash in the wall seems trembling and about to fall. That very stone may have been in its place when Joan of Arc brought Charles VII here to be crowned.

Rheims, May 9, 1919.

NEEDED—A LEAGUE OF CHURCHES

BY HIS EMINENCE DOROTHEOS, PATRIARCH OF THE GREEK CHURCH

AN AUTHORIZED INTERVIEW WITH GREGORY MASON, OF THE OUTLOOK STAFF

THERE is just as much need of applying the principles underlying the Fourteen Points of President Wilson to the affairs of the churches of the world as there is of applying them to the affairs of the states of the world. In particular, the principle of the self-determination of peoples in church matters is vital. With regard to missionary effort this means that one Christian church ought not to be wasting its energies trying to take converts from another Christian Church. All Christian Churches ought to unite to lead the world out of darkness. We need a League of Churches as well as a League of Nations."

These words are the words of his Eminence Dorotheos, the Patriarch of the Greek Church, or the Locum-Tenens of the Ecumenical Throne, to give him his full ecclesiastical title. His Holiness came to Paris recently. It was the first time since the Council of Florence, in 1339, that a Patriarch of the Greek Church has left the Ecumenical Throne. On Easter Sunday all the Greeks in Paris, from the Premier down, went to the beautiful Greek Church in the French capital for the service which was led by the venerable Patriarch.

It was a memorable service. Imagine a service in a Roman Catholic Church in which the Pope should take the leading part. What the Pope is to the Church of Rome the Patriarch is to the Church of Greece, whose members number one hundred and thirty millions. One hundred million of them are in Russia alone, where the Greek Church was the official Church until the Revolution.

And yet the presence of his Eminence Dorotheos was not the only reason why the service Easter Sunday in the church on Rue Georges Bizet will never be forgotten by those who saw it. For one feature of this service was a thanksgiving for the liberty of redeemed Christendom from the Turkish yoke, and for the memorable event to take place, namely, the return to Christendom of St. Sophia, the noble temple seized by the hordes of Islam when they battered their way into Constantinople on May 29, 1453.

"Sophia," chanted a divinely handsome young priest with long silky black hair and beard, as a silver-bound copy of the Bible was carried to the pulpit by the deacon. And the chorus—a mixture of quaint Byzantine and modern music—started chanting, "Te ipermacho strategho ta nikiteria" (To the invincible, victorious general be sung the hymn of victory). It was perhaps the most solemn part of the service. Absolute quietness reigned, and but for the strong emotion pictured in the faces of the worshipers one would have thought that these were the phantoms of those who in 1453 were assembled in the Church of St. Sophia to hear the same hymn sung to the Mother of God. And ever since the Emperor Heraclius returned to Constantinople victorious from his campaign against the Arabians this hymn, composed on the occasion of his entry into the Eternal City of Hellenic Christendom, and dedicated to the Mother of God, has symbolized the song of victory, the prayer of thanksgiving to God.

The hearts of the few French, Britons, and Americans in the congregation were stirred no less than the hearts of the Greeks. Did they not remember that that venerable long-bearded Patriarch in his brocaded robes of cloth of gold and his jeweled miter was the head of the Church which for centuries has held the first-line trenches against the Moslem attack? The Greek Church has been a buffer between the more fortunate Christian churches behind her and the infidel.

"Christos Anesti" (Christ is risen). Yes, risen this Easter in the splendid temple built to him by Constantine and lost to him now for these more than four hundred and fifty years. As the Patriarch swung the golden incense-pot to left and right, standing before the Holy of Holies, or extended his small, carefully manicured hands in blessing his "children," who stood packed for two hours in the nave of the church, I remembered the prediction in that piece of nursery lore known to every Greek child and translated by Professor Blackie as follows:

"They have taken the city—they have taken it—they have taken Thessalonika;

They have taken also St. Sophia, the large minster,

Which had three hundred altar bells and sixty-two bells in the steeple,

And to every bell a priest, and to every priest a deacon.

And when the Most Holy went out, and the Lord of the World,

A voice was wafted from heaven, from the mouth of angels,

'Leave off your singing of psalms, set down the Most Holy,
And send word to the land of the Franks that they may come and take it,
And they may take the Golden Cross, and the Holy Gospel, that the infidels may not pollute it.'

When Our Lady heard this, her image wept.

'Be appeased, Sov'ran Lady, and do not weep,

For again, with the years and the seasons, the minster shall be yours.'

In Greek, the last two lines are sonorous as bells:

"Sopase Kira Despœna, kai sis aghie mi cleto,

Pale me chronia me kerous pale dicamas thane."

Of all changes wrought by the war, is any more imbedded in fundamental justice than the return to the Greeks of the church which Gibbon called "the metropolis of Eastern Christianity"? So I asked myself as I walked to the hotel near the Place de l'Etoile where the Patriarch was living in Paris.

On this occasion he was wearing a robe which suggested a Japanese kimono of expensive silk. The lining was black and the exterior was the sheeny steel blue of a barn-swallow's back. All the arrangements for this interview were made by Mr. K. P. Tsolainos, special attaché of the Greek Delegation to the Peace Conference. Mr. Tsolainos, who is a graduate of McGill University, Montreal, and a postgraduate student of Columbia University, also acted as interpreter, for the Locum-Tenens of the Ecumenical Throne speaks no English.

The Patriarch is a medium-sized man of about seventy, with beard, mustache, and hair in which gray mingles with dark brown. His brown eyes are keen and kind. It is a strong, honest face, full of dignity without conceit. His hands attracted my attention both times that I saw him. They are the slender, delicately modeled, rather nervous hands often found in scholars.

After his Eminence had offered me a cigarette I asked him what extraordinary circumstances had induced him to come to Paris.

"They are indeed unusual circumstances which have made it necessary for me to leave the Holy Seat," said his Eminence. "They are circumstances which form a grave danger to my people. You understand that I am the shepherd of all the Greeks. The unredeemed Greeks living under alien domination all look to me for succor, for there are ways in which I can reach them when the hands of even our great patriot and public leader, M. Venizelos, are tied. I have come to put before the leaders of the great nations assembled at the Peace Conference a plea for the protection of my people against imperialistic influences which are threatening to envelop them."

HIS EMINENCE DOROTHEOS, PATRIARCH OF THE GREEK CHURCH

"Are these influences purely secular, your Eminence, or are there ecclesiastical forces among them?" I asked.

"There are ecclesiastical forces much in evidence," Dorotheos replied, frowning. "It is unfortunately true that the imperialism of the Italian Government, which aims at swallowing territory in both the Aegean Sea and northern Epirus, which is preponderantly Greek, is abetted by the covetousness of the Roman Catholic Church. It is extremely regrettable that in these trying times, when all Christians ought to stand together, we find one Christian church slyly trying to undermine another. Why, the Roman Church has even put forward a preposterous claim to St. Sophia! Such conduct from the great Church of Rome is hard to understand. Have her leaders forgotten all the noble ideals of Christianity? Now, if ever, is the world sadly in need of the spirit of brotherly love."

I asked the Patriarch what he thought of the future of Turkey and of the future of her Church.

"Turkey is finished," he answered, quickly. "You need have no fear on that score. The rule of Islam enforced on unwilling peoples, with all its oppression, injustice, and barbarity, is broken forever. Oh, I could tell you some things if I had time—and if you had not heard enough of the kind already. Stories I could tell you, substantiated by unquestionable evidence, about beautiful Greek and Armenian girls who died of starvation in the very streets of Constantinople rather than accept bread from the hands of German and Turkish officers. They know the price of bread offered by German and Turkish officers, our Greek and Armenian girls do."

"But, God be thanked, the Government which permitted such atrocities to flourish is shattered. And I believe Mohammedanism is also finally on the wane. Mohammedanism is a religion of the sword. It lives and flourishes by force alone. It cannot stand by reason of any moral virtue in its principles, because it has none. Now that the sword is broken which cleaved a path for it, Mohammedanism must fall back. But if it does possess moral virtues, as the Mohammedans claim, now is the time to prove them."

The Patriarch stopped and stroked his beard nervously. When he began to speak again, his normally quiet voice quivered with restrained anger.

"Is the world going to forget," asked he, "what abominable crime Germany has done? Is it going to forget how a so-called Christian nation whose profane leader prated continually of 'Gott' made an unholy alliance with the forces of blackest night? Is it going to forget that to accomplish her own selfish ends Germany was willing to throw European Christianity into the maw of Islam? When has civilization ever developed such a Judas as Germany? Ah, in our deep gratitude at this Easter time to God who permitted us to win the good fight, let us not forget on the verge of what degradation we trembled for months from the push of a so-called Christian, civilized nation."

"But in regard to Mohammedanism again," continued the leader of the Greek Church, "remember that we Christians are not going to persecute it as it persecuted us. Full freedom of worship will be allowed to all Moslems in Christian lands. Neither do we forget the great service given to the cause of justice by the Mohammedans of India and Arabia. But if you ask me for my opinion of the future of Mohammedanism in Turkey, I must say that I am sure it is on the wane, because it is a religion which cannot stand on its merits alone."

As the Patriarch is the head of the Church which has been the Orthodox Church of Russia, and which has been in more or less conflict with the Bolsheviki, I asked him for his opinion of the future in Russia.

"I am not a politician," he answered, simply, "but my opinion is that the Bolsheviki Government of Russia cannot last unless it changes its present attitude. Between Christianity and the present Bolshevism there can be no compromise. They are as different as white and black, as good and evil. There are millions of Russians who can never forgive the Bolsheviki for their persecution of the Church. This persecution included the confiscation of millions of rubles' worth of church property. The Russians are naturally a deeply religious people, and I have no fear that Lenine, Trotsky, or any other man will ever lead them long away from their religion. Perhaps the Bolsheviki are beginning to have new light on this, for there are some signs that Lenine is inclining to be more conciliatory, although Trotsky remains as obdurate as ever."

"There are people, your Holiness, who have been predicting that the war would be the inspiration for the formation of a new religion. Do you see any evidence of this?"

"I am aware," answered Dorotheos, "that since the outbreak of the war certain self-styled prophets have been predicting the coming of some vague new religion. But the war lasted four years and a half, and has now been ended for five months. And still this long-heralded religion has not been heard of. I believe it will never appear. On the other hand, the war has tried the quality of Christianity. The world has seen that Christianity is immeasurably the finest religion conceivable to-day."

"However, all speculation about the effect of the war on religion interests me very much. The war has undoubtedly strengthened religion. There is a new intensity of feeling everywhere. Men have seen that moral values count, that God always fights for the right, and that the most important consideration for a military commander is to be sure that his cause is just. Germany lost the war because she aroused the moral indignation of the whole world. The agitation everywhere for a new world constructed on a closer recognition of the oneness of humanity shows that religious feeling is deep in the hearts of men. The world-wide demand for a new social and political order, for some kind of a league among nations, is an unmistakable evidence that the spirit of Christ is strong everywhere."

"This brings me to something on which I feel very strongly. I believe there is just as much need of applying the principles underlying the Fourteen Points of President Wilson to the affairs of the churches of the world as there is of applying them to the affairs of the states of the world. In particular, the principle of the self-determination of peoples in church matters is vital. With regard to missionary effort this means that one Christian Church ought not to be wasting its energies trying to take converts from another Christian Church.

All Christian churches ought to unite to lead the world out of darkness. We need a League of Churches as well as a League of Nations."

"Are you speaking mainly in terms of general principles, your Holiness," I asked, "or have you in mind as compact and definite an organization as is proposed for the League of Nations?"

"I have in mind just as compact and definite an organization as that proposed for the League of Nations," he answered, decisively, "and I believe it is entirely practicable. On all sides already you can see signs which indicate that churchmen everywhere recognize the vital need of co-operation among all Christian churches. I have been already in communication with the Archbishop of Canterbury, who has always championed the entente of all the Christian churches. In fact, our relations with the Anglican and Episcopalian Churches have always been cordial, and to-day they are the very best."

"What will be the attitude of missionaries from English and American Protestant churches in the Balkans and in Asia Minor?"

"Perhaps it is too soon to say, but I think it ought to be sympathetic. In the past the relations between our Church and the Protestant churches have been cordial. There have been some exceptions, there have been some individual Protestant missionaries of a bitter temper, but on the whole the relations have been cordial."

"I regret to say that it is with the great Roman Catholic Church that the rub comes. Thus far indications are that the Catholics are not so inclined to welcome the plan for a League of Churches as one would hope. In many respects there has always been more sympathy and understanding between the Greek Church and the Protestant churches than between the Orthodox Church and the Church of Rome."

I asked the Patriarch to expand his idea of how a League of Churches would affect missionary work in foreign fields.

"The idea is," he answered, "that each Christian Church would be allotted particular fields, just as particular nations are made mandatories for certain territory under the League of Nations. Asia Minor would naturally be the field for the Greek Church. Friendly churches would no more send missionaries to invade one another's fields than America, for instance, would send political agents into Ireland to wean the Irish away from the British Empire. It is necessary to face the fact that in some respects foreign missionary work runs the risk of clothing itself in some of the very features which make disliked the work of such foreign political propaganda as you came to disapprove of so heartily in America during the recent war. But it should be understood that the free exercise of religion is to form the basis of our understanding. Non-Christian peoples will not be simply relegated to this or the other Church, but will be allowed to choose for themselves the Church they wish to join. We will have simply brought them the message of the Bible."

"But, your Holiness, as I understand it, your League of Churches would embrace only Christian organizations. Now, if there is a League of Nations it will contain some non-Christian nations. What would be your attitude toward the invasion of a modern and civilized but non-Christian nation like Japan by Christian missionaries?"

The Patriarch reflected a moment, while he twined and untwined his slender fingers. Then he replied:

"I should say that any missionary effort is proper so long as it is not brutal or coercive, so long as the missionary confines himself to offering people a chance to have the light which he believes he carries. No one could object to Japan sending Buddhist missionaries to Europe in that spirit. Christianity fears no rival, because Christianity is confident of the moral foundation on which it rests. But Christian missionaries ought to bear in mind that very feature of their religion in carrying their message to heathen peoples. Christianity does not lend itself to being spread by force, but merely by the inherent strength of its own principles."

At this moment the Greek Minister to France was announced, and the Patriarch asked to be excused for ending the interview.

"Before you go, however," he said, "I want to express my thanks for this opportunity of sending a message to the American people through the great journal which you represent. I want Americans to know that there is no measure for the gratitude which we Greeks feel for what America has done for us in the past. We will never forget how America helped us in the darkest hours of the Turkish persecutions. And all the more because Americans and American churches have helped us so generously in the past we hope now to see their altruistic spirit respond to our appeal for co-operation and assistance in this great work of building a League of Churches, an organization solidly devoted to the practical application of the principles of Christ in alleviating the suffering of the world."

As I understood the Patriarch, his feeling is that more than ever the world needs brotherly love to-day, that more than ever the world is weary of senseless competition. This is shown by the tendency toward amalgamation and co-operation at the expense of old-fashioned competition in everything, in economics as in international affairs. He feels that it is the duty of religious leaders not only to welcome this tendency among mankind but to direct it. And he wants the world to know that the ancient and vigorous Church of which he is the head is ready to join other churches in building such a machinery for the avoidance of friction in religious affairs as the delegates to the Peace Conference are trying to construct for the avoidance of friction in political affairs.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of July 2, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Submission of Germany; German Honor.

Reference: Pages 357, 358.

Questions:

1. What is the attitude of the Germans and the German Government toward the peace conditions to which they have submitted? What is your explanation of their attitude? 2. The Outlook prints in full what the German Government said in telling the Allies the German Republic was ready to accept and sign the peace terms. Paraphrase the German communication in words such as you think the Germans should have used in accepting the peace terms. 3. Comment at length on The Outlook's statement: "Only the credulous expect this present generation of Germans to keep their word to their own hurt except under compulsion." 4. Give the known facts about the Scapa Flow affair. Was this a dishonorable thing for the Germans to do? 5. Discuss what the Germans mean by honor. Do the last five years of German history show that the German idea of honor is generally involved with the breaking of a promise and that honor is a matter of convenience for the Germans? 6. Discuss what, in your opinion, the Allies should do about the sinking of the German ships. 7. Tell, with reasons, what you think of the following comment: "The ships were of no great value. But to Germany, the German nation, and the German people the harm done is irreparable. Germany's pleas for equal respect and fair dealing will fall on deaf ears." 8. Explain how the Allies can prevent the Peace Treaty from becoming a scrap of paper. 9. Is this a fair statement: "But the new Germany is the old Germany. Might is still the German god. The Germans are still incapable of understanding what other men think"? Explain why or why not. 10. When and on what conditions would you trust the Germans? 11. German character and ideals are well set forth in "What Germany Thinks," by T. F. A. Smith (Doran), and in "Germanism From Within," by A. D. McLaren (Dutton).

B. Topic: Should We Pay Colombia Twenty-five Millions?

Reference: Editorial, page 363.

Questions:

1. Give the salient facts presented by those who believe that the United States should pay Colombia $25,000,000, and the facts presented by those who are against paying Colombia this or any other amount. 2. Had you been in Mr. Roosevelt's place at the time, do you think you would have acted differently than he did? Reasons. 3. Discuss the value of a nation's good will that can be secured for $25,000,000. Do you think Colombia's attitude toward America would be fundamentally changed if we paid her that amount? Reasons. 4. Read in Mr. Roosevelt's autobiography (published by Macmillan) what he himself says about the Panama Canal question, especially pages 516-546.

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: American Federation of Labor; Popular Fallacies.

Reference: Pages 359; 364, 365.

Questions:

1. Give reasons for believing or disbelieving that the American Federation of Labor is guided by intelligence, reason, and the spirit of loyalty to America, her institutions and ideals. 2. Discuss each one of the items in the Federation's educational programme. Which one of these do you consider the most significant of all and why? 3. Name and say a few things about the enemies of the true interests of labor. 4. Give reasons for believing or not believing that all laboring people should expect are their food, clothes, and shelter. 5. Do you think the Federation did right in endorsing a forty-four-hour week for all laborers? Reasons. 6. Explain what is meant by the doctrine that labor is a commodity to be bought in the cheapest market. 7. Do you think the objections to this theory are as many and as serious as does Dr. Abbott? Reasons. 8. Indispensable volumes for the student of labor and labor problems are those by Commons: "History of Labor in the United States" (Macmillan).

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. The Germans are without honor. 2. Elihu Root is unpatriotic in offering his suggestions for the League of Nations. 3. Every democracy is controlled by some kind of oligarchy. 4. National sovereignty can no longer be regarded as absolute.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for July 2, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Apology, salient, collusion (363); orthodox doctrine, political economy, economic, postulate (365).

Boston Garter

With Low Shoes

The appearance of your ankles is even more important than usual.
To insure faultlessly smooth hose—

Boston Garter

Velvet Grip

GEORGE FIRST CO., BOSTON, MAKERS OF
Velvet Grip Hose Supporters
For Women, Misses and Children

Can you use an extra $10.00 a week?

If you can—and who can't?—The Outlook is in a position to offer you the opportunity of earning this, and more, in your spare time and in an exceedingly pleasant way. The work consists simply in taking subscriptions in the homes of your community where The Outlook should be a regular weekly visitor. You can give as much or as little time as you like; and your profits are immediate and generous. The more time you give, the more you will make. Write to-day, asking for details about The Outlook's Money-Making Plan. Address:

Representatives' Division, Desk D

The Outlook

381 Fourth Avenue,
New York City

"The Most Beautiful Hymnal in the American Church"

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett, Editors

The Hymnal for the New Social Era

Adapted to all Evangelical Denominations

Prices $2 and $1.25 per hundred.

Returnable copy sent on request

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 702 E. 4th St., CHICAGO

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequaled for Boys' Schools and Camps

Send 35c today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"

THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

PISO'S

for Coughs & Colds

Hinds Cream
HONEY AND ALMOND
A Cream for Men

Applied after shaving, its healing qualities are reflected in the soothing, cooling sensation and soft comfortable skin that follows. Clear skinned men in all walks of life who shave daily, know from experience that Hinds Cream improves the complexion, prevents infection and fortifies the skin against wind and sun burn. The new non-leakable cap makes the bottle ideal for travelers and vacationists.

SAMPLES: Be sure to enclose stamps with your request. Hinds Honey and Almond Cream 2c. Both Cold and Disappearing Cream 4c. Talcum 2c. Trial Cake Soap 8c. Sample Face Powder 2c; trial size 15c. Attraction Week-End Box 50c.

A. S. HINDS 257 West Street Portland, Maine

BY THE WAY

An advertisement in the daily papers offers a vast war-production plant for sale—"from a typewriter to a train of cars"—"whole villages and cities for populations of 3,000 to 30,000." "We are selling carloads daily" of this material, the announcement states. An article in "Harper's" on French production during the war makes one wonder whether the captains of industry in France were not more far-sighted in arranging their factories for after-the-war work. It says that when acres of new shops were put up at Le Creusot and Honfleur to make cannon, the owners had already decided to become locomotive-builders after the war and constructed the new buildings accordingly. The vast Citroën plants for making 75-cm. shells were transformed in a few weeks to factories for making low-priced automobiles, which were put on the market on January 1, 1919. That seems like real industrial prevision.

Sir Sidney Lee, the Shakespearean critic, says in "The Landmark," speaking of changes in Stratford-on-Avon: "The cross-timbered house with the fine carved front in High Street where John Harvard's mother was born and spent her childhood is now, through the intervention of Miss Marie Corelli, the perpetual property of Harvard University, and is a club-house for its traveling alumni. Such a destiny for the property felicitously commemorates the fact that the oldest seat of learning in America was founded by the son of a contemporary fellow-townswoman of Shakespeare."

Fashions in etiquette are unaccountable and fortuitous. So the assistant editor of "Punch," Mr. A. A. Milne, finds. "It is the fashion," he says, "to be late for dinner, but punctual for lunch. What the perfect gentleman does when he accepts an invitation for breakfast I do not know. Possibly he has to be early. But for lunch the guests should arrive at the very stroke of the appointed hour." Mr. Milne describes his predicament when, by allowing himself time to be pushed off the first half-dozen omnibuses but actually succeeding in boarding the first one, he arrived at his destination forty minutes ahead of time. He killed the forty minutes, then entered his host's house as the clock was striking one-thirty. "Then

I remembered," he concludes, in the British humorist's best vein, "it was Tuesday's lunch which was to be at one-thirty. To-day's was at one o'clock."

"And what did you most enjoy in France?" the friend asked of the nouveau riche who had just returned from her first visit to Paris, as reported in "Tit-Bits." "Well," was the answer, "I think it was the French pheasants singing the 'Mayonnaise.'"

"What can you say of King Solomon?" a little girl was asked by her Sunday-school teacher, as reported in the "Argonaut." "King Solomon was a very wise king and very fond of animals." "Fond of animals?" queried the astonished teacher; "what do you mean?" "Why, in the Bible it says he had seven hundred wives and three hundred porcupines."

Sir Arthur Pearson, the well-known Englishman who not long ago became blind, tells how his misfortune made him really more self-reliant. "When I found my sight was doomed," he says, "I concluded that I had better dispense with the services of the personal attendant who had looked after me for many years, as otherwise he would probably become a stumbling-block in the path of blind proficiency. . . . I have frequently been congratulated upon the skill with which my valet ties my bow tie. But I have to take the compliment to myself. My valet neither ties my tie nor does anything else for me, the very simple reason being that I have no valet."

The railway board, a current story goes, had met to consider the case of old Tom Jones, who, in a train accident, had become deaf. "Well," said a director, "old Tom has been with us a long time now, and we want to find him a new job. What do you suggest?" "I know," said the chairman. "Let's put him in charge of the complaints department."

It is stated that during the war, says "Shipping," 254 spies were discovered and arrested at the Hog Island Shipyard. These men, most of whom have since received severe penalties, obtained jobs at the shipyard for the purpose of gathering information and were arrested by the Hog Island guard and secret service forces. Some of the spies were among the cleverest agents of Germany and one was a notorious Mexican.

A soldier who is interested in optics writes from abroad: "I have discovered something more about German efficiency. You know we Americans have been taught that bubbles and little flaws in anastigmatic objectives were unavoidable; in fact, we have regarded bubbles in a fine lens as a sort of hall-mark of genuineness. We have been most completely hornswoggled. I have seen over here 14-inch and 18-inch anastigmats, F: 4.5, clear and free from flaws and as transparent as distilled water. The Germans kept these lenses for home consumption, and sent the imperfect ones abroad—and their foreign customers, including ourselves, just ate 'em up. I am glad to say that I have secured one of the lenses they kept for themselves. It is a beauty. You gotta hand it to the Boches for their optical skill."

The London "Daily Mail" quotes this commentary on colloquial English "from a speech delivered at a Medical Conference." "He was ashamed of the term 'shell shock.' It was a bad word and should be wiped out of the vocabulary of every scientific man. It was really molecular abnormality of the nervous system, characterized by abnormal reactions to ordinary stimuli."

The vast coal-beds of China are this year to be drawn upon, for the first time it is said, in aiding American industry. "Shipping" announces that the cannery plants at Bristol Bay, Alaska, are to be supplied with coal brought from the Chinese port of Chingwangtao.

Among the various "drives" that have lately taken place, one of the most successful was the membership week drive of the Railroad Young Men's Christian Association. The goal was 40,000 new members, while the total secured exceeded 48,000. Individual men did splendid work in "boosting" the organization. One example may be quoted: at Secaucus, New Jersey, an Italian machinist, working in conjunction with two waitresses in the Association restaurant, secured more than one hundred new members.

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT

All legitimate questions from Outlook readers about investment securities will be answered either by personal letter or in these pages. The Outlook cannot, of course, undertake to guarantee against loss resulting from any specific investment. Therefore it will not advise the purchase of any specific security. But it will give to inquirers facts of record or information resulting from expert investigation, leaving the responsibility for final decision to the investor. And it will admit to its pages only those financial advertisements which after thorough expert scrutiny are believed to be worthy of confidence. All letters of inquiry regarding investment securities should be addressed to

THE OUTLOOK FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York

A Complete Service to Investors

ONE of the remarkable phases of modern finance is the growth of security investment. This development has brought greater opportunities to the investor. It has also created new problems for him, and a need for comprehensive service. Such a service is offered by this Company through its various departments.

For the Bond Buyer

OUR BOND DEPARTMENT furnishes information regarding investments, and offers, with its recommendation, bonds and notes selected with strict regard for the investor's individual requirements. At our offices in New York, and through our correspondents in various cities, you are assured of prompt, courteous, and personal service.

Our booklet, "An Organization for Investment Service," describes these facilities.

Custody of Securities

OUR SECURITIES DEPARTMENT accepts securities for safekeeping, collects the income and principal, and attends to income tax and other routine matters. The securities are always subject to the owner's control and may be sold or transferred upon instructions to us at any time.

Our booklet, "Safe Keeping of Securities," gives full details.

Trust Service

Security owners who desire to set aside certain investments to assure themselves a competence, or to make immediate provision for those dependent on them, may do so through a Trust Deed. Our TRUST DEPARTMENT undertakes such trusts, and acts in every fiduciary capacity.

Our booklet, "Some Trust Problems and Their Solution," gives further information.

Banking Service

We pay interest (credited monthly) on daily balances of checking accounts. Deposits subject to 30 days' notice of withdrawal, and certificates of deposit, which pay a higher rate of interest, may be used to advantage pending reinvestment of funds.

Our "Statement Booklet" describes briefly the Company's complete facilities.

It will be a pleasure to give full information regarding these and other features of our complete financial and trust service.

Guaranty Trust Company of New York

New York      London      Liverpool      Paris      Brussels

Capital & Surplus $50,000,000    Resources over $700,000,000

FINANCIAL COMMENT

INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAXES

"WILL the individual income taxes and the surtaxes be reduced in the near future?" This question has been foremost in the minds of the two million taxpayers for some time. And they have been looking to Congress for news of the much-desired relief. The law provides that these taxes be automatically reduced next year and each succeeding year. The return for the current year is expected to be about $1,430,000,000, which sum will be brought down about ten per cent for 1920 by the automatic reduction. This is all pretty generally understood, but the public wants to know if there will be any additional diminution.

Senator McCumber, of the Senate Finance Committee, and other experts have declared that there is slight possibility of such a reduction for some time to come and that the closest economy will be necessary to keep within the existing bounds. Their opinions are based on the facts that we are still encumbered by heavy war expenses and have yet to face the payment of our Liberty Bonds.

This latter factor is looming up as a large one. The Victory Notes fall due in 1923 and the bonds mature in periods between 1928 and 1947; in addition to which an old issue of bonds is due in 1925 and the War Savings Stamps in 1923 and 1924. The Government's future obligations thus summarized show clearly the necessity of extending taxation for a good many years. The House Ways and Means Committee has begun to consider proposals for means of liquidation.

DEFAULTS

When the Russian Government 6½ per cent bonds were sold in this country three years ago, little thought was given to Russia's ability to retire them at maturity, and they found a ready market. But these bonds have fallen due, and there exists no responsible Government to assume the obligation of their payment. Formal announcement to this effect was made about two weeks ago—at that time the bonds were selling for about 53, and have since appreciated four or five points. This appreciation is attributed to the pledge given by the anti-Bolsheviki faction that as soon as stable conditions are established Admiral Kolchak's Government will recognize Russia's external debts.

Another default which has recently come into prominence is that of the New York Railways Company. This company, which operates the greatest traction system in the world, is one of the eleven "tractions" in New York State to be forced into bankruptcy. The Court has announced that the interest due July 1 on their "First Real Estate and Refunding Mortgage 4 per cent Bonds" maturing in 1942 would not be paid. Let us hope that the Federal Electric Railways Commission will propose legislation which will enable this and other tractions to meet their obligations.

REFINANCING EUROPE

The Peace Treaty having been signed, the United States must turn its attention to providing means for the reclamation of Europe, which with its devastated areas, maimed industries, and shortage of food and materials must be restored to its former basis of production and prosperity as quickly as possible.

To make this possible the United States

The Scope of Our Service

WE OFFER an investment service national in scope, having offices in six prominent cities and an extensive wire system reaching other important points in the United States and Canada.

Our Statistical Department is constantly collecting, analyzing and verifying complete data on Municipal and Corporation securities in all parts of the country.

Our Bond and Note Departments, under the direction of executives of long and successful financial experience, and possessed of wide sources of information, offer you expert guidance in investment matters, and immediate consideration of your individual problems.

HORNBLOWER & WEEKS

BOSTON
PORTLAND
PROVIDENCE

Investment Securities

Founded in 1888

NEW YORK
CHICAGO
DETROIT

Members of the New York, Boston and Chicago Stock Exchanges

ARE YOU AN INVESTOR?

During the past year the Financial Editor of The Outlook has helped hundreds of Outlook readers to solve intelligently their particular investment problems. Perhaps you are contemplating a shifting of your present holdings or have fresh funds to invest. In either case we shall be glad to give you specific information on any securities in which you may be interested. This service is entirely free to Outlook readers.

THE OUTLOOK FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

Digitized by Google

What a Check Tells

The customers of the National Bank of Commerce in New York are among the leaders of industry.

Our credit is extended to concerns ably and successfully managed, whose financial history is clean.

A check drawn on the National Bank of Commerce in New York tells of leadership, sound policies, financial integrity and success.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE IN NEW YORK

Capital, Surplus & Undivided Profits Over Fifty Million Dollars

Financial Comment (Continued)

will have to make liberal extensions of credit. A committee of New York bankers, with J. P. Morgan as chairman, has taken this problem in hand and is now holding a series of conferences. One plan has already been suggested by Mr. Henry P. Davison, of the Morgan firm, who spent considerable time in Europe as head of the American Red Cross. It is proposed that a huge corporation be formed and capital be raised by issuing debenture bonds. These bonds are to be secured by credits established in Europe and sold to the American investing public. It is believed that this private enterprise would have the Government's support and be able to function more rapidly and efficiently than the Government itself.

JULY REDEMPTIONS

For a corporation to call its outstanding bonds for redemption is a sign that it is enjoying real prosperity. That our industries are now enjoying that state to an almost unprecedented degree is shown by the amount of their funded debt to be called this month. Among the companies which have been able to take this action are many which had slumped badly before the advent of war business. This is certainly gratifying when it is considered that our country is now entering a period of industrial expansion.

The bondholder seldom fails to realize a good profit on his bonds when they are redeemed. The redemption price is always at a premium, usually ranging between 100½ and 110, and oftentimes many points higher than the market price the bonds command.

THE STOCK MARKET

July 1 is the turning-point into the second half of the year, and, although we may not confidently expect to see call money at 3 or 3½ per cent, there seems already to be a letting up in the high tension which has held sway recently. The laws of supply and demand obtain in the case of money as well as with other commodities, and with an increasing trade we may look for a greater demand for funds. If one considers the demand which every country in the world will make upon capital, it would be illogical to expect anything but a continued fairly high interest rate for loanable funds.

The movement of the stock market is likewise based upon supply and demand probably more than upon any other factor, and in attempting to forecast the probable trend of stock prices we should not forget that even if the buying does not seem to come from the moneyed interest, there is to-day a new power which the American public has never been able to wield before—that is, there exists in their hands collateral for speculation in the amount of some twenty billion dollars' worth of high-grade marketable securities, and a public so equipped is indeed a power to be reckoned with.

MIDYEAR INVESTMENTS

As the second half of the year comes in, bringing with it the important July 1 period of interest and dividend disbursements, the bond market is in a very quiescent state. There has been very little appreciation in price of the old-established bonds, due of course to the continued firm money rates as well as to a great number of new offerings of securities which have taken

The Future of the Railroads

Director General Hines and Senator Cummins have expressed certain definite views concerning prompt and constructive railroad legislation by Congress. Copies of the speeches referred to will be furnished on request.

With the enactment of such legislation many railroad securities should have a substantial advance. Seasoned securities issued well within physical value of the property and amply protected by earning capacity can now be purchased at prices to yield up to 8½%, and such issues should logically be benefited.

We do not carry speculative accounts but solicit correspondence regarding railroad securities with present or prospective investors and are prepared to make suggestions for the purchase or exchange of securities.

Write for Circular No. 15

F. J. LISMAN & CO.

61 BROADWAY, NEW YORK
MEMBERS NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
Specialists in Railroad Securities since 1890

Invest with Intelligence

Many Outlook readers have invested their money in sound stocks and bonds and wish to follow the general course of various classes of securities.

Others are about to invest for the first time and desire a better knowledge of financial subjects.

To all of these we suggest a careful reading of the financial articles which are published in the second and fourth issues of The Outlook each month. Many helpful suggestions to old and new investors will be found in these articles, which are written especially for our readers by a New York financial man.

Financial Comment (Continued)

the form of preferred stocks with their higher, enticing yields.

This desire to obtain a high return may prove costly before long, and the investor should make certain that he is acting wisely in accepting a higher return with its accompanying risk, to the almost certain subsequent neglect of the more stable security—high-grade, fair yielding bonds.

ACCEPTANCES

The United States, a leader in practically every financial operation, is to-day far behind many foreign countries in financing its trade by means of acceptances as instruments of credit in holding fast to the old system of promissory notes and open accounts. If we are to expand in developing our foreign as well as our domestic trade, we must learn the meaning of the acceptance and encourage its use. Merchants are often reluctant to adopt any new idea, and lack of confidence in its potential benefits has made the acceptance an unknown quantity. But the acceptance, however, is by no means a new idea, as it has been used successfully in European and South American countries, and if once the American people should realize its usefulness and its many advantages by acquiring a knowledge of what it is all about opposition would shortly be dispelled. The banks and bankers understand its uses, and some of the exporters and importers realize how important the acceptance is in their particular line, but the merchant and the manufacturer, as well as the farmer, cling to the old method of open accounts and notes.

Any one who is sufficiently interested in acquiring a knowledge of bank and trade acceptances may obtain from the larger banks or bankers descriptive booklets and explanatory data which may prove of inestimable worth in dollars and cents to him, and after a superficial knowledge is acquired your banker will be happy to discuss the matter with you in its direct application to your own business affairs.

A CORRECTION

In your issue of June 4, 1919, page 189, you state that the evangelist Billy Sunday has not been ordained. On page 532 of the Minutes of the General Assembly, 1918, you will find Wm. A. Sunday, D.D., a member of the Chicago Presbytery. Billy and Wm. are the first name to the same person.

GEORGE B. SMITH.

Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Good Bonds

Backed by a Good Name

Very apparently this company has entrenched itself in the good opinion of investors.

There is observable a steadily growing and deepening conviction that the name of the Federal Bond & Mortgage Company does add a certain and definite value to its bond issues apart from the value of the bonds themselves.

And so, as a direct and natural result, more and more men and women are coming to regard the 6% First Mortgage Real Estate Serial Gold Bonds offered by this company as the most desirable issues to be had.

The simple truth of the matter is that the issues recommended by this company are thoroughly exceptional examples of this type of security.

Mail your request today for "Questions and Answers on Bond Investment"

Federal Bond & Mortgage Co.

90 L Griswold Street

Detroit

(215)

Buy A Bond The Way You Buy A Home

When you buy a home you do not locate in the business section unless your office is in the house. The rent would be too high.

Many investors make this same mistake by buying bonds better adapted to institutions. The consequent loss in income is not only needless but amounts to a tidy sum in a period of years.

Investors are invited to write for our Booklet Q-200, describing selected bonds and notes yielding 5½ to 8%

A. H. Bickmore & Co.
111 BROADWAY, N.Y.

The Best Security for Money

Farm land is the best security for money. Our 6% First Farm Mortgages and Real Estate Gold Bonds are secured by good farm land in one of the richest agricultural sections in the United States. Amounts to suit your requirements. 15 years' experience. Write for pamphlet "B" and current offerings.

E. J. LANDER & CO., Grand Forks, N. D.
Est. 1883. Capital and surplus $500,000.00

DANFORTH FARM MORTGAGES

represent the highest type of investments. They have stood the test of wars and business depression since 1868—60 years, and always worth 100%. Interest paid promptly at maturity.

FARM MORTGAGE BONDS in $500 and $1,000 denominations

For further information regarding our Farm Loans and Bonds write for Booklets and Investors' List No. 28.

A. G. Danforth & Co.

BANKERS Founded A.D. 1855
WASHINGTON ILLINOIS

BOOKS, MAGAZINES

THE Mecca of Negro history and literature. Distributors Scott's official history of the Negro in the World War. Send us your order. Young's Book Exchange, 135 W. 135th St. Price $2.50 and $4.75, post paid on all orders. Mention The Outlook.

HELP WANTED

Professional Situations
WANTED—Associate principal girls' school: executive ability, experience, traveled; photograph. Miss Robinson, 918 Title Insurance Building, Los Angeles, Cal.

Business Situations
WANTED—Competent woman as stenographer and private secretary to manager of large hotel. Year round position with good pay to competent person. Address, with references and experience, 7,112, Outlook.

EMBROIDERERS on infants' flannels: work sent out of town. Barringer, 29 East 11st St., New York.

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CM7 Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

HELP WANTED

Companions and Domestic Helpers

WANTED—Refined middle-aged woman as mother's helper and housekeeper in pleasant summer camp. 7,123, Outlook.

WANTED—An experienced housekeeper for private house. Must be unmarried and Protestant and have good references. Give full particulars. Dunlap, Box 34, P. O. Station O, New York.

Teachers and Governesses

GOVERNESSES, cafeteria managers, dictators, maîtres, housekeepers. Miss Richards, Box 6, East Side Station, Providence, R. I.

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

WANTED—Teacher-governess for girl twelve years old for coming school year. Address Box 116, Catsaqua, Pa.

KINDERGARTNER for the Blind Babies' Home, Summit, New Jersey, just outside New York City. $25 monthly. Good home, room alone, four assistants. Apply or write Mrs. John Alden, 2 West 15th St., New York City. Room 52. Telephone 1315 Chelsea.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Professional Situations

WANTED—Two maternity graduates (with general training) position in institution. 7,135, Outlook.

Business Situations

SECRETARYSHIP in boys' school wanted by widow with boy of seven where child will have privilege of education as part of compensation. Ten years' secretarial experience and highest references. 7,100, Outlook.

YOUNG woman, summering on North Shore of Long Island, would like position as social secretary or chaperon by day or week. Highest class references exchanged. 7,137, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

MISS CLARKE, returned from France, will resume her interrupted work of chaperoning young girls to Europe when travel facilities permit. Meanwhile she desires position as chaperon, secretary, or companion in good family. Experienced traveler. French, German, knowledge of Italian. Registered nurse. Excellent references. Care Rev. Jaa. G. K. McClure, Jr., Asheville, N. C.

GENTLEMAN of education, lately discharged from Army, wishes position with gentleman as companion. Would travel. Best references. Box 345, Williamsburg, Va.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Companions and Domestic Helpers
TRAINED dietitian with experience would like position in private school. 7,122, Outlook.

WANTED—Supervising home elderly gentlemen. South winters. References. 7,105, Outlook.

GENTLEWOMAN, with four years' experience, desires care of young children. 7,135, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED—Young, experienced teacher, desiring to spend winter in ideal climate, will teach primary grades in small public school, tourist town, for moderate salary. Address Mrs. David Packard, Pinebluff, N. C.

WANTED, by young college man, position as tutor for summer. French, German, mathematics, English. Best references. Virgilus Dabney, University, Virginia.

YOUNG man, college student, experienced tutor and athletically inclined, desires position for summer as tutor or companion. Would travel. 7,132, Outlook.

GOVERNESS OR NURSEY GOVERNESS. Mrs. Charles H. Davis recommends most highly an English governess who has been with her for three years and is leaving in September. Address Miss J. M. Perry or Mrs. Davis, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

Tours and Travel

JAPAN
CHINALimited Party Sailing
SEPTEMBER 21, 1919

EGYPT AND PALESTINE

Spring and Summer 1920

The Battlefields of France
in the Summer of 1920H. W. DUNNING & CO.
6 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.Hudson River
by Daylight

In planning your summer vacation be sure to include the delightful daylight sail between New York and Albany

Direct rail connections to the Catskills, Berkshires, Adirondacks, Saratoga, Lake George, Lake Champlain, Niagara Falls and all points North, East and West

All through rail tickets between New York and Albany accepted
FOUR FAMOUS STEAMERS
Service Daily, including Sunday

Hudson River
Day Line

Desbrosses Street Pier, N. Y.

"Take a Planned Vacation"

FREE Send or call at any of these offices for Free Art booklets, "Nine Ideal Vacations."

Tells where to go to Fish, Camp, Hunt, Travel, Rest, spend a few days away from home, see Historical Points, combine Business with Pleasure or keep within a fixed expense.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Boston, Mass.	294 Washington Street
Chicago, Ill.	64 W. Adams Street
Detroit, Mich.	527 Majestic Building
Duluth, Minn.	424 W. Superior Street
Minneapolis	211 Nicolet Avenue
New York, N. Y.	510 Woolworth Bldg.
Pittsburgh, Pa.	214 Park Building
St. Louis, Mo.	311 Pierce Building
St. Paul, Minn.	Cor. 4th & Jackson Sts.

Summer in the National Parks,
California, Canadian Rockies

Motoring, camping, tramping, horseback riding, fishing, etc. THE TEMPLE TOURS, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

Health Resorts

ALDERBROOK A Summer Camp for Adults—Physical culture. Physician's care. Leaflet on request. Alderbrook, Norwalk, Ct.

LINDEN The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Dorchester, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LEFFINGWORTH WALTER, M.D. (late of The Walter Sanitarium)

CREST VIEW

For nervous and convalescent patients.
R. H. CHASE, M.D., and E. C. McDANIEL, Booklet. Wynoota, Pa.

Dr. Reeves' Sanitarium

A Private Home for chronic, nervous, and mental patients. Also elderly people requiring care. Harriet E. Reeves, M.D., Melrose, Mass.

Hotels and Resorts

CANADA

"Highlands of Ontario"
Canada

Millions of acres of pine and balsam with thousands of lakes and streams. The mecca for outdoor men and women. "Algonquin Park"—"Muskoka Lakes"—"30,000 Islands of Georgian Bay"—"Timagami"—"Kawartha Lakes"—"Lake of Bays." Modern hotels. Good fishing and delightful climate. Altitude 1,000 to 2,000 feet above the sea. Write for illus. literature: C. G. Ortenberger, 907 Merchants Loan & Trust Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

W. R. Eastman, Room 510, 294 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

H. M. Morgan, 1019 Chamber of Commerce Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.

J. H. Burgis, 819 Dime Bank Bldg., Detroit, Mich.

A. R. Chown, 1270 Broadway, New York City, N. Y.

For adults, boys' or girls' camp sites apply to H. R. Charlton, General Passenger Department, Montreal

MYRTLE HOUSE
Digby, Nova Scotia
Queen of Canadian Resorts
Ideal Climate
Golf, fishing, boating, bathing.
Cuisine the best. Booklet.
HERRICK & SELLMAN

CONNECTICUT

THE WAYSIDE INN
New Milford, Litchfield Co., Conn.
In the foothills of the Berkshires. Open all the year. An ideal place for your summer's rest. 2 hours from New York. Write for booklet.
Mrs. J. E. Castle, Proprietor.

MAINE

YORK CAMPS LOON LAKE, MAINE
In famous Rangeley region in heart of mountains facing lake. Private log cabins with open fires and baths. Central dining room. Golf within easy reach: garage. Boating, bathing, fishing, mountain climbing. Farm one mile from camp furnishes fresh vegetables, eggs, poultry, certified milk. Booklet. J. LEWIS YORK, Prop.

The Grindstone Inn

BRISTOW TYLER, Manager

Winter Harbor
MAINE

Coollest Summer Resort in the United States.

Average Maximum Temperature During Summer 72°.

Contains 125 Rooms En suite and Singly with Baths

A NINE-HOLE GOLF COURSE.
FIVE TENNIS COURTS.
MOTOR BOATS, SAILBOATS, CANOES.

BOWLING ALLEYS, BILLIARDS, SHUFFLEBOARD.

LARGE SWIMMING POOL OF SALT WATER.

AMERICAN PLAN—$40 per week up
For reservations or information wire or write.

Send for booklet.

A few desirable cottages for rent
Cottage residents may get their meals at the Inn.

Permanent Address,

601 Morris Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

Hotels and Resorts

MAINE

THE HOMESTEAD

Halley Island, Maine
Open June 15 to Oct. 1. Air, scene and taball of the best. Illustrated booklet on application. THOMAS E. HAZELL.

MASSACHUSETTS

THE CHARLESGATE
HOTEL

BOSTON, MASS.

just outside the limits of the hot city and yet only a few minutes to the shopping district, theaters, etc., by the subway trains. Located in the residential section of the beautiful Back Bay, overlooking the Park and Charles River. Cool and comfortable accommodations by day or week at attractive rates.

HERBERT G. SUMMERS, Mgr.

Also operating the

Cliff Hotel

and COTTAGES

North Scituate Beach, Mass.

25 Miles from Boston. "On the Ocean Front."

If You Are Tired or Not Feeling Well
you cannot find a more comfortable place in New England than

THE WELDON HOTEL

GREENFIELD, MASS.

It affords all the comforts of home without extravagance.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little house by the sea
PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Dexter Richards
Hall

A comfortable Inn on a hilltop. 1,000 feet elevation. July and August. Weekly rates $14 to $21. Booklet.

MERIDEN, N. H.

"The Bird Village"

NEW YORK CITY

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square
adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

Vacation Headquarters, 35 W. 38th St.
Rooms for women. References required. Weekly $8 to $9.50. Transients $1.50 per day.

NEW YORK

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake, Includes 500 acres of wild-est Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, saddle horses. Tramps to surrounding mountain peaks, Lake George and Lake Champlain. Dancing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $16 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

TWILIGHT INN

Twilight Park, Haines Falls, N. Y.
An exclusive resort for those who discriminate. Rates $5.00 per day and upwards. Several well equipped cottages in Twilight Park for rental. Write for particulars.

MEREDITH INN
IN THE CATSKILLS
MEREDITH, Delaware Co., N. Y.

To visit Meredith Inn is a revelation in summer vacation comfort. Homelike in its hospitality, modern in appointments. Meredith Inn provides a table that is famous for the purity of its foods, private suites, shower-baths, electric lights. Motor heavy, cooling apparatus. Garden. Rates moderate. Write for booklet.

Hotels and Resorts

NEW YORK

Hotel Champlain
Bluff Point-on-Lake Champlain, N.Y.

HIGHEST point on lake—fireproof
—every room a front room—800
acres—tennis—18-hole golf course—concrete garage—boating, bathing, fishing, motor highways in all directions.
Excellent cuisine, American plan.
Management Mr. J. P. Greaves, of Florida East Coast Hotels. Booklet on request.

Open June 25th

New York Booking Office,
243 Fifth Avenue

Apartments

WANTED—THREE APARTMENTS

unfurnished, in same building in New York City. No. 1. Containing living-room or studio, dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms, bath-room and maid's room. No. 2. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. No. 3. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. Location preferably out of the usual beaten path, something not usually rented if possible, and preferably in a private house altered for such purpose. Nothing south of Greenwich Village nor north of 53rd Street will be considered. Occupancy October 1, 1919. Address CHARLES H. DAVIS, Base River, Cape Cod, Mass.

Real Estate

LOUISIANA

School for Sale A flourishing, long-established girls' college in the South. Personal reasons for owner's retirement. Address the Interstate Teachers' Agency, Machine Building, New Orleans, La.

MAINE

FOR SALE ON UNION RIVER
BAY, MAINE

Attractive six-room cottage, completely furnished. Porches, fireplace, telephone, boat, water, and mountain view. One-half acre of land. Near Ellsworth and Bar Harbor. Delightful summer colony. Price twelve hundred dollars. 753, Outlook.

MASSACHUSETTS

Furnished Cottage NANTUCKET, MASS. Six rooms, open fireplace. Ocean front. $200 season. 107 North Van Dien Ave., Ridgewood, N. Y.

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential section, suburbs of New York City. Half hour Grand Central; also near subway. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 50 x 100. Garages. Price $9,500. Full particulars from owner, 9,813, Outlook.

NEW YORK

For Sale, Furnished Adirondack camp in miles from Elizabethtown, 2 1/2 acres of land; unexcelled views; living room 32 x 30 feet with large stone fireplace, five bedrooms, bath, open plumbing, ice-house. Never failing supply of pure water. No mosquitoes. Miss R. M. White, 122 Livingston Road, Auburndale, Mass.

FOR SALE Pleasant Suburban Home
Overlooking Hudson River; half-hour from Grand Central Station; five bedrooms, modern conveniences. Address GEO. A. BYRNE, Suite 1377, 50 Church Street, New York City.

MISCELLANEOUS

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Frances Parker Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

MISS Guthman, New York shopper, will send anything on approval; services free. References. 300 W. 90th Street.

WANTED—Young women to take 3-year course of training in general hospital. Requirements one year high school or its equivalent. Monthly allowance. Pleasantly located. Write Superintendent of Training School, Good Samaritan Hospital, Lexington, Ky.

WOULD care for elderly lady in my home. References required. P. O. Box 116, Lima, N. Y.

TEACHER will take into her home two backward children. Good remuneration for best care. 7,144, Outlook.

WANTED—One or two elderly ladies to care for. Good remuneration for best care. References exchanged. 7,141, Outlook.

TRAINED nurse, having strictly up-to-date home overlooking park, would take patients. Obstetrics, convalescence, care of old people. 7,142, Outlook.

“My! How Valspar Varnish brightens that old linoleum!”

WHEREVER you have linoleum, congoeum or oilcloth in your home, varnish it with Valspar after it has been on the floor three or four months.

You will be delighted with the result! The Valspar will not only brighten it up, but will make it last a great deal longer because it will take much of the surface wear and absolutely prevent the penetration of moisture.

Valsparred linoleum can be washed with soap and warm water. In fact, even boiling water has no effect on Valspar.

Hot grease can spatter or spill on Valsparred kitchen linoleum without injuring the finish or soaking in.

Spilled liquids, such as vinegar, ammonia, and alcohol will not harm Valspar.

In halls and vestibules Valspar will protect linoleum against scuffing feet and dripping umbrellas.

Valspar is easy to apply and it dries over night.

Try it! Give your linoleum two coats of Valspar, allowing the first coat to harden at least a week before applying the second.

And beware of this: Don't be led into using any ordinary varnish on linoleum. You must have the washable, waterproof varnish that will not turn white—Valspar!

VALENTINE & COMPANY

440 Fourth Avenue, New York

Largest Manufacturers of High-grade Varnishes in the World

ESTABLISHED 1832

New York

Chicago

Boston

VALENTINE'S
VARNISHES
(Trade Mark)

Toronto

London

Amsterdam

W. P. FULLER & Co., San Francisco and Principal Pacific Coast Cities

Copyright 1919, Valentine & Company

Special Offer: Don't be content merely with reading about Valspar—Use it.

For 25c in stamps we will send you enough Valspar to finish a small strip of linoleum, table or chair. Or, if you will write your dealer's name on bottom line you need send us only 15c for the sample can.

Your Name.....

Your Address.....

Dealer's Name.....

REPRODUCED FROM A PAINTING, OWNED BY THE OUTLOOK, BY ADRIAAN MARTIN DE GROOT

ROOSEVELT, THE AMERICAN

The Outlook

JULY 16, 1919

In the next issue of The Outlook there will appear an article entitled "The Hermit of Amerongen," by the distinguished author of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," Vincent Blasco-Ibañez. The authorship, the subject, and the manner of treatment all make this article peculiarly noteworthy and timely. All who have read "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse"—and almost every one has read that remarkable book—will remember its keen study of the German national character and Germany's intolerable attitude toward the rest of the world. In the article we have a scathing analysis of the guilt and crimes of the Kaiser, "the chief offender of the war," as Ibañez calls him. That the Kaiser should go unpunished seems incredible. To quote the article once more: "We who have seen his work close at hand, the greatest mass of atrocities since the ravages of Attila, cannot quietly endure seeing the deviser and executor of these crimes live like a middle-class gentleman spending his summer in the country, suffering no other punishment than his own rage at the loss of his huge, absurd power and at his shameful flight." Just now, when the question of trying the Kaiser is pressing under discussion, the article will clear men's minds of false sympathy and apathy.—THE EDITORS.

THE WEEK

THE PEACE CONFERENCE

WITH the signing of the Treaty of Versailles and the departure of President Wilson for his homeward voyage, happily completed last week with a welcome in New Jersey and in New York City, the Peace Conference seems to have passed its climax. As a matter of fact, however, some of the most difficult problems of the Conference remain to be solved. On its hands are still Austria, sadly reduced and in trouble; Hungary, internally upset and externally hostile; Russia, the key to future peace; Turkey, still a thorn in Europe's side; Poland, a perplexing, not unpromising, and very essential experiment; the Balkans, quite as turbulent as ever; and other problems which it would be tiresome even to catalogue. It has been said that there are twenty-three wars in progress at present. That of itself is a statement of the continued task of the Peace Conference which we think of as being ready to adjourn!

Turkey's representatives who were sent to Paris and pleaded for something more than the mere continuance of Turkey as a nominal nation did not make any very great impression. Their plea that Turkey's offenses were committed by a government rather than by the people, and therefore should be forgotten or at least condoned, received the answer that every such plea should evoke. There would never be any way of holding a nation responsible for misdeeds if, when its plans went awry, it could conveniently escape the consequences by sloughing off its government and slipping on a new one. Nations must be held responsible for the governments they create or endure.

The Treaty with Poland has been published, and with it a letter of explanation addressed to Poland by the Chairman of the Peace Conference, M. Clemenceau. This Treaty requires of Poland certain acknowledgments concerning her responsibility, not only for matters lying outside of her domain, but for her course in affairs which most nations regard as purely domestic. For example, she is required to make promises concerning her treatment of peoples not Polish in origin or language, and particularly of the Jews. In M. Clemenceau's letter it is explained that this is not an unprecedented requirement in the erection of a new nation. Poland must not think that these stipulations are put into the Treaty through any want of confidence in her intentions. It is necessary to put these in because the Powers that have created Poland and have undertaken to preserve her integrity so long as she complies with the requirements of the Treaty have assumed a trusteeship for the peoples they have assigned to the Government of Poland, and therefore must have assurances in writing.

Italy is going through an experience of disturbance which is capable of consequences serious to other nations besides herself. It is not altogether due to the economic privations brought on by the war; but is partly due to the effect of unfortunate circumstances, for which the United States, France, and England are not wholly without responsibility, tending to make Italy feel her isolation from her allies. There is no immediate danger that Italy will be thrown into Germany's arms; but what has happened has made it very difficult for the Italians to escape from the renewal of the political and economic influence of Germany from which they so largely freed themselves when they entered the war.

The most sensational news from the Peace Conference last week came, paradoxically, not from the Peace Conference, but from the British House of Commons. It was the announcement made by Premier Lloyd George that the Kaiser was going to be put on trial in London. This announcement has elicited anew the objection, expressed in various forms, that trying the Kaiser would make a martyr of him. Of course this objection holds true of the trying of any gangster. No police or court can prevent a gang and all who sympathize with the gang from making a martyr of its captured and convicted leader. Of course the evil in this is not prevented by letting the leader go scot free. It is only prevented by changing the character of the gang, or at least by making the sympathizers with the gang ashamed of themselves. The first step to that end is the infliction of the justly deserved penalty.

THE VOYAGE OF THE R-34

The troubling conditions of clouds, thunder-storms, and perplexing air currents which delayed the R-34 in her memorable voyage of 3,130 sea miles from Scotland to Long Island were happily offset at the end by a favorable wind which wafted her quietly to her prepared landing-place just when it seemed that outside assistance was necessary. Most people read with surprise that the dirigible's fuel was all but spent, and that she had left for her five engines only gasoline enough for a few hours' additional run, if it had been needed. But when we learn that the full weight of the dirigible and its load is 112,720 pounds, and realize how continuously the engine had to fight against adverse conditions, we begin to understand how it was that even the almost 5,000 gallons of gasoline carried were needed.

The adverse conditions encountered and vanquished added to the value of the accomplishment, the first transatlantic voyage of an airship lighter than air, for the navigators had unexampled opportunity for studying the difficulties of over-ocean sailing; and already illuminating discussion has followed the account of the observations made on this remarkable voyage. General Maitland, who sailed on the R-34 as an official observer for the British Air Ministry, is quoted as saying that he believes that in a few years we shall see regular commercial service between England and the United States by dirigibles, and that the future may develop an airship five times as big as the R-34, capable of making one hundred miles an hour, and with a lifting capacity of two hundred tons.

It is hard to visualize such a future monster of the air. The R-34 is longer than the height of the Singer Building and her measurements are those of a big ocean steamship. Imagine an airship five times as large. It would be truly stupendous.

The summer of 1919 will assuredly go down in history as a marvelous period in aeronautical accomplishment, for the Atlantic has three times been crossed by aircraft, and three widely different types have shared the victorious record—the airplane, the seaplane, and now the gigantic dirigible.

THE MONSTER DIRIGIBLE

The R-34 is the largest aircraft in the world. Not long ago it was on the point of beginning a transatlantic flight when orders suddenly sent it eastward to the Baltic. That voyage was a demonstration of the Allies' readiness to advance into Germany if the Treaty of Peace was not signed by delegates of the German Government.

It is known that this airship and at least one other of the same type had long been under construction by the British Government as an answer to the Zeppelin. It was to have carried eight guns and to have been capable of dropping bombs weighing five thousand pounds. A formidable military weapon, indeed!

The R-34 is almost 650 feet in length and a little over 78 feet in diameter, has five cars connected by a deck, is propelled by five engines of 250 horse-power each, with a total horse-power of 1,550 (less than that of the NC-4), and has a maximum speed of about sixty miles an hour. She holds 1,600,000 cubic feet of hydrogen gas. Preparations on a large scale had been made to receive her at Mineola, Long Island. The total time consumed was 108 hours. Her course was from East Fortune, Scotland, to Newfoundland, thence over Nova Scotia, and thence to Long Island. Her commander is Major G. H. Scott. She carried thirty officers, crew and passengers, one stowaway, and a cat. On another page will be found a group of pictures relating to the R-34.

ANNA HOWARD SHAW

Of few leaders in the struggle for woman suffrage can it be said, as it may of Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, who died on July 2, that she had been an active participant in that struggle from pioneer days until its victory in a large number of States and, in the belief of its advocates, the near approach of National triumph. When Dr. Shaw's friend Susan B. Anthony became the head of the National Woman's Suffrage Association, the women she led were widely regarded as a little band of theorists, fanatics, or plain cranks; when Dr. Shaw succeeded to the presidency in 1906 (Miss Anthony died in 1904 and Mrs. Catt held the office for two years), the movement had assumed importance and had scored many successes; under her own leadership twelve new States were added to the suffrage map, and the ratification of the Amendment, framed originally by Miss Anthony and this year approved by Congress, was under way. Dr. Shaw's speeches, her writings, and her personal influence had much weight in this change of public opinion.

And it was not only what Dr. Shaw was, but what she was not, that availed. She avoided rant and sensationalism, she thoroughly disapproved of violence and illegal demonstrations, she was a patriotic American, a lover of peace but an enemy to German insolence and lawlessness. As a speaker she was persuasive rather than objurgatory, with a keen but quiet humor which gained attention and appreciation even from hostile audiences. Some one has classified woman suffragists as those who wanted to get the vote because men said they shouldn't have it, and those who wanted to use the vote for the good of humanity. Dr. Shaw emphatically belonged to the second class.

Apart from the suffrage question Anna Howard Shaw had a life history unusual even among the careers of ambitious, independent, and energetic American women. She grew old gracefully, with a hopeful, friendly spirit. But the calm and serene woman of over seventy in her youth fought physical and social obstacles with tremendous determination. A school-teacher at fifteen at four dollars a week, a college student beginning with a capital of fifteen dollars, a sharer in the privations of Western pioneer life in Michigan, a breadwinner for her family when its men were fighting in the Civil War, she emerged from her struggles to carry out her early dream of becoming a preacher. And a preacher she became, licensed by the Methodist Church as a laywoman, then graduated regularly from Boston University's Theological School, and pastor of a little Cape Cod church. Lecturing first for temperance under Frances Willard's guidance, then for suffrage, brought her into friendship with Miss Anthony, "the torch that illumined my life."

The advocate of woman suffrage lived to have the right to vote in New York State, but illness, we believe, prevented the actual exercise of the right. Her life was spent in trying to make women finer, broader-minded, and stronger citizens—and not by any means merely through suffrage alone.

A NEW CHARTER FOR PHILADELPHIA

Philadelphia is to have a new Charter, the conspicuous features of which are a single-chambered Council of twenty-one members and a provision that the city shall do its own street paving and repairing and its own garbage and waste removal.

The first of these means that the voters of the city will have a large say in the selection of their representatives, for the system under which the city has been run since 1854 (the year of consolidation) was clumsy and out of date, consisting of two chambers—one the upper body, modeled on the United States Senate and consisting of forty-eight members, and the lower (consisting of ninety-six) modeled on the National House of Representatives. In other words, the city possessed the "Federal system" with a vengeance, and of course a political machine was an absolute essential. The public works provision is aimed at the contract rule, which has so long discredited the city and magnified the power of the famous, or shall we say, the notorious, "Philadelphia organization."

If the Charter contained no other provision, it would still be an important piece of legislation, but it contains many other features which make it in many respects one of the important contributions to charter revision. Among other things it provides for the elimination of the police and firemen from politics, punishing such activity by loss of office and by fine and imprisonment. The ballot is shortened by providing for the appointment of the city Solicitor by the Mayor, heretofore the city's law officer having been elective.

Other important sections provide for a budget prepared by the Mayor on estimates submitted by the Comptroller and for doing away with the accumulation of floating indebtedness, the Charter requiring on this point that "from the receipts of the city from taxation and sources other than loan funds the Council shall appropriate before the beginning of the ensuing year a sufficient amount for the extinguishment of the floating indebtedness (other than that accruing within one year from condemnation of real property) which the city Comptroller may estimate to be outstanding on the 1st of January following; and for the payment of all lawful obligations due by the city during the fiscal year commencing January 1; and for such expenditures to be made from such receipts as may be authorized by the Council." The Comptroller is forbidden to countersign any warrant pertaining to any of the appropriations until the Council shall have first passed all appropriations necessary for the expenses for the current year, in itself a reform of no mean proportion. The improvement of the civil service section makes it one of the best and most modern in any American charter. A provision for the revision of the assessor's lists of voters, which are made the basis of councilmanic representation, constitutes another most important reform in view of the fact that heretofore there has been no official revision of these lists and it has been possible for designing politicians to increase their ward representation practically without let or hindrance.

The Council of twenty-one is elected every four years in the various State Senatorial districts, of which there are eight. There is to be one Councilman from each district and one additional Councilman for each unit of 20,000 assessed voters. The Charter contains an interesting provision that "if at any time hereafter the women of the Commonwealth shall be given the right to vote, the unit of representation shall be 40,000 assessed voters instead of 20,000, so that the Council shall continue to be composed of twenty-one members."

HOW PHILADELPHIA GOT ITS NEW CHARTER.

This modern Charter, which is a model of draftsmanship, was drafted by a representative committee of citizens and backed up by Senator Boies Penrose and his State organization and by Governor Sproul, who, combined, outgeneraled and outmarshaled the Philadelphia machine, which has been under the control of the contractor bosses, the Vare Brothers, one of whom is a State Senator and the other a Congressman.

The same allies—the Independents, the Town Meeting Party, and Senator Penrose—succeeded in putting through a series of electoral reform measures, restoring personal registration to its former strength and usefulness and curtailing the dangerous inroads which the Vare organization has made on the electoral machinery of the State. Other laws designed to prevent tampering with places of election and to give effect to the voters' intention were passed. Heretofore where a voter marked a straight party ticket and a candidate in another column partisan election boards regarded such ballot as void so far as that office was concerned. Under the new law, the vote will be counted for the candidate whom the voter specifically marked, which is in line with the practice elsewhere.

John C. Winston, the Chairman of the Charter Committee, says: "I do not hesitate to assert that the passage of the legislation is primarily due to organized public sentiment. The assistance of the administration, including the support of Senator Penrose and Governor Sproul (without whose aid all our effort would have been in vain), was a commendable recognition of this overwhelming sentiment of the people, to which the public press gave expression. If this same public sentiment can now be organized for the purpose of electing Councilmen who are free from allegiance to contractors and who will serve the public interest, then we shall get the full benefit of the new Charter.

"It must not be overlooked that we have not only secured a small single-chamber Council, but for the first time in a generation this Council is to be elected on a representative basis, the number of Councilmen from each district being in proportion to the number of votes.

"The people can now have the kind of government they choose to vote for, which before was not possible, owing to the grossly unequal ward representation in councils."

CANADA'S FINANCES

Canada's financial statement was presented the other day by Sir Thomas White, Minister of Finance, in his annual budget speech. In the years previous to the war a national debt of but little more than three hundred millions was regarded with some degree of alarm by many Canadians, in view of the fact that the population was under eight millions. When all expenses in connection with demobilization are paid, Canada's national debt will be almost two billions. The annual interest charges were less than thirteen millions in 1914, but they have now increased to one hundred and fifteen millions.

Undoubtedly, this is a heavy annual charge on a country with a small population. It is, in fact, almost as much as the total of Canada's annual expenditures in pre-war years. Canadians are congratulating themselves, however, on the pleasing circumstance that three-quarters of the securities representing the national debt are held by Canadians. The balance is owing to British and American investors. Interest payments sent out of the country will not be much greater than in 1914. Before the war practically all Canadian public loans were placed in Great Britain, domestic borrowing being considered impossible. Thrown upon her own resources during the war, and with the unusual experience of a balance of trade heavily in her favor, Canada discovered that she could do her own financing. Her Victory Loan in 1918 of eight hundred millions was a greater accomplishment, in proportion to population, than any of the Liberty Loans in the United States. It is not surprising, therefore, that Canadians are calmly confident to-day that the new and heavy financial burdens can be carried without impoverishing the country. The financial impossibilities of 1914 are the commonplaces of 1919.

Nevertheless the burden is heavy. For the current financial year ending March 31 the total expenditure is estimated at $620,000,000. More than half of this sum represents demobilization expenses and war gratuities. As the estimated revenue is only $280,000,000, a loan for the balance will have to be floated in the autumn.

In the face of this situation, the Canadian Government has nevertheless made some substantial concessions to the free-trade sentiment of the western provinces, compensating itself for the resulting loss of revenue by increases in the income tax and excess profits taxes on corporations. There is a strong sentiment among the organized farmers of the Canadian west in favor of sweeping reductions in the tariff; and, although substantial concessions have been made to this sentiment, they have not been sufficient to satisfy the western demands. Twelve western supporters of the Union Government voted against it on this issue, led by the Hon. T. A. Crerar, who resigned his portfolio as Minister of Agriculture in protest. Mr. Crerar is head of a farmers' co-operative company which is probably the biggest grain-buying organization in Canada, and he is generally considered the leader of the western farmers.

There are indications of an early return to party government in Canada, but probably the alignment will be different as a result of the political upheaval of 1917.

THE AMERICAN LEGION

For those of our readers who have been interested in the accounts of the American Legion which have appeared in our columns we give the following information relative to the requirements for eligibility and other facts concerning application for membership, etc.

The American Legion originated in two meetings of soldier, sailor, and marine delegates at Paris and St. Louis on March 15 and May 8, 9, and 10, respectively. The Executive Committees appointed at these meetings have combined to form the National Executive Committee of the American Legion, with temporary headquarters at 19 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City. Its immediate programme includes co-operation with the Government and other existing agencies to find employment for ex-service men, and to assist ex-service men in matters of War Risk Insurance, Liberty Bonds, allowances, compensation, and service pay. In order to extend its scope, it also plans the immediate organization of State branches and local posts. These posts must have a minimum membership of fifteen, and application for a charter must be made to the State branch.

Any soldier, sailor, or marine who served honorably between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, whether at home or abroad, is eligible to membership in the American Legion, as are also all women who were regularly enlisted or commissioned in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps. We are informed, furthermore, that all Americans serving in the armed forces of our allies are eligible.

A leaflet has been issued by the Legion which contains useful information for those desiring to join its ranks. In it are given the names and addresses of the secretaries in the various States, Territories, or territorial possessions of the United States to whom application for membership should be made. For example: the New York State Secretary is Mr. Wade H. Hayes, whose address is 140 Nassau Street, New York City; the Hawaiian Secretary is Mr. J. P. Morgan, Box 188, Honolulu. Copies of this leaflet may be obtained at the headquarters of the American Legion.

A competition has been arranged for a design to be used as the official emblem of the Legion—just as the circular copper button has been the well-known emblem of the G. A. R.—for which cash prizes are to be offered. Artists and others interested are invited to submit designs capable of reproduction in bronze or other suitable metal. Full details concerning the conditions of this competition can be secured by addressing Mr. Charles Parsons, Secretary Emblem Committee, American Legion, 663 Downingtown Avenue, Salt Lake City, Utah.

"UP-AGAINST-IT" FIGHTERS

One of the best types of fighters that the war brought out is "the boy who has been down and out and up against it."

This is what Mr. Butcher, the Superintendent of the Brace Memorial Newsboys' Home in New York City, told a representative of the New York "Globe," and he proves it by showing the splendid service under the flag of boys and young men connected with that Home. No less than 2,820 of them volunteered. Long before America went into the war these boys began to be missed, and soon letters came from one after another showing that they had enlisted in France or England or Canada. After we went in four hundred of them passed the enlistment officers in one week.

What kind of a fighter was the ex-newsboy? Mr. Butcher answered: "He's the greatest fighter in the world. He's used to standing on his own feet. His wits have been sharpened. He's aggressive, full of pep, courageous. When it came his time to go 'over the top' he went, and nothing that walked the earth could stop him." Some sixteen hundred of these boys are still in the Army—"among the first to go, among the last to come back." Many have citations or decorations. Some won commissions. Their names are largely foreign in sound, but they are fine Americans in grit and spirit.

If ever there was a better argument for saving and Americanizing the boys who are "up against it" than this record, it would be hard to find.

THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION

At the fifty-seventh annual Convention of the National Education Association, held in Milwaukee June 29 to July 5, Mr. George D. Strayer, President of the Association, gave the following analysis of our present education and future needs:

Millions of Americans, boys and girls, are being taught during a six months' school term by boy and girl teachers who have less than a high school education. The great majority of our children receive no education beyond fourteen years of age. It is a matter of common knowledge that ideals and purposes which govern in life are commonly developed after fourteen, and we know that the intellectual maturity required to understand the principles underlying our republican form of government is not developed before that age.

The future of our American democracy depends upon a recognition of the necessity of developing in the United States a system of public education (1) which will remove illiteracy; (2) which will provide for the Americanization of every foreigner who would continue to live among us; (3) which will include a programme of physical education and health service, providing for every boy and girl an opportunity for normal physical growth and development; (4) which will guarantee sufficient support for public education to make possible a well-equipped school in which a properly trained and adequately paid teacher will teach for a minimum of one hundred and eighty days in the year: (5) which will make compulsory education to eighteen years of age, on full time for boys and girls until sixteen years of age, and on part time, in daylight hours, on the employer's time, for those who work between sixteen and eighteen years of age.

Three especially important general sessions of the Convention were held; one to discuss "The New World and the Demand it Will Make upon Public Education," another in which the central theme was "Education for the Establishment of a Democracy in the World," and a third in which the Child Welfare agencies co-operating with the schools were given a hearing.

Mr. Henry Sterling, a representative of the American Federation of Labor, traced the history of the attitude of the American Federation toward education and concluded by pledging the support of the American Federation for the Smith-Towner Bill, which provides for a Secretary of Education in the President's Cabinet and an annual appropriation of one hundred million dollars for co-operation with the States for National school improvement.

In its resolutions the Association recognized the defects in our National life which President Strayer pointed out and the inadequate organization and supervision of rural education. Against such defects the Association proposes a vigorous, continuous campaign.

AMERICANIZATION IN THE INDUSTRIES

The conference on Americanization in Industry held lately at Nantasket will tend to speed up a Nation-wide movement already advancing by leaps and bounds—the movement for free English in the factories.

Take the case of Massachusetts. One year ago there was not a factory class in the State. To-day half a hundred great industrial concerns offer their foreign-born employees lessons in English during working hours, either in whole or in part on employers' time. They do it from a conviction that, patriotic and philanthropic motives apart, it pays.

Responses to a questionnaire sent out by the Massachusetts Bureau of Immigration indicate that already employers are appreciating distinct gains. Labor is more contented, there are fewer rows between foreigners of different races, fewer misunderstandings between foremen and hands. Labor turnover is actually reduced! Substantial gains are also reported in the reduced proportion of spoiled work now that the workers know

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

Hirby in the New York World

"THE CARRIAGE WAITS, M'LORD"

Cassel in the New York Evening World

Copyright, 1919, by The Press Publishing Co. (The New York Evening World.)

NOW CLEAN UP THIS DESK!

Darling in the New York Tribune

Low in the Passing Show (London)

Patient Parent: "Well, child, what on earth's the matter now?"
Young Hopeful (who has been bathing with his bigger brother):
"Willy dropped the towel in the water and he's dried me wetter than I was before."

Hurley in Blighty (London)

Park Ranger: "Come on, young feller—I'm just shutting the gates."
Tramp (drowsily): "All right, 'Gracie; don't slam them."

Copyright, 1919, New York Tribune, Inc.

AND THUS ENDETH THE STORY

Digitized by Google

the technical terms of their trade and can clearly understand directions. Accidents are fewer, the workers being able to read warning signs or to take in verbal cautions. In this connection it is a significant fact that seventy per cent of all applicants for accident compensation require the services of an interpreter.

Many employers also report increased output through better understanding of instructions, the mental waking up of language study, and the general healthy atmosphere of good will fostered by a common medium of communication. Most of them are agreed that plant classes will tend to prevent strikes. Labor difficulties not infrequently arise through misunderstanding of English, and strikes are most readily fomented and prolonged among workers who can be easily swayed by agitators who speak their tongue, while these workers are as a rule well-nigh out of reach of their employer, who does not understand their talk.

THE NEW METHODS

Massachusetts did not originate "plant classes." The "English for Safety" campaign of the New York Bureau of Industries and Immigration dates back to 1917.

The Ford plant, the Goodyear plant, and the Goodrich factory at Akron, Ohio, certainly had introduced factory English before Massachusetts began. But so new is the movement that only here and there are statistics forthcoming.

All over the country, however, the factory class is supplanting the night school for the teaching of adult aliens. Aside from the ignominy of being put to school in mature life, the grown alien is not helped by the night school. His brain is too fagged after a day of hard labor. If he is to grapple with the formidable difficulties of English, it must at least be when his powers are at their height. Moreover, the ideal place for him to learn practical English is in the place where he works, where he can get the peculiar vocabulary needed in his particular trade.

In Massachusetts a powerful co-operation between the school board which supplies the teachers, the factory which gives the men's time, and the State Bureau of University Extension which provides special training for the teachers and prepares sample lessons and a valuable teacher's manual insures that the teaching—by the dramatic method—shall be scientific and effective.

A bill now pending in the Legislature would shift the whole burden of Americanization classes to the State for all towns whose total property valuation is under a million dollars, larger towns paying half. Free from any taint of coercion or of patronage, neither of which the intelligent foreigner can stomach, the plant class is perhaps the most thoroughly practical and hopeful offshoot of the Americanization movement.

COMMUNITY SERVICE

The War Camp Community Service has done an immense amount of useful work during the period of the war, and any effort looking toward a continuation of this work will make a strong appeal to all those who have participated in its endeavors. For this purpose there has been formed a National organization, non-partisan and non-sectarian, to be known as Community Service, Incorporated. It is proposed to use to the full the experience of the War Camp Community Service (an outgrowth of the Playground and Recreation Association of America) in its social and recreational work, and of the force of trained workers and volunteers which it has enlisted in its service.

Requests have come to the War Camp Community Service from National officials acquainted with its work, from governors and mayors, from citizens' organizations, from newspapers, from business men, to continue this work into peace times. This as an organization it cannot do, as its funds cannot be spent for other than war work.

It is to meet this demand, to carry over into peace times the accumulated social power or "good will" which the War Camp Community Service has helped to develop and which it would take years to re-establish, and to utilize this power in the solution of our peace problems, that Community Service has been organized.

The aim in all its work will be, not to impose a cut and dried programme from without, but to draw out the strength that is in the people and make them efficient directors of their own affairs. As Governor Sproul, Chairman of the War Camp Community Service in Chester, Pennsylvania, aptly said: "This movement is not something handed down, but an organization of the people themselves, representing all elements of community life, called together under the auspices of the United States Government to develop popular activities and relationships which enrich and strengthen community life."

The programme proposed by Community Service, particularly in industrial cities, contains, among other features, the following:

Play and athletics, such as new parks, playground and athletic fields, municipal beach and bath-houses, boating, swimming, camping, meets, hikes, etc.

Social and recreational activities, including dances, movies, picnics, spelling bees, dramatics, school centers, clubs, and home hospitality.

Plans for concerts, recitals, music festivals, and the development of the ever-popular and much to be commended community singing.

The establishment of club-houses, community clubs, and camps; plans for community mass-meetings and celebrations.

Community Service is not a theory, but an accomplished fact. In the cities of Chester, Pennsylvania, Washington, D.C., and Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, its work is now in progress. An interesting summary of its efforts in those cities is given in a little pamphlet, copies of which may be obtained at the National Headquarters, 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

The amount of money required for the first year's work is two million dollars. This will provide for the organizing of four hundred communities, to be selected principally from among those in which the War Camp Community Service is already working, at an average cost of five thousand dollars each. It is proposed to apply this amount about evenly to the expenses of the central office and to temporary contributions toward starting the work in the poorer communities. In this way it is hoped and believed that there may be developed better moral and industrial conditions, health and welfare, play and recreation, higher and more adequate community and neighborhood expression, and a better social life.

WHAT WE OWE TO FRANCE

DO we owe anything to France? Have we not just paid our debt? In that already legendary exclamation, "We are here, Lafayette!" is there not expressed, or at least implied, the judgment that the score is settled?

To think of our relations with France or with any other country in that way is to commercialize a spiritual thing. Whatever debt America owes to France for her understanding of the aspirations of the American colonists is a debt that will remain as long as France retains that love of liberty, equality, and fraternity that impelled Lafayette and Rochambeau to come to these shores. Such debts are not canceled.

But even if that ancient debt could be wiped out by anything that America has done, a new debt greater than the old has been incurred. For nearly three years, while we in America debated and hesitated and vacillated, France defended with her life-blood the frontiers of our freedom. We in America know that we have been at war. At least we think we know. But what do we know of war compared with what France knows? France suffered from this war, not merely after it broke out, but long before. Turn to Daudet's story printed on another page of this issue, and catch for a moment the feeling of the French whenever they have thought for the past forty years and more of the coming of the Prussians. Imagine what it has meant to French families to have their sons spend months of their lives in training and years of their lives in constant readiness to meet the Prussian menace. From all this we in America have been saved by France's vicarious sacrifice.

And now we are closer than ever before to France and closer too to that peril from which France has saved us and the world. Submarine, airplane, seaplane, and dirigible have within the past few months been binding us close to Europe. Talk of isolation in these days is evidence of blindness and deafness to the most obvious facts. The nearer we are to our friends, the more definite the obligations of our friendship become.

What friendship demands of us self-interest demands also. If we are nearer to our friends, we are nearer also to the perils that are not only theirs but ours.

What we owe to France we thus owe to ourselves. There has been drawn up a Treaty in which America will recognize formally this obligation. For the present Germany is in handcuffs, but will soon regain much of her freedom of action. She has signed a promise to keep her fortifications, her armed forces, and all permanent works for mobilization far away from the frontier which borders France. "In case these stipulations should not assure immediately to France appropriate security and protection," so runs this Treaty, "the United States of America shall be bound to come immediately to her aid in case of any unprovoked act of aggression directed against her by Germany." This Treaty does not create a new obligation; it simply recognizes one that already exists.

Together with this Treaty there has been drafted a similar one between France and Great Britain. This is right, for Great Britain owes to herself and France what we owe to France and ourselves. Nineteen months of our own experience in the war, five years' experience of the still unsubdued spirit of German aggression, and forty years' observation of what France has had to endure, are surely sufficient to make us see that upon Great Britain and the United States there should rest some of the burden that France, because of her nearness to Germany, has never been able in the slightest degree to escape. Upon these three free nations, America, France, and Great Britain, because with their freedom they have power, lies the special duty of standing ready to defend together the cause of ordered liberty.

THE TACTICAL BLUNDER OF THE REPUBLICANS

THE League of Nations is very likely to be the issue of the 1920 Presidential campaign. And some good political judges prophesy that Mr. Wilson may accept the challenge and run for a third term on that issue. We do not believe that he will seek a re-election on the ground that he should be rewarded as one of the authors of the plan. But if the Republicans persist in attacking, opposing, or emasculating the Treaty which has been framed by the five chief Allies, it would not be unnatural for him to take a third nomination in order to defend what he has constantly asserted to be the great issue before the civilized world.

It is our belief that as the people of the United States continue to think about the matter they will say to themselves: "The proposed League doubtless has defects; like the Constitution, it may need ultimate amendments as the result of practical experience; but we are tired of fighting and appeals to force, and we want to try any reasonable experiment that will give us some escape from such catastrophes as that which has just overwhelmed us. If we don't try this experiment now, nobody knows when we shall have another opportunity. We don't propose to jeopardize this chance by further discussion and criticism. We want to get to work and do our tinkering later."

From the point of view of political expediency the sole question is: Which is the largest body of Americans, those who want to try this experiment or those who do not?

Whatever the answer may be, it must be admitted that Senators Lodge, Knox, Borah, and Johnson have raised this question.

Here, it seems to us, has been their great tactical mistake. They would have been far wiser, we think, and far surer of success, if they had gone to the country with an appeal in substance like this:

"We join unhesitatingly with the Democrats in ratifying the Treaty and the League of Nations Covenant. The ratification is not a partisan issue. The administration of the Treaty and the League is. Neither document is worth the paper it is written on unless the most efficient men and the ablest minds are devoted to administering the League. If the appointments to the Assembly and the Council of the League are not of the highest order, the League will be a dismal and probably dangerous failure. You know the general character of appointments under the Democratic Administration. You know the many and great failures of efficiency of that Administration in the conduct of the war. It will be a bigger and more perplexing job to run the League than to run the war. If you are dissatisfied, as we believe you are, with the general war record of the Democrats, we ask you to give your mandate to the Republican party to carry on the League, to enforce the Treaty of Peace, and to direct on your behalf the work of National and international reconstruction."

Such an appeal would at least have commanded a respectful hearing. For the American people do not like obstructionists. They want their leaders to do things. Are not the Republican leaders in the Senate in danger of giving the country the impression that they are critical obstructionists rather than constructive statesmen? It was this course that led to the defeat of the Republican party in 1916. Is that mistake to be repeated?

MILLIONS FOR MUSIC

RECENTLY a great fund to an amount variously estimated at from five to twenty million dollars was bequeathed to the cause of music.

To the man who regards music as a form of entertainment, like vaudeville or the circus, it may seem a waste of money to will a fortune for the encouragement of music in America. To such a man the question might naturally arise, If people want music, why not let them pay for it, as they pay for acrobatics? Since the experience of the past two years, however, a great many Americans who have never thought of the matter before have come to see that music is something more than entertainment. It has proved to be of enormous value to a fighting army. It has been like ammunition and weapons to the soldier. It has been a part of his training. It has given him heart. It has made it easy for him to train, to march, and to fight in rhythm and unison with his comrades. In this sense music is certainly more than an entertainment; it is a utility. There are, however, men who see that it is something still more. They understand, perhaps some of them only dimly, others more clearly, that it is an art, and as such that it has a function of the very highest kind.

As an art the function of music has been compared (as, for example, in the last chapter of D. G. Mason's "From Grieg to Brahms") to the function of science, philosophy, and religion. The scientist encounters a universe that seems capricious: lightning seems to strike whimsically; living things devour one another; disease spreads like magic. But the scientist experiments and by observation and study discovers in all this apparent lawlessness the basis of law. The philosopher sees the world at sixes and sevens; he observes the misery and pain and evils of mankind; superficially the world seems a chaos, but the philosopher delves into his own mind and into the minds of other men to find an explanation in terms of order and unity. The religious teacher sees all this evil and chaos, but by faith and hope he enables men to conform their lives to the hidden unity and order. The artist encounters the same confusion; but instead of trying to search out the law and discover it as the scientist does, or to frame in his mind a system of orderly thought as the philosopher does, or to find resource in a serene and untroubled life based on faith as the religious teacher does, he takes out of the confusion material with which he proceeds to erect a structure of order and beauty. If he is a painter, he uses the pigments that lie all about, and he brings them into order and beauty upon canvas. If he is an architect, he finds in the stones scattered about in confusion on the earth's surface or in the iron ore hidden in the earth materials out of which he builds his creation of order. And if he is a musician, he takes his material from the confused sounds of the earth, from the noises that can be made with striking or with blowing or with scraping, and out of these confused noises he creates a structure of harmony. The scientist finds a chaos, but he searches in it for the laws of a cosmos; the philosopher finds a chaos, and he thinks out a cosmos; the religious teacher finds a chaos, and he reaches out for faith in a cosmos; while the artist, seeing the chaos, says: "Go to! I will build me a cosmos."

Men do not expect science or philosophy to be self-supporting. They believe that the scientist and the philosopher are doing the world a service which cannot be bought and paid for, and which cannot be bartered in the market, and so men, and even states, have endowed universities. Men, too, believe that the religious teacher and prophet renders a service that cannot make him self-supporting in the ordinary sense, and so men endow churches or unite to support institutions of religion by their common contributions. The time has already come in America, as it has come in other and older countries, when men see that art too cannot be made a matter of commerce, that it cannot be left to the competitive struggle of the market-place, but must be supported out of the larger reservoirs of accumulated wealth. America has been lavish in its support of schools, colleges, and universities, and has supported churches by the thousands; so America has been awakening to the need of giving similar support to institutions of art.

This is the significance of the generous bequest recorded in the will of Augustus D. Juilliard. The terms of this gift were recently made public when the will was filed for probate at Goshen, Orange County, New York. According to the statement made on behalf of the executors and trustees of the estate—

The general scope of the Juilliard Musical Foundation, as stated in the will, is to aid all worthy students of music in securing complete and adequate musical education, either at appropriate institutions now in existence or hereafter to be created, or from appropriate instructors in this country or abroad; to arrange for and to give without profit to it musical entertainments, concerts, and recitals of a character appropriate for the education and entertainment of the general public in the musical arts; and to aid the Metropolitan Opera Company in the City of New York for the purpose of assisting it in the production of operas.

Ample discretion is vested in the trustees to provide that the Juilliard Musical Foundation shall have the necessary powers to carry out the expressed wishes and general scheme as expressed by the testator.

In no respect does the wisdom of Mr. Juilliard in making this bequest show itself more evident than in the freedom which he grants to the trustees of the Foundation. No man can foresee the peculiar needs or the peculiar opportunities of the generation that is to follow him; and to recognize this limitation upon foresight is a sign of foresight itself. By his very restraint Mr. Juilliard has made his gift the more expansive. He has enabled genius yet unborn to rise and grow and flourish. He has put at the disposal of boys and girls endowed with native gifts opportunity to gain the training without which those gifts would remain hidden and lost. He has, as it were, already put out the talents of coming Americans to usury.

We hope that the trustees of this Foundation will administer their trust with the same breadth with which it was established; that they will call nothing common or unclean; that they will see in the music of the people the material out of which great art can be created; that they will see in the stones which the builders of ordinary musical temples reject the heads of the corner; that they will not value the opera, which is hardly so much an art as it is a social occasion, too highly; that they will not regard with too great disdain the musical products of Broadway; that they will not confine themselves to the metropolis or to the great cities, or even to the towns; that they will not only "give a thought to Broadway," but also to the broader fields of our far-flung population. Few men have had as great an opportunity to serve the coming civilization of America as the trustees of the Juilliard Musical Foundation.

THE SENATE SHOULD RATIFY, WITH RESERVATIONS

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

PROFESSOR IN LAW AND CIVIL POLITY AT HAMILTON COLLEGE AND REPUBLICAN MEMBER OF THE SENATE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

SINCE the United States Senate is Republican, Republican leadership has a great responsibility and a great opportunity. Through the mist there is beginning to appear the position that America should take. And America can take her position only through the Senate, which is now dominantly Republican, and a two-thirds vote can be obtained for the Treaty only through a Republican majority. It is the Republican party which is now to speak for America, and not Mr. Wilson. This is the result of the election returns of last November, which indicated a temper of mind unfavorable to the continuation of the Wilson régime in Washington.

Will the Republican party rise to the level of its solemn duty? Party leadership has had a golden opportunity. The psychology of America is against the Democrats, and probably against the President. But the Republican Senate has not yet succeeded in persuading the American people that it has a policy of its own, or in carrying the public opinion of the American people with it. Is it too late for Republicanism to meet its vast responsibility?

The issue is clearing. Probably one reason for the seeming impotence of the Republican leadership has been that until recently the issue has not been clear; that nobody in the Republican majority had a copy of the Treaty; that covert and complicated covenants, covertly arrived at, are hard to fathom and straightforwardly to interpret to a hundred millions, anyway.

Now that we know the provisions and the stipulations, we are beginning to see the light. The public opinion of the country is crystallizing. It is evident that the American people believe that the suspense of a continued state of war should cease, that some sort of a substantial and practical league of nations is a necessity for human progress, and that the instrument embodying the League and the Treaty should be ratified. Arrangements for delay and deliberation in serious disputes, the provision to avert war by joint action, the recognition of the right to freedom of races and of peoples, the measures to maintain order in the chaotic region east of the Rhine, are indispensable to the continuation of an orderly civilization. So far the American people follow President Wilson.

But there is a great current of influence which is not Wilsonian at all, and not yet interpreted by the Senate leadership at Washington, but which is in reality traditionally American, eminently sound, and comes along the Hay-Root-Roosevelt line of political heredity. It represents the tradition of foreign policy and of internationalism which was at its best when Republicanism was aforesight at its best in the McKinley and Roosevelt Administrations. The Hay-Root-Roosevelt diplomacy was far more democratic than the Wilsonian diplomacy has turned out to be. Take the provision in the recent Treaty settlement about Shantung, practically guaranteeing the imperialistic aims of Japan in China. How far removed from the internationalistic ideals of democracy! How far removed from Hay's principle of the open door, and the Root agreements with Japan with respect to universal equality of opportunity in China and the continuation of the open door! Yet the Shantung settlement in our Versailles Treaty seems to be directly in line with the upsetting of the Root-Takahira agreement by the Lansing-Ishii agreement under the Wilsonian Administration. The Lansing-Ishii agreement recognizes the special interest of Japan in China, just as the Shantung provision clearly aims to do. At this point the Republican tradition runs much truer to democracy than does the Wilsonian tradition as disclosed in the Lansing-Ishii agreement or the Shantung provision.

The feeling of uneasiness about this particular phase of the Versailles instrument has been heightened by the language in which reference has finally been made to the Monroe Doctrine in the amendment to the original draft. "Regional understandings like the Monroe Doctrine" are not to be disturbed. Now the Monroe Doctrine is not a regional understanding. It is a trespass notice warning Europe not to interfere with the developing freedom and nationality of the peoples of the Western Hemisphere. And here again the way seems to be opened for the old imperialistic spheres of influence, and special interests of all sorts, which are regional understandings, to obtain new vitality and flourish with new strength.

It is no wonder that there has arisen a feeling of uneasiness and a disposition to look more closely at the provisions of the League and the Treaty, and a growing fear in some quarters that not only here but elsewhere in the instrument the highly trained and astute diplomats of the foreign offices of Europe may have put something over on democracy and on the President. By such provisions democracy is certainly made no safer for the world.

The undertaking in Article X of the Treaty "to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League" also brings out in bold relief the sharp cleavage between the Root-Roosevelt-Republican tradition and the tradition which Wilson would now impose upon America. For example, the American tradition, which has come down from the Root-Roosevelt foreign policy, has been a tradition of hands off in the territorial and political disputes of South America. South America is full at this moment of possible disputes, some of which may be rather easily revived. It has been the policy of the United States not to take sides in these disputes. If we now take sides with our Allies under Article X, shall we not at once have the whole of South America solidly united against us? Is not the older tradition of our foreign policy safer for America and safer for democracy?

And in Europe, if we undertake beyond a reasonable period of readjustment and reconstruction to preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing independence of all members of the League, and mingle, as a full and permanent partner in the Alliance, with the petty quarrels of the Old World, do we not risk the loss of the moral leadership which our unbiased and altruistic helpfulness has brought within our grasp? Is America fitted by her own purposes, her own rationally detached position of physical and moral greatness, her own experience, to match wits as an all-the-year-round partner at the gaming-table of the Allied Council? Is there not some modification of the wise and traditional policy of American aloofness in South America, in Europe, which will make her relation to the League of Nations more flexible than Article X makes it, and which would leave her in a position of far greater efficiency to enforce the peace of the world?

In the next few weeks the American people ought to discuss these questions from sea to sea. They are vital to our National as well as to our international welfare. We are not to assume that President Wilson is not bringing home from Europe many provisions of great value, but we must remember that they are not his provisions. For the most part his ideas did not prevail. And even if they had prevailed, they should have been subjected to the frankest and profoundest criticism as soon as they were released from the semi-darkness that has overspread Versailles. The League Covenant represents the mind of General Smuts, of South Africa, more than that of any other man. The dangerous Article X was never in the Smuts plan. And General Smuts, who emerges from Versailles as a most enlightened and open-minded personality, himself signed with the reservation that he did not consider it a satisfactory document, and the only ground on which he would agree to it as it stands was that it closed the chapters of the war and the armistice. Inspired by this great authority, the American people may well consider what reservations they may determine upon in the interest of the National welfare and the world, which may still make it possible to close the unsettling and ruinous chapters of the war and the armistice.

There is no proof of it competent in a court of justice, but there is a widespread belief in the world, which is reinforced by the testimony of the Liberal Smuts, that our President has not succeeded in his mission to obtain the letter and the spirit of a permanent and a genuine peace. There is a widespread suspicion that the exigencies and intrigues of world diplomacy have entangled and imprisoned his idealism. All the more is it incumbent upon America to scrutinize seriously and deeply the work of the Versailles Conference. May not America and the Republican Senate preserve the League of Nations and all of the Treaty which cannot be changed without affirmative action of amendment, and yet not be a party to the riveting upon the neck of the world of the chains of the status quo?

Are not reservations to which no objection is offered in accordance with long-established precedent? Has not America again and again made reservations in the Hague conventions? Does not the Republican leadership in the Senate and the Republican party in the country owe it to America to make an intelligent and critical stand against the stampeding of public opinion on the most critical issue of our generation? Is there any reason to doubt that in the end the Allies will offer no objection to any reasonable reservation which we may make? Are we not still, and shall we not continue to be, the hope and stay of our allies? Is not the power ours, and not theirs? And is there not for them and for the world far greater potency in the reasonable aloofness of America from the congested intrigues of Europe than from a complete and mechanical partnership of alliance and action that well might weaken the position which America occupies as the keystone of the arch of moral leadership?

If the Republican leadership in Washington at a stroke can make it clear to the country that democracy is still not safe, but endangered in the very instrument which brings also some hope to the world; that the Treaty is at best at many points a peace of national interests, and not a peace of democracy; that it must be ratified, but with reasonable reservations; and that then what General Smuts calls "the new creative spirit which is once more moving among peoples in their anguish" must be depended upon to inspire change in the instrument in the direction of democracy and justice—and if the Republican leadership can put this across into the confidence of the American people it will be an inspiring thing for the country and of great advantage to the Republican party.

THE DEDICATION TABLET PLACED ON THE ROOSEVELT MONUMENT

THE DEDICATION OF MOUNT THEODORE ROOSEVELT

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE FROM TRAVERS D. CARMAN

CONTAINING A TRIBUTE BY MAJOR-GENERAL LEONARD WOOD

"So lived this man, and died, and lives again—

A white dynamic memory in the land.
Oh, what a heritage, my countrymen!

He'll plead forever now, with voice and hand,

Our righteous causes, and his power will grow.

Cease tolling, bell, and let the bugles blow!"

THIS last stanza of that beautiful memorial to Theodore Roosevelt, written by Samuel Valentine Cole and published in The Outlook of February 5, recalled itself to my mind with added emphasis at the dedication ceremonies of Mount Theodore Roosevelt, four miles north of Deadwood, South Dakota, on Friday, July 4.

Civil War veterans, men of the Spanish-American War, boys in khaki just back from the great war, Major-General Leonard Wood, the Hon. Peter Norbeck, Governor of South Dakota, Mr.

Hermann Hagedorn, author of "The Life of Roosevelt," representing the Executive Committee of the Roosevelt Memorial Association, Congressman E. W. Martin, the Rev. William P. Remington, Bishop of South Dakota, Captain Seth Bullock, the Colonel's lifelong friend and admirer, Sylvane Ferris, Mr. Roosevelt's one-time ranch partner, Major Allen, special representative of Commander Booth of the Salvation Army, and other prominent men and women from many parts of the country far and near, all had assembled there, drawn together and united in the common bond of paying the Nation's tribute of love and reverence to the memory of Theodore Roosevelt, the Great American.

Bearing proudly aloft on its summit its stately monument about to be dedicated, Mount Theodore Roosevelt towered high above the surrounding peaks and canyons for miles on every side. As far as the eye could see the Black Hills of South Dakota, with wondrous contrasting colors of wooded slopes, rock-bared mountain-tops, and valleys softened with purple haze, shone resplendent in the golden sunlight of the West.

It needed but the first strains of "My Country, 'tis of Thee," to swell the hearts of all with a renewed and devout thankfulness for the God-given blessings of our country, its salvation for future generations to come, and a full realization of the part the Great American had played in making this country our country and a land of liberty.

Following an invocation of singular beauty of expression by Bishop Remington, embodying an earnest supplication that the life of Theodore Roosevelt might forever in the history of this nation be followed as a standard of Christian living, Congressman E. W. Martin made the opening address of the dedication.

"The West," said the Congressman,

"is honoring itself to-day while it pays a loving tribute to the character of Theodore Roosevelt. The Western people have always recognized in him a living personification of their highest and noblest inspirations. The idea of this memorial originated with Captain Seth Bullock—Roosevelt's lifelong intimate friend and companion. Upon his motion, the Society of Black Hills Pioneers at their annual meeting in Deadwood, in the month of January of this year, passed a resolution changing the name of this mountain upon which we are gathered this afternoon from Sheep Mountain to Mount Theodore Roosevelt."

Governor Norbeck in a stirring address paid a justly earned tribute to General Wood's remarkable career of executive and military achievement.

And then followed as the principal address of the dedication ceremonies the following tribute to Colonel Roosevelt by General Wood:

GENERAL WOOD'S SPEECH

"We are assembled here to-day to dedicate this monument and this mountain to the memory of Theodore Roosevelt, the Great Leader, whom death has taken from us. The sense of loss and sorrow which spread over the land when he died is still heavy upon us. The Nation mourns one of its greatest sons—a man whose memory will be as enduring among us as the mountain itself.

"Millions who have never known or seen Theodore Roosevelt feel that they have lost a friend; that the Nation has lost an absolutely honest and courageous leader; that a great far-seeing intelligence has been taken from us at one of the most critical periods in our National life—taken from us at a time when we needed it more than ever before.

"America loved him and trusted him because he was, above everything else, an American. His broad vision, deep knowledge of the world's affairs, sound judgment, and courageous leadership were never more needed than in these days when it is necessary to stand together, shoulder to shoulder, for the Constitution and for the policies through which we have become great. While intensely American, his sympathy was as broad as the world. It was limited to no race or creed.

"Somehow the world seems less safe for the ideals we are struggling for. The cause of righteousness and fair dealing between nations, of open and honest policies, has lost its strongest champion. This feeling of loss is confined to no class or section; it is felt by labor and capital, by soldier and sailor, by rabbi and priest, by the people as a whole. They all understand that he stood for the right, for the square deal, for high ideals, for clean living, and that he had studied and that he understood the difficulties of the poor and of labor; that he appreciated the responsibilities and the problems of the rich. They appreciated his frankness, his absolute honesty, his willingness to admit a mistake once he saw it. He appealed to the conscience of our country and impressed upon business and industry new standards. He preached against the neglect of civic obligations by those of our citizens who should take most interest in them—the educated and well-to-do. His name is a synonym for honest courage and the spirit of service. He was a true statesman, wise enough to hold on to the good of the past and liberal enough to take advantage of what is best in the progress of to-day.

"He prepared a way for a better understanding between labor and capital. He appreciated the fact that they were interlocking forces, that united they stood, separated they fell. He strove to encourage legitimate business and to curb and control unworthy enterprises. He held that wealth should be the servant of the people, and not their master. He believed in neither an autocracy of wealth nor an autocracy of labor; but rather in a democracy of both, a democracy characterized by a spirit of helpfulness and co-operation and an understanding of the vital relationship between them.

"As President he pursued an unbroken foreign policy of international understanding and good will. He was a believer in arbitration, as shown by the many arbitration treaties made during his Administration. He called to his assistance the best men available, regardless of party. He gathered his information by full and free consultation with the best men of all parties. The mainspring of his policy was an honest desire for justice and fair dealing, with a view to a righteous peace. He was conservative and patient in crises, seeking freely the advice of all those best able to give it. The welfare of our country was ever foremost in his mind. He never sought it through oppression or injustice in dealing with the weak, nor did he lose sight of it in dealing with the strong. He believed in avoiding entangling alliances, while standing ready to help when our own conscience dictated, and realized that America must have a strong National spirit, backed by the right kind of a National conscience, in order that she might stand ready to play her part when civilization and the rights of mankind were in danger, acting under the dictates of her own conscience and not under the mandate of other nations.

"Among his last words were these:

"We must feel in the very marrow of our being that our loyalty is due only to America, and that it is not diluted by loyalty for any other nation or all other nations on the face of the earth. Only thus shall we fit ourselves really to serve other nations, to refuse ourselves to wrong them, and to refuse to let them do wrong or suffer wrong.

"He hated war, as all do who know it; but he dreaded, above all things, failure to do our duty, even though it should be done through war. While believing in arbitration, he had that knowledge which comes from study of the past, which led him to understand that arbitration is most effective when we have not only justice but strength. He had sufficient confidence in America. He believed she could be organized and strong, ready to do her duty as she saw it, without becoming an oppressor of others. He realized that, strong as well as just, we would be a force for righteousness and world peace.

"He believed in international conventions and in bringing nations together to discuss matters which were of international interest; in other words, in any procedure which would tend to make nations discuss questions at issue before fighting, provided such arrangements did not interfere with our essential sovereignty or violate our traditional policy.

"We lost our soundest and strongest advocate for peace when Theodore Roosevelt died. Soundest and strongest because he understood the character of man, the causes which lead to war, and realized that a nation must be not only right, but of resolute spirit and have ready that moral and material organization which is often necessary to make the protest of a justice-loving nation effective. He saw the war approaching years before it came. When the fatal day arrived, he pointed out where our duty lay. The people of the Nation turned to him for leadership, not only in counsel, but in the field. He planned to raise a division. Tens of thousands stood ready to respond to his call. The voluntary spirit of the country was behind him. Denied an opportunity to raise a division, he threw his whole energy and his whole soul into a vigorous support of the war. His children and those closest to him went with his blessing. Everything he had, everything he controlled, was devoted to the winning of the war; for he saw clearly that it was as much our war as that of our allies, and that it was a war for civilization.

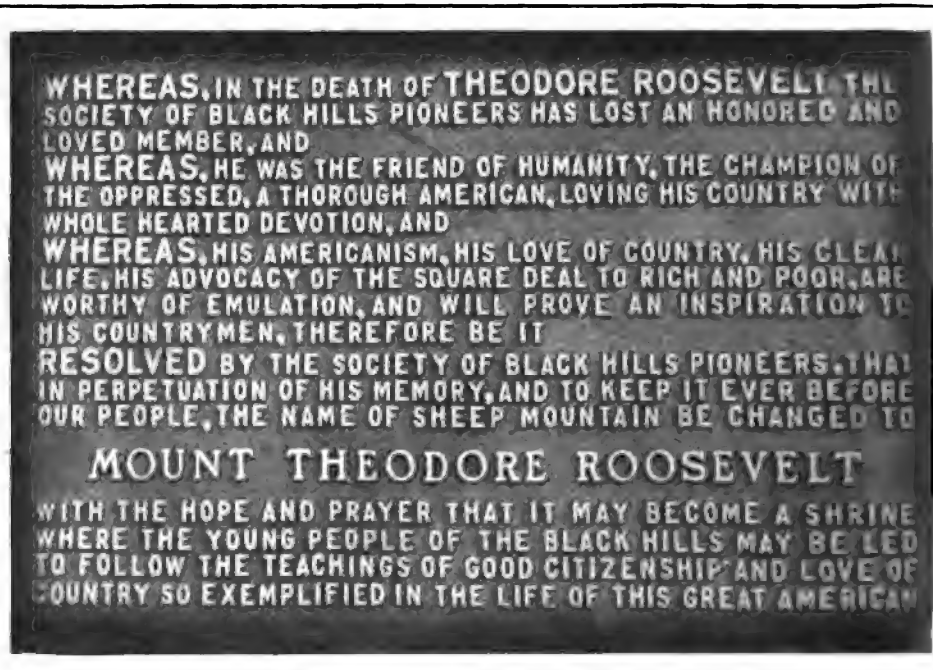

"Born and reared under the best surroundings, well educated, widely read, with every opportunity to drift into the easy, careless life, his whole career from early youth was marked by a desire to do something worth while, to be of some service to the world. Frail in early youth, he made himself robust and strong. Handicapped by defective vision, he became an expert hunter, fearless explorer, a man who loved rough and dangerous places. He loved the simple, yet strenuous life. He worked hard and played hard. He was never inactive.

"Married life was for him the ideal life. He was singularly devoted to home and family. His respect for women was profound. He appreciated their position and influence in the world as few men do. He was clean of speech, and his life was clean and moral. He abhorred, above all, suggestive speech, loose living, and immorality.

"While he loved all our people, he had an especial appreciation of the people of the West. It was the part of the country in which he had found health and strength. He was fond of their simple life, their patriotism, and their directness. He loved a hard, fast run in a rough country, a bout with the broadswords, a hard gallop across country. He was an omnivorous reader. He was equally at home at a roundup, in the legislative halls, an assembly of scientists, or as a speaker at a university commencement.

MAJOR-GENERAL WOOD AND CAPTAIN SETH BULLOCK STANDING BESIDE THE TABLET

THE MEMORIAL TO COLONEL ROOSEVELT THAT APPEARS BELOW THE DEDICATION TABLET ON THE ROOSEVELT MONUMENT

"Travel, reading, study, and contact with men had given him a familiarity with men and affairs which is seldom found. He was a many-sided man; a human dynamo, driven by the forces of truth, humanity, and patriotism.

"Like all men who do things, he made mistakes—mistakes which he was the first to recognize once he saw them. His honesty, purpose, and purity of character were such that slander never touched him and his real enemies were few. He had the old crusading spirit. He was always leading onwards and upwards, generally well in the advance. He feared nothing, unless it were duty undone. He was a profound student of history and a devout Christian.

"He realized that progress comes generally through struggle, and seldom through ease and idleness.

"He realized that wars have been man's portion at times ever since he was created; that it is often necessary for a nation to do its duty through war. He believed that rational preparation against it, combined with justice and fair dealing, are the most effective forces for peace.

"He was a thorough believer in the basic principle of democracy, that hand in hand with the opportunity and privilege given us by the Republic goes obligation for National service in war as well as in peace. He believed that unless democracy accepts and lives up to this principle it cannot endure; that shoulder to shoulder, rich and poor, Jew and Gentile, newcomer and native-born, we must serve the Republic in war and in peace, in fair weather and in storm. He saw in this community of service, in this equality of obligation, the flame to fuse the diverse elements in our population into one homogeneous mass of Americans, the upbuilding of a spirit of National solidarity, and the establishment of better understanding between the groups and classes of our people. He saw in it also something of the brotherhood of man which comes through community of effort, surroundings, and purpose, and that better appreciation of each other which comes from closer association, especially when this association is for a common purpose, and that purpose a lofty one—the defense of our country and the right.

"In Theodore Roosevelt's opinion, no man who refuses service to the limit of his ability, whether in war or peace, is fit to be a citizen.

"Knowing our men will always go to war for what they believe to be right, and that when they refuse we shall cease to be a nation, and realizing that our women will send them and despise them if they do not go, and that the better trained they are the fewer will die, he advocated universal training for National service, training on rational lines such as the Swiss or Australian. He realized that it was a false humanity, indeed it was brutal inhumanity, not to give the men who are to fight our battles a sporting chance. He saw the deadly unpreparedness of this country as the war crept upon us, and strove to correct it by voice and pen, for he knew that not to prepare meant thousands of unnecessary dead. Having been in war, he realized how great the losses must be where the men, and especially the officers, are unprepared and where there is any shortage in the machines and weapons with which man fights on the ground, in the air, on the sea, or beneath its surface.

"Speak softly, but carry a big stick," with him meant to be just and fair but ready to meet the forces of wrong with the disciplined strength of right. He had little patience with those adroit in the use of words and skilled in the building of phrases but lacking the concrete courage to meet issues when National honor, the lives of our people, and the best interests of humanity and civilization demanded action.

"It was impossible for him to be a neutral in the face of wrong. He believed in a free press, free speech, and pitiless publicity and understood that a democracy resenting criticism, smothering the press, and hampering publicity is a democracy in danger, if not a democracy dying.

"He was devoted to nature. No one loved forests and mountains more than he. From extensive travel and observation, not only in our own country but abroad, he saw the necessity of establishing a sound and rational system of conservation of our National forests, which were being ruthlessly wasted in many places, and under his leadership a sound system of conservation became a part of our National policy. In looking forward to an equitable distribution of our National wealth he urged a vigorous policy in reference to the reservation of our water-power sites and the reclamation of our desert areas, that they may be ready for the coming millions. He established the Department of Commerce and Labor; laid the foundation for better understanding between capital and labor; did more than any other President to make the world realize what the United States stands for, and what a government 'of the people, for the people, by the people,' means.

"He was the most inspiring, and consequently the most dominant, figure in our National life since Lincoln. The youth of the country turned to him: he was its ideal.

"He was a brave and efficient officer, often reckless of his own safety but always careful of that of his men. He was always frank and straightforward, yet absolutely subordinate and loyal. While subordinate, he understood the difference between subordination and servility. He gave his opinion frankly, but obeyed promptly and faithfully whatever commands he received, whether they were in accord with his own views or not.

MAJOR-GENERAL LEONARD WOOD DELIVERING HIS ADDRESS AT THE DEDICATION CEREMONIES

"He was a many-sided man, but four-square to all the world—a wise statesman, naturalist, author, writer of history, scholar, soldier, builder of standards, a man with a clean soul and dauntless spirit, whose watchword was duty and whose life was one for the right, for country, and for God. Such was Theodore Roosevelt. He believed in the Constitution, in a government owned and run by and for the people, and not in a people owned and dominated by the government. Perhaps his greatest service was rendered in his last years when he raised his voice against the deadly menace of internationalism and the heresies of the day.

"He believed in one flag, one language, and one country; no dual citizenship. He believed in a sincere welcome and fair treatment for the immigrants who come to us for the purpose of adopting our standards and living up to them, and had no sympathy for those who come to us for the purpose of tearing down those things which we have spent our National life in building up. He believed that true liberty is found within the law. His creed was clearly expressed in his last message:

"I cannot be with you, and so all I can do is to wish you God-speed. There must be no sagging back in the fight for Americanism now that the war is over. . . . We should insist that if the immigrant who comes here does in good faith become an American and assimilate himself to us, he shall be treated on an exact equality with every one else. . . . There can be no divided allegiances at all. We have room but for one flag, the American flag, and this excludes the red flag, which symbolizes only war against liberty and civilization. We have room but for one language here, and that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding-house, and we have room for but one loyalty, and that is loyalty to the American people.

"Such is the man to whom we to-day dedicate this mountain, which in its rugged simplicity and strength typifies his character. May the influence of his teachings be as permanent among us as the mountain itself!

"God grant that his spirit and ideals may guide us in the days before us!"

THE COLONEL, THE CAPTAIN, AND THE BLACK HILLS

It would not perhaps be out of place here to tell briefly the story of Colonel Roosevelt's connection with the Black Hills.

In September of 1883, when recovering from serious illness, and in hopes to gain strength for his third term in the Albany Assembly, Mr. Roosevelt, who had long been eager to know the West intimately, arrived at Medora, a somewhat disappointed cow town of North Dakota, and found his way to Chimney Butte, a ranch then owned by Sylvane Ferris and Arthur W. Merrifield, located on the Little Missouri River, seven miles south of Medora. A friendship developed almost immediately between the three, and before Mr. Roosevelt's return to New York he had bought Chimney Butte Ranch, with Sylvane Ferris and Arthur W. Merrifield as his partners, and with the former as his ranch boss. Upon this trip Joseph Ferris, a brother of the Colonel's partner, also met Mr. Roosevelt, and afterwards became his lifelong friend. He it was who helped the Colonel get his first buffalo after a three days' hunt on rations consisting only of dry biscuit. In the fall of 1884 Colonel Roosevelt bought Elkhorn Ranch, also on the Little Missouri River, thirty miles north of Medora.

On the day following the dedication of Mount Roosevelt it was my great good fortune to meet Sylvane and Joe Ferris, men fashioned after the heart of the Colonel. They mourned his loss as one would a brother infinitely near and dear. Speaking of the building of the commodious ranch at Elkhorn, where the Colonel did much of his writing, Joe Ferris told me of one particularly amusing incident. Bill Sewall and Will Dow, two famous Maine woodsmen and old friends of Mr. Roosevelt's, had, upon the latter's invitation, gone to Elkhorn and assisted the Colonel in cutting the logs for the new ranch house and in building it. It seems that the Colonel's art as a wood-chopper was somewhat restricted. A cowboy was heard to ask one of them as the three were returning one night after a hard day in the woods, how many trees they had cut. "Well," said Will Dow, "Bill [Sewall] cut down fifty-three, I cut forty-nine, and the boss 'beavered' down seventeen." Any one familiar with the methods of the industrious beavers in gnawing down trees for their dams will appreciate this humorous description of the Colonel's way of chopping down a tree.

Suspicious of the Colonel's eyeglasses and fearing that they indicated "some moral rather than physical defect," the cowboys nicknamed the Colonel on sight the "four-eyed cow-puncher."

And about this time began Captain Seth Bullock's close friendship with Colonel Roosevelt, which lasted throughout the remainder of the latter's life. Seth Bullock had gone in search of his cattle from his own ranch at Belle Fourche (in South Dakota, one hundred and sixty miles south of Chimney Butte), which had strayed north, and Colonel Roosevelt had gone in search of his cattle, which had strayed south, and thus they met. I asked Seth Bullock what stood out foremost in his early recollection of Colonel Roosevelt, and he replied: "First, his absolute fairness; and, second, his unwillingness to ask his cowboys to do anything the Colonel himself would not do and did not do."

After the close of the Spanish-American War, through which Seth Bullock

MONUMENT ERECTED BY THE SOCIETY OF BLACK HILLS PIONEERS ON MOUNT THEODORE ROOSEVELT. VETERANS OF THE CIVIL WAR STANDING ON THE BASE OF THE MONUMENT—GENERAL WOOD AND CAPTAIN BULLOCK IN THE FOREGROUND served as a captain of Troop A in the Cowboy Regiment, he was, through the efforts of his friends, and unknown to himself, appointed Forest Supervisor for the Black Hills Forest Reserve.

In the above connection it is of interest to note that through a treaty made with the Sioux Indians the Black Hill country was opened for settlement in the fall of 1876 and Deadwood founded at that time. The Black Hills, located partly in northeastern Wyoming, but principally in southwestern South Dakota, cover an area of about 6,000 square miles, of which 1,988 square miles has been set apart by the United States Government as a Forest Reserve. Furthermore, that in accordance with the by-laws of the Society of Black Hills Pioneers, by whom the monument was erected on Mount Theodore Roosevelt, no person is eligible for membership who has settled in the Black Hills subsequent to January 1, 1877. That Colonel Roosevelt was elected its only honorary member was an honor of which he was particularly proud to the day of his death.

When Mr. Roosevelt was President, Seth Bullock had the pleasant but grave responsibility of "breaking in" each of three of Mr. Roosevelt's four sons in successive years, and with orders from the President that he was to "rope, throw, and brand" them in the cow-puncher's school.

Of one of the sons Captain Bullock delights to tell the following as typical of the Roosevelt spirit: "The day of his arrival we wanted some trout, so I told him to go and catch them in a near-by stream, but not to go into the water, as it was desperately cold. Looking him up later, I discovered the President's son wading in midstream with the water up to his waist. I asked him when he came ashore why he had done so, and his reply was: 'Well, you told me to catch some trout. I couldn't catch them from shore, so I went in and got them.'"

And right here I must tell you of the story of Seth Bullock, the promoter. It was supposed to have happened in Deadwood and is ample testimony of Seth Bullock's ability to embrace an opportunity possessing possibilities.

A shipment of supplies had come in, and among them was a case of eggs, a number of which, strange to relate, had not been broken. By some fortunate coincidence several gallons of sherry had arrived at the same time. Scanning both with growing interest, Seth Bullock permitted opportunity to knock but once at his mental door. Going to the bartender to whom the sherry was consigned, he asked him how he'd like to have an egg sherry, and the latter allowed as how it listened well, but that he didn't have any eggs. "Well," said Seth Bullock, "if I provide the eggs, will you provide the sherry?" to which the bartender readily agreed. Going next to the grocer to whom the eggs were shipped, he said, "How would you like an egg sherry?"

to which the grocer replied, "Fine, but I haven't any sherry." "All right," said Seth Bullock. "Bring three eggs and come with me," and took him back to the bartender. Whereupon three egg sherrys were duly prepared and appreciatively surrounded. It was not until then, however, that suspicion of aught amiss occurred to the bartender, who suddenly exclaimed, "Where the hell, Bill, does Seth come in on this ante?" To which Seth Bullock replied, with a pleasant smile, "Oh, I'm the promoter."

The Colonel had often said that without his ranching experience and the friends he made while a cow-puncher and rancher in the Black Hills he would never have been elected President of the United States; and after what I saw the statement is not hard to believe.

Rarely have I enjoyed so delightful an evening as that spent with Seth Bullock in Deadwood the night before the dedication of Mount Roosevelt. I had not seen him since those memorable days and nights during the Republican and Progressive Conventions in Chicago in 1912.

He told how one day one of Colonel Roosevelt's cowboys had hunted in vain for an hour down a coulee for a stray cow and calf, and returned swearing profusely, artistically, and at great length, with little repetition. The Colonel shut him off abruptly with a sharp reprimand and went himself to look for the missing pair. Returning at the end of several hours without success, but returning apparently only after the most diligent and wearying search, the Colonel hunted up the cowboy and said: "I didn't find 'em either; swear all you want to."

As Captain Bullock got up to go, with a look of infinite sadness, he said: "The Colonel was to have come out here this summer, and instead here are a lot of us gathered to dedicate a monument and mountain to him. The country is only beginning to sense its loss—a full realization of the extent of that loss must be left to the years to come. There have been two great Americans, Lincoln and Roosevelt, and I had the honor of knowing the latter."

A rare scholar, possessed with a courage that knew no fear, a man of great achievement, a never-ceasing fighter for right, champion of every movement for National, civic, industrial, and social betterment, of remarkable personality, a father of loving solicitude, a husband of tender devotion, one of God's great noble men, honored of all nations, worshiped by his friends, respected by his enemies, so lived Theodore Roosevelt, unsparing of self, lavish in his herculean efforts in behalf of humanity and his country.

As I beheld the rugged grandeur of the country Colonel Roosevelt had fought for so many years to reclaim I realized to the utmost that it had become indeed a land of promise trebly fulfilled. It even seemed as though, in defiance of the grave at Sagamore Hill, the Black Hills had called, and that Mount Theodore Roosevelt had possessed itself, as its unquestioned heritage, of the spirit of that great soul.

ROOSEVELT AS A PRACTICAL POLITICIAN

BY BRANDER MATTHEWS

THOMAS B. REED, sometime Speaker of the House of Representatives, once defined a statesman as "a successful politician—who is dead." The definition is characteristically clever; and it is at least as accurate as the generality of clever definitions. Abraham Lincoln was a statesman who was also a successful politician, up to every move of the game and always making the best of the cards which happened to be dealt to him by fate. Grover Cleveland, on the other hand, was a statesman who was not so successful a politician, in spite of his two terms in the White House. He did not always get on with his own party as well as he might; and he had no relish for practical politics, preferring to go his own way in his own fashion without making sure in advance of the necessary support. He belonged to the Democratic party, but he sometimes acted as if he believed that the Democratic party belonged to him. He did not hesitate to antagonize men from whom he might have won useful assistance.

Lincoln had no more persistent admirer than Theodore Roosevelt, who is said to have asked himself in any position of uncertainty what Lincoln would have done under similar circumstances. And like Lincoln, Roosevelt was an idealist, with a masterful understanding of the realities of political life. He was like Lincoln also in intuitive perception of popular feeling, due in large part to his sympathetic appreciation of human nature. Like Lincoln, once more, Roosevelt was ambitious; and like Lincoln he never allowed the promptings of this dangerous passion to swerve him from the path of duty. He had a firm conviction as to the abiding accuracy of the old saying that he serves his party best who serves his country best. But he believed in party government; and he was always ready "to go with his party" in non-essentials in the hope that he could persuade the party to go with him in essentials. He had no liking for intrigue; he never descended to "peanut politics;" but, as he wanted to accomplish certain results which he could not achieve single-handed and which were possible only with the support of the "organization," he was ever tactful in binding to himself all the elements of his party, even those of which he could not but disapprove.

II

He had confidence in the people, in the average American citizen, in the ordinary voter. He felt assured that the main body of our population was to be trusted and that it was itself ready to trust a leader who had proved his honesty. He accepted as axiomatic Lincoln's assertion that "you can fool part of the people all of the time and all of the people part of the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time." He did not doubt the ultimate wisdom of the people, its shrewdness, its insight, and its ability to size up those who appealed to it for support. He appreciated the fact that the people may blunder and flounder and make many mistakes of judgment; but he recognized also that in the long run they were pretty certain to arrive at a wise decision. And he knew that the American people had imagination and that they were at heart idealists, however sordid some of their practices might seem to be.

It was to this imagination, this idealism, this underlying morality, that Roosevelt was forever addressing himself, and in so doing he did not shrink from the spectacular. The raising of the Rough Riders, the building of the Panama Canal, the sending of the battleship fleet around the world, "ready for a frolic or a fight"—these were all spectacular, each in its own way. But no one of them was spectacular for its own sake; all of them had an immediate practical value, obvious to all men. Whenever Roosevelt hitched his wagon to a star, he made sure that the harness would hold and that the wheels would not catch fire.

He credited the average man with the keen moral sense and the high moral fervor that he himself possessed. He knew that to scoff at political morality and to call the Golden Rule an iridescent dream is bad politics, even if it is not worse; and that way madness lies and disgraceful defeat. Merely as policy, it was better for him to advocate the Square Deal, especially when he believed in it with the enthusiastic faith of a moral crusader. One of his opponents thought to pour contempt on him by the sneer that Roosevelt was forever talking about the Ten Commandments "as if he had written them himself." Well, he had written them in his own heart, which is more effective than merely reading them on a table of stone. He had not only written them, but he believed in them and accepted their obligations; and he was earnest in the effort to make others obey this code, even if they did not believe in it.

His hold upon the American people was due largely to his active imagination, his practical idealism, and his insistent moral energy, which awakened, aroused, and stimulated the imagination, the idealism, and the morality that he knew to be latent and only a little below the surface. He got the best out of the people because he asked for the best and because they could not help seeing that he himself practiced what he preached to others. So it was that the people had faith in him and came to believe that he would keep faith with them. The young men more especially rallied around him and were ready to follow his flag into the fight, feeling sure that he would be in the thick of it. The young are always more likely to respond to an appeal to their imagination than their more disenchanted elders, and they are more willing to run risks for the sake of their ideals.

No one of our political leaders in the hundred and thirty years of our history as a nation has ever been able to enlist an army of adherents as large as Roosevelt's—as enthusiastic, as personally devoted, and as eager to be led into the fray. He might make mistakes and his followers might not always be willing to go as far or as fast as he desired; but they did not think any the less of him. He might arouse bitter and vindictive opposition; but they loved him all the more for the enemies he had made. He might not always be as clear and exact in his use of words as he generally was; most of his battle-cries needed no apology and no explanation. They affixed themselves to the memory from the moment he uttered them.

Now and again, it is true, one of Roosevelt's slogans might be less felicitous than was his wont, as when he advocated the recall of judicial decisions, which seemed to threaten the integrity of the courts, and which therefore met with instant denunciation. But while his phrase was not fortunate, he was in fact only calling attention to a process of carrying out the popular will which had been applied repeatedly. The Dred Scott decision had been recalled by the Civil War, the legal tender decision had been recalled by a change in the membership of the Supreme Court; the anti-income tax decision had been recalled by an amendment to the Constitution; and we are now witnessing what will undoubtedly be a successful effort to recall the child labor decisions. Whenever a decision of a court, high or low, is shocking to the moral sense of the community, a way will be found sooner or later to recall it. The people themselves are the ultimate makers of the laws by which they intend to be governed; and it is right and proper for them to insist on recalling a decision of which they disapprove, even if it is also necessary for them to face the difficulty of the operation and to take time to express their will in accordance with all the forms of law and with all due deference to the necessity of respecting the courts.

III

The second cause of Roosevelt's astonishing success as a practical politician—that is to say, of his hold on the people—was due to his knowledge of human nature and to his sympathetic understanding of his fellow-man. Consider first of all his career—private school in New York City, then four years at Harvard, followed by a brief stay at the Law School of Columbia University, which he left to serve as a member of the Assembly of New York. Thereafter he went out to Montana to ranch and to hunt, until he was called to Washington to take a place as a Civil Service Commissioner, rising to be chairman and resigning at last to take charge of the New York Police Department. As the Spanish-American War grew near he resigned again to accept the position of Assistant Secretary of the Navy, that he might help the Navy to be ready for its approaching duties; and when the war broke at last he left the Navy for the Army, raising the Rough Riders and seeing active service in Cuba. On his return he was elected Governor of New York; and before his two years of this office were ended he had been elected Vice-President, succeeding to the Presidency in less than six months. This career afforded him a variety of experience greater than that of any of his predecessors in the White House; and it gave him an unequalled training.

Consider again the multiplicity of his points of contact with all sorts and conditions of men. As his father and mother had held an honorable place among the old families of New York, he was at ease with those who had inherited fortunes; he spoke their language and he had been brought up with their manners and customs. But as a result of the Western adventures he was equally at ease with the men who labored with their own hands, with ranchers and hunters. By official association he came to have a wide acquaintance with the men of the Army and with the men of the Navy. He had had intimate relations with the professional politicians of New York City and of New York State, with the police force and with the members of Tammany Hall. He mingled as an equal with the historians and the men of letters; and he had friends who were painters and sculptors. He was not afraid of highbrows and he was friendly with prize-fighters.

In short, he was a good "mixer," to employ an expressive word not yet recognized by the lexicographers. He was "folksy," to use another expressive word also waiting at the door of the dictionary. He liked people, and as long as they were good of their kind, he did not greatly care of what kind of people they were. He was not exclusive, or toplofty, although he was unfailingly dignified. He could get along with anybody and get the best out of him if there was any good in him. He was approachable and cordial; but he was also both shrewd and swift in his judgment of men; and he was almost unerring in his decisions. Rarely did he make any mistake in the choice of his associates, and more especially of his intimates. He had friends in every walk of life and in every State in the Union, and he profited greatly by the fact that a very large proportion of these friends were not in politics, even if they were all likely to take a healthy interest in public affairs, as a good citizen should. He had a host of friends entirely devoid of political ambition—so devoid that they refused the posts which he proffered them.

To say this is to suggest that he was intensely human. He liked to call himself a faunal naturalist; but the animal he knew best was the genus Homo. And it was in consequence of his clear-eyed insight into character that he was able to bind men to him and to get his own way, even from the baser sort of politician who did not aspire to his standards or share his ideals. His personality was so winning, his appeal was so persuasive, that there were few who could resist it.

After he had served his term as Governor of New York a friend asked him how it was that he had been able to get a Legislature dominated by the party machine to pass the law imposing a franchise tax and the law putting the Civil Service of the State rigidly on the merit system—two acts which that Legislature certainly was not anxious to pass. It is impossible, of course, to quote his exact words, but his explanation ran more or less in this wise:

"You must remember that I am a party man. I believe in party and in the organization by which only can a party retain its necessary cohesion and compactness. I consulted the party leaders when I had an appointment to make. Of course if the post to be filled demanded a man of a special kind with special qualifications and I knew the only man who could fill it properly I appointed him, and explained to the party leaders the absolute necessity of my selection. But for nine places out of ten all that was needed was a really good man, honest and capable and reasonably likely to make good in the post. One man of this sort would suit me as well as another. So I invited suggestions; and I was sometimes at first urged to appoint a broken-down and discredited party hack. Then I would gently point out the disadvantage to the party if I made that kind of appointment; and I requested another name. Very possibly the second man would be also a party hack, but not broken down and not discredited; and I would explain again that the leaders ought to be able to bring me a more attractive suggestion, one more in accord with the provisions of our platform. They would then name a better man, perhaps a man almost good enough; and I would thank them cordially and ask them to make a final effort—and that final effort would be the name of exactly the sort of man that I should have chosen if left to myself. Then when the time came for the passage of the bills that I wanted I sent for the leaders and told them that I had acted on their suggestion as regards all these appointments—and now the time had come for them to do something for me. And they did it!"

It was no wonder that Thomas C. Platt was extremely desirous of getting Roosevelt out of the Governorship and into the Vice-Presidency.

IV

Roosevelt's belief in the people was as solidly rooted as Jefferson's; his appreciation of human nature was as acute as Lincoln's; and his courage was as outstanding as Cleveland's. And courage, resolute and undaunted, is one of the most useful qualifications for political leadership. Without it the politician can never be a leader, since he only follows if he is not ready to take the risk of blazing a trail in advance. Roosevelt had imagination and the vision which only imagination can give; as a historian he knew the past (and very few men in public life have ever mastered all the details of our political history as he had mastered them) and as became a statesman he looked to the future. It was a daring deed to take the steps necessary to the building of the Panama Canal. It was a brave act to send the battleship fleet around the world. It demanded a bold confidence to proclaim loudly and repeatedly that we ought to enter the war the day after the Lusitania had been sunk.

It was once asserted that the difference between him and Mr. Taft as Presidents and when they were confronted with a crisis that called for immediate action lay in this—that Mr. Taft was ready to take any step which was authorized by law, and that Roosevelt did not hesitate to do anything which was not forbidden by law. He avoided the illegal, of course, for he was a law-abiding man; but in utilizing an unprecedented remedy for a wrong he did not shrink from the extralegal.

As an instance of his courageous method of disentangling himself from a legal difficulty, attention may be called to an achievement early in his management of the New York police. There was then a Chief of Police who had made himself popular with the newspaper men and who was believed to be competent and efficient. It was known, however, that Roosevelt did not approve of him and wished to get rid of him, which seemed impossible, since the tenure of a police official is carefully guarded by rigid legislation. Suddenly, to the surprise of everybody, this chief of police resigned, leaving Roosevelt master of the situation. How was this resignation extorted from a man who had boasted that he intended to hold his post to the end?

To a friend who requested the solution of this mystery Roosevelt explained the method he had adopted, a method beautiful in its simplicity.

"An investigation of the Police Department had revealed that the force was demoralized and that the conditions were unsatisfactory. Either the chief knew what had been going on, in which case he had failed in his duty, or he did not know, in which case he was incompetent. So I sent for him and asked for his resignation. He refused to give it. I told him that I intended to put him out on a certain charge, and I handed him the papers. He only glanced at them and said that he knew all about the charge and that his counsel, Mr. Carter and Mr. Choate (the two leaders of the New York bar), had assured him that the courts would reinstate him. I told him that I supposed this to be perfectly possible, but that the day the courts put him back I would put him out on a second charge. And I added that if he was again reinstated he would be put out on a third charge. As long as I was at the head of the Police Board I did not intend to have him as Chief of Police. Then I advised him to let me have his resignation, for I knew that some one of the charges against him would be completely sustained and he would leave office a disgraced man. He looked at me and I looked at him. Then without a word he left my office; and that afternoon I had his resignation."

The risk that Roosevelt ran is obvious. If he had put the Chief out three or four times, only to have him reinstated by the courts, it would have looked like persistent persecution; and there would have been an unending clamor against the flagrant injustice of the procedure.

There is another puzzle which Roosevelt never explained publicly and which will probably never be cleared up completely except by the official biographer, who will have access to all his papers. This is the sudden change of heart on the part of the heads of the coal roads at the time of the strike in the coal regions. These presidents of the companies engaged in mining coal declined to make any concessions to the strikers. They refused to submit anything to arbitration, and they told Roosevelt with offensive rudeness that they proposed to manage their own affairs in their own way. Then, most unexpectedly, they agreed to arbitrate, and a settlement was speedily arrived at which was satisfactory to the public. What were the influences by which Roosevelt was able to make the heads of the coal companies eat their words and do the one thing they had declared they never would do?

The explanation is to be found in the fact that the coal roads had been reorganized by the late J. P. Morgan, and that he controlled them, although he did not interfere in any way with their management. To Morgan came a member of Roosevelt's Cabinet bearing a message that the President felt that some way must be found to prevent a coal famine during the winter, which was only three or four weeks distant, and that he was going to follow the example of Cleveland in the Venezuela matter. He had prepared a Message to Congress asking for authorization to appoint a commission of five to investigate the coal business; not merely the conditions brought about by the strike, but the coal-mining industry as a whole, its history, its practices, its management, in all its recesses and in all its details. He intended to request an appropriation of $100,000 for expenses, and he had already chosen the five men who were to constitute the commission. They were all men of the highest character, whose names would carry weight with the American people and whose recommendations would demand acceptance. The chairman of the commission would be Grover Cleveland, who had already written accepting the appointment.

Morgan knew that Roosevelt would do as he had said, and he did not know what disturbing facts the proposed commission might uncover. So he notified the presidents of the coal companies that they must agree to arbitrate.

Roosevelt had found a way out of an apparently impossible difficulty by using his courage, his imagination, and his knowledge of human nature. When it was necessary, he could be a very practical politician.

THE SOCIETY OF NATIONS IN THE LIGHT OF THE PRESENT SITUATION

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE FROM ELBERT FRANCIS BALDWIN

YOU cannot live with the members of any family without realizing that they owe one another mutual protection.

So the nations of the world owe one another mutual protection, for the world is but one large family.

How can nations provide for such a mutual protection? In particular, how can they save mankind from another world war?

As in the family proper, so in the family of nations, any jealous rivalry must be removed. By what means can this be done? By providing the means for the common conduct of those nations' common affairs. To this end have been all the efforts to form a League, Federation, or Society of Nations.

The present year, one is glad to think, has seen a greater advance in this direction than has any other year. A Society of Nations has been formed. The co-operation has been apparently entirely friendly.

So far, so good. But the mere forming of a Society of Nations will not suffice unless those nations genuinely resolve to live and work harmoniously together.

It is all very well to get together and to frame a charter providing for direct responsibility in harmonizing international discords, for arbitrating disputes, for open diplomacy, for economic and social work, and then to amend that charter so that it has the approval of practically every national parliament; indeed, to change the very name: "League" to "Society," on the ground that a league or alliance has not proved lasting beyond a certain number of years—the Holy Alliance, for instance; whereas a federation or society, as we have seen in the cases of Switzerland and the United States, has lasted for very many years.

The plan, as thus far worked out, is indeed an accomplishment. Yet what if the plan will not work further? Is the Society of Nations standing the present strains upon it?

"Yes," say many men I see; "because here in Paris we have daily evidence of amicable interchange of views and amicable results arrived at conformable to the principles laid down for the charter of the Society of Nations. The Society is changing its character from that of a mere alliance to that of a real international government."

"Moreover, with regard to one particular feature, that of food, in which the United States has played the leading rôle, we see the Society of Nations at work in its most beneficent, humane, and best-organized activity."

At the same time the various attacks on the Society should be noted.

AMERICA

United States Senators assail the Society's charter as too pro-British, especially in the articles providing for the guarantee of territorial integrity. The Senators are still unsatisfied as regards the Monroe Doctrine and as regards alien disputes. On the other hand, there is a general suspicion here in Paris that we at home are not yet ready to make the necessary sacrifice of our comfort and our prejudices incumbent upon each component part of the Society. Our Commissioners agreed to the clause in the charter which involves the appointment of mandataries to supervise the affairs of nations not yet strong enough to stand alone. Why, then, say our critics, should we object if, in the unanimous judgment of all the other members of the Society's Executive Council, a mandate should be given us to supervise Armenia, for instance—a difficult job, it is true, but certainly one which, as Lord Bryce said to me, offers certain rewards to unselfish international service, and one which the United States could do better than any other nation, first, because we have no territorial ambitions, and, second, because of the splendid educational, charitable, medical, and missionary work which we have done there, a work amounting in volume and value to more than that of all the other nations put together?

As to our Commissioners themselves, I found in Italy much cynicism concerning any Society of Nations in which President Wilson should play a preponderant rôle. "What confidence can we have in a scheme so ordered," said an Italian to me, "when one hand of its principal protagonist withholds Fiume from us and the other hand gives Shantung to the Japanese? It looks as if your President had one policy for a subject which does not closely concern America and another policy for a subject which does."

Of course the Chinese express the same opinion. And no wonder! The opinion also finds an echo among many Americans.

My friend Baron Serge Korff, late Russian Vice-Governor of Finland, has just said: "The Great Powers doubtless want to make the small struggling peoples on the Russian western and northwestern border free and strong, and thus more and more a bulwark against Germany. But, I ask, just as our Admiral Kolchak is on the point of triumph, why do the Powers—already acting as a Society of Nations in embryo—hamper him by imposing obligations which can only bind him hand and foot? It has done this in its demand on him that if a solution of the relations between Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and others in the north, and the Caucasian and Transcaspian territories in the south, on the one hand, and Russia on the other, is not speedily reached a settlement will be made in consultation and co-operation with the Society of Nations; and that until such settlement is made the Kolchak Government agrees to recognize these territories as autonomous, and to confirm the relations which may exist between their de facto governments and the Entente Governments. The Society of Nations is thus playing right into the hands of Germany. It is continuing the exact German plan, which in order to rule Russia would first divide her. The Society's present action, however, is not as bad as was the incredible Prinkipo proposal and the still worse nomination of a man like Herron as your representative to the Prinkipo Conference, which would have been a practical recognition of Russian Bolshevism. If that is the sort of thing a Society of Nations is going to do, then I say we would be infinitely better off without any society at all."

ENGLAND

As to English influence, the chief British Commissioner, Mr. Lloyd George, believing disarmament to be an essential condition of the success of a Society of Nations, says that we cannot expect nations ravaged by war to trust their desolated lands to the Society's protection if its chief advocates themselves, the Great Powers, hesitate to show confidence in its guardianship. But, no matter what self-denying regulations the Great Powers may ultimately agree on as to their own military forces, are they really awakening the trust of those ravaged nations? Having demanded that the German army be reduced to 100,000 men, the Society of Nations would limit the armies of those smaller nations, but more generously, it is true, than in the case of Germany—for instance, Poland may not have more than 80,000 men; Czechoslovakia and Rumania, each not more than 60,000; Jugoslavia, 40,000. At first blush this might seem more than fair to those four nations, especially as they are as anxious as any one to demobilize. But, for the moment, what do they say? "Reduce Germany, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria—all right," remarked a Slav the other day: "that's the way to have peace. But to reduce the defense of those of us who have been ravaged and oppressed is only a new outrage for us. Our weakening would bring on a new war all the sooner."

"Again," he added, "no one of us seeks to evade his just debts. But is it right for the Peace Commissioners, acting as a Society of Nations, to demand that we shall pay any part of the actual expenses of a war waged against us? That would be monstrous."

He concluded: "The Society of Nations can go too far. Why is it preventing the Rumanians in Hungary from finishing for good and all with Bela Kun and his 85,000 men, many being the German troops of Marshal von Mackensen? Why is it permitting Bela to attack the Czechoslovaks at the same time? Anyway, what can you expect from a man like Lloyd George, who has been willing to leave Constantinople to the Turks?"

FRANCE

As to France, we see a nation which, having borne the burden of the war, now feels lonely and exposed, because the Americans and English are withdrawing and demobilizing their forces, just as if the war were over!

France is poorer by the loss of 1,500,000 men killed, and how many mutilated? But this is not all. Let it not be forgotten that France has lost twice as many men as England has. Let it not be forgotten that, compared with us, France has lost many times the number of men we have.

Yet never was there such need here as there is now for labor. For example, to replace the lack of native labor in one region our American forestry contingent is at this moment felling 150,000 trees in the Landes, necessary for immediate consumption in the rebuilding of houses, schools, and factories. This is a practical instance of what the fraternal work of a real Society of Nations can accomplish.

The French have expected that part of their army would by this time be demobilized and that their most pressing needs for labor would be met in some degree. But how can it be done when the French must now occupy the regions abandoned by the Americans and the English?

Then there is another poignant circumstance—the strikes, doubtless fomented by the Boches and Bolsheviki working hand in hand. Their plotting has all the more fruitful ground for success in a country like France, where capital and labor do not yet understand each other as well as they do in England and America—do not yet understand that their interests are in common and that there must be economic harmony for the common good. The employees of a particular concern go on strike, as did the employees of the great dry-goods store the "Printemps," for example; or the employees of a particular industry go on strike, as did those of the sugar refineries just outside of Paris last month. To hear the strikers' talk you might think that they represented some individualistic entity, opposed by all other men. You get no notion from the talk that the strikers realize in any degree that there must be union with all other men, a mutual development.

France is economically ill. That itself is bad enough. But what is worse is the fact that her illness menaces the health of all other nations. Fortunately, French statesmen are alive to both these things. As to external danger—a future war by Germany—they are grateful for the promised Anglo-American alliance in that event intervening in their behalf. But as to internal danger, how glad they would be to have the moral significance of even a very few American and English soldiers here!

In this connection, while it would be better to have an imperfect Society of Nations than to have none at all, French statesmen still protest that no provision has yet been made for the support of the well-nigh universal opinion favorable to a Society of Nations by a proportionate force. In the words of M. Bourgeois to me: "The armaments of each state should be limited to the needs of the state's internal security, but the contingents for an international force should be so selected that it would be sure of the last word! It is necessary that any future Teutonic alliance should realize that in a recourse to arms it would face a force already completely organized, capable of breaking all resistance and compelling respect for law and justice."

GERMANY

There are arguments on both sides as to whether it was or was not a good thing to insert the charter of the Society of Nations in the Peace Treaty. But one thing is sure, anyway—Germany does not yet appreciate (nor do we altogether, I fancy) that the Treaty's value in securing reparation and in preventing future war directly depends upon that Society. Especially does Germany not appreciate the fact that the incorporation of the Society's charter makes the Treaty more elastic than any other has been.

And yet Germany is expecting great things from our Society of Nations. She did, indeed, put forward an alternative scheme for a League of Nations which was at once rejected by the Allies here as unworkable. Nothing daunted, Germany, without the slightest confession that she has sinned and without one word of repentance, demanded admittance into our Society. She doubtless expects that the camouflaged militarism which masks itself under her new Government will meet the entrance qualifications—namely, that the applying state shall have a free self-government, inspiring confidence; that it shall give effective guarantees of sincere intention to observe international obligations; that it shall have loyally carried out a good part of its obligations and show a patent resolve to carry out the rest; and that it shall accept armament limitations as regulated by the Society of Nations.

What Germany is really after is to unsettle the existing Society of Nations at its base; second, to evade all possible performance of international obligations; and, third, to obtain from it the economic and territorial advantages which she was not able to obtain by force.

Again, and in particular, the Society of Nations is helping Germany at this actual moment. The great question here

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

(C) International Film Service

THIS FINE PHOTOGRAPH OF PRESIDENT
WILSON AND CARDINAL MERCIER WAS MADE IN FRONT OF THE CARDINAL'S
RESIDENCE AT MALINES DURING PRESI-DENT WILSON'S RECENT VISIT TO BELGIUM

(C) Press Illustrating Service

A PIONEER BISHOP

Here, in Augustus Lakeman's equestrian statue of the first American Methodist Bishop, Francis Asbury, is a characteristic presentation of the old-time pioneer circuit rider

Photo Edwin Levick

(C) Underwood & Underwood

THE NEW AND OLD COMMANDERS OF OUR ATLANTIC FLEET

Rear-Admiral Henry B. Wilson (to the left in the portrait) has just succeeded Rear-Admiral Henry T. Mayo in command of the American Atlantic Fleet. The new Admiral is saluting the old Admiral as the flag is raised. On the same occasion both Admirals received the French Legion of Honor decoration

(C) Underwood & Underwood
THE ARRIVAL OF THE R-34 AT MINEOLA, LONG ISLAND, ON SUNDAY MORNING, JULY 6,
AFTER A TEMPESTUOUS VOY-AGE ACROSS THE ATLANTIC

International Film Service

MAJOR G. H. SCOTT, IN COMMAND OF THE R-34
ON HER TRANSATLANTIC VOYAGE. THIRTY-ONE MEN IN ALL MADE THE VOYAGE

International Film Service

LIEUTENANT ZACHARY LANSDOWNE, OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY, WHO BY INVITATION REPRESENTED THIS COUNTRY ON THE VOYAGE

(C) Underwood & Underwood
"GRUB" FOR THE BRITISH
DIRIGIBLE. THESE "BOTTLES" OF HYDROGEN GAS MAKE ONE
OF A NUMBER OF PILES OF SUCH BOTTLES ASSEMBLED AT ROOSEVELT FIELD, MINEOLA.
TO REFILL THE R-34 FOR HER RETURN VOYAGE

THE LARGEST AIRSHIP IN THE WORLD

The British naval dirigible R-34 arrived at Mineola, Long Island, on July 6. An account of the voyage and description of the craft will be found elsewhere

Digitized by Google

to-day (June 13) is, "Will she sign the Peace Treaty?"

"Yes," say most people, "she will sign, even though knowing that she cannot execute because she can no longer resist her conquerors by force of arms."

"No," say others, "she will not sign, and for this reason: What the Germans want above all else is protection to person and property. Suppose the German Commissioners sign. The Ebert Government will fall the next day. No government, certainly no Ebert, could stand up against that. What comes in? Perhaps a Haase Government—the Independent Socialists replacing the Majority Socialists. Now, you may be for Haase and not for Ebert, but you must admit that if the majority of Socialists do not protect persons and property better than at present the Minority Socialists could protect not at all. No matter how much new freedom and independence the Haase people might introduce, Germany would drift from bad to worse. There would be anarchy—just what most Germans want to avoid."

"But suppose Germany does not sign. One of two things would occur. Either Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau would place in the hands of the Ententists a decree dividing the German National Assembly and containing the resignation of President Ebert and of all the Ministers and requesting the Ententists to exercise all the sovereign rights of the German state and all the governmental powers; or the non-signature would enormously strengthen the present Government, which already gives a certain protection, and of course the Entente Allies would have to extend throughout Germany the protecting Governments which have worked so well in the occupied zones along the Rhine—the people would thus have a double security of law and order."

We outsiders would then have the demonstration of a Society of Nations at work for the ultimate redemption of a morally bankrupt Power.

We could presumably expect a more immediate result, however, in so far as the Treaty is concerned, through its early signing by the various governing forces in Germany. The slight amendments as to frontiers and finance so far admitted to that Treaty proves the desire of those constituting the Society of Nations to act fairly. These amendments are not an admission of weakness, but of strength.

These are the critical days for the Society of Nations. These are the days when it must meet the special conditions arising in America, England, France, Italy, Rumania, Japan, China, in the newly made nations—and in Germany. They are testing the Society's backbone. Has it a real backbone? Has it a real fiber? It has.

At the same time, to demonstrate this to the world it must be permeated by a greater atmosphere of understanding, of less political time-serving, less listening for the next election. There must be, in short, less indecision, more force.

Taken as a whole, however, the Society of Nations is not losing, but gaining, ground.

Paris, June 13, 1919.

THE SIEGE OF BERLIN<sup>1</sup>

A STORY BY ALPHONSE DAUDET

Remote from Prussia as we are, we Americans can understand only through imagination the nature of the Prussian menace; but the French know it, for they are Prussia's neighbors. This is not the first time that France has seen the wearers of the spiked helmet on her soil. This story of Daudet's is not only a prophecy of what is happening in these days, but is also a reminder of the fact that France for many years has been on the frontier of freedom.—THE EDITORS.

WE were going up the Champs Elysées with Doctor V——, gathering from the walls pierced by shell, the pavement plowed by grapeshot, the history of the besieged Paris, when just before reaching the Place de l'Etoile, the doctor stopped and pointed out to me one of those large corner houses so pompously grouped around the Arc de Triomphe.

"Do you see," said he, "those four closed windows on the balcony up there? In the beginning of August, that terrible month of August of '70, so laden with storm and disaster, I was summoned there to attend a case of apoplexy. The sufferer was Colonel Jouve, an old Cuirassier of the First Empire, full of enthusiasm for glory and patriotism, who, at the commencement of the war, had taken an apartment with a balcony in the Champs Elysées—for what do you think? To assist at the triumphal entry of our troops! Poor old man! The news of Wissembourg arrived as he was rising from table. On reading the name of Napoleon at the foot of that bulletin of defeat he fell senseless."

"I found the old Cuirassier stretched upon the floor, his face bleeding and inert as from the blow of a club. Standing, he would have been very tall; lying, he looked immense; with fine features, beautiful teeth, and white curling hair, carrying his eighty years as though they had been sixty. Beside him knelt his granddaughter in tears. She resembled him."

Seeing them side by side, they reminded me of two Greek medallions stamped with the same impress, only the one was antique, earth-stained, its outlines somewhat worn; the other beautiful and clear, in all the luster of freshness.

"The child's sorrow touched me. Daughter and granddaughter of soldiers—for her father was on MacMahon's staff—the sight of this old man stretched before her evoked in her mind another vision no less terrible. I did my best to reassure her, though in reality I had but little hope. We had to contend with hæmoptysis, from which at eighty there is small chance of recovery."

"For three days the patient remained in the same condition of immobility and stupor. Meanwhile came the news of Reichshofen—you remember how strangely? Till the evening we all believed in a great victory—twenty thousand Prussians killed, the Crown Prince prisoner."

"I cannot tell by what miracle, by what magnetic current, an echo of this national joy can have reached our poor invalid, hitherto deaf to all around him; but that evening, on approaching the bed, I found a new man. His eye was almost clear, his speech less difficult, and he had the strength to smile and to stammer:

"'Victory, victory.'"

"'Yes, Colonel, a great victory.' And as I gave the details of MacMahon's splendid success I saw his features relax and his countenance brighten."

"When I went out his granddaughter was waiting for me, pale and sobbing."

"'But he is saved,' said I, taking her hands."

"The poor child had hardly courage to answer me. The truth as to Reichshofen had just been announced, MacMahon a fugitive, the whole army crushed. We looked at each other in consternation, she anxious at the thought of her father, I trembling for the grandfather. Certainly he would not bear this new shock. And yet what could we do? Let him enjoy the illusion which had revived him? But then we should have to deceive him."

"'Well, then, I will deceive him,' said the brave girl, and hastily wiping away her tears she re-entered her grandfather's room with a beaming face."

"It was a hard task she had set herself. For the first few days it was comparatively easy, as the old man's head was weak, and he was as credulous as a child. But with returning health came clearer ideas. It was necessary to keep him au courant with the movements of the army and to invent military bulletins. It was pitiful to see that beautiful girl bending night and day over her map of Germany, marking it with little flags, forcing herself to combine the whole of a glorious campaign—Bazaine on the road to Berlin, Frossard in Bavaria, MacMahon on the Baltic. In all this she asked my counsel, and I helped her as far as I could, but it was the grandfather who did the most for us in this imaginary invasion. He had conquered Germany so often during the

<sup>1</sup> From "Tales from Many Sources," by permission of Dodd, Mead & Co.

First Empire. He knew all the moves beforehand. 'Now they should go there. This is what they will do,' and his anticipations were always realized, not a little to his pride. Unfortunately, we might take towns and gain battles, but we never went fast enough for the Colonel. He was insatiable. Every day I was greeted with a fresh feat of arms.

"'Doctor, we have taken Mayence,' said the young girl, coming to meet me with a heartrending smile, and through the door I heard a joyous voice crying:

"'We are getting on, we are getting on. In a week we shall enter Berlin.'

"At that moment the Prussians were but a week from Paris. At first we thought it might be better to move to the provinces, but once out of doors, the state of the country would have told him all, and I thought him still too weak, too enervated, to know the truth. It was therefore decided that they should stay where they were.

"On the first day of the investment I went to see my patient—much agitated, I remember, and with that pang in my heart which we all felt at knowing that the gates of Paris were shut, that the war was under our walls, that our suburbs had become our frontiers.

"I found the old man jubilant and proud.

"'Well,' said he, 'the siege has begun.'

"I looked at him, stupefied.

"'How, Colonel, do you know?'

"His granddaughter turned to me, 'Oh, yes, Doctor, it is great news. The siege of Berlin has commenced.'

"She said this composedly, while drawing out her needle. How could he suspect anything? He could not hear the cannon nor see that unhappy Paris, so sullen and disorderly. All that he saw from his bed was calculated to keep up his delusion. Outside was the Arc de Triomphe, and in the room quite a collection of souvenirs of the First Empire. Portraits of marshals, engravings of battles, the King of Rome in his baby robes; the stiff consoles, ornamented with trophies in brass, were covered with Imperial relics, medals, bronzes; a stone from St. Helena under a glass shade; miniatures all representing the same becurled lady, in ball-dress, in a yellow gown with leg-of-mutton sleeves and light eyes; and all—the consoles, the King of Rome, the medals, the yellow ladies with short waists and sashes under their arms—in that style of awkward stiffness which was the grace of 1806. Good Colonel! it was this atmosphere of victory and conquest, rather than all we could say, which made him believe so naively in the siege of Berlin.

"From that day our military operations became much simpler. Taking Berlin was merely a matter of patience. Every now and then, when the old man was tired of waiting, a letter from his son was read to him—an imaginary letter, of course, as nothing could enter Paris, and as, since Sedan, MacMahon's aide-de-camp had been sent to a German fortress. Can you not imagine the despair of the poor girl, without tidings of her father, knowing him to be a prisoner, deprived of all comforts, perhaps ill, and yet obliged to make him speak in cheerful letters, somewhat short, as from a soldier in the field, always advancing in a conquered country. Sometimes, when the invalid was weaker than usual, weeks passed without fresh news. But was he anxious and unable to sleep, suddenly a letter arrived from Germany which she read gayly at his bedside, struggling hard with her tears. The Colonel listened religiously, smiling with an air of superiority, approving, criticising, explaining; but it was in the answers to his son that he was at his best. 'Never forget that you are a Frenchman,' he wrote; 'be generous to those poor people. Do not make the invasion too hard for them.' His advice was never ending; edifying sermons about respect of property, the politeness due to ladies—in short, quite a code of military honor for the use of conquerors. With all this he put in some general reflections on politics and the conditions of the peace to be imposed on the vanquished. With regard to the latter, I must say he was not exacting:

"'The war indemnity and nothing else. It is no good to take provinces. Can one turn Germany into France?'

"He dictated this with so firm a voice, and one felt so much sincerity in his words, so much patriotic faith, that it was impossible to listen to him unmoved.

"Meanwhile the siege went on—not the siege of Berlin, alas! We were at the worst period of cold, of bombardment, of epidemic, of famine. But, thanks to our care and the indefatigable tenderness which surrounded him, the old man's serenity was never for a moment disturbed. Up to the end I was able to procure white bread and fresh meat for him, but for him only. You could not imagine anything more touching than those breakfasts of the grandfather, so innocently egotistic, sitting up in bed, fresh and smiling, the napkin tied under his chin, at his side his granddaughter, pale from her privations, guiding his hands, making him drink, helping him to eat all these good, forbidden things. Then, revived by the repast, in the comfort of his warm room, with the wintry wind shut out and the snow eddying about the window, the old Cuirassier would recall his Northern campaigns and would relate to us that disastrous retreat in Russia where there was nothing to eat but frozen biscuit and horseflesh.

"'Can you understand that, little one? We ate horseflesh.'

"I should think she did understand it. For two months she had tasted nothing else. As convalescence approached our task increased daily in difficulty. The numbness of the Colonel's senses, as well as of his limbs, which had hitherto helped us so much, was beginning to pass away. Once or twice already those terrible volleys at the Porte Maillot had made him start and prick up his ears like a war-horse; we were obliged to invent a recent victory of Bazaine's before Berlin and salvoes fired from the Invalides in honor of it. Another day (the Thursday of Buzenval, I think it was) his bed had been pushed to the window, whence he saw some of the National Guard massed upon the Avenue de la Grande Armée.

"'What soldiers are those?' he asked, and we heard him grumbling beneath his teeth:

"'Badly drilled, badly drilled.'

"Nothing came of this, but we understood that henceforth greater precautions were necessary. Unfortunately, we were not careful enough.

"One evening I was met by the child in much trouble.

"'It is to-morrow they make their entry,' she said.

"Could the grandfather's door have been open? In thinking of it since, I remember that all that evening his face wore an extraordinary expression. Probably he had overheard us; only we spoke of the Prussians and he thought of the French, of the triumphal entry he had so long expected, MacMahon descending the Avenue amid flowers and flourish of trumpets, his own son riding beside the marshal, and he himself on his balcony, in full uniform as at Lützen, saluting the ragged colors and the eagles blackened by powder.

"Poor Colonel Jouve! He no doubt imagined that we wished to prevent his assisting at the defile of our troops, lest the emotion should prove too much for him, and therefore took care to say nothing to us; but the next day, just at the time the Prussian battalions cautiously entered the long road leading from the Porte Maillot to the Tuileries, the window up there was softly opened and the Colonel appeared on the balcony with his helmet, his sword, all his long-unused, but glorious apparel of Milhaud's Cuirassiers.

"I often ask myself what supreme effort of will, what sudden impulse of fading vitality, had placed him thus erect in harness.

"All we know is that he was there, standing at the railing, wondering to find the wide avenue so silent, the shutters all closed, Paris like a great lazaret, flags everywhere, but such strange ones, white with red crosses, and no one to meet our soldiers.

"For a moment he may have thought himself mistaken.

"But no! there, behind the Arc de Triomphe, there was a confused sound, a black line advancing in the growing daylight—then, little by little, the spikes of the helmets glisten, the little drums of Jena begin to beat, and under the Arc de l'Etoile, accompanied by the heavy tramp of the troops, by the clatter of sabers, bursts forth Schubert's 'Triumphal March.'

"In the dead silence of the streets was heard a cry, a terrible cry:

"'To arms!—to arms!—the Prussians.' And the four Uhlans of the advance guard might have seen up there, on the balcony, a tall old man stagger, wave his arms, and fall. This time Colonel Jouve was dead. Digitized by Google

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of July 9, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: Versailles and After; Protests; Ratify the Treaty.

Reference: Pages 389, 390; 393, 394.

Questions:

1. The Germans have signed the Treaty of Peace. What does The Outlook mean in saying: "The United States to-day is still at war with Germany. Not merely technically at war"? 2. What reasons does The Outlook advance for believing that "if this peace is to be a peace of justice, it must be a peace of vigilance"? 3. Give the German people and nation five reasons why they "fail to command the world's respect." 4. Make a list of the protests against the Treaty of Versailles mentioned by The Outlook. Why these protests? Can you add any further protests? 5. Discuss whether China did right in refusing to sign the Treaty. 6. Give as many reasons as you can why the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles is more significant than the ratification of any other treaty in American history. 7. What, according to The Outlook, will the ratification of this Treaty by all the Allied nations mean? Does it seem to you that it will mean all these things? Reasons. 8. Tell what you think of The Outlook's belief as to the result if we fail to accept the treaty and do not enter the League of Nations. 9. Discuss: The Treaty is by no means perfect, but it is a big advance over the diplomatic method of 1914. 10. Give arguments for and against this proposition: America can in the future "render the greatest service to the world if it is allowed to express its opinion as an independent and impartial state as each crisis in civilization arises."

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: Industrial Democracy on Trial.

Reference: Editorial, pages 394-396.

Questions:

1. From this editorial and other sources, state and explain several reasons for industrial unrest. 2. Explain somewhat at length what industrial democracy is. 3. What reasons are there for believing that it is on trial? 4. Give several reasons for believing, now that the war is over, that the first problem which must be solved is industrial reconstruction. 5. How does Mr. John Leitch believe organized industries can be made democratic? 6. Make clear what The Outlook means by saying that industrial democracy is much more than profit-sharing. 7. Labor has been and now generally is excluded from representation in the control of industry. Discuss the results of this. Do you think that labor should be represented in the ownership and management of all businesses? Reasons. 8. Among the schemes advocated for the improvement of social and industrial conditions are communism, Socialism, anarchism, the single tax, and constructive liberalism. Explain briefly the meaning of each and tell your own opinion of these schemes. 9. Discuss whether poverty and pauperism could be banished from the United States in twenty-five years. 10. You would do well to own "Industry and Humanity," by W. L. Mackenzie King (Houghton Mifflin), and "Principles of Political Economy," by T. N. Carver (Ginn). Read also a suggestive book, "Proposed Roads to Freedom," by B. Russell (Henry Holt).

III—LOCAL AFFAIRS

Topic: North Dakota's Rash Adventure.

Reference: Editorial, pages 396, 397.

Questions:

1. What is North Dakota's adventure? The Outlook considers it rash. Do you? Reasons. 2. Furnish proofs for The Outlook's statement: America "is built in such a way as to make experiments comparatively safe and simple." Illustrate by giving not less than one experiment from each of the following phases of public life: social, educational, religious, industrial, and political. 3. Why has North Dakota undertaken this experiment? Explain. 4. What are some of the things that, in your opinion, are against true Americanism? Illustrate your answer. 5. What is State paternalism? Discuss whether we have enough of it in the United States.

IV—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. The Irish question is purely a domestic affair. 2. All true Americans will heartily welcome the return of President Wilson.

V—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for July 9, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Technically, treaty, league, alarmists (389); ratify, negotiate (393); impracticable (394); referendum, eminent domain (396); tinctured, leeches, reactionary (397).

"A GENTLE CYNIC"

Under this title, chosen by Professor Jastrow, of the University of Pennsylvania, for his new theory and new metrical version of the Book of Ecclesiastes, "The Preacher," The Outlook reviewed it in its issue of June 18. As stated then, he regards it as a genial satire by an unknown Hebrew "Omar Khayyám," to which some orthodox critic, or critics, have added comments, amendments, and replies.

It should not be forgotten that in 1905 a more serious and more definite view of that puzzling book was presented by an equally eminent Semitic scholar, Professor Haupt, of Johns Hopkins University. He attributes the genuine portions of it to a Sadducean physician at Jerusalem in the second century B.C. The Epicurean view of life which he inculcated under the pseudonym of King Solomon naturally roused the ire of orthodox critics. The Pharisees, unable to suppress the book, injected into it the neutralizing comments and replies which resulted in its admission, A.D. 90, into the Jewish canon of Holy Scripture. In that dark time for Judaism it may have seemed to those rabbis what Luther in his stormy career declared it—"a book of consolation."

Professor Haupt's metrical version of it, with an Introduction and notes, makes a handsome quarto of forty-seven pages, from the Johns Hopkins Press, price-marked fifty cents. His translation of the passage, "Cast thy bread upon the waters," etc. (xi. 1, 2), is eminently Sadducean and worldly-wise:

"Send thy breadcorn across the water,
Though it take many days—thou wilt regain it;
But apportion it 'twixt seven or eight [ships];
For what may happen, thou knowest not."
J. M. W.

CONFIDENCE RESTORED

The article by F. M. Davenport in The Outlook of June 4 will restore confidence in The Outlook among some of its readers. The friends of the progress of social well-being are not sufficiently numerous in the party of Mr. Davenport and Colonel Roosevelt to keep other friends of social progress assured; the position won by Senators Penrose and Warren and by Congressman Mann in the organization of this Congress is not reassuring; and for that reason the words of Mr. Davenport are timely. Too many periodicals of the class of The Outlook appear to be committed irrevocably to the opposition to Mr. Wilson and have sought to undermine him in the public confidence till protests from their readers forced a change of tone. This article should serve as a warning that there is a section of the Republican following which will not go to all lengths in its distrust of the Democrats as a party without financial convictions and with a "pandering tendency." Does not Mr. Davenport's cross-section of Albany Republican politics show in the Republican party a "pandering tendency"? It is well that The Outlook still stands as the spokesman of the Rooseveltian conscience and warns certain interests that if the poor are not to rob the rich the Republican party will not be permitted to hold the poor while some of the rich rob them.

JOHN MCCARTHY,
Pastor Eastwood Memorial Methodist Church,
Caruthersville, Missouri.

They couldn't believe it would happen—but it did. And that hospital fire cost the lives of ten bedridden patients and three nurses.

Some five billion dollars of business property has been protected from fire by automatic sprinklers.

State Industrial Commissions are guarding the lives of factory employees by requiring this same un-failing protection in business property.

The United States Government insisted on war industries being so protected.

Are you one of the dull public ?

"THERE is not much chance of a fire in a hospital," said the doctor.

"Unless somebody overturns an alcohol stove or unless there is defective wiring—or something happens in the heating plant—or unless—well, I guess I'm getting myself in trouble here," he ended ruefully.

Many other good and useful citizens would say just what this doctor said. You never can know and appreciate fire dangers till you stop and think how many, many causes there are, and how worthless ordinary methods of prevention have proved themselves.

Hospitals for the insane with splendid equipment for helping or curing the mentally unfit; hospitals where little crippled children grow strong and learn once more to play; hospitals where the blind are taught trades so they can go back to a happy and natural life; hospitals where wounded heroes are made whole again; all with the finest of modern appliances, light, air, sunshine, heroic doctors and nurses—but no fire-fighting apparatus worth mentioning.

Constant exposure to the worst kind of death in institutions dedicated to humanity, the world over!

Investigate your own Hospital. Find out for yourself what will mean safety for the patients.

Don't put on your nurses, those fine women already giving their lives to the service of others, the cruel burden of responsibility in case of fire.

See that your hospital is equipped with Grinnell Automatic Sprinkler System. Like a hundred firemen scattered throughout the building, always on the job! When the fire starts, the water starts—no chance for the fire to spread.

Read—"Fire Tragedies and Their Remedy"

Parents, trustees, or officials will find in "Fire Tragedies and Their Remedy" the unvarnished truth and a path of imperative social service. Write for it today. Address General Fire Extinguisher Company, 289 West Exchange Street, Providence, R. I.

GRINNELL
AUTOMATIC SPRINKLER SYSTEM
When the fire starts the water starts

Towels & Bed Linens at McCutcheon's

Reg. Trade-Mark

THE present is a particularly opportune time to lay in a supply of Towels, Sheets, Pillow Cases and other housekeeping Linens for the town house and the country home.

We cannot emphasize too strongly the impossibility of lower prices on Linens for another year at least. The destruction of machinery in Belgium and the failure to plant flax in Russia, make it certain that the world's supply of Linens will be far short of the demand for a long time to come.

The Luxury Tax does not apply to Linens

Linen Towels

Hemstitched Guest Towels, $7.50 to 13.50 doz.

Bedroom and Bathroom Towels, $9.00 to 24.00 doz.

Hemstitched

Pure Linen Sheets

Single-bed size, $16.50 to 50.00 per pair.
Double-bed size, $13.50 to 60.00 per pair.

Hemstitched

Pure Linen Pillow Cases

22 1/2 x 36 inches, $3.50 to 7.50 per pair.

Bath Towels, Mats, Etc.

Hemmed Bath Towels, $4.20 to 22.50 doz.

Hemstitched Bath Towels, $21.00 to 30.00 doz.

Bath Sheets, 52 x 69 inches, $3.50 each,
60 x 72 inches, 5.50 each.

Bath Mats, $1.00 to 3.25 each.

Kitchen Towels, $3.25 to 9.50 doz.

Glass Towels, $6.00, 7.00 and 7.50 doz.

Roller Towels, $1.00, 1.30, 1.40 each.

MAIL ORDER SERVICE: Any of the merchandise described or illustrated above may be ordered with complete satisfaction through our Mail Order Service

James McCutcheon & Company
Fifth Avenue, 34th & 33d Sts., N. Y.

The Outlook Will Buy Your Spare Time

and pay you well for it. The work consists simply in taking subscriptions, and your profits are immediate and generous on new subscriptions and renewals alike. The more time you give, the more you will make.

This is a splendid opportunity for a man or woman—or boy or girl—who would like to earn extra money, and who is willing to work in a pleasant way to do so. Write to-day, asking details of The Outlook's Co-operative Profit Plan, addressing Desk E, Representatives' Division,

The Outlook Company, 881 Fourth Avenue, New York City

THE NEW BOOKS

This Department will include descriptive notes, with or without brief comments, about books received by The Outlook. Many of the important books will have more extended and critical treatment later

FICTION

All the Brothers Were Valiant. By Ben Ames Williams. The Macmillan Company, New York.

A story of love and sea adventure of quite unusual vigor and imaginative vividness. There is tragedy in the situations, but there is also the record of high purpose and dauntless character.

Black Sheep Chapel. By Margaret Baillie-Saunders. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Black Sheep Chapel was originally Bank Chepe [market] Chapel, and was once owned by the London Vintners' Company. It becomes a ritualistic church and its sacristan, a dealer in sawdust, and his adopted son, whom he means to offer as a second Samuel to the divine service, are chief among the novel's characters. One might expect a story of pietism or propaganda; on the contrary, the novel is intensely human and has a good deal of gentle irony. It is decidedly original and well written.

Foreign Magic. Tales of Every-Day China. By Jean Carter Cochran. Illustrated. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Too many books about the Chinese make them seem utterly alien and almost unhuman; this book brings the reader into sympathetic touch with the kindly traits of the race as seen by one whose own spiritual attributes bring out the best in her Chinese friends. This is the "Foreign Magic" that wins and transforms the individuals described in these tales of Chinese life.

Haunted Bookshop (The). By Christopher Morley. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City.

A story that begins so realistically that the reader is impelled to take down the telephone book to get the address of the haunted bookshop. The tale starts quietly enough to please the most scholastic bookworm, but ends with thrills that will satisfy the most exacting lover of melodrama.

Saint's Progress. By John Galsworthy. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

In the delicacy yet firmness of its fictional art this may be classed with Mr. Galsworthy's best novels. Never once does the reader's interest falter, never once do the four or five principal characters lose definite outline and human reality. Passion, sorrow, disillusionment, and perplexity are here in abundance. The war's effects in England are generalized, by intimation at least, as being disheartening and morally relaxing. Not all people will agree with the soundness of all this shadowy intimation. The progress which Mr. Galsworthy's Saint (a sweet-natured parson) makes is not an advance in faith, hope, and patriotism, but a shaking of his archaic theological dogmas and a confusion of mind as to England's social future.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Boy Scouts Book of Stories (The). Edited by Franklin K. Mathews. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

The Boy Scout must be abnormal indeed if he doesn't find this book to his liking. It contains stories selected from the works of O. Henry, R. L. Stevenson, Arthur Conan Doyle, Mark Twain, Joseph C. Lincoln, and other writers who know boys and how to write boys' stories. It is safe to say that it will soon become a wellthumbed book in any place where it falls within the reach of a group of boys.

The New Books (Continued)

Joyous Travelers (The). By Maud Lindsay and Emilie Poulsson. Illustrated. The Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company, Boston.

Nice stories, nice pictures, nice verses for nice children to read or have read to them about bedtime. Pleasant dreams are sure to follow, for these fairy stories are old-fashioned enough to have happy endings and new-fashioned enough to rouse and keep the interest of all children who love an imaginative tale.

BIOGRAPHY

Iron Hunter (The). By Chase S. Osborn. Illustrated. The Macmillan Company, New York.

The "iron hunter" sought and found iron mines with much success; and when, in their turn, the people of Michigan were hunting for a capable man for Governor, they found the "iron hunter" and elected him. The story of his life as here told will thrill all progressive Americans; it is replete with stirring incidents and is told with dramatic effect.

Journal of a Disappointed Man (The). By W. N. P. Barbellion. Introduction by H. G. Wells. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Mr. Wells in his preface says: "In this diary of an intensely egotistical young naturalist, tragically caught by the creeping approach of death, we have one of the most moving aspects of our universal struggle." The diary is in fact moving and also depressing, but the reader is saved from being steeped in gloom by the acuteness of the writer's comment on men and life. The book is morbid and feverish but brilliant. Is it disguised fiction or actual diary, or a mingling of both? Most people who read Marie Bashkirtseff's journal will inevitably be reminded of that singular ebullition, not by the matter but by the manner of this diary. So when, half-way through the book, Barbellion discovers Marie and declares, "She is the very spit of me," one wonders whether this is not a device whereby the author forestalls a natural comment. At any rate, it is certainly true that, as Barbellion says: "She feels as I feel. We have the same self-absorption, the same vanity and corroding ambition. She is impressionable, volatile, passionate—ill! So am I." Whatever its inner history, the book has a fascination of its own, dismal as its ending is.

Life of John Redmond (The). By Warre B. Wells. Illustrated. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

A sympathetic yet judicial account of the life of one of Ireland's recent leaders. The book is largely, and necessarily, a history of Irish politics during the last generation; it is singularly fair-minded, and will make a strong appeal to people who wish to study the question of Home Rule dispassionately and with open minds.

HISTORY. POLITICAL ECONOMY. AND POLITICS
Bolshevism. By John Spargo. Harper & Brothers, New York.

We do not know of any book which describes so accurately and so judicially what Bolshevism is, how it differs from Socialism, how it differs from democracy, and what were the conditions and events in Russia out of which it has grown. John Spargo is a Socialist—in our judgment, the most intelligent and fair-minded of any modern writer on the subject. He is English-born and has the Anglo-Saxon belief in law and order. He is an idealist, and in that respect has a faith which is in

Film On Teeth

Proves Your Way Wrong

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

That's the Tooth-Destroyer

Millions know that well-brushed teeth still discolor and decay. Tartar forms on them, pyorrhea starts. The tooth brush has proved itself inadequate. Statistics show that tooth troubles have constantly increased.

Dentists long have known the reason, but not a home way to combat it. The trouble lies in a film—that slimy film which you feel with your tongue. It clings to the teeth, gets into crevices, hardens and stays. And that film causes most tooth troubles.

The film is what discolors, not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid.

It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

One great dental question for years has been, how to combat that film. A dental cleaning removes it, but the great need is to fight it day by day.

Science has now found the way. Able authorities have amply proved it by convincing clinical tests. Leading dentists all over America have proved it and adopted it. Now that method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we let everybody prove it by a ten-day home test free.

See What Clean Teeth Mean

Teeth in general, though brushed daily, are not clean. That's why tooth troubles come. Use a 10-Day Tube of Pepsodent and see the difference for yourself. It will be a revelation.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digester of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

That seems a simple method. But pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed forbidden. What science now has done is to find a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. It is that method, used in Pepsodent, which has solved this great tooth problem.

The proof is quick and easy. Within ten days you will gain a new light on tooth cleaning, and that's important both to you and yours.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Use like any tooth paste. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how the teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Compare this method with your present method. Look at your teeth in ten days. Then let the evident results tell you what to do. There will be no need for argument.

Cut out the coupon now.

Pepsodent
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

The New-Day Dentifrice

A scientific tooth paste based on activated pepsin. An efficient film combatant, now endorsed by dentists everywhere and sold by druggists in large tubes.

Ten-Day Tube Free

THE PEPSODENT CO.,
Dept. 548, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Mail Ten-Day Tube of Pepsodent to

Name.....
Address.....
Digitized by Google

THE NATION'S INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS

Believing that the advance of business is a subject of vital interest and importance, The Outlook will present under the above heading frequent discussions of subjects of industrial and commercial interest. This department will include paragraphs of timely interest and articles of educational value dealing with the industrial upbuilding of the Nation. Comment and suggestions are invited.

PREPARATION FOR GAS DEFENSE

Now that the war is over, many interesting stories can be made public of the quick and efficient response of manufacturers to the Government's requirements of war material. Many large plants were, almost overnight, converted wholly or in part to the manufacture of army supplies, and this instant co-operation contributed in large measure to the success of our forces abroad.

An interesting story appeared recently in the "Colgate Clock," published by Colgate & Co., telling of the part this company played in the preparation for gas defense. We believe that the following excerpts from this article will be of interest to our readers:

The modern gas mask, as every one knows, has two eyepieces—lenses made of glass or celluloid or a combination of both. It is essential that these be clean and bright as long as the mask is in actual use. Should they for any reason become clouded, the soldier is as helpless as though he were blind. The difficulty in keeping these eyepieces clear seemed insurmountable—moisture from the breath would collect on them, making it impossible to see clearly through them.

The need of an anti-dimming material was recognized by the War Department in preparing equipment for the first overseas fighting contingent, and the men charged with the task of procuring it approached Colgate & Co. for a solution of the problem.

With alacrity, of course, they agreed to do their utmost. During the next few days following the Government's request experiment after experiment was made and many things were tried. No trouble or expense was spared. Finally a compound was found which met all tests. After treatment with this compound the lenses remained clear even when the mask was put to the same arduous test that it would meet in the field of warfare.

While the tests were proceeding a special die had been made for stamping out the tubes in which the compound was to be packed. (In its early days the compound was in the form of a paste, like a shaving or dental cream, and a special tube was required.) The formula was perfected and the manufacture of the compound was begun, and in a very short time a large quantity was ready for shipment. Not only was the quiet work of those experimental days a vital help in defeating the enemy, but the mechanical feat of turning out thousands upon thousands of tubes in a few days was remarkable.

Wishing to keep nothing secret from the Government that might help, the formula of the first anti-dimming preparation was turned over to them. This was for the double purpose of facilitating improvement and posting the Government on just what they were using. In the very beginning a stick form for the compound had been suggested as being more practical and quicker to manufacture. The Research branch of the War Department became greatly interested in the work, and able chemists sought to procure an even better compound—one that would not fail even with careless application—and an anti-dimming stick was soon decided upon. It was about two inches long and half an inch thick, wrapped except for one end in tinfoil, and packed with a small piece of cotton flannel in a round tin box. These sticks were turned out at the rate of 100,000 a day, a task involving much labor and skill.

The method of applying the anti-dimming compound was simple. A small quantity was rubbed over the eye-pieces, which were afterwards polished with the flannel cloth. After this treatment the moisture, instead of collecting in drops, spread over the glass in a thin sheet which did not affect its transparency in the least.

As the effect of one application lasted for days, one stick should have been enough for a lifetime. But unfortunately the little tin box, which was sturdy and well made, presented to the doughboy alluring possibilities as a holder for matches or cigarettes—and away went the stick. It was necessary to have sufficient sticks to replace any that were lost.

The other substance, known as Sag Paste, was used to combat the frightful mustard gas, which was used so extensively during the latter part of the war. This gas, which, strictly speaking, was not a gas at all but a volatile liquid, not only affected the throat and lungs, but where it penetrated the clothing caused serious burns—especially where the skin was damp from perspiration.

The German drive to the Marne in 1918 was made largely with this gas. Shells were filled with it, which on exploding often killed everything in the vicinity. As the gas mask protected only the face, something was needed to prevent the gas reaching the body. An important problem suddenly confronted the Army, and the Commander-in-Chief cabled to Washington urging that something be found to counteract the effects of mustard gas and shipped abroad as soon as possible.

A preparation was thus sought that would protect the skin against the burning action of the gas. Haste was the first consideration, and the first experiments were made with materials which were procurable at once in large quantities. Various ointments were tried out on volunteers, who allowed themselves to be exposed to the gas, first rubbing the ointment on the skin. One of the ointments which was submitted was found to give the needed protection, and its manufacture was begun with all haste. The Sag Paste was packed in special large tin tubes, seven inches long and an inch and a half in diameter, and large quantities were prepared and shipped in June—the month in which the need first became apparent.

The manufacture of Sag Paste was continued until the signing of the armistice. An idea of the gigantic scale on which this work was carried out, which will also give a hint of its importance as a war measure, can be gained from the fact that hundreds of tons of Sag Paste were made and shipped and several car-loads of pure block tin used in the manufacture of the tubes.

Why the name "Sag Paste"? The word "gas" spelled backwards!

DURAND STEEL LOCKERS

Are You Proud of Your Plant?

If you are not, you may be sure that your employees are not.

And they ought to be—if they are to put the spirit into their work that spells success for you.

Better lighting, heating, and ventilation; better sanitation; bonus and profit-sharing systems, are some of the means used to foster this spirit today.

And Durand Steel Lockers

Write for Catalogue of steel lockers, or of steel racks, bins and counters, etc.

DURAND STEEL LOCKER CO.

1573 Ft. Dearborn Bk. Bldg. 973 Vanderbilt Bldg.
Chicago New York

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequalled for Patriotic Church Services

Send 35c today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"
THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

Summer Money for You

The Outlook wants to employ 375 wide-awake, intelligent men and women to represent it this summer—and all through the year if you like. You can easily earn $10.00 a week and more. Write to-day for details of The Outlook's Co-operative Profit Plan, addressing Desk E, Representatives' Division, The Outlook Company, 381 Fourth Ave., New York City.

The New Books (Continued)

sharp contrast to such Socialists as Morris Hillquit. He believes that the present wages system is economically unsound and ethically unjust, and he wishes for its overturn; but he wishes to change present social conditions because they work deterioration of character in all classes in society. The change in conditions is a means to an end; the end to be sought is the recognition of the obligation of social duty resting on every member of society and the door of opportunity for self-development open to every member of society, and therefore liberty, equality, and fraternity for all. Bolshevism denies that the obligations of the moral law rest on the proletariat if they come into power, or that the door of opportunity should be open to the property-owners and the intellectuals in case a proletarian government is organized. The Bolsheviks do not want liberty for the people; they want power for themselves. To a rational Socialist, to a real democrat, no indictment of Bolshevism could be more conclusive than Lenin's own definition of it, which John Spargo quotes: "Just as one hundred and fifty thousand lordly land-owners under Czarism dominated the one hundred and thirty millions of Russian peasants, so two hundred thousand members of the Bolshevik party are imposing their proletarian will on the mass, but this time in the interest of the latter." This book is to be recommended not only to editors, preachers, and teachers who have to deal with the problems which the Bolshevik revolution has brought before the world, but to all Americans who really wish to know what Bolshevism is, how it sprang into being, and how men of sanity and good morals should deal with it and with the conditions which have given it birth.

Mexico Under Carranza. By Thomas Edward Gibbon. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City.

Mr. Gibbon agrees with other Americans who have studied existing conditions by actual, extended observation that Carranza's Government is not preserving order, protecting property, or substantially aiding the peons, who make up eighty per cent of the population. His indictment against the present régime is both severe and specific.

Problem of the Pacific (The). By C. Brunsdon Fletcher. Preface by the Right Hon. Sir William MacGregor. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

The Australian author of "The New Pacific" in this new work adds materially to his former discussion of world questions. His chapter on "Two Ideas of Empire," comparing German and British ideas, is illuminating. In reply to the question, "Will a beaten Germany be a converted Germany?"—that is, as to just colonial administration—he replies: "The Germany we know has been bred into a bully and a world-pirate through generations of successful buccaneering, and it will take generations for the new Germany to unlearn the lessons of its failure." The discussion of the relations of Australia to India and Japan is valuable in suggestion and exposition.

WAR BOOKS

History of the Great War (A). By Arthur Conan Doyle. Vol. IV. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

This volume covers the story of the British campaign in France and Flanders in 1917, ending with the battle of Cambrai. It is chiefly a military history and has too much technical detail for the general reader, although touches of drama and color are to be found here and there.

A CALL FOR 3,000 NEW PHOTOPLAYS

Movie Stars and Producers are Searching the Country for New Suitable Scenarios—Read How This New High-Paid Art is Easily Mastered

Cecil B. DeMille

Mabel Normand

Roscoe (Fatty) Arbuckle

Olive Thomas

THE moving picture industry is facing a famine—a famine in story plots—photoplays. Prices undreamed of a few years ago, are being paid today—$500 to $1,000 and more for 5-reel dramatic scripts; $100 to $500 for clever short comedies. For the studios—around Los Angeles alone—need approximately 3,000 new stories each year. Producers must have material—new plots, especially written for the screen.

And now a plan—the first to be endorsed by the leading stars and producers—has been designed to teach you how to prepare your ideas for the screen. The plan was created by Frederick Palmer, formerly of Universal—the man who wrote 52 scenarios in 9 months—more than one a week—all accepted. Mr. Palmer furnishes you with a handbook and cross references to scenarios that have been PRODUCED. Both drama and comedy are represented. Since we started a little over a year ago, many of our students have sold their plays, some for as high as $1,000. A number of our students have already taken positions at the studios.

Indorsed by Stars, Producers, Directors and Writers

Under this plan we give you one year's free Advisory Service. And our Sales Service is at your disposal to assist you in selling your plays.

Note the pictures of the movie stars in this advertisement. All of them endorse the Palmer Plan of Photoplay Writing. These and dozens of others you will find in our new booklet, "The Secret of Successful Photoplay Writing."

Write for this booklet now. It will show you the great opportunity in photoplay writing. This book is filled with autograph letters from the biggest stars and producers, strongly endorsing the Palmer Plan of Photoplay Writing, urging us to do our best to develop photoplay writers.

Have you ever thought you could write a better plot than some you have seen at the movies? If so, send for this booklet. It will show you how you can get it produced. If you believe you have an idea for a scenario, this booklet will tell you how you can turn it into money. For photoplay writing is very simple, once you have learned a few basic principles. Genius is not required.

A simple story with one good thought is enough. For movies are made for the masses. Never was there such an opportunity to turn any simple story-idea into money and reputation. The field is uncrowded. The demand is growing greater each day. Write for the booklet. It's free. No obligation. Just fill out the coupon and mail to us.

THE PALMER PHOTOPLAY CORPORATION,
847 L. W. Hallman Bldg., Los Angeles, Cal.

Name.....

Address.....

Please send me without obligation, your new booklet, "The Secret of Successful Photoplay Writing," containing autograph letters of the leading stars

The Hollender offers a combination of central location, splendid service, and cuisine of super-excellence.

RATES:

European plan, with bath:
Single $2.00 to $4.00
Double 4.00 to 5.50
With Twin Beds:
5.00 to 7.00

The Hollender
Cleveland

Nobody ever changes from

RAMESES

CIGARETTES

Twenty-five Cents

RAMESES CIGARETTES

Nobody!

Tours and Travel

Summer in the National Parks, California, Canadian Rockies
Motoring, camping, tramping, horseback riding, racing. Booklet. THE TEMPLE TOURS, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

Hotels and Resorts

CANADA

MYRTLE HOUSE
Digby, Nova Scotia
Queen of Canadian Resorts
Ideal Climate
Golf, fishing, boating, bathing.
Cuisine the best. Booklet.
HERRICK & SELLMAN

MAINE

Robinhood Inn and Cottages
Bailey Island, Me., opened June 15. Bathing, fishing, sailing. For circular, Miss MANSERV.

YORK CAMPS LOON LAKE, MAINE
In famous Rangeley region in heart of mountains facing lake. Private log cabins with open fires and baths. Central dining-room. Golf with easy reach; garage. Boating, bathing, fishing, mountain climbing. Farm one mile from camp furnishes fresh vegetables, eggs, poultry, certified milk. Booklet. J. LEWIS YORK, Prop.

The Grindstone Inn
BRISTOW TYLER, Manager
Winter Harbor
MAINE

Coollest Summer Resort in the United States

Average Maximum Temperature During Summer 72°.

Contains 125 Rooms En suite and Singly with Baths

A NINE-HOLE GOLF COURSE.
FIVE TENNIS COURTS.

MOTOR BOATS, SAILBOATS, CANOES.

BOWLING ALLEYS, BILLIARDS, SHUFFLEBOARD.

LARGE SWIMMING POOL OF SALT WATER.

AMERICAN PLAN—$40 per week up
For reservations or information wire or write.

Send for booklet.

A few desirable cottages for rent
Cottage residents may get their meals at the Inn.

Permanent Address,
601 Morris Building, Philadelphia, Pa.
THE HOMESTEAD
Bailey Island, Maine
Open June 15 to Oct. 1. Air, scene and table all of the best. Illustrated booklet on application. THOMAS E. HAZELL.

MASSACHUSETTS

HOTEL PURITAN
Commonwealth Ave. Boston
THE DISTINCTIVE BOSTON HOUSE
Give others call the Puritan one of the most homelike hotels in the world. Your inquiries gladly answered and our booklet mailed.

If You Are Tired or Not Feeling Well
you cannot find a more comfortable place in New England than

THE WELDON HOTEL
GREENFIELD, MASS.
It affords all the comforts of home without extravagance.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little home by the sea
PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

CLIMB MT. WASHINGTON BY MOTOR

The automobile road up Mt. Washington is now open; 8 miles long; maximum grade 16%. Unrivaled scenery. Comfortable hotel at foot of mountain. Write for booklet to GLEN HOUSE, GORHAM, N. H.

Hotels and Resorts

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Dexter Richards Hall

A comfortable Inn on a hilltop. 1,000 feet elevation. July and August. Weekly rates $14 to $21. Booklet.

MERIDEN, N. H.

"The Bird Village"

NEW YORK CITY

Hotel Le Marquis

31st Street & Fifth Avenue
New York

Combines every convenience and home comfort, and commands itself to people of refinement wishing to live on American Plan and be within easy reach of social and dramatic centers.

Room and bath $4.50 per day with meals, or $2.50 per day without meals.
Illustrated Booklet gladly sent upon request.
JOHN P. TOLSON.

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square
adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

NEW YORK

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of wild-est Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, saddle horses. Trails to surrounding mountain peaks, Lake George and Lake Champlain. Dancing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $16 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

Health Resorts

Sanford Hall, est. 1841
Private Hospital

For Mental and Nervous Diseases

Comfortable, homelike surroundings; modern methods of treatment; competent nurses. 15 acres of lawn, park, flower and vegetable gardens. Food the best. Write for booklet.

Sanford Hall Flushing New York

ALDERBROOK A Summer Camp for Adults—Physical culture. Physician's care. Leaflet on request. Alderbrook, Norwalk, Ct.

"INTERPINES"

Beautiful, quiet, restful and homelike. Over 25 years of successful work. Thorough, reliable, dependable and ethical. Every comfort and convenience. Accommodations of superior quality. Disorder of the nervous system a specialty. Fred. W. Seward, Jr., M.D., Fred. W. Seward, Jr., M.D., Goshen, N. Y.

Crest View Sanatorium
Greenwich, Ct. First-class in all respects, home comforts. H. M. HIRSHBACH, M.D.

If you are tired BLINK BONNIE or convalescent conducted by a trained nurse, is just the place to regain health and courage. For particulars write to S. Jean MacKenzie, Northfield, Mass.

LINDEN The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Doylestown, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LIPPINCOTT WALTER, M.D. (late of The Walter Sanatorium).

CREST VIEW

For nervous and convalescent patients.
R. H. CHASE, M.D., and E. C. MCDANIEL, Booklet. Wyncote, Pa.

Dr. Reeves' Sanitarium

A Private Home for chronic, nervous, and mental patients. A few elderly people requiring care. Harriet E. Reeves, M.D., Melrose, Mass.

Apartments

WANTED—THREE APARTMENTS

unfurnished, in same building in New York City. No. 1. Containing living-room or studio, dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms, bathroom and bath. No. 2. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. No. 3. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. Location preferably out of the usual beaten paths, something not usually rented if possible, and preferably in a private house altered for such purpose. Nothing south of Greenwich Village nor north of 134 Street will be considered. (Occupancy October 1, 1919.) Address CHARLES H. DAVIS, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

Property Wanted

WANTED Furnished or unfurnished house, four chambers, within 30 minutes of Boston, near good school. Cambridge or Belmont preferred. H. Leland Lowe, 147 Milk St., Boston, Mass.

Real Estate

CONNECTICUT

FARM FOR SALE

Gentleman's Country Home and Farm, "Mapledale," situated on beautiful Housatonic River at Derby, Conn. Two hours from New York, frequent trains daily; sixty-three acres. Large house, barns, garage, ice-house and henhouse; pure spring water under good pressure to all buildings and yard; beautiful maple shade lawns, large porch facing river; excellent black bass fishing; motor boating; magnificent scenery; twenty acres under cultivation consisting of oats, rye, wheat, corn, potatoes and all kinds of garden truck for market; 500 choice varieties of fall and winter apple trees in full bearing; 11 head of stock, 10 pigs, 200 chickens, and 2 horses; full equipment of farm tools and machinery all in first-class condition. Will keep 25 head of stock. A capable working farm manager and his wife have been on this farm for eight years. One of the most delightful country homes and farms in Connecticut. Send for photo and booklet. Possession August 1st. Price and terms of care of The Home Trust Company, Derby, Conn.

Charles N. Downs, Executor

MAINE

RANGELEY LAKE, MAINE

The Gilman Estate, one of the most beautiful on Rangeley Lake, is offered for Sale

A modern house with 19 rooms, furnished throughout. Stable, garage, boat-house, tennis court. 75 acres of land. 1/2 mile shore frontage. Adjoining the estate 3 bulking sites totaling 1,000 feet shore frontage. Birch, maple and spruce in abundance. 3/4 mile by road or water to the famous Rangeley Lake house, with its casino, golf links and tennis courts. For photograph and particulars address owner, Mrs. ARTHUR B. GILMAN, Gilman Point, Rangeley, Me.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

FOR RENT Cottage near Bethlehem, N. H.
Six rooms and bath. All modern improvements. Pure artesian water. For particulars address E. E. BISHOP, Littleton, N. H.

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential section, suburbs of New York City. Half hour Grand Central. Hot water heating. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 34 x 106. Garage. Price $8,500. Full particulars from owner, 9,815, Outlook.

NEW YORK

Completely Furnished Summer Home For Rent
With eight rooms and bath. Large fireplace, lawn, garage and piazza. Good water supply and heating apparatus. Good fishing near by. Good train service to New York morning and evening. Located on State Road, near Lake Mahopop. Address or phone N. I. MEKEL, Yorktown Heights, N. Y. Price $200 up to Sept. 1, 1919.

VIRGINIA

For Sale, Country Home, Tidewater, Va.
Fifty acres good land, all in cultivation. Large roomy house, good repair. Hot and cold water. Hot-water heating system. Barn, tenant house, and garage. Large shady yard. Good boating, bathing and fishing. Price and terms on application. Address "HOLLY POINT," Cardinal, Matthews Co., Va.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

WANTED—450 Outlook readers to represent this publication the summer—on all through the year, if you like. You can easily earn $10 a week and more, simply by using an hour or two a day of your spare time. If you want extra spending money—and everybody does—write us for details of the Outlook's co-operative profit plan. Simply address Representative, Division, Dept. 4, The Outlook, 351 Fourth Ave., New York City.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

EARN $20 to $40 a week in spare time selling new Home Budget System. Twenty million Liberty Loan buyers want it; every home needs it. So simple a child can keep it; pays for itself several times over first month, in many instances. Approved by Government and domestic economists. Teaches economy; encourages thrift—actually increases buying-power of money 10% to 40%—just like that much raise in salary. Tie up to a winner! Write quick. G. J. Spigner, Sales Mgr., Dept. 51, 121 S. La Salle St., Chicago.

BOOKS, MAGAZINES

FOR SALE—5 bound volumes of The Theatre Magazine—1903 to and including 1907. What is offered? 7,133, Outlook.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

WANTED—Competent woman as stenographer and private secretary to manager of large hotel. Year round position with good pay to competent person. Address, with references and experience, 7,112, Outlook.

EMBROIDERERS on infants' gowns; work sent out of town. Barringer, 29 East 31st St., New York.

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CM2 Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

WANTED, October 1, competent housekeeper. No pantry work. Address Housekeeper, Box 625, Charleston, S. C.

DIETITIANs, cafeteria managers, governesses, motorists, housekeepers. Miss Richards, Box 8, East Side Station, Providence, R. I.

MOTHER's helper, Sept. 1. Five healthy, well trained children, ages 9 to 1. Simple country place, 3 maids. References exchanged. Mrs. Stanley Bright, Cedar Hill Farm, Reading, Pa.

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

WANTED—Teacher-governess for girl twelve years old for coming school year. Address Box 316, Gettysburg, Pa.

INQUIRIES already coming in for teachers in all subjects for 1919. International Musical and Educational Agency, Carnegie Hall, N. Y.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Business Situations

SECRETARYSHIP in boys' school wanted by widow with boy of seven where child will have privilege of education as part of compensation. Ten years' secretarial experience and highest references. 7,109, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

COLLEGE girl wishes care of children during summer. Excellent references. 7,144, Outlook.

YOUNG, refined teacher, willing, healthy, wishes summer work on large farm. No remuneration except fresh air and congenial family. Or would chaperon girls at camp, take charge of games, etc., in return for camp life. Excellent references. 7,143, Outlook.

KINDERGARTNER, young, also experienced in secretary work, would be useful companion to lady at shore or mountains for summer in return for board and room. Would travel in return for expenses. Good health. Excellent references. 7,144, Outlook.

WIDOW desires supervising elderly gentleman's home. South winters. References. 7,104, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

COLLEGE woman, teacher and lecturer—demonstrator of cookery, desires non-resident school position, September, 1919. References. 7,148, Outlook.

MISCELLANEOUS

M. W. Wightman & Co. Shopping Agency, established 1895. No charge; prompt delivery. 44 West 23d St., New York.

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Frances Farber Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

MISS Guthman, New York shopper, will send anything on approval; services free. References. 340 W. 97th Street.

YOUR WANTS IN EVERY LINE

of household, educational, business, or personal service—domestic workers, teachers, nurses, business or professional assistants, etc., etc.—whether you require help or are seeking a situation, may be filled through a little announcement in the CLASSIFIED COLUMNS OF THE OUTLOOK. If you have some article to sell or exchange, these columns may prove of real value to you as they have to many others. Send for descriptive circular and order blank AND FILL YOUR WANTS. Address

Department of Classified Advertising
THE OUTLOOK
351 Fourth Avenue, New York

BY THE WAY

Personally conducted round-the-world trips are again being planned by the tourist agencies, after a long interim caused by the war. The announcements read alluringly, but, alas! the prices have gone up after the prevailing fashion. One trip of this sort, lasting nearly eight months, will cost $5,875! And even at this figure, the announcement says, "rooms with private bath cannot be guaranteed."

The continued high prices of food are hit off by "Pêle-Mêle," of Paris, in two pictures. One presents a bill of fare for 1918, somewhat thus: "Sirloin, 3 francs; peas, 1.25; coffee, 1 franc—It is the war!" The other itemizes the 1919 situation thus: "Beef, 3 francs; beans, 1.25; coffee, 1 franc—It is the peace!"

The American tourist who said of Niagara Falls, "Gosh! that's neat!" is matched by a Scotch tourist at the Pyramids, who, according to "Harper's Magazine," said, as he gazed at the stupendous pile, "Ah, mon, what a lot o' mason-work not to be bringing in any rent!"

Houses and apartments seem to be scarce in cities on the other side of the Atlantic as well as here, as a result of the suspension of building during the war. Here are two humorous indications of the shortage. From a British weekly: "Lady: 'How was it you lost your job?' Tramp: 'Well, mum, I was a nartist, I was—used ter paint them "To Let" notices.'" From a Christiania (Norway) weekly: "Have you a room to let?" "Yes, but I entertain applications only from night editors who are out all day."

"There were probably not more than two professional oil geologists in Oklahoma at the time of the discovery of the Ponca anticline," says a book on the oil-producing country. "Now, a few years later, every big company has its staff of geologists, some companies employing two or three hundred men in that work alone. The State University is turning out big classes of geologists every year." One of the oil wells in western Oklahoma produces five hundred barrels a day from a depth of 4,000 feet. This is said to be the deepest producing oil well in the State.

The Osage Indian Reservation in Oklahoma, according to the above-quoted authority, is the least developed region yet remaining in the State. It is rich in oil, and its development is just beginning. It is owned by the Osage tribe of Indians—probably the richest population, individually, in the world. They number about 2,200. "Each Indian is estimated to be worth $50,000. Each one draws about $5,000 a year from the treasury of the tribe. They are still a band of blanketed Indians, yet a family of five can spend $25,000 a year."

The old saying, "Many hands make light work," receives a modern exemplification in the news item that the war-ship Wyoming was painted from stern to stern in forty minutes. Eight hundred "gobs" went over the vessel's sides with paint brushes and pots, and gave the ship, 585 feet long, its new dress in this time, which is said to constitute a record for such work.

A. W. L. sends a suggestion to ward off an attack of the blues: "If any of your women readers ever get despondent in these days of high prices and low spirits after the tension of war times, I would advise them to go up into the garret (if they are fortunate enough to have one) with a like-minded pal and put on the discarded hats of yesteryear and before. I did this the other day when the blues were impending, and my sister and I screamed ourselves red in the face with the ridiculous appearance we made in the fashions of a decade back. Try it! You've no idea how much fun you'll get out of it."

Two domiciliary memorials to great Americans are being planned at present—one to Theodore Roosevelt, the other to Horace Greeley. The Roosevelt memorial will take the form of a restoration of his birthplace, 28 East Twentieth Street, New York City, and the Woman's Roosevelt Memorial Association is now asking for contributions of a million dollars for purchasing and remodeling the property. The Greeley memorial is to consist of a similar restoration of the house in East Poultney, Vermont, in which Greeley learned the printing trade. It has been purchased by the Vermont Press Association and will be used as a museum of material relating to the great journalist's career.

While the houses spoken of above are thus in the way of being preserved, the announcement is made that the residence of Alexander Hamilton at 122 William Street, New York City, is to be demolished to make way for an office building. Washington is said to have used this old house as one of his numerous "headquarters" before the British occupation of New York City during the Revolution. Hamilton occupied it after independence was won, and then moved "uptown" to Hamilton Grange, where he lived until the duel took place which resulted in his death.

Bears, like pigeons and cats, have an instinct for "homing," it seems. In his book on "The Grizzly" Mr. E. A. Mills quotes this story about a pet bear: "He had been teased by a visiting ranchman. When the ranchman had been reassembled and revived, it was decided that the bear must be 'lost.' He was led two hundred miles from the ranch and bidden to go his way. His return to the ranch preceded that of his keeper by eight hours. He was led [from Wyoming] to the mountains of Idaho, and the duration of his return journey not improbably is still the minimum record for that course. Finally two admirers conducted him to Oregon and there parted with him forever."

Mr. Mills gives the grizzly a good character, saying that he rarely attacks man. When brought to bay, however, he is a courageous fighter. This incident is cited in proof. A grizzly was chased by dogs and hunters into a box canyon. The bear fought the dogs with coolness and resource while the hunters waited for a chance to shoot. When the dogs attacked him from behind or at the side, he brushed them off without turning his eyes from the front. At a favorable moment he charged, scattering the dogs and killing two of them, disabling two horses, breaking a man's arm, and making good his escape before the demoralized party could fire a shot!

A palpable hit on the manners of many individuals among the traveling public in this land of democracy is the following from the Washington "Star": "I can't understand," said Uncle Eben, "why some folks think de only way to show dey's jes' as good as anybody is to act disagreeable."

Attacked with Axes
but still on the Job

It lived up to its reputation

THIS Yale Padlock, on guard over a printing shop, was powerfully attacked with axes which cut, dented and battered it but could not break its grip.

Your "Yale" may never have to meet the test of assault or the malicious attempt to get by. But you know that it is always on guard, sturdy and unyielding, ready to meet the test when it comes.

Correct construction, in both materials and design, assures the reliability and endurance of Yale padlocks and of every other lock bearing the trade-mark Yale. "Yale" will not fail to protect.

Go to your hardware dealer for the Yale padlocks you need. You can make sure by seeing the trade-mark on each one. It is always on Yale products, including Yale Night Latches, Door Closers, Builders' Locks and Hardware, Cabinet Locks, Bank Locks and Chain Blocks.

The Yale & Towne Mfg. Co.
9 East 40th Street New York City

Chicago Office: 27 East Lake Street
Canadian Yale & Towne Ltd.
St. Catharines, Ont.

The Yale Cylinder Night Latch is another Yale Product equally capable of withstanding malicious attack.

Engineered by

NEW-SKIN

For Little Skin Hurts

New-Skin forms an antiseptic waterproof film that keeps out dirt and germs while the wound is healing.

"Never Neglect a Break in the Skin"

Be sure you get New-Skin, not an inferior substitute. Smile, but insist.

All Druggists—15 and 30 cents.

NEWSKIN CO.
NEW YORK

TEACHERS' AGENCIES
The Pratt Teachers Agency
 70 Fifth Avenue, New York
 Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools.
 Advises parents about schools. Win. G. Pratt, Mgr.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. Esenwein
 Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Courses in Short-Story Writing, Versification, Journalism, Play Writing, Photoplay Writing, etc., taught personally by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, especially valuable for its full reports of the literary market. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

150-page illustrated catalogue free
Please address

The Home Correspondence School
 Dept. 58, Springfield, Mass.
 ESTABLISHED 1897 INCORPORATED 1904

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122 July 16, 1919 No. 11

THE OUTLOOK IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. H. T. PULSWORTH, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. HOYT, TREASURER. HERBERT H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAVERS D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER. YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION—FIFTY-TWO ISSUES—FOUR DOLLARS IN ADVANCE. ENTERED AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER, JULY 21, 1893, AT THE POST OFFICE AT NEW YORK, UNDER THE ACT OF MARCH 3, 1879

Roosevelt, the American. An Original Four-Color Portrait by Adrian Martin de Groot.....	418
An Announcement.....	419
The Peace Conference.....	419
The Voyage of the R-34.....	419
The Monster Dirigible.....	420
Anna Howard Shaw.....	420
A New Charter for Philadelphia.....	420
How Philadelphia Got Its New Charter.....	421
Canada's Finances.....	421
The American Legion.....	421
"Up-Against-It" Fighters.....	422
The National Education Association....	422
Americanization in the Industries.....	422
Cartoons of the Week.....	423
The New Methods.....	424
Community Service.....	424
What We Owe to France.....	424
The Tactical Blunder of the Republicans.....	425
Millions for Music.....	425
The Senate Should Ratify, with Reservations By Frederick M. Davenport.....	426
The Dedication of Mount Theodore Roosevelt.....	428
Staff Correspondence from Travers D. Carman. Containing a Tribute by Major-General Leonard Wood.....
Roosevelt as a Practical Politician.....	433
By Brander Matthews.....
The Society of Nations in the Light of the Present Situation.....	435
Staff Correspondence from Elbert F. Baldwin.....
Current Events Illustrated.....	437
The Siege of Berlin.....	440
A Story by Alphonse Daudet.....
Weekly Outline Study of Current History.....	442
By J. Madison Gathany, A.M.....
"A Gentle Cynic".....	442
Confidence Restored.....	442
The New Books.....	444
Preparation for Gas Defense.....	446
By the Way.....	449

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents.
 For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage.
 Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.50.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY
 381 Fourth Avenue New York City

Don't Wear a Truss

Brooks' Appliance, the modern scientific invention, the wonderful new discovery that relieves rupture, will be sent on trial. No obnoxious springs or pads.

Brooks' Rupture Appliance

Has automatic Air Cushions. Binds and draws the broken parts together as you would a broken limb. No salves. No lies. Durable, cheap. Sent on trial to prove it. Protected by U. S. patents. Catalog and measure blanks mailed free. Send name and address today.
 Brooks Appliance Co., 4710 State St., Marshall, Mich.

LAW

Send for free book today. It will show you how the Blackstone Institute removes all the former drudgery from law study. You can gain a thorough knowledge of law in your spare time. Our free book tells what the Course is and who the big men are who have written it. Send for your copy now.
BLACKSTONE INSTITUTE
 Dept. 210B 608 So. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

St. John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses

YONKERS, NEW YORK
 Registered in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a general training to refined, educated women. Requirements one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the Directress of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

100,000 people
 subscribe to
The Outlook
 mostly because it's edited on the absurd principle that human beings have brains.

Simply mail your check or a money order for $4 to The Outlook Company, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Bon Ami

re-news
white shoes—

I FIND that my white shoes will stay new-looking if I always clean them with Bon Ami.

Bon Ami doesn't paint over the dirt on white shoes and fill up the seams—it removes the grime and the stains, and uncovers the original whiteness so that the shoes look like new.

When the original whiteness finally does wear off, the regular white dressing will improve them. But even then they should always be cleaned first with Bon Ami.

For white canvas, cloth, and all white leather except kid.

Made in both cake and powder form

"Hasn't scratched yet!"

Honor

*Congressional Medal of Honor
U.S.A.*

PALL MALL

A Shilling, Three Pence in London
Thirty Cents Here

Plain or Cork

[Advertisement]

How I Discovered My Own Character

One Evening's Experience That Changed the Career of Donald Warwick and Gave Him the Big Job of His Dreams

I SHALL never forget the light that flooded my mental vision when Dr. Blackford singled me out from that audience of 153 purchasing agents and said: "This gentleman is wasting his time in the wrong kind of work—for he is the blond type!"

We were gathered at the Hotel Astor for a dinner and meeting of purchasing agents—and the men represented the greatest concerns of their kind in the United States.

Dr. Blackford had come to give us one of the famous demonstrations in Character Analysis about which I heard more than once—and the eager audience by this time was leaning forward to catch every word of a remarkable message.

No wonder! For Dr. Blackford had begun with the startling observation:

"It is exactly as I told your president it would be—when he invited me to address this company.

"All of you—with a half dozen exceptions—are rather pronounced brunets.

"You will never fail to find this true of any group of successful purchasing agents—no matter where you meet them.

"But, were this an organization of successful salesmen, you would find most of them to be blonds.

"The brunet is the man from Missouri. He must be 'shown.' He is thoughtful, analytical, conservative, deliberate—everything a buyer should be. The blond is usually quite the reverse. He is a man of moods, of imagination, impetuous, easy to sell, but remarkably qualified to influence other people and to make them buy things."

And I am the blond type—thought I—one of the exceptions in this room! Can it be that I am "in wrong"? I had felt that in that group of purchasing agents I could hold up my end quite well. And I was jolted!

But as Dr. Blackford went on I became more and more certain that this remarkable teacher of character analysis had called the turn correctly.

"There is more to this scientific fact than color of the eyes, hair and skin—vastly more," continued Dr. Blackford.

"I observe that the prevailing type of features among you gentlemen is what science knows as the 'concave type'—prominent forehead at the top, short nose, prominent chin."

I found my hands playing about my face—and looking in embarrassment, I found many of my neighbors doing the same thing! Then I realized that my features were just the opposite—sloping forehead, prominent nose, receding chin. (The convex type, Dr. Blackford called it.)

If I needed any more proof, I got it overwhelmingly when Dr. Blackford asked the audience to choose "subjects" from their fellow-members, invited them to the platform, and after a quick survey of their features told them with startling accuracy what their

"And I Am a Blond"

special capabilities were and where their greatest powers lay.

I cannot remember when I have seen a group of men more deeply or more seriously interested.

But Dr. Blackford's revelation of the science of Character Analysis had done more for me perhaps than for any other man in the room.

The next day I got a set of Dr. Blackford's simple lessons in "Reading Character at Sight," which I learned the Independent Corporation was publishing at a popular price, and it took me just one evening to discover the practical application of all the wonderful things that Dr. Blackford had told us at the meeting of the purchasing agents.

In one week I changed my job. Having "sold myself" on the big secret of my success, I went out and sold goods. I sold in quantities that surprised me. I sold myself to our customers. And, best of all, from a monetary standpoint, I sold myself to my firm.

With the result that, first having achieved the coveted position of sales manager, I am today vice-president of our company.

You see, I am the blond type.

And my features are convex.

And if it hadn't been for my chance meeting with Dr. Blackford I would probably still be plugging along at the same old "wrong job"—with a salary check only a fraction of the rather big one that cheers up my bank balance every week in these happy and more prosperous days.

Perhaps you, too, have been jolly yourself about yourself and trying, as I did, to make your success by sheer courage and hard work, instead of analyzing your capabilities and fitting yourself into the kind of work you are naturally best fitted to do.

In that case, I beg of you to get that wonderful course of Dr. K. M. H. Blackford, the leading character analyst in the United States, and join the many thousands who have learned, in an amazingly short time, not only how to size up other people from outward signs, but how to size up one's own character, how to attract the friendship of other people, how best to strive for the success that your ordinary qualifications entitle you to achieve.

DONALD WARWICK.

Dr. Blackford's development and application of the science of Character Analysis has been built on a solid foundation of direct professional study of all kinds of men and women. After years of extensive character work among business concerns, merchants, manufacturers, Chambers of Commerce, and trade associations, which sought assistance in solving human problems, Dr. Blackford made a trip around the world, observing widely different races, comparing notes with leading specialists in forty nations, and comparing theories with such famous authorities as Alfred Haddon, Metchnikoff and Giuseppe Sergi, and studying the exhaustive records of Bertillon. So Dr. Blackford's store of material and ideas in the realm of human relations has become probably the most carefully arranged exhibit of facts on Character Study in the United States.

It is not surprising, therefore, that many concerns will not employ a man without first getting Dr. Blackford to pass on him. Concerns such as Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Baker-Vawter Company, Scott Paper Company, and many others pay Dr. Blackford large annual fees for advice on dealing with human nature.

So great was the demand for these services that Dr. Blackford could not even begin to fill all the engagements. So Dr. Blackford has explained the method in this simple seven-lesson course which meant so much to the business career of Donald Warwick. Even a half hour's reading of this remarkable course will give you an insight into human nature and a power over people which will surprise you.

Such confidence have the publishers in Dr. Blackford's Course, "Reading Character at Sight," that they will gladly send it to you on approval. Send no money. Merely fill in and mail the coupon. The complete course will go to you instantly, on approval, all charges prepaid. Look it over thoroughly. See if it lives up to the claims made for it. If you do not want to keep it, then return it and the transaction is closed. And if you decide to keep it—as you surely will—then merely remit Five Dollars in full payment.

Remember you take no risk, you assume no obligation. The entire course goes to you on approval. You have everything to gain—nothing to lose. So mail the coupon NOW while this remarkable offer remains open.

— Free Examination Coupon —

Independent Corporation

Publishers of the Independent Weekly

Dept. B227, 119 W. 40th Street, New York

You may send me Dr. Blackford's Course of seven lessons entitled "Reading Character at Sight." I will either re-mail the course to you within five days after receipt, or send you $5 in full payment of the course.

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

.....Out. 7-21-19.

Just 3 Letters

"My life began anew the day I discovered you. The money I spent was well earned by you and well spent by me. It pays to know yourself as others know you, and in my case the knowledge has laid for me a solid foundation upon which I am now building my temple of success."

"The investment is the best I ever made. The analysis of character, aptitudes, etc., is remarkably true and accurate, and is a very valuable possession. It enables one to realize and appreciate with certainty just what his abilities are and you have brought to light things that would have taken years of experience to unearth."

"One glance at the course was sufficient to tell me that it was exactly what I wanted and had been looking for. . . . In the pages of that course I found myself looking into a clear mirror and saw myself reflected there as I have never seen myself reflected in a material sense. I now know myself for the first time in my life."

THE OUTLOOK SCHOOL AND CAMP DIRECTORY

Many of the best private schools, colleges, correspondence schools, and camps are advertised in these columns. Each one issues descriptive literature which will be sent to Outlook readers upon application

TEACHERS' AGENCIES

The Pratt Teachers Agency
70 Fifth Avenue, New York
Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools.
Advices parents about schools. Wm. O. Pratt, Mgr.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES CONNECTICUT

The Curtis School for Young Boys
Has grown forty-four years and is still under the active direction of its founder.

FREDERICK S. CURTIS, Principal.
GERALD B. CURTIS, Assistant Principal.
BROOKFIELD CENTER, CONNECTICUT.

WYKEHAM RISE

A Country School for Girls

FANNY E. DAVIES, LL.A., Principal,
Washington, Conn.

Boston representative,
MABEL E. BOWMAN, A.B., Vice-Principal, Cohasset, Mass.

INDIANA

ELMHURST FOR GIRLS

Eleventh year. Incorporated. Non-sectarian. College preparatory and academic courses. Only 24 pupils. Much individual attention. Large country estate. Elevation 840 to 1,000 feet. All outdoor sports and many practical outdoor activities. Tuition $1.00. Address ELMHURST, R. F. D. No. 3, Connersville, Indiana.

NORTH CAROLINA

BINGHAM MILITARY SCHOOL

126th Year ASHEVILLE, N. C. Military Since 1861

Forty States of our Union and eighteen countries outside of the United States represented since 1880.
COL. R. BINGHAM, Supt. Army Officer Detailed

MASSACHUSETTS

New England CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

George W. Chadwick
Director

Year Opens
September 18, 1919

BOSTON, MASS.

Located in the Music Center of America. It affords pupils the environment and atmosphere so necessary to a musical education. Its complete organization, and splendid equipment, offer exceptional facilities for students.

Complete Curriculum
Courses in every branch of Music, applied and theoretical.

Owing to the Practical Training
In our Normal Department, graduates are much in demand as teachers.

Address Ralph L. Flanders, General Manager

The Free Privileges
Of lectures, concerts and recitals, the opportunities of ensemble practice and appearing before audiences, and the daily associations are invaluable advantages to the music student.

A Complete Orchestra
Offers advanced pupils in piano-forte, voice, organ and violin experience in rehearsal and public appearance with orchestral accompaniment.

Dramatic Department
Practical training in acting.

MASSACHUSETTS

ABBOT ACADEMY

A School for Girls. ANDOVER, MASS. Founded 1828.
23 miles from Boston. General course with Household Science. College Preparation. Outdoor sports.
Address MISS BERTHA BAILEY, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 779 Beacon Street
Posse Normal School of Gymnastics
31st year. New building. Courses of one, two and three years. The war has created great demand for our graduates. Courses in Medical Gymnastics and Playgrounds.
Apply to THE SECRETARY.

DEAN ACADEMY, Franklin, Mass.

53d Year
Young men and young women find here a homelike atmosphere, thorough and efficient training in every department of a broad culture, a loyal and helpful school spirit. Liberal endowment permits liberal terms, $350-$450 per year. Special Course in Domestic Science.
For catalogue and information address
ARTHUR W. PEIRCE, Litt. D., Principal

The Burnham School FOR GIRLS

NORTHAMPTON, MASSACHUSETTS
Founded by Mary A. Burnham in 1877
Opposite Smith College Campus
MISS HELEN E. THOMPSON, Headmistress

MISS CAPEN'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

For many years known as "The Burnham School."
43rd year opens September, 1919.
Correspondence should be addressed to
Miss B. T. CAPEN, Principal, NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

MASSACHUSETTS

WALNUT HILL SCHOOL
23 Highland St., Natick, Mass. A College Preparatory School for Girls. 17 miles from Boston.
Miss Conant, Miss Bigelow, Principals.

Wheaton College for Women

Only small separate college for women in Massachusetts. 4-year course. A. B. degree. Faculty of men and women. 20 buildings. 100 acres. Endowment. Catalog.
Rev. SAMUEL V. COLS, D.D., LL.D., President.
Massachusetts, Norton (30 miles from Boston).

SHORT-STORY WRITING
A course of forty lessons in the history, form, structure, and writing of the Short-Story taught by Dr. J. Berg Kossowatz, for years Editor of Lippincott's. 150-page catalogue free. Please address
THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, Springfield, Mass.

THE MISSES ALLEN SCHOOL

Life in the open. Athletics. Household Arts. College and general courses.
Each girl's personality observed and developed. Write for booklet.

WEST NEWTON, Mass.

MICHIGAN

BATTLE CREEK NORMAL SCHOOL

OF PHYSICAL EDUCATION. Normal Course—September 10. Three years. Broad, powerful training for a dignified profession of wholesome and happy service. Unrivalled facilities and equipment.
C. Ward Crampton, M.D., Dean, Box 38, Battle Creek, Mich.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

AUTUMN SCHOOL OF ARTS AND CRAFTS

September 1 to November 1, 1919
Including courses in Drawing, Painting, Outdoor Sketching, Modeling, Theory of Color, Theory of Design, Leather Work, Gesso, Block Printing, Metal Work and Jewelry, Weaving, Basketry, Embroidery and Bead Work.
For Descriptive Booklet, address
MANCHESTER INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES
MANCHESTER, NEW HAMPSHIRE

NEW JERSEY

KENT PLACE Summit, N. J.
20 miles from N. Y.
A Country School for Girls. College Preparatory and Academic Courses.
Mrs. SARAH WOODMAN PAUL, Principal.
Miss ANNA S. WOODMAN

NEW YORK CITY

The Clark School for Concentration

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS
BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS

Prepares for any college. By an intensive system of individual instruction, enables a bright pupil to complete a course in much less than the usual time, and trains pupils who have been backward elsewhere to cultivate alert retentive minds and qualify in all subjects.
Write for records made by pupils at this school and for full descriptive catalog. Summer sessions.

Boys' School, 72d St. & West End Ave.
Girls' School, 301 West 72d St.
New York City

A School Where Records Are Made

Pratt Institute

School of Household Science and Arts
BROOKLYN, NEW YORK

Courses training Teachers of Household Science or Household Arts (2 or 3 years), Institutional Workers—practical dietitians, housekeepers, lunch-room and cafeteria managers (1 year), Dressmakers (1 year), Dress Designers (1 year).

Also part time day and evening courses for homemakers.

Circular of information sent on request.

A School that Studies Life

The Training School for Community Workers
Reorganized on the Cooperative Plan
John Collier, Director

In an eight months' course the School prepares students to meet the demand for trained workers and organizers in Communities, Industrial Welfare Organizations, Public Schools, Churches and Colleges. Also offers short courses for trained workers already in the field and for volunteers.
Address, for full information,
A. A. FREEMAN, Room 1061, 70 Fifth Ave., New York City

OHIO

Glendale College for Women Glendale, Ohio
(suburban to Cincinnati)
Fall semester begins Sept. 17, 1919. Unusual advantages offered High School graduates in secretarial, History of Art academic courses. Preparation for all colleges. Music Expression, Household Science. Beautiful location. Accessibility to the city utilized for liberal culture.

Oxford College for Women

Founded 1880. Standard college course with B. A. Degree Music courses with B. M. Degree. Normal courses in Household Economics, Public School Music and Art. Rates $25. Write for "Seven Points." Address Oxford College, Box 62, Oxford, Ohio.

NEW YORK

NEW YORK MILITARY ACADEMY

Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

THE story of this famous School is told in the illustrated catalogue, which will be sent upon application to the Principal.

Largest Military School in the East

CAVALRY, INFANTRY, CADET BAND
(SPECIAL RATES TO MUSICIANS)

THE STONE SCHOOL

Cornwall-on-Hudson, Box 16, New York
FIFTY-THIRD YEAR

A School in the Heart of the Open Country. For Boys from 9 to 19

Location: 50 miles from New York, 5 miles from West Point, on a spur of Storm King Mountain, 900 feet above sea level. Healthful, invigorating, unusually adapted to a sane and simple out-of-door life. Work: Preparation for College or Business Life; recent graduates in 12 leading colleges. Each boy studied physically and mentally to increase individual efficiency. Small Classes: A teacher for every 6 boys. Athletics: Two fields with excellent facilities for all sports, under supervision; hiking, woods life, swimming pool.

You are invited to come and see for yourself. Catalog sent on application
ALVINE DUERR, Headmaster

PUTNAM HALL
Vassar Preparatory School. Special 1-year course for High School graduates. Music, Art and Domestic Science. Tennis, horseback riding. Military drill under a captain detailed from the Armory. Sleeping porches. Separate house for younger children. Address: Ellen C. Bartlett, A.B., Prin., Box 906, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

PENNSYLVANIA

SCHOOL OF HORTICULTURE FOR WOMEN

Ambler, Pennsylvania

18 Miles from Philadelphia

SUMMER COURSE—Vegetable gardening, floriculture, fruit, canning and preserving. August 4th to 30th.

Vegetable and flower gardens, greenhouses, orchards, ornamental trees and shrubs, demonstration kitchen, apiary, poultry plant, live stock. Lectures and outdoor practice. Two year diploma course beginning Jan., 1920.

ELIZABETH LEIGHTON LEE, Director

OGONTZ SCHOOL

Founded 1850

A country school for girls in the Rydal Hills. 25 minutes from Philadelphia, on the New York line of the Philadelphia and Reading. Catalog describing and illustrating new buildings sent on request.

MISS ABBY A. SUTHERLAND, Principal
Ogontz School, Penna.

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122 July 23, 1919 No. 12

THE OUTLOOK IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. H. T. PULSIFER, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. HOTT, TREASURER. ERNEST H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAVERS D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER. YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION—FIFTY-TWO ISSUES—FOUR DOLLARS IN ADVANCE. ENTERED AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER, JULY 21, 1893, AT THE POST OFFICE AT NEW YORK, UNDER THE ACT OF MARCH 3, 1879

The President Reports to the Country; Makes a Comparison; Appeals for Support.....	457
The Celebration in Paris.....	457
Honor to Captain Fryatt.....	458
Daylight Saved Again.....	458
Congress and Prohibition.....	458
The Irish Question in America.....	459
A Savior of Children.....	459
A New Approach to Americanization Work.....	459
The R-34's Round Trip.....	460
The Social Unit Plan.....	460
Cartoons of the Week.....	461
Delaware's Little Red Schoolhouse.....	462
Why the Kaiser Should be Tried.....	462
Classics and Culture.....	463
The Greatest American Invention.....	463
The President, the Senate, and the Treaty: A Poll of the Press.....	464
A Wonderful Dinner.....	466
Fire of Life (Poem).....	467
By Harold T. Pulsifer
Joyce Kilmer, Poet and Patriot.....	467
By Katherine Brégy
The Hermit of Amerongen.....	469
By Vicente Blasco-Ibañez
Let Russia In.....	472
By Gregory Mason, Staff Correspondent of The Outlook
The Miracle of the Withered Hand.....	474
By Captain Hughes-Mearns, U. S. A.
Current Events Illustrated.....	475
Weekly Outline Study of Current History.....	480
By J. Madison Gatheny, A.M.
Hermione the Bolshevik.....	482
Financial Comment.....	485
By the Way.....	486

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents.
For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage.
Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.50.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY

381 Fourth Avenue

New York City

Over 365

Different Type-Sets

Including Various Styles for Commercial and Professional Use, and All Languages, any one of which may be substituted in a few seconds.

Note these two styles of Multiplex type—(Roman)
Two different styles of type always in the machine—"Just turn the knob"

(Italic)
Special type-sets for every business, every language, every profession, every science. Any type may be substituted in a few seconds.

EMPHASIZE the important parts of your writing, by INSTANTLY changing from Roman to Italic; possible only on "The Wonder Machine"—The

MULTIPLEX HAMMOND

Standard "Writing Machine"

"Just turn the knob" on this great inter-changeable type writing machine and you climax every subtle distinction, every telling point, making them stand out as clearly as in print.

The inter-changeable type-sets of the Multiplex make your writing talk. You actually get the full effect of your thoughts as they appear in type, and no fine point is lost, however hurriedly your letter or manuscript is read.

Write for FREE BOOKLET

It will show you how, with the Multiplex, you can put the force of emphasis into your typed matter—how you can drive home with strength of accent the fullness of your argument—how you can write with the same convincing force that you use in speaking—an exclusive feature of the Multiplex.

Write your name, address and occupation and cut off the margin of this page NOW and mail the margin to

Hammond Typewriter Co., 597 E. 69th St., N. Y. City

Also a PORTABLE Aluminum Model About 11 lbs. Full capacity. Ask for special Folder

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES PENNSYLVANIA

The Baldwin School

A Country School for Girls, Bryn Mawr, Penna.

Preparation for Bryn Mawr, Mount Holyoke, Smith, Vassar and Wellesley colleges. Also strong general course. Within 26 years 272 students have entered Bryn Mawr College. Fireproof stone building. Abundant outdoor life and athletics.

ELIZABETH FORREST JOHNSON, A.B., HEAD of the SCHOOL

SWITZERLAND

Les Fougères, Lausanne, Switzerland

This well-known school for girls, with commodious modern buildings and beautiful surroundings, under the experienced direction of M. and Mme. Chaubert, offers thorough training in languages and other studies, as well as exceptional facilities for riding, lectures, concerts, the drama and Alpine excursions. Best American references on application to Mlle. Chaubert, who will sail with a party from New York in August. Temporary address:

43 Hillhouse Avenue, New Haven, Conn.

VERMONT

BISHOP HOPKINS HALL

An endowed school for girls overlooking Lake Champlain. Well-equipped buildings. All outdoor sports. College preparatory and general courses. Write for booklet. Miss Ellen Seton Ogden, Principal. The Rt. Rev. A. C. A. Hall, President and Chaplain. Box C, Burlington, Vermont.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

MIDDLESEX GENERAL HOSPITAL TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES

New Brunswick, N. J., offers a course in training to refined young women having had one year high school or its equivalent. Monthly allowance. Apply to SUPERINTENDENT.

St. John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses

YONKERS, NEW YORK

Registered in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a general training to refined, educated women. Requirements one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the Directress of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

IVORY SOAP had a good many unusual experiences during the war, and it was found in many strange bath-tubs. Perhaps in none did it give more pleasure than in the one mentioned below, in a letter written on board one of the army transports:

"We all had a bath in a large canvas arranged for the purpose a few days ago, about 25 being under the hose at one time. Best of all, we had Ivory Soap. It certainly seemed like home to rub in the mild Ivory lather from head to foot and then feel the delightful exhilaration following a brisk rub down."

IVORY SOAP...  ... 99  $\frac{44}{100}$  % PURE

IT FLOATS

The Outlook

JULY 23, 1919

THE PRESIDENT REPORTS TO THE COUNTRY

IT was not chiefly to the assembled Senators that the President spoke in the Senate Chamber on July 10 (within forty-eight hours of his arrival in this country), but to the American people. The occasion was perhaps the most impressive of all the appearances of President Wilson before Congress, with the single exception of that on which he asked for the declaration of war against Germany. The Senate Chamber was crowded with distinguished visitors, including Representatives, Cabinet members, Justices of the Supreme Court, and diplomatists. Welcoming him with hand-clapping and cheers, the audience listened to the President in silence, reserving its applause for the address until the end. The address itself was one of the longest he has delivered. It took about forty minutes. It was not an exposition of the Treaty or of the processes by which it was constructed, but an appeal, supported with references to the difficulties involved in the work, to the valor of our soldiers, and to the idealism with which America entered the war and now looks to the future.

Terming the Treaty as "nothing less than a world settlement," the President explained that he could not summarize or construe its manifold provisions in a speech which "must of necessity be something less than a treatise;" but he placed himself at the disposal of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. By saying that he spoke to the Senate "prior to your own study of the document" he intimated clearly that he expected the Senate to take some time for an examination of the Treaty. There has been some opinion to the effect that the Senate has already had time enough to come to a conclusion about it; but this is an opinion which the President evidently does not share.

In saying that the Senate had been "daily cognizant" of what had been going on in the Peace Conference, the President was not speaking in irony; it is clear that he does not quite realize how difficult it has been for Americans, even men in the Senate, to know what has been done from day to day and from week to week at Paris.

THE PRESIDENT MAKES A COMPARISON

Early in his speech to the Senate the President drew a contrast between the entrance of America and the entrance of other nations into the war. "We entered it, not because our material interests were directly threatened or because any special treaty obligations to which we were parties had been violated, but only because we saw the supremacy, and even the validity, of right everywhere put in jeopardy and free government likely to be everywhere imperiled by the intolerable aggression of a Power which respected neither right nor obligation. . . . We entered the war as disinterested champions of right and we interested ourselves in the terms of the Peace in no other capacity."

The President gave a tribute to our men in the war, saying of them: "Finer men never went into battle, and their officers were worthy of them. . . . They were terrible in battle, and gentle and helpful out of it, remembering the mothers and the sisters, the wives and the little children at home. They were free men under arms, not forgetting their ideals of duty in the midst of tasks of violence."

These men, he declared, were symbols of what America stood for, and it was therefore the duty of American representatives at the Peace Conference "to make the triumph of freedom and of right a lasting triumph."

Difficulties, however, stood in the way. "It was not easy," he said, "to graft the new order of ideas on the old, and some of the fruits of the grafting may, I fear, for a time be bitter." The men of the Conference tried to get away from the "bad influences, the illegitimate purposes," of the old order. The difficulties, he declared, "lay in the circumstances, not often in the men."

THE PRESIDENT APPEALS FOR SUPPORT

The President outlined to the Senate the task of the Peace Conference as one not merely of making peace, for, as he put it, "there could be no peace until the whole order of Central Europe was set right." The old order consisted of "arrangements of power," not "arrangements of natural union or association." So "peoples hitherto in darkness were to be led out into the same light and given at last a helping hand." It was an opportunity therefore "to throw safeguards about the rights of racial, national, and religious minorities by solemn international covenants." All this could not be done by describing in a treaty what should be done. The President summed up the different tasks as, for example, the placing of colonies in the hands of trustees, future control of waterways, setting up the new states, the future administration of such territories as the Sarre Basin or the city of Dantsic, safeguarding plebiscites, the supervision of the work of reparation on the part of Germany, carrying out mutual promises among governments concerning labor. He thus led up to this statement:

A league of free nations had become a practical necessity. Examine the Treaty of Peace and you will find that everywhere throughout its manifold provisions its framers have felt obliged to turn to the League of Nations as an indispensable instrumentality for the maintenance of the new order it has been their purpose to set up in the world—the world of civilized men.

He said that as the Peace Conference went on it became more and more obvious to all who took part in it that the League was not only necessary, but that it must be "the authority through which international action was to be secured. . . . The League of Nations was the practical statesman's hope of success in many of the most difficult things he was attempting." As the President described it, "Again and again had the demon of war been cast out of the house of the peoples and the house swept clean by a treaty of peace, only to prepare a time when he would enter in again with spirits worse than himself. The house must now be given a tenant who could hold it against all such." The practical statesmen therefore saw the League of Nations as the hope of the world. "Shall we," the President asked, "or any other free people hesitate to accept this great duty? Dare we reject it and break the heart of the world?"

Promising to present the Franco-American treaty later and delivering a tribute to America as a friend of all nations, the President closed with the declaration:

We cannot turn back. We can only go forward, with lifted eyes and freshened spirit, to follow the vision. It was of this that we dreamed at our birth. America shall in truth show the way. The light streams upon the path ahead, and nowhere else.

THE CELEBRATION IN PARIS

"It was early in the morning of Monday, July 15, that the long expected German drive on the western front began to the east and west of the city of Rheims." This was the first sentence of The Outlook's history of the week a year ago. Really, as was very soon learned, the military movement there described began with an air patrol by Allied planes on the day before—the national holiday of France, Bastille Day. Thus began the battle of Champagne, which was to this war what the battle of Gettysburg was to the American Civil War. From that time on the Germans were beaten.

This year, on Bastille Day, France celebrated the victory by a parade under the Arc de Triomphe.

It was a solemn celebration. Those who have been in France during the past months know very well that the French have not been and are not now in a gala mood. What France has endured would leave any people solemn. And these days of the Peace Conference have not been such as to relieve the French of their seriousness. It was fitting, therefore, and natural that at the head of this parade there should pass under the arch and before the reviewing stand a thousand representatives of the wounded poilus. The blind, the invalid, and the lame had the place of honor. It is reported that the presence of these wounded soldiers was a surprise to the crowd; that they were scarcely recognized at first, because these limping men and these men in wheeled chairs did not give the appearance of a military formation; but cheers greeted them as soon as the crowd understood.

Following these wounded came the two French Marshals, Joffre, the victor of the Marne, and Foch, the victor at the Aisne. After them came General Pershing and other American generals, with American troops. Then followed the Belgians, British, Italians, Japanese, Portuguese, Serbs, Czechs, Rumanians, and Poles. Here indeed was figured the uprising of the world against the nation that had deliberately chosen to act the pirate and brigand.

In the evening, while some danced, though without the spontaneity of armistice night, and while searchlights played and fireworks illumined the sky, a silent, somber throng passed before a great cenotaph, an empty coffin, symbol of the war's human sacrifice. These people were of the families of the dead. Before this procession ended the empty coffin was buried in flowers—one flower for each family.

America should never forget what her peace, her security, the preservation of her soul, has cost, not only herself, but her friend and associate, France.

HONOR TO CAPTAIN FRYATT

"Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God," was inscribed by one of the judges of Charles I on a rock in his New England hiding-place. "Resistance to pirates is punishable with death," was the theory put in practice by Germany when it executed Captain Charles Fryatt. The charge brought against him was that as captain of a British merchant ship he attempted to ram a German submarine. This was in 1916; no fact of the war is better known and better established than that then Germany had practiced ruthless and lawless attacks on merchant ships and had slaughtered hundreds of non-combatants. Captain Fryatt knew this. He was entitled by law and by common sense to defend his vessel, and how otherwise could he defend her except by attacking a predatory submarine as soon as he saw it? We see no reason whatever to change the opinion of The Outlook, uttered soon after the incident: "As master of a British merchantman he knew very well the history of German submarine warfare, with its attacks without warning and murderous drownings of women and children and other non-combatants. When, therefore, his vessel was approached by a German submarine, he did what he was entitled to do by all the laws of warfare, and doubly entitled to do by the moral status of German submarines as established by themselves."

The other day, in London, business was dropped, flags were flown at half-mast, people lined the streets, all to do honor to the remains of the brave British sailor Charles Fryatt, whose body was borne to St. Paul's with dignified and solemn ceremony, and thence to a little country churchyard.

Nurse Cavell and Captain Fryatt are the two figures whose martyrdom through German cruelty will in the minds of the English people stand forever as the most moving and the deepest felt example of Germany's multifold evil acts.

DAYLIGHT SAVED AGAIN

It took considerable political courage and some confidence in his own understanding of public opinion for the President to veto the bill which provided that after this year there shall be no more daylight saving.

The bill which carried the repeal was a great appropriation measure for the Department of Agriculture, and it had been adopted by a great majority in both branches of Congress. The House of Representatives by declining to pass the measure again by a two-thirds vote sustained the President's veto.

We think that the President in this case has interpreted the opinion of the country aright.

Such opposition as there is to daylight saving seems to us to be chiefly of two kinds. One is the opposition of interests which suffer by the measure. Concerns that produce and sell electric and other light cannot compete with the sun; and anything that induces or makes it easy for people to use sunlight instead of artificial light hurts their business. Public welfare, however, outweighs such private interests, and should control.

The other kind of opposition comes from some farmers who have found it necessary to get up before daylight in order to meet the changed schedules of milk trains and the like. This opposition is natural, but it could be removed by methods less drastic than the repeal of a law that is a godsend to hundreds of thousands of workers in the cities and towns. The running time of milk trains could be altered. The law, moreover, could be modified so as to postpone the change of time to a little later in the spring and advance the change back again to a little earlier in the autumn. This has been proposed. Reasonable modifications in the daylight saving plan should be considered.

That the subject can be discussed on its merits is due to the President's veto.

CONGRESS AND PROHIBITION

The failure of various attempts to amend in the House of Representatives the Volstead Bill by test votes indicates a strong leaning toward drastic enforcement. As our readers know, the bill attempts to deal both with the situation now existing under the war-time measure and under the Constitutional Amendment. Votes on proposed amendments which would, if adopted, have the effect of killing the bill were adverse, by 94 to 141 and 78 to 143. So far the House has not shown a disposition to reject the definition of intoxicating beverages as those containing one-half of one per cent of alcohol, nor to adopt a definition declaring those beverages intoxicating "which are by a jury declared to be in fact intoxicating." A proposal has been made to divide the Volstead Bill so as to embody in separate bills the provisions regarding the two situations involved in the war-time law and the Amendment. So far such attempts have failed.

It is certainly most desirable for Congress to act, and act quickly, upon the immediate situation, while it might very properly take more time in defining the Amendment and providing the means to enforce it.

The degree of observance of the prohibition bill now in force differs in different localities and as between cities and rural districts. The Government has instituted suits against large brewers which will undoubtedly lead in time to authoritative decisions by the higher Federal court. Arrests of individual retail dealers have been made at various places, notably in Atlantic City. If we may trust indications in the New York newspapers, there is a growing belief that retail dealers who sell nothing but the "2.75" beer cannot survive, because their receipts are altogether too small to meet their large expenses. The indications are that most of the large and more reputable hotels and restaurants are observing the law, although many interpret it rather liberally, while there is inevitably in many saloons such evasions and disobedience of the law as have always been known in Sunday selling in the past.

THE IRISH QUESTION IN AMERICA

Sincere sympathizers in this country with Irish aspirations for self-government deplore acts and utterances in America which are insulting to the great Ally which carried so many thousands of American soldiers to France and beside whose armies at the Hindenburg line and elsewhere American soldiers fought for victory. There may well be demands, if the sort of thing we have had lately continues, of a feeling that the Irish-American hyphen must be checked before it resembles the German-American hyphen. Even so good a friend of our Irish citizens as the New York "World" remarks that this danger is imminent, and says: "Until Irishmen themselves learn to settle their quarrels at home, it would be wiser for them not to embroil other peoples whose sympathy they profess to desire."

The most offensive demonstration took place at a meeting in Madison Square Garden, New York City, in honor of Mr. Valera, who is, as some one has put it, "the imaginary President of the imaginary Irish Republic." At this meeting the newspapers report that several times hisses greeted references to the President of the United States, and that "so loudly was Mr. Wilson's name hissed and booed" that the meeting could not go on. With all respect to liberty of speech and freedom of thought, there is a limit of courtesy and decency toward the country and its chosen head that must not be passed without rebuke. Moreover, American citizens of Irish descent should be American first, last, and all the time; and, whatever their traditional sympathies may be, they should abstain from violent agitation as regards political matters in another country.

From another source (namely, from Sir Edward Carson, the great enemy of the Sinn Feiners and of any Irish independence which would make Ulster a minority county governed by the majority in the other Irish provinces) comes an ill-advised and intemperate rebuke to America (not to Irish agitators in America, but to America itself) in which he bluntly says: "You attend to your own affairs; we will attend to ours." He attributes to America at large the campaign "to create a great anti-British feeling." The whole tone of this Irish Union leader is calculated to arouse resentment even among those who have no sympathy for the cause of Irish independence. It was marred also, apart from the rebuke to America, by a deplorable attack upon Sir Horace Plunkett, who, Sir Edward asserted, "has boxed the compass of political profligacy." As a matter of fact, all moderate-minded friends of Ireland know that Sir Horace Plunkett has done more than any other Irishman to try to bring the Irish question to a reasonable compromise. It is almost ludicrous for Sinn Feiners to declare President Wilson a hypocrite because he does not meet their views as to Irish "self-determination," and at the same time to refuse to listen to reason as to Ulster's natural anxiety for some kind of self-determination. And it is offensive and certainly ineffectual for Sir Edward Carson to attack as scoundrels those who are now advocating making Ireland a Dominion like Canada or one of a federation of British estates, each having Home Rule as to its own affairs, and all to be represented in an Imperial Parliament which should deal with the whole British Empire.

A SAVIOR OF CHILDREN

Dr. Abraham Jacobi was one of the best loved men and most honored physicians in New York City. When he died, on July 11, at the age of eighty-nine, more than one account of his life recalled the phrase used by Mr. Nathan Straus at a dinner in honor of Dr. Jacobi's eighty-fifth birthday—"the Father Abraham of the twentieth century, the savior of babies." Rich babies and poor babies profited by Dr. Jacobi's skill and knowledge. His time and effort were always first pledged to their aid. Moreover, he preached as well as practiced, and his text was, in his words: "The only protection for the Nation, for mankind, is to assure a healthy, uncontaminated progeny."

Germany, which had exiled Jacobi in his youth, tried forty years later to recover him by an offer to make him Professor of Pediatrics in the University of Berlin. But Dr. Jacobi had long been an American through and through. He would remain where he was, he replied; he did not speak of America as his adopted country, but "as the country that adopted me and gave me a chance to work."

Born the child of a poor Jewish storekeeper in Westphalia, Jacobi's thirst for knowledge and capacity for hard work fought for him against all odds until he got his medical degree when he was barely twenty-one. But Berlin, asked to give him a license to practice, found out that he read and circulated "dangerous" books, locked him up in a fortress, and convicted him of lèse majesté. Carl Schurz knew him in that revolutionary stage. Their introducer told Schurz that Jacobi was "a young man who could be absolutely depended upon in every respect and under all circumstances." "And [Schurz added more than half a century later] as the man who can be depended upon in every respect and under all circumstances I have known and loved him ever since."

Dr. Jacobi had an active and a recipient mind for all of his professional life. He absorbed modern ideas, advanced step by step with medical science, applauded research and discovery as earnestly as he denounced quacks and charlatanry. What Dr. Osler said of him as an authority in the profession was true of him in his life and practice: "There is no claptrap, no gallery play, but a faithful administration of an intellectual trust."

A NEW APPROACH TO AMERICANIZATION WORK

Out of the war and the imperative need for Americanization which the war showed has come a new school for the foreigner.

The old night school, meaning not continuation classes, but the instruction offered adult immigrants, met in the evening, in the public school. The new classes for foreigners meet in the daytime, in the factories. No longer is there any need to dress up, nor the effort of going out at night; the man goes in his working clothes, during his working hours. Instead of two-hour sessions four times a week, the new plan has forty-five-minute lessons twice a week. It is elastic, allowing for absentees changed temporarily to the night shift, allowing for industrial fatigue by putting the class on company time, or half and half. The old night school gave the immigrant books fitted for children. Its pupils, grown men who had done a hard day's work, read, "I am a little yellow bird," or the classical primary beginning of education, "The cat is on the mat." The new class for foreigners has special lessons on the every-day things the newcomers are using and doing—things about the house, things to eat, to wear, to buy; on the work of the factory, safety signs, and warnings; and, lastly, lessons in civics and citizenship, the ideals for which they came to America. Where the old plan put its emphasis on books, the new class puts it on conversation. Where most of the time was spent on reading and writing, that is now the test of the lazy teacher. Instead of books it uses objects—shoes and hats and tools, to be handled and talked about. With a definite amount in the books to be covered in a definite time, the old night school gave very long lessons—twenty-five words to spell, a dozen problems in arithmetic. The new class for beginners insists that five words are sufficient for a lesson. Ten words a week, actually mastered, so that a man or woman can use them immediately, means encouraging progress.

The old night school worked with large groups—thirty, forty, even fifty. The new class is small, with twenty-five as the maximum, and fifteen preferred. A group that grows beyond twenty-five is divided, the men ranked as advanced pupils or beginners according to their ability to speak English. But there is also another method of grading—their desires; the Slav wants English to get a job, the Italian to converse, the Russian Jew to read and write, the Pole, seeing further than the others, to secure an education.

Instead of thinking that any teacher will do, supervisors of these new classes spend an infinite amount of time in interviewing applicants. They must be teachers of experience, of vision, of friendliness, keenly interested in the work. They must have special training, given in lectures, discussions, and observations in factory classes. The new teaching builds up, not from a man's ignorance, but from his intelligence. It isn't a pouring in of facts, but education in its literal meaning, a leading out of the pupil.

Where are these new classes for foreigners? In Chicago, where through the splendid co-operation of the Board of Education, their supervisor, Miss Frances Wetmore, and the Association of Commerce, a hundred and fifty classes a week are being held, with a hundred important industries on the waiting list. And the new approach to Americanization has spread to Bridgeport and New Bedford, to Syracuse and Cleveland, and many other factory towns.

THE R-34'S ROUND TRIP

When the R-34 landed safely at Pulham (an English air station northeast of London) last week Monday, she completed a journey across the Atlantic and back of about 6,200 miles in the actual flying time of 185 hours. Her home flight was shorter both in miles and hours than her western crossing, and the 75 hours of the return would certainly have been less had it not been for the breaking down of one of her five engines. As it is, the Mauretania's ship record of four days and ten hours is left far in the rear.

Practically the lighter-than-aircraft record is now three days, while the heavier-than-aircraft record (Alcock's) is a trifle over sixteen hours. If one considers relative bulk, carrying power, and safety, he may see force in Major Scott's remark after he had navigated the R-34 twice across the ocean: "I think the large type of aircraft will be best suited for trans-ocean work in the future. Improvements will be made, chiefly in size and accommodations. I think a speed of at least 100 miles an hour, irrespective of winds, should be aimed at, but that is a long way ahead yet."

Major Scott describes the return voyage as uneventful; despite the engine trouble, much fog, and some head winds, the prevailing westward breezes made sailing home easy. General Maitland, who represented the British Air Ministry on the R-34, is even more optimistic than he was when in New York as to the future navigation of the air for commercial purposes. "Airships," he says, "undoubtedly will be used in the future over sea and over land. They will not conflict in any way with the airplane or seaplane, but all will work together. The airship will go on long voyages, while the other fliers will radiate for short distances from the airship termini."

As a sequel to the "round trip," it is stated in despatches from London, it is planned to send the R-33, mate of the R-34, on a voyage to India.

THE SOCIAL UNIT PLAN

A plan of community organization which has been on trial for two and a half years in what is known as the Mohawk-Brighton district of Cincinnati, Ohio, may be extended to other districts and cities or applied throughout one municipality in 1920 if plans under discussion by the National Social Unit Organization mature.

Mr. Franklin K. Lane, of President Wilson's Cabinet, who recently became chairman of the National Social Unit Organization, describes the social unit as "a plan for bringing Government closer to people's lives, developing the neighborhood as a unit of the city, State, and Nation, and creating for the people the municipal and civic life fulfilling their desires."

This the Organization seeks to do by creating a neighborhood administration representative, first, of all of the people, divided geographically into units of a hundred families, with elected "block committees" and "block executives," and second, of the various skilled groups, federated together into a planning body for the community, initiating programmes, submitting them to the people for ratification or rejection, and putting them into effect through the intimate block organization. Representatives of the blocks and representatives of the skilled groups join in a central community council. It is claimed for this system of neighborhood administration that it provides for the utilization of the highest type of expert skill, and tends to secure the constant participation of an increasingly large number of people in the conduct of their own affairs.

In the plan as it has been tested in the Mohawk-Brighton district every block has been organized and block committees and representatives elected by a very fair proportion of the entire adult citizenship. Physicians, social workers, teachers, nurses, trade-union representatives, business men, recreation workers, and clergymen have come together as groups, and have elected representatives to the "Occupation Council," a body co-operating with the representatives of the blocks. Together these bodies have planned and carried out a remarkably comprehensive programme of preventive health work, have vitalized recreation, made a beginning in the establishment of a unique and significant system of collecting community statistics, started a community newspaper edited and controlled by an elected editorial board, improved housing conditions, and brought into activity scores of people hitherto passive in community affairs. Simultaneously there has been a marked increase in attendance at night schools, attendance at school social centers has increased, and representatives of agencies which had been working in the district, both before and after the community organized, agree that neighborliness and general community pride and intelligence have noticeably increased.

The most clear-cut demonstration of the value of this form of organization in carrying out a complete programme in any field has been made in public health. Local physicians have opened a diagnostic clinic, and through the co-operation of the block organization have given medical examinations to over eighty per cent of all children of pre-school age in the district. Nurses, backed by an organized community and assisted by lay representatives in the blocks, have put every baby under nursing care. During the influenza epidemic the district organization demonstrated its superiority over the rest of the city both in the prompter and more complete reporting of cases, and in a markedly lowered death rate—less than half that of the immediately contiguous territory and of the city as a whole. When the community took cases of tuberculosis

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

Bronstrup in the San Francisco Chronicle

NOT ROOM FOR BOTH

THE LEAGUE AND, THE SENATE: TWO VIEWS

Chapin in the St. Louis Republic

THIS DIRIGIBLE SEEMS LOST IN THE FOG

From the Manchester Chronicle

THE IRON DICE OF WAR HAVING DROPPED AGAINST HIM, THE TIME HAS COME FOR THE GAMBLER TO PAY

Hart in London Opinion

BOARDING-HOUSE PERILS

"Why do you sit all the evening on that uncomfortable piano stool? You can't play the piano."

"No; and as long as I am here, no one else can."

Keene in London Opinion

THE HIGH PRICE OF THINGS

Boy: "Gimme a penn'orth of mixed sweets."

Shopkeeper: "Here are two, my lad. You can mix them yourself."

Digitized by Google

under its general nursing system, the number under care increased four hundred per cent, and it has been possible through this organization to reach a remarkably large proportion of all expectant mothers.

The plans of the National Social Unit Organization include the rounding out of the Mohawk-Brighton experiment, the building up of a large National membership representative of territories and skilled groups, the valuation of the results accomplished in the experimental period, and the holding of a National conference at which plans for extension shall be made.

DELAWARE'S LITTLE RED SCHOOLHOUSE

From the thirty-third State in the Union to the first is the jump that the Diamond State is endeavoring to make in the line of educational advance. Delaware is recognizing the new era, and preparing her young citizens for its opportunities. A new and complete school code was passed by the Legislature this year, and one of the members of the State Board of Education, Pierre S. du Pont, has just established a trust fund yielding $2,000,000 to lift Delaware into the front rank as regards well-equipped schools.

The conditions of the trust fund gift are that up to one-half the cost of constructing new schoolhouses or thoroughly reconstructing old ones will be borne by the du Pont fund. But not a penny of it can be claimed for repairs or temporary remodeling. The other half of the cost of school buildings must be borne by the school districts. Every school thus built must conform in location, size, and plans to the rules of the new State Board of Education. Precedence will be given to those rural districts which offer to put up the approved type of consolidated schools, so planned that they can be used as community centers.

One-fifth of the total fund is set aside for the benefit of the colored schools of the State, that being practically the proportion of colored pupils to white ones. Delaware has neglected the schooling of her colored boys and girls, but she can do so no longer. Nearly all the schoolhouses of the State are of a decidedly backward and inferior type, as shown by a recent survey made by the General Education Board.

Experts from Columbia University, New York, are now at work making a scientific survey, with measurements and photographs, of all school buildings outside of Wilmington. If the school districts claim more than the income of the fund, the principle will be drawn upon up to half a million. The fund is given for four years, after which the offer no longer holds good.

There were 38,710 pupils in the public schools of Delaware last year. If the school districts respond fully during the next four years (as there is no doubt they will), $4,000,000 will be spent in schoolhouses, or over one hundred dollars per pupil. This means a school-housing scheme ahead of every other State in the Union. No other State has such a supplementary building fund as this, and its beneficent workings will be watched eagerly by every educational expert in America. Incidentally, every other State envies Delaware her wise and generous giver, who, already having given Delaware College a million and a half for higher education, now has turned his attention and his business genius to the neglected little red schoolhouse, the Cinderella of our National school system.

WHY THE KAISER SHOULD BE TRIED

HIS futility, his pretensions to knowledge, his love of theatrical effect without a sense of the ineffectiveness of stage play beside real tragedy, his personal vanity, his attempt to act a mediæval rôle in the twentieth century, his disposition to be a braggart, his yellow streak—these qualities and others make Wilhelm Hohenzollern offensive. That, however, is no reason why he should be haled before a tribunal of the nations and tried. That he has been a disturber of the peace of nations, that he has said ridiculous, insulting, and irritating things, that he has even been the leader—nominally at least—of a nation with whom we have been at war, ought not to be of weight in deciding whether he should be put on trial. If Wilhelm were but another autocrat who had failed, it perhaps would be best to leave him where he is and to let him be forgotten.

If Wilhelm as Kaiser had merely pursued a policy antagonistic to other nations and had failed, there would be no occasion for trying him. Other leaders have adhered to mistaken causes. Other leaders have made unjust wars or wars which the world, at least, has judged to be unjust. That has been no reason for trying those leaders. They may have been regarded as offenders, but they were political offenders.

Wilhelm ought to be tried for none of these reasons, but because he has been the chief of a gang who have broken the law, and are therefore not political but criminal offenders.

The law that he and his gang broke is the public law of nations.

It was not war that they made; it was a murderous assault. In doing what they did they made themselves outlaws. They recognized this fact, for their spokesman, Bethmann Hollweg, acknowledged it. They even gloried in the fact that they were not only breaking the law, but, as they believed, were destroying it. What we call the World War was not strictly a war at all as history knows wars. On the part of the Germans and their associates it was a criminal raid; and on the part of those who fought them it was the pursuit of the criminals by a vast vigilance committee. From the beginning to the end this is what the World War was. It was a struggle on behalf of law against the lawless.

This is not a figure of speech; it is the actual historic fact. In order to understand this it is necessary to understand what law is. In his treatise on "International Law" Dr. Oppenheim, one of the chief authorities on the subject, points out that law is virtually the very basis of any community. Wherever men live together and have common interests and intercourse they have to observe certain rules and conventions. The rules that are accepted by common consent may be rules of morality or rules of law. If they are left to the individual conscience, they are rules of morality; but if they are by common consent to be enforced by external power upon any member of the community, then they are rules of law. It is not necessary, therefore, that there be a lawmaking or law-giving state or sovereign. Laws may be enacted, but laws also may grow without enactment. Indeed, every legislative body owes its very existence to the acceptance of the law that it has lawmaking power. This is fundamental law. Such is the character of the law of nations. It consists of that body of rules which the community of nations has by common consent accepted as enforceable. Just as in primitive communities of individuals, so in the community of nations there is no central authority for the enforcement of the law; but that does not mean that the law is not enforced; it means that the constituent states "have to take the law into their own hands." As Dr. Oppenheim declares: "Self-help and intervention on the part of other states which sympathize with the wronged one are the means by which the rules of the law of nations can be and actually are enforced." This is what happened in what we call the World War. Germany defied the public law of nations. In contempt of that law she attacked Serbia, Belgium, and France. The only way in which that law could be defended and enforced was by resistance, not only on the part of those whom Germany had wronged but on the part of all who believed in the public law of nations as the foundation of security and justice for the world. Thus the nations took the only means available for enforcing the law, namely, self-help and intervention.

It is not enough, however, to have thwarted Germany in her designs. It is necessary—if the public law of nations is to be maintained—as in the case of any other violator of the law, to exact a penalty that will stand as a notice and sign forever that law is a reality and a power in the world.

As the head of the offending state, the former Kaiser is, in the light of the law, the chief, though by no means the only responsible, person to be called to account. If, as Señor Blasco-Ibáñez with fine irony suggests in his article in this issue, Wilhelm should observe the code of the Prussian military officer and take his own life, he would to that extent cheat the law. We hope the world will not hear that pistol shot, for there is something more to be done than to get rid of a troublesome and offensive personality. It is the duty of the free and law-abiding nations of the world to establish the precedent which can best be exemplified in the formal trial of the Kaiser. The Treaty of Versailles arraigns him "for a supreme offense against international morality and the sanctity of treaties." It would have been better if the Treaty had stated the exact fact—that it was an offense, not merely against international morality, but against international law.

It is well to remember, however, that the offender is not merely an individual, but a nation. Burke's theory that there is no way of indicting a whole people has been disproved in these days. It is, however, physically impossible to bring a whole people bodily to the bar for trial. What can be done is to bring that people's leaders where they can face their accusers and, after conviction, receive their sentences. This war will not be completed—if we can call it a war at all—until those trials are held and until the sentences are pronounced.

CLASSICS AND CULTURE

THE old and ever-interesting question of the value of the classics and of cultural as contrasted with practical education has just been revived through two delightful contributions to the discussion, each laying emphasis on a single phase of classical learning.

The knowledge of our own language, the meaning and the shades of meaning of countless English words as gained through Latin and Greek, is the subject of an article in the current "Atlantic Monthly," by Mr. Frederic Irland, official reporter of debates in the House of Representatives. In a letter to the editor, quoted in the "Atlantic's" "Contributors' Column," Mr. Irland says: "The English language is a garden of glorious hybrid flowers. Nobody objects to the flowers, but there are cutworms who would destroy our knowledge of the roots." In the article itself he supports his contention that "the average high school graduate, who has studied no other language than English, cannot even understand literary English, much less use it" by lists of definitions given by high school pupils (who know not Latin) of words of Latin and Greek origin, the meaning of which should have been evident to any one with a classical training. Thus the word "phenomena" is defined in various ways as a lung disease or bad cold, the confusion with "pneumonia" being evident; "pomp," as a dancing slipper; "parable," as capable of being peeled; "diaphanous," as having to do with the diaphragm; "eugenics," as genius; "paregoric," as a story with a moral; and so on in numerous and amusing examples. The writer affirms that pupils who have studied the classics would not make these mistakes, but gives no confirmatory evidence. He fears that neglect of the old languages is weakening general knowledge of the riches of our flexible tongue.

No doubt there is point, and certainly there is pungency, in his presentation of the philological worth of language study, but its value is not limited to the Latin and Greek; it may be had from modern language study also. It is true that there are some people who take naturally to the form, derivation, and connection of words, while others may dig at Cicero and Virgil industriously with very little residue of word-lore to help them in wielding their own language as an instrument.

Dr. John H. Finley, in an address before the recent meeting of the National Education Association, struck a deeper note in arguing for "The Need of the Classics." He quotes a book on Roman agriculture by a Virginia farmer who is also a railway president as saying that "the Romans achieved their results by thoroughness and patience. . . . The foundation of their agriculture was the fallow." In education as in agriculture Dr. Finley sees the value of the fallow field—not the idle field, but one preserved from over-haste in working and well fertilized. "In the war days," says Dr. Finley, "we naturally ignored the fallow. We cultivated with Hooverian haste. It was necessary to put our soil in peril of exhaustion even as we put our men in peril of death. Forty million added acres were commandeered, six billion bushels of the leading cereals were added to the annual product of earlier seasons. The land could be let to think only of immediate defense. Crops only could be grown which would help promptly to win the war." But now, in study as well as in farming, he argues, we should plow deep, clear the ground, and strengthen it richly. And the classics, to carry on his analogy, furnish the best plows for mental soil that is not shallow; in short, "there is a time to sow, to sow the seed for the special crop you want; but it is after you have plowed the field. There is a time to specialize, to give the information which the life is to produce in kind; but it is when you have thoroughly prepared the mind by its plowing discipline."

Thus, despite the rush and push of practical training for quick and concrete accomplishment, we find the feeling still strong to-day that the old ways of gaining culture and mental discipline—to say nothing of the charm of association ever present in properly directed intimacy with the literature of the past—are still defended by men of taste and wisdom.

The truth is that both scientific and cultural courses are valuable. The problem is an individual one, related to the purpose and future of the student. It may be met by great universities through furnishing equal facilities and equal thoroughness in both directions, or it may be met by smaller institutions solely adapted to the one or the other need.

THE GREATEST AMERICAN INVENTION

WE of the United States are sometimes humblest about our noblest achievements and braggarts about less worthy ones. Parents and teachers, pastors and publicists, are to-day solicitous about American education, all alike eager to subdue and strait-jacket it to that pitiful dead level called standardization—this American education which by some high and happy hazard has produced a power of initiative and of energy beyond that of any other nation in the world. Better not shackle our schools or our homes, but let them go on with their liberty for incessant experiment, for back of both has been one pervasive but modest influence, one potent but unnoted person. Our armies of the field and our armies of the factory were due both to the American school and to the American home, and yet we have never been proud of the child-training of either. We boast of our electricity, our industry, our inventions, but the greatest thing America has ever produced is the great American "daddy."

"Daddy" is the most influential person we have ever given birth to, and he is also the humblest. He is still pretty young; as a National type he does not belong to the time of our grandfathers—he has only just begun to be a grandfather himself. He is found in every class in this country, but he is not found at all in any other country or in any other period. Yet perhaps from time to time there were in the past potential daddies. In mediæval literature it is a daddy's blithe joy in baby play and prattle that a fond and mourning father commemorates in "The Pearl;" and Roman history chronicles another natural-born daddy, for when little Tullia pattered across a tessellated court to greet a father spent with oratory she sprang into the arms of a man quite as clear in severing fatherhood from forum as any American faring home at evening from factory or office.

It has remained, however, for the American daddy to solve the problem of parenthood better than history has ever before solved it, and much better than the mother has yet solved it, although that is hardly her fault, poor thing! There is a subtle division of parental labor and parental privilege implicit in the fact that an American household calls its male head "daddy," while it calls its female head "mother." In the nature of things, mother is a generic term, belonging to every time and country, as static in its implication as it is stanch. Mother is mother all the world over, but daddy, in the American tongue, is a word instantly whimsical with individuality. Daddy, however, is a sad rogue really, walking off with all the poetry of parenthood and leaving the prose to mother. The dentist and the doctor, the teacher and the oculist, are mother's affair; tonsils and adenoids are under maternal management; candy and toys and holidays are the paternal prerogatives. It is not fair, of course, but it will grow fairer as the woman recognizes her equal rights with the man in utter, irresponsible enjoyment of children.

It may be inherent in the laws of nature that mothers cannot enjoy children so much as fathers may. Perhaps a mother cannot sufficiently separate herself from what was once flesh of her flesh and bone of her bone to be able to regard her offspring as separate entities. Yet the consummation of happy irresponsibility is to be recommended as a goal for mothers no less than for fathers. Mothers are prone to an anxious and insistent dominance that involuntarily shapes a child's character into a maternal likeness, eventually entailing upon the mother herself the deadliest ennui rather than the delight due to intercourse with a fresh and independent personality. In spite, however, of the still imperfect evolution of the maternal attitude, the development of parental responsibility is to-day peculiarly promising. What daddy has already accomplished mother will later attain, because the constant attitude of woman toward man's privileges is first to covet, then to appropriate.

One special advantage the present-day father possesses which enables him both to be his son's boon companion and to let his son be his, and that is that to-day old age has become obsolete. Young people now have greater liberty to become enjoyable entities because old people are too busy with their own affairs to bother their children so incessantly as in the days when at fifty the old were laid upon the shelf, where they had nothing whatever to do but cavil at the antics of the oncoming generation. Now that a man goes on experimenting with business or statesmanship until he dies, he has less impulse to live in his son's life, being too much absorbed in his own. In fact, no one who has lived his own life adequately has any desire to live again in another's life. Only those who are feeble and frustrate desire by means of another's existence to right their own mistakes. Any live man or woman prefers to watch while younger folk essay the great adventure each after his own vision. The wise American daddy knows well that discreetly letting his children have their own way is the only means of making them unfailingly entertaining as friends.

Within the last forty years the world has made an incalculable advance in the sheer abandoned joy of intercourse between parents and children, first securely established and made uniform by the one and only American daddy. Little as we have noted the fact, daddy is so far our greatest contribution to the march of civilization.

THE PRESIDENT, THE SENATE, AND THE TREATY

A POLL OF THE PRESS

IF one may judge the sentiment of the country from editorial comment in the newspapers, there is very little question in the minds of Americans about the terms which the Allies have imposed upon Germany. Whatever disposition there is to protest against those terms as too severe, and to ask that the Treaty be rejected on the ground that Germany has been treated cruelly, seems to be confined to certain isolated groups, such as some of the still unreconciled German-Americans, certain so-called radicals of an academic type, and the like. For the most part, whatever discussion there is about the Treaty seems to be devoted mainly to such special provisions as that dealing with Shantung and, most of all, with the Covenant of the League of Nations. There is no evidence of the existence in America of any concern lest the world, and particularly Europe, may not have been sufficiently protected against a still powerful, if temporarily manacled, Prussia. The whole question under general discussion seems to be, on the one hand, whether too great concessions have not been made to the alleged imperialistic designs of our own allies, and, on the other hand, whether the liberty of the United States to determine its own foreign policy has been sufficiently safeguarded.

When, therefore, the President spoke before the Senate, interest centered on these two aspects of his address, and the reception of that address in the papers varies, according to the editors' opinions as to whether Mr. Wilson sufficiently assured the country concerning the non-imperialistic character of the terms of the Treaty and as to the character of the projected League of Nations.

Those who have had doubts about the League and about the nature of the Treaty awaited the President's speech in the frame of mind expressed by the Kansas City "Star," which, in its issue of July 8, before the President spoke, declared:

The country . . . is eager for all the information it can get. But it may be hoped Mr. Wilson will supply definite information and not generalities. . . . To say, as Mr. Wilson did in Boston, that American soldiers were crusaders and fought as men in a dream, is to be eloquent, but not convincing. The information the country desires is on concrete points of how the Covenant will work. . . . The President, his most earnest supporters will admit, has a love for generalizations and a distaste for concrete details. This order must be reversed if he is to contribute to the National enlightenment. The details of the workings of the League of Nations are the very essence of the Covenant.

Those who awaited the President's speech in this frame of mind generally report that the President did not fulfill the country's expectations. Even a supporter of the Treaty such as the Des Moines "Capital" says about the speech:

The President's address to Congress was up to his usual standard of eloquence and poetry. . . .

To some practical minds the words "vision," "pathway," and all such are a little tiresome, but they are willing to take it.

The address seems to give evidence that the President is still enthusiastic about what we have accomplished on the other side. . . .

But we regret to feel that there are just as many sources of trouble in Europe to-day as there were a year ago. . . .

No one on this side of the water fully knows or realizes what the League and the Covenant actually contains. . . .

The thing to do is to adopt the Covenant, Treaty and all, and fight the other difficulties out afterwards.

Other newspapers that express their disappointment at the President's generalizations are not so willing to accept the Treaty on trust. The New York "Sun," a consistent and vigorous critic of the President's course in Paris, and particularly of the League of Nations, notes "with pleasure the absence from the President's remarks of that tone of defiance, of uncompromising demand for acquiescence in his personal views, which has characterized some of his previous utterances;" but it describes the speech as what "might have been expected from an impassioned revivalist, and not from a statesman and practical legislator discussing an American question in the American Capitol." The "Sun" adds that "Mr. Wilson's address is conceived throughout precisely as if he had been sent abroad by his country to bring about that revolution in the world's system of government which has been his individual idea, his self-determined purpose, and his self-appointed task."

Supporters of the President and earnest advocates of the League may resent some of the comment upon the President's speech, as opponents of the League resent some of the comments upon the League's critics in the Senate. No one, however, can very well resent a piece of such good-humored comment as Don Marquis makes in his "colyum," the "Sun Dial," in the New York "Evening Sun." He has some verses about the President's speech and its reception in the Senate, based on the President's question concerning the League, "Dare we reject it and break the heart of the world?" It is a series of four stanzas, each followed by a chorus. The chorus after the first stanza represents the President as saying:

"O sign my League! O sign my League!
The world's heart it will break!
O sign my League! O sign my League!
for Home and Mother's sake!
O sign my League! O sign my League!
the Wee Tots lisp to thee!
And Angel Voices plead to sign
and save Humanity!"

Then "wicked Cabot Lodge" replies for the bold and bad Senate, and this is his version of the chorus:

"I will not sign! I will not sign! The world's heart it can break!
I will not sign! I will not sign! for Home nor Mother's sake!
I will not sign! I will not sign!
though Wee Tots lisp to me,
Though Angel Voices plead to sign
and save Humanity!"

Appearing to many as an appeal to sentimentalism rather than to reason, a skillful employment of the art of rhetoric to enlist the idealism of the American people on behalf of the Covenant without any encumbrances of fact, the President's speech is almost everywhere praised as a piece of English. Thus the Chicago "Daily Tribune" refers to "the spell of his eloquence," and declares that his address "is especially moving with reference to that clean and valorous achievement with which our soldiers and sailors thrilled our National heart." But the same journal is also impressed with the tendency of Mr. Wilson to use "liberal poetic license," and thus comments upon the President's preceding speech in New York:

Mr. Wilson's latest remarks must be taken purely as poetry. . . . Let us quote:

"It [his homesickness] was still more softened by the pride that I had in discovering that America had at last convinced the world of her true character. I was welcome because they had seen with their own eyes what America had done for the world. They had deemed her selfish. They had deemed her devoted to material interests. And they had seen her boys come across the water with a vision even more beautiful than that which they conceived when they had entertained dreams of liberty and peace."

If the President is about to try to sing the American people into a dreamland of that sort, sane men must indeed combat him promptly and vigorously.

The Wisconsin "State Journal" comments upon the Chicago "Tribune's" remarks by saying of the New York speech:

As poetry it is poor enough, but as a statement of what most of the American Army and Nation believed they were fighting for it comes "much closer" to literal truth than anything we recall in the Chicago "Tribune's" war editorial matter.

Most defenders of the President, like the Wisconsin "State Journal," follow the principle that the best defense is an offensive. Thus the Louisville "Courier-Journal" speaks of the "twaddle and cant" in the Senate; and the Atlanta "Constitution" defends the League by calling its opponents in the Senate "recalcitrants, political buzzards, and partisan mountebanks," and attributes criticism of it to partisan motives by saying:

There is opposition to it in the United States Senate, and it will continue as long as it can harass the President and the Democratic Administration or disturb the political sentiment of the country.

The New York "World," which among newspapers has been the most consistent and vigorous defender of the President's policies, so that it has sometimes been called the mouthpiece of the Administration, describes the President's address to the Senate as a "call to duty." It says:

Mr. Wilson has never been more felicitous in any of his public utterances than he was yesterday when he explained the stupendous difficulties with which the Paris Conference had been compelled to grapple in rebuilding the peace of the world, and the reasons why it had been found imperative to make the League of Nations the keystone of the structure. . . .

The President's address is more than a plea for the Treaty and the League. It is a call to duty no less imperative than that which he made to Congress on April 2, 1917, when the United States was summoned to war "for the things that we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free."

The "World" in another editorial likens the opposition to the Versailles Treaty to the opposition, as described by Hamilton, to the Jay Treaty; and denounces still later the Republicans in the Senate by ascribing to them a trivial purpose, saying:

Some of the opposition Senators seem to think that "reservations" is a blessed word like Mesopotamia, and that it makes no difference in particular what the reservations are, provided the Senate asserts its power and tinkers the Treaty.

The New York "Sun" is not at all troubled by the argument that any reservations may require the sending of the Treaty back to the Peace Conference. There is a good deal of doubt in the minds of critics of the Treaty whether that would be necessary; but the "Sun," saying that the conviction strengthens day by day that after reservations are added the Covenant will go before the Peace Conference again, exclaims:

All the better if it does.

What the American people know they are going to do and are not going to do after the Treaty ratifying and the League tinkering are over should also be unmistakably clear to all the world now as well as later.

If reservations are made, the New York "Tribune," which advocates ratification with reservations, believes that other nations will not object.

In commenting upon the President's speech some newspapers take the occasion to explain in their own terms the nature of the Treaty, and particularly of the League. Thus, in commending the President's speech, the Grand Rapids "News" declares of the Covenant of the League of Nations that "it is a big, vital, throbbing, momentous instrument, fearfully powerful for good or for evil, pregnant with hopes." And then more specifically adds:

Throughout its long history Europe has known only force. . . . Force, and force only, can dominate the people over there now. And it is force in the supreme that is latent in the League of Nations. . . .

But the League of Nations, powerful as it is or can be, is a different force from any that ever exercised authority in Europe. It is a force not to hold men in thrall, but to set them free.

In the midst of rather a good deal of bitter or acid controversy it is refreshing to find comment such as the following from the St. Louis "Post-Dispatch," which is as strong an advocate of the League and of the President's policies as the New York "World" is, and owes its existence to the founder of the "World," Joseph Pulitzer. Its remarks might apply to the political discussion of other subjects as well as to that of the League and of the Treaty. The "Post-Dispatch" says:

Although some of the leaders of the opposition are moved by unworthy motives, it would be a gross blunder to assume that all doubts and fears are based upon unworthy motives. There are thousands who have genuine doubts and fears and who do not understand.

Sincere doubters must be handled with sympathy and courtesy. Sincere questions must be answered with friendly reasoning. We believe that a great, an overwhelming, majority of the people want the League, but in this crisis, when peace and prosperity and even civilization hang in the balance, no arrogant mistakes should be made. Let the opposition do the blundering.

A WONDERFUL DINNER

A distinguished and influential citizen of New York who desires that his name shall not be mentioned has given us, at our request, the following account of a recent after-the-war experience. In these days when all thoughtful Americans are anxious and troubled about the vast and complicated problems, political, economic, and human, that have arisen out of the war, such an experience as here related strengthens the hope and stirs the reasonable optimism with which every one of us must enter upon the task of reconstruction.—THE EDITORS.

I WAS honored by an invitation to dinner lately. My hosts were the officers and men of a company of infantry of a famous New York regiment lately demobilized.

It was not a charitable affair. After a long service overseas the company's fund had something left over, and so the company voted itself a farewell dinner in a large New York hotel.

Officers and men came on time to the rendezvous and almost at the appointed hour we sat down.

Some were in uniform, more in mufti. There were two other civilians present besides myself. One of these had lost his son, killed in action, a lieutenant in the company; the other had devoted his energies to keeping together during the war wives, parents, and friends of the boys who had gone overseas. My son had captained the company during the days of its fiercest fighting in the Argonne, and had turned over his command when severely wounded. I was an outsider, of course, yet long residence in New York and an intimate knowledge of its East Side had given me more than a fair knowledge of the material of which this band of men was composed.

Men demobilized in New York scatter quickly, and it said much for the strength of the new tie that a common cause and a common danger had created that over one hundred men of that company and all of its officers that remained alive gathered round the table for their farewell to each other that night.

As I looked down the long table something of the wonder of that gathering, something of its immense significance, came to me. As the evening passed (we met at 7:30 and did not separate until after midnight) this feeling deepened. Less than two years before I had seen these very men taken almost without notice or warning out of the great city's life of which they were a part.

Raw and most unwarlike were they then, many of them understanding little of the great world movement that was laying such violent hands on their bodies and their souls; some of them not wanting to understand it, only going to Camp Upton because they had to go. Some were American in name only, some were not even American in name, and many of them could not speak English.

The company officers on whose young shoulders had descended the extraordinarily difficult task of making soldiers of them were most of them Plattsburg men. They brought little military experience to their task, it is true, but, in my judgment, they had brought something more than that. Generally speaking, they were men of some culture. Good schools and universities had given them some knowledge of men, and very many of them had already won a moderate success in the profession of life.

Our hastily raised Army had, of necessity, to be a democratic army. The iron discipline of an army taking years to train could not be given it. It might be lacking in many things that the professional soldier considers indispensable. But three things it had to have if it was to win at all—a fighting spirit, confidence in itself, and belief in its good cause.

Could volunteer Plattsburg men do this great work for drafted New York? Could they infuse into thousands of men who had to have even the word of command translated to them these three great essential things that should spell victory for the cause of mankind on the long-contested battlefields of France and Flanders?

I spent some unforgettable days shortly after we declared war with Colonel Wolf, Commandant at Plattsburg. I saw and had the high honor of speaking to the two most wonderful bodies of young men any man ever faced in this country. I felt their spirit, I realized their mighty power. I knew then that America could draw from her sons officers capable of training and inspiring in peace and leading in war her democratic millions of drafted men.

This was Colonel Wolf's conviction, and he was right. But let me get back to our dinner.

The last gathering of men who had trained, toiled, suffered, died, and conquered together, army discipline for them was now over, many were already back in civilian life, but few were in uniform, and every man there might say his say; and say it they did, not officers only, but non-coms. and buck privates. They had a right good dinner, and plenty of tobacco and light beer were on hand. The bars were down, and it was time for joke and story and song.

As the evening grew later, my amazement grew. Many a dinner had I been at in my varied life and in a good many lands—college dinners, racing dinners, club dinners, dinners of all sorts. If at such gatherings here and there a man drank too much and showed it or told a questionable story, if now and then there was noisy talk, no one resented it, no one was surprised. But here at this company dinner of disbanded soldiers there was nothing of the sort. I speak the simple truth, amazing as it is. Not one vulgar story (and scores of most excellent stories were told). Not one unkind story, though there were plentiful jokes on men by officers and on officers by men.

I had thought that such things might be, but as I sat there and tried to realize what was passing before me I found it hard to keep the tears from my eyes. I was seeing the actuality of human brotherhood, born and grown to power and high efficiency, finding its fine selfhood in unselfish service for men.

The hour was growing late. Officers had praised men and men had chaffed and praised their officers and each other. There had been wit a plenty, and the brave fellows left under the sod in France had not been forgotten.

Some had to go far that night. The company had to do what it had never done in France—break up.

A big fellow who had not spoken during the evening raised himself up at the foot of the table. He leaned on his crutches, for he had lost a leg at the hip, and one side of his face was still covered with plaster.

"I've got to get back to the hospital," said he, "but before I go I want to say something. When I was drafted and went to Upton, I could not say one word of English and I was only twenty-five per cent American. I have lost a leg and part of my face, and my people say I have lost a lot, but I do not say so. I have gained a lot. I am glad I went to the war. I am one hundred per cent American now."

And so came to an end a wonderful evening. The boys themselves could not realize how wonderful it was, but to me it seemed the greatest dinner I had ever attended in my life.

There are new tasks awaiting us, new and great problems to solve, but surely a loving God has given to us a new power and a new unity with which to meet and conquer them. Of this I felt sure as I went to my hotel that night.

FIRE OF LIFE

BY HAROLD TROWBRIDGE PULSIFER

Let us sit here, side by side
Underneath this ancient tree:—
You, who say, "The flame has died;"
I, who burn eternally.

Let us reason out the way
And the road that we must tread.
It is still too soon to say,
"Life is over, love is dead."

Still too soon while you and I
Dream of deathless dreams and know
Sunlight, starlight, in the sky;
And on earth, all things that grow.

Look, your hand is close to mine
And the tendrils of your hair
Touch me like a fragrant vine
Stirring in the silent air.

So I sat here, close to you,
On that day the vision came
And the world that once we knew
Vanished into sudden flame.

I have kept the vision clear
Hour by hour, and day by day.
You who sit beside me here
Shall not, dare not, drift away.

Child and woman, wistful-eyed,
If you cannot bear to smile,
You, who say, "The flame has died;"
Take my hand and weep a while.

Weep, and let the cleansing rain
All this age-old doubt dispel.
Love is always kin to pain,
Heaven neighbor unto hell.

JOYCE KILMER, POET AND PATRIOT

BY KATHERINE BRÉGY

AUTHOR OF "THE POETS' CHANTRY," ETC.

JUST one year ago this July, Sergeant Joyce Kilmer was shot through the brain as he pressed ahead of his regiment, the "Fighting Sixty-Ninth," of New York, to locate German machine guns hidden in a copse beside the river Ourcq. His act won him, posthumously, the Croix de Guerre. But it won his compatriots a far greater thing—a concrete symbol of all that efficient, practical idealism which is perhaps the dearest dream of our democracy. The memory of this young poet-patriot of our latter days fathers one more legend to set beside the bright records of Rupert Brooke, of John McCrea or Charles Péguy, a legend which Americans are proud to own and will be slow to forget.

One wondered at the time if that keen sense of personal loss among the greatest variety of people—scattered youths who had known him at college, newspaper men who were in the habit of borrowing tobacco at his office in the New York "Times," priests, soldiers who had fought at his side, as well as the men and women who count in literature on both of the Atlantic—could prove the permanent, lasting judgment. For, after all, this young heroic figure had not yet reached his thirty-second birthday, and the world was struggling through one of the most momentous years in its entire history. But it has lasted. It has endured through all the stupendous issues of life and death and war and peace and reconstruction. For Joyce Kilmer was not, as sometimes happens, a poet in spite of his life, nor even a poet for whose life any excuse had to be made. He never wished, in fact, nor was able to separate his life from his poetry. That is why when the hour of national hazard fell he saw with so uncompromising a clearness the one sun-smitten path: "It is wrong for a poet to be listening to elevated trains when there are screaming shells to hear, and to be sleeping soft in a bed when there's a cot in a dugout awaiting him and the bright face of danger to dream about and see." Perhaps, also, that is why the passing of this American singer is now soberly reckoned among the great losses to literature of a war which in all the older countries was so inevitably fatal to the young, eager spirits of art. For our own country it was emphatically the greatest literary loss suffered in that brief crusade overseas.

Before those ten stressful months with our Expeditionary Forces, Joyce Kilmer had proved himself, not merely one of the foremost lyrists and most versatile newspapermen of the United States, but also a man who was helping to define the highest ideals of Americanism. He was of those who asked much of life; and, as usual, life was quick to return the compliment. Born in New Brunswick, December 6, 1886, of a family claiming English, Irish, and Scotch descent, and still, in the words of his literary executor, boasting "a Colonial Dame on both sides," Joyce lived through most phases of contemporary American thought, adding a few distinctly contributory phases of his own. He had, of course, his young romance—a quite idyllic one, which culminated in his marriage to Miss Aline Murray, a stepdaughter of Dr. Henry Mills Alden, as soon as he was graduated from Columbia University. The matter of a career which then imperiously faced him he took less as a battle to be fought than as a game to be won—a vastly interesting, delightfully intricate game, to be played always with sportsmanlike rules and usually with sportsmanlike railery. Joyce—he was always that, and that only, to his friends—was not timid of experiments. By the time he was twenty-five he had exercised his versatilities as a Latin master, a maker of dictionaries, a poet of love's blossomy summer, a lay reader in the Episcopal Church, a hot and talkative Socialist, an all-round newspaper man, and a rather superior and sophisticated literary aesthete.

From the year 1912 he began to find himself—not that so blithely responsive a nature as his could ever be described as really "settled." At this time he joined the staff of the New York "Times" and began that series of brilliant reviews and interviews which quickly revealed to American readers a new man of letters. The next spring brought one of the great sorrows of Joyce Kilmer's life, when the touch of infantile paralysis blighted the body of his little much-loved daughter, Rose. A few months later he laid forcible claim to what proved one of his most permanent joys. For it was then that he entered, with all of a convert's zeal but none of a convert's crudity, that old, old Catholic Church—so mystical at once and so practical!—to which he ever after gave a young and proud allegiance. "If what I write nowadays is considered poetry," he declared in one of his last letters written from France, "then I became a poet in November, 1913." That is to say, he became then the greatest American representative of that little band of "modern mediævalists" which on the other side of the Atlantic included the Chestertons, Hilaire Belloc, and a group of younger singers—all sworn to recapture something of the robust faith, the fine fervor, and heroic folly of Merrie England. But he was much more than this. Popular judgment has singled out Kilmer as a poet of the ideal realities of life, and popular judgment has been, in the main, right. The ideal realities were his goal; and he showed the most astonishing verve in tracking them into unexpected corners. He celebrated (upon a wager!) the hidden glories of the delicatessen shop. He immortalized the sleepy and apologetic commuter. He found the pathos of "The House With Nobody In It," the proud poetry of "The Snow Man in the Yard," the tender and humorous poignancy of Dave Lilly's bibulous ghost swinging his shadowy line after phantom trout. All these colloquial notes he struck with enormous felicity—and consequent popularity. He had, in fact, the most ideal reasons for keeping close to the great humble, loving heart, not merely of America, but of the whole world. He wanted to show forth the glory of the simple, universal things which he had found after no little trying out of the more complex and exotic things. Myriads of poets had sung the praise of childhood, but here was one who had the courage to sing the praise of marriage and of home, the joys of daily work and daily faith in God and man. For a while, indeed, Joyce became almost radical in his ferocious conservatism.

But every one who knew his essays or his inimitable conversation must have been aware that here was a critic of broad knowledge and exuberant humor. He was far less easily satisfied than were his readers, and not at all content to remain, as many of them would have had him, merely a "familiar" or "domestic" laureate. Perhaps the first hint of that larger immortality in store for the young Kilmer was the title poem of his volume called "Trees," published in 1914. That sunny and singing lyric achieved the distinction of being almost universally memorized, and it is already accepted as one of the classics of American poetry. There were other things to warn the elect that here was a new aspirant for the Siege Perilous of high poetry—arrestingly fine things, like that vision in a brief Christmas poem which pictured the clouds rocked with song—

"As if the sky were turning bird."

Over and above this, it became suddenly evident that into the much-abused field of religious poetry Joyce Kilmer was bringing an inspired passion and—actually!—originality. A new, or rather a very ancient and almost forgotten, fragrance hung about his half-playful, half-serious songs of the star-crowned Virgin, of St. Michael, "the thorn on the rose-bush of God," and of St. Valentine, whom he celebrated in a most ingenious bit of vers libre. He sang ballads, too, with the tender familiarity of the Middle Age jongleur about them, and the wistful brotherhood of our modern age. Here is a fragment from that deliciously naïve "Gates and Doors:"

"There was a gentle hostler
(And blessed be his name!)
He opened up the stable
The night Our Lady came.
Our Lady and Saint Joseph,
He gave them food and bed,
And Jesus Christ has given him
A glory round his head.

*So let the gate swing open
However poor the yard,
Lest weary people visit you
And find their passage barred;
Unlatch the door at midnight
And let your lantern's glow
Shine out to guide the traveler's feet
To you across the snow."*

Joyce Kilmer was a good worker, a good player, and a good fighter at times, but his sympathy was—for a man—phenomenal. He hated scarcely anything in the world except respectable hypocrites and those decadent rhymesters, "so mildly, delicately vile," who, in his opinion, brought poetry into disrepute among honest men. For the rest he was the kindest of critics, lavish, even sumptuous of praise wherever he detected real poetic sincerity. His office at the "Times" was crowded with literary aspirants, both old and young, his desk stacked with letters seeking advice or encouragement. "No poet has any right in the world to knock the work of another poet who is honest," he once declared. And this sympathy, this broad and human idealism, was fore-ordained to spring up like a flame at the call of an outraged world. Joyce saw something of the war at first hand when in the autumn of 1914 he went to England to bring his mother safely back to the States. But it was probably not until after the Lusitania tragedy—which he commemorated in his haunting poem, "The White Ships and the Red"—that the call became personal and not to be gainsaid.

There was a gasp of surprise in literary circles when, almost immediately after the United States declared war in the spring of 1917, Joyce Kilmer began drilling with the Seventh Regiment of New York. But when a few months later he had himself transferred to the 165th Infantry (the old Sixty-ninth of New York) and sailed for France as a private because he was unwilling to lose precious time studying to be "an officer in charge of conscripts," surprise was swallowed up in the heroic and wholly Kilmerian rightness of the thing. It was not that he was a head-long enthusiast, quick on the trigger, not counting the cost. He had small opinion of "blind courage" and had just told a group of college boys that "only an enlightened man and only a good man can be brave." Over and above this he was an enormously efficient person—he had to be with that young, quickly growing family in the Larchmont home!—and at this time he was easily doing three men's work. But it was his strength, and not less his good fortune, that the business of life never drove the dream from his heart. He loved the fighting saints and the fighting poets, and years earlier he had sung the praise of that divine and healing "Folly" which our modern world was said to have forgotten:

"Lord, crush our knowledge utterly
And make us humble, simple men,
And cleansed of wisdom, let us see
Our Lady Folly's face again."

So when America started upon the supreme crusade of the twentieth century,

Joyce Kilmer was willing to pay any price to claim his part in winning it. Being, as we have said, a practical idealist, he saw no other way but to resign his editorial work, cancel his lecture engagements, leave his last book of poems in press, and bid farewell to his wife, to the little children (Kenton, Deborah, Michael, and Christopher), and to the friends he knew so well how to love. It was one of the finest examples in American letters of what Henry Arthur Jones once called "the madness which keeps the world alive."

All Joyce Kilmer's life was a pressing toward the deeper seas, the more distant horizons, and in France he had but one goal—the front. He frustrated every effort of the regimental authorities to keep him in the reasonably safe, although far from bomb-proof, duties of the statistical department, finally getting himself transferred to the intelligence section, which, as he declared, was "the most fascinating work possible." As he was on "observation" duty, it was also the most dangerous work possible, and eventually, of course, the work which cost his life. When he left New York, he had naturally expected to keep on writing from time to time, and among other things had promised a history of his own regiment. But he soon became too absorbed and shaken by the new life to think of this. He was not interested any more in writing, he wrote to his friend "Bob" Holliday, "except in so far as writing is the expression of something beautiful." And the poems among which he now lived were mostly "unwritten and undiscussed." But out of the crowded drama of his daily life there came at least four works of art. One of them was that tender and dramatic sketch of a night's billet in the home of a French peasant woman called "Holy Ireland." The other three were poems—poems of the moment, with the poignancy of heart-beats through them, yet all poems which seem likely to fulfill the soldier's wish that he might write about the great war only such things as people would want to read "a century after it is over."

Placed beside the sublimated "bluff," the careful cheerfulness, of his letters home, these verses are an inexhaustible commentary upon the real Joyce Kilmer. He lived through the cold and hunger, the almost inevitable touch of pneumonia, the long marches of that first winter of our troops in France—and out of it all came that "Prayer of a Soldier," which has the indomitable sweetness and simplicity of an early Christian martyr:

"My shoulders ache beneath my pack (Lie easier, Cross, upon His back).
I march with feet that burn and smart
(Tread, Holy Feet, upon my heart).
Men shout at me who may not speak
(They scourged Thy back and smote Thy cheek).

Lord, thou didst suffer more for me
Than all the hosts of land and sea.
So let me render back again
This millionth of Thy gift. Amen."

Then he went on duty in a dugout, where a group of his young brother soldiers were suddenly killed by the explosion of a falling shell. And in their memory he wrote that song of "Rouge Bouquet," whose music was known and treasured by thousands of our "dough-boys" before ever it reached the literary critics or was declared one of the best poems of his career. And, finally, while his nights were being spent crawling through the barbed wire of No Man's Land on observation work for the Intelligence Section, the poet-patriot sent home a sonnet called the "The Peacemaker:"

"Upon his will he binds a radiant chain,
For Freedom's sake he is no longer free.

It is his task, the slave of Liberty,
With his own blood to wipe away a stain.
That pain may cease, he yields his flesh to pain.

To banish war he must a warrior be.
He dwells in Night, eternal Dawn to see,
And gladly dies, abundant life to gain."

Just a few weeks later, on the morning of July 30, 1918, Sergeant Kilmer voluntarily undertook a piece of work which he and those in command knew to mean certain death. And before nightfall his silence had sung the greatest song of all.

It is a hard thing for civilized man to live through bitter and unbelievable scenes without becoming bitter and unbelieving. The verses of many a young British soldier recently at the front—Lieutenant Nichols and his friends Siegfried Sassoon and "Bobby" Graves, for instance—have shown how hard. But Joyce Kilmer kept unshaken and unshakable that bright "sanity" and "faith" which he was always praising in the brave French people around him. He believed in very might and deed that he and the men fighting at his side were peacemakers—that "by new and bloody paths" the world was coming again "upon the old road to paradise." Up this steep road he himself charged in the vanguard. He did not lose, but gave, his life.

THE HERMIT OF AMERONGEN

BY VICENTE BLASCO-IBÁÑEZ

AUTHOR OF "THE FOUR HORSEMEN OF THE APOCALYPSE," "THE SHADOW OF THE CATHEDRAL," ETC.

EUROPE has been so absorbed in the problems of peace that she has forgotten the chief offender of the war.

The fugitive Kaiser lives tranquilly in a castle in Holland, and only now and then do the newspapers mention this sorry personage, whom we may style "the hermit of Amerongen."

One can understand how those who have seen the war from a distance and know its horrors only by hearsay are not greatly interested in the fate of the most sinister figure of the war. But we who have seen his work close at hand, the greatest mass of atrocities since the ravages of Attila, cannot quietly endure seeing the deviser and executor of these crimes live like a middle-class gentleman spending his summer in the country, suffering no other punishment than his own rage at the loss of his huge, absurd power and at his shameful flight.

I have a right to speak of this man with complete liberty. I never believed in him. I always feared that his theatrical poses and his pedantries, the result of superficial learning, would wind up in a tragic fashion for the world. Twenty years ago, when so many gullible persons were hailing him as the superman, I had the honor to be arrested and prosecuted in Spain (at the instigation of the German Ambassador, no doubt) for an article in which I compared him to Nero. Since then I have spoken of him in a similar vein in several of my novels. My ideas have changed somewhat since then, and I must ask Nero's pardon for having compared him with William II. Nero confined himself to burning a few sections of just one city, and besides he knew how to die.

Almost as irritating as the atrocities of the war is the boundless admiration which just six years ago the general public felt for this chatterbox, so devoted to speech-making, to toasts, and to sermons, who participated with godlike self-sufficiency in all the branches of human activity. Strategist, seaman, financier, business man, farmer, musician, poet, painter, sculptor, there was neither science, art, nor profession in which he did not long to be leader. His is the agile, simian ability of an actor who can, with the aid of costumes, wigs, and makeup, outwardly imitate all types. But it is not the actor who puts the soul into the characters; it is the poet who talks through their mouths.

William is a man of appearances. Garrulous, nervous, he touches upon everything with the flightiness of an unbalanced person endowed with a vivid imagination. But he never passes beneath the surface of things; there is not a single subject that he knows even halfway.

For thirty years he paraded before the world as the perfect man of war, directing maneuvers that made old strategists smile discreetly, terrifying the world with his ominous frown and his bragging. And when the decisive moment arrived his generals passed him about from one to another like a ball; nobody wanted him near, for fear of his absurd counsels and his wild projects that amounted to orders. Moreover, his army was a heritage; Moltke and Roon had given it to him; he had only enlarged and perfected it, like a young capitalist who rounds out the fortune his father and grandfather began as poor men.

But the navy was his creation. There is no disputing that. It was he who exclaimed, "Germany's future lies upon the water." No doubt he had numerous collaborators of more ability than he, but we will pay no attention to this. Let us grant that he was able to squeeze the second greatest fleet of the world out of his country in a few years. He deserves to have his paternity recognized, for the creator is worthy of his work. In its future writings history will be at a loss to know which was more cowardly and which ended in a more shameful manner, the German fleet or the sovereign who created it. Throughout the war the huge German ships stayed hidden in port, protected by nets and mines, like an ostrich that buries its head in the sand to avoid seeing its dangers. And finally they surrendered without the least struggle, with a lack of dignity that offended the professional pride of the Allied sailors intrusted with taking them prisoners.

The only active part of this navy of William II's was the submarine, against unarmed or careless boats, killing with certainty and without danger, like an assassin who lies in wait for a victim that he knows cannot return the attack.

"But there is his work of peace," some say. "The development of the commerce, industry, and education that has taken place in Germany during his reign."

I recognize this, too, as an indisputable fact. But it is one more plagiarism of this dilettante who has spent his life imitating others, and then presenting his imitations as pure German discoveries.

The only thing original and sincere about him is his mediæval personality, his romantic mystic mentality which makes him consider himself the favorite child of the heavens. God, according to him, is interested only in the prosperity of the Hohenzollern family, and in that of Germany by consequence of her having the honor to be ruled by them. All his words and his acts have been in accord with this belief. There could be no simpler conception of humanity than his: all the world subject to Germany is "the salt of the earth;" Germany subject to the Junkers and the innumerable princelings, and above this haughty, proud nobility himself as Sovereign Lord.

Warrior and Christian like Lohengrin, bloody and religious like the ancient tribal heads, in his philosophic moments he gave vent to the most inexplicable incoherencies. We will pass over his evangelical exhortation to the troops that went to China to repeat the barbarisms of Attila. After the Russo-Japanese War he harangued his soldiers thus: "If the Japanese, who are idolators, have defeated the Russians, who are Christians, this is due to the fact that the Japanese, even though they believe in Buddha, are true Christians because they are good soldiers." All the world has believed that if the Christian doctrine really ruled the earth there would be no soldiers. Why does a doctrine of peace and brotherhood among men need soldiers? But William saw things in a different light. Only soldiers are Christians, and what he understands by soldier and how he describes it is well known from another of his discourses: "An automaton, obedient to his king, who, if necessary, should, without vacillating, fire upon his parents and his brothers."

Because he was the grandson, he compared his glorious grandfather (who was nothing but a little soldier, pushed on to success by Bismarck) with Moses, Abraham, Homer, Charlemagne, Luther, Shakespeare, Goethe, and Kant. And, as this seemed but slight praise, he added that if William I had been born in the Middle Ages they would have canonized him.

This man, with his psychology of a mystic and his romantic ideas, has been at the same time, by reason of his Protean character, his desire to have his fingers in every pie, a man of his epoch. This figure of the Nibelungen, living out of date in the twentieth century, had the gift of imitation and falsification that characterizes the unbalanced.

He saw that there existed in the world a nation far greater and more powerful than his own, which ruled the earth peacefully through its industry and its wealth, almost without soldiers, and without imposition of any sort. This was the United States. And he copied its industry, its commerce, and its supposed system of advertisement. All the development of Germany, so rapid and so noisy, is only Americanism falsified in German style.

In the same way that an author can file suit for plagiarism against one who copies his works, the United States should have sued William and his collaborators for infringement of author's rights; with the added claim that they not only stole the work, but that they disfigured and spoiled it.

I have often grown indignant at certain short-sighted people of Europe, who can appreciate only immediate values, who admired the progress of the German Empire as something very original and peculiarly German.

"But all this is only a bad translation from the American," I exclaimed, knowing the original through books and magazines.

The pirates and merchants of Hamburg and Bremen, the councilors of William II, were men who had lived and worked in the United States, who reproduced after their own fashion what they had seen across the ocean.

Germany's banking system, her commerce, the productive organization of her industry, all were copied from the American—but without the American spirit.

The Germans plagiarized the material, exterior side of things, but they took good care not to imitate the spirit of freedom and democracy.

The omnipotent "War Lord" who spoke of my army, my navy, my commerce, my industry, wanted to add my schools and my universities. He never could endure Haeckel or Ostwald, the two best-known German scientists, because of their irreligiosity. He showed his displeasure toward certain theaters because they produced works of Hauptmann, the most famous contemporary dramatist of Germany. He abominated the painters and sculptors of his country whose merits were recognized by other nations. On the other hand, he conferred honors and pensions on a series of second-rate, flexible-spined men of learning, mediocre writers, commonplace artists, who were in perfect harmony with his æsthetic and philosophic ideas.

This man has deceived us all in a shocking fashion. Deceived is putting it mildly; he has robbed us of the peculiar estimation in which we held him; he has swindled us in the only line of credit he ever had.

I never thought he would be a hero. But, accustomed as I was to seeing him with his martial mustache, his paralyzed hand on the hilt of his sword, and to reading his bellicose proclamations, in which he threatened the whole world with his "mailed fist" or spoke of "the dry powder and the sharpened sword," I finally imaged him as a perfect lieutenant who had continued in his juvenile rank almost to his sixties; one of those professional lieutenants of Europe, petulant boys, insufferable, to be sure, but with a certain chivalrous conception of their profession and of the obligations it imposes. I thought of him as the sort of lieutenant who when he enters a room looks past all the men, makes love to all the women, talks on every subject, imposes his opinions, plays the piano, recites poetry—does everything badly—shows a ridiculous self-sufficiency, but to whom no one dares to say anything for fear of provoking a duel. This somewhat absurd, completely intolerable being has nevertheless one moment in his life in which he commands respect. If there has been any offense to his honor that might lower him in the eyes of his comrades, if he has fallen short in any of his professional obligations, he settles the matter by putting a revolver to his forehead and pulling the trigger.

Throughout the war I did not doubt for a moment William's ultimate defeat, and I said, in all good faith: "I know my lieutenant. He will not see the final disaster of his Empire. When he sees that all is lost, he will get out of the tight place like any desperate man of honor. He will shoot himself."

Although I never believed in him, I recognized the sense of honor which even the lowest officer possesses—the courage of even the most timid peaceful man in life's crises.

The poor ship captain, when he sees his boat lost through fault of his, goes down with it, not wishing to outlive his disgrace. Many merchants, faced by ruin, take refuge in suicide. There have even been architects who have killed themselves over the collapse of one of their buildings.

I know perfectly well that dying does not help any, that suicide proves nothing; but we do so many things in our lives that are of no use, and yet are so worthy and so beautiful. The men or women who kill themselves for love may be, in the eyes of rational beings, idiots, but without them so many poems, so many novels, so many plays, which now enrich our universal literature would have gone unwritten!

I am still hoping to hear the pistol shot of this hero who for thirty years made us tremble with his roars.

The father of a family, he had himself photographed with his six sons, and even with his daughter, all dressed in the uniform of the Death's Head Hussars, in fur caps decorated with a skull and crossbones. Of this gruesome family, which delighted in getting itself up in sepulchral adornments, not a single one has been scratched. All are enjoying perfect health.

The Emperor who bears upon his conscience the burden of ten million corpses buried on the battlefield and of fifteen or twenty million who have died or will die as a consequence of the war wants to live to an old age; it annoys him to think of the shock on his august skull of one of those bits of lead that during these four years he has scattered like an endless flood upon the battlefields of Europe: he prefers to fall a victim to microbes at the latest possible moment, like a peaceful, quiet citizen who never harmed a soul and who takes scrupulous care of his health.

He might, in keeping with his past and his tragedy airs, have perished in the last battle in France, charging, for the first and only time in his life, at the head of one of the regiments of the Imperial Guard. Every general has at some time been under fire—all except him. But he found it more to his liking to escape like a defaulting banker with the police at his heels.

In this shameful termination of a militaristic empire only one man showed honor and dignity, and he wore neither sword nor uniform. There was only one who had the courage to commit suicide, unable to outlive his country's disaster: a business man, a Jew—Ballin, the ship-owner, of Hamburg.

All the German generals, those thunderbolt heroes in favorable moments, after burning and bombarding cities and assuring the world that overcoming the Allies was a matter of weeks, have quietly retired to their castles to raise chickens, or sport with their dogs, or, perhaps, to write their memoirs.

This is something new in history. Never has there been seen so lamentable an absence of professional honor, such a demonstration of brazen shamelessness.

Napoleon, who in the number of his victims is comparable with William II (but who inherited nothing and who built up everything himself, who had the vision of a leader, and who knew, when necessary, how to risk his life), behaved differently in the hour of misfortune. In one of his last battles, seeing that all was lost, he stationed his mount over a bomb which, by chance, failed to explode. Later, in Fontainebleau, before signing his abdication, he tried to poison himself, and it was only by dint of great exertions that he was saved. On the eve of Waterloo the fugitives overwhelmed him and dragged him along with them as he was walking, like a somnambulist, toward the enemies' lines that they might kill him. Only at the end did he desist from his attempts at suicide, convinced, by a sort of fatalism, that death would not come to him, since he had called to it again and again in vain. And his nephew, Napoleon III, who was only a pale shadow of him, also knew how to fall with dignity. Zola has described him in that awful day of Sedan riding slowly down a highway raked by artillery fire. He was hoping that a shell would shatter him into bits, saving him the shame of witnessing the surrender. But the projectiles respected his life, and, sick and discouraged, he pursued his destiny. He might have fled. Whole battalions took refuge from Sedan in Belgium. But this ruler wished to share the fate of his comrades, and he gave himself up as a prisoner together with his army.

This is the way emperors behaved only a few dozen years ago. They may be censurable as emperors, but they command respect as men for the way they faced disaster.

And the false Parsifal, the priest-king terror of Europe, is hidden like a hare in his refuge at Amerongen. Perhaps he is giving lessons in horticulture to the gardeners of the castle, criticising the construction of the building, advising the owner about desirable changes, or thinking up a new uniform, "the uniform of the exile," in which to stroll about with tragic solemnity beneath the trees, as though thousands of cameras were focused on him.

This cannot continue. It is too immoral. Perhaps it will go on—for life is nothing but a web of absurd realities—but I repeat that it should not.

The United States has the electric chair, England the gallows, France the guillotine; almost all civilized countries have their modes of suppressing dangerous individuals that attack the safety of society or its future. He who kills just one person, he who burns just one house, he who robs on the highway, pays this isolated and individual crime with his life.

And this man upon whom rests the weight of four years of incessant slaying, who represents the authority for more crimes and brutalities than have been committed since the days of the barbarians, goes on living peacefully, forgotten in his refuge at Amerongen; and if they take him from there it will be to carry him to a picturesque far-off island that will recall to him his sweet Corfu!

Ah, no! this is neither logical nor moral.

I foresee certain objections, and hasten to add that I do not believe in capital punishment. But there are so many things to which we are opposed but which we must unblushingly yield to through the force of reality! Death proves nothing, I know. But the living must protect themselves.

I know that all life is sacred; every life (let it be clearly understood), without categories or distinctions, for the social hierarchies are nothing in comparison with life. And when one sees millions and millions of innocent lives sacrificed through the ambition and arrogance of one single guilty life one feels an irresistible desire, not for revenge, but for justice.

Besides, the future is terrifying if the great catastrophe which we have just passed through bears no severe punishment for its authors.

The worthy nations have made war that there might be no more wars. Well, there will be if the makers of wars get off unscathed.

Without just punishment the office of kings who seek amusement and glory in war as in an interesting sport will be a safe and desirable one. The plain individual who in a fit of rage, perhaps justified, shoots or kills is punished severely. The ruler who carries whole nations to death and upsets the world's life has only to retire afterwards to a castle, like a tragedian who, after brandishing his dagger upon the stage, goes to the country for a rest.

Fear of punishment is of great service. All we civilized men have moments in which we feel within ourselves the sanguinary fury of the primitive man. But we at once calm ourselves, remembering that there are police, judges, prisons, and capital punishment. If in the future rulers knew that an Emperor of Germany who exterminated millions of men and profoundly disturbed the world's order had been solemnly tried before the nations, and afterwards no less solemnly shot, they would hesitate a long time before planning another war, and they would end by desisting from it for fear of being held personally responsible.

The European "divine-right" monarchies became liberal and constitutional, not through conviction, but through frequent meditation on the heads of Charles I of England and Louis XVI of France.

If the makers of wars go unpunished, the bad training that the hereditary princes receive from the cradle will continue. They are brought up as soldiers, and their only dream is to make war which shall afford them glory without any personal danger, for their soldiers fight for them. What responsibility need they fear? This is the reason the Crown Prince passed his early youth in such a fury because the long-awaited war, which he visioned as "gay and fresh," was long in coming. For this reason his father, after so many speeches in favor of peace, concluded by provoking the most terrible of all wars. They had brought him up as a soldier, and he was going to die without other title than that of "Chief Commission Agent of the Commerce of Germany." And he drew his sword when the world least expected it.

No, this war has not ended right. Its termination is neither logical nor moral. If the millions of dead could rise, they would surely cry out (especially the Germans), looking toward tranquil Amerongen:

"How is this? We have died, and this man still lives."

If the world were ruled by justice and logic, I know well what would have happened. William would not be alive to-day. Since he lacked the courage to die like a lieutenant in disgrace, the nations would have made him die like a great criminal.

Rivalries might have arisen between the nations over the place in which this memorable act of justice should be executed. But all could have been arranged and every one satisfied by adding to William his first-born, Ferdinand of Bulgaria (another forgotten criminal), Ludendorff, the prolonger of the war, and a few more of his master criminal generals. All the great nations would make their sacrifice in honor of justice, and on a fixed date, at the same hour; before the Capitol in Washington, in Trafalgar Square in London, in the Place de la Concorde in Paris, in the Capitoline Square in Rome, and in the Municipal Square in Brussels, they could majestically proceed with this great example to history, each one executing the criminal who fell to his lot.

This event would inspire in some hitherto ignored musician a new "Marseillaise," the true "Marseillaise" of peace.

"Tremble, tyrants!" sang the French volunteers in 1792 as they intoned the hymn of Rouget de Lisle. "Tremble, ye kings who invent wars!" would say the people to-day at witnessing these punishments. "Know that ye will answer for them with your lives like ordinary beings for their acts."

And there would be fewer wars; that is a certainty.

But all this is a dream. There is no reason to suppose that life is just or logical. It is always the absurd that happens.

The hermit of Amerongen will go on living peacefully there, or in some other agreeable spot; and he will die when the microbes say so, and then who knows what the future may have in store?

Perhaps his crimes may be forgotten, or will be obscured by time like so many of the scourges of humanity; perhaps the German poets of the future, for lack of a better theme, will fasten upon him, as the French romantics fastened upon the hermit of St. Helena, and will serve him up to our grandchildren as a new Napoleon, who will not be a Napoleon, after the fashion of all German imitations, which are never like the copied model, but which outwardly resemble it.

This article will be followed next week by one on "The Responsibility of the Kaiser," written by Mr. Vernon Kellogg, of the American Relief Administration

LET RUSSIA IN

BY GREGORY MASON, STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

FROM no quarter of the world, perhaps, has the spring of 1919 brought so much new hope as from Russia. There are signs, persistent signs, that life is returning to Russia.

Small thanks is due to the directors of the Peace Conference for this hint of Russian rejuvenation—which perhaps contains even more promise for the future peace of the world than anything that the statesmen at the Peace Conference have done. With very few exceptions, the leaders of the nations which were Russia's allies have steadily failed to understand her. Nor if Russia gets back to her feet is there much credit to be given to physical assistance from the outside, the help of the Czechoslovaks possibly excepted.

It is too early to predict the definite revival of Russia. But certainly there is far more reason to hope for recovery than there was a year ago. On all its edges Bolshevism seems to be fraying.

In its early stages Bolshevism had the support of many of the Russian peasants because of its promises of land to them. And it had the support of most of the industrial workers, who expected from it an industrial millennium. But after getting their land the peasants fell away from Bolshevism when communism was begun to be advocated by the Leninites. And gradually the workmen have become disgruntled, too. So that to-day, although it is terribly risky to attempt any statistics about Russia, most of the peasants and perhaps more than half of the workmen are finished with Bolshevism. The industrials who still support it do so mainly for personal considerations.

The fact that the Allies have overlooked many past opportunities in Russia is no reason why they should overlook the opportunity which is beginning to appear as the result of the weakening of Bolshevism. In the first place, gratitude ought to make us do something for Russia. Most military critics of any account admit that Russia's efforts in the first months of the war saved Paris. And probably few will disagree with the dictum of the French General Cherfils, who said recently in the "Echo de Paris" that "the offensive of Brusiloff of the 6th of June, 1916, improvised to the detriment of a more rational plan, saved Italy from the disaster which threatened her." After reminding his readers that in the two years and a half during which she fought Russia suffered more casualties than any of her allies suffered in four years of fighting, General Cherfils went on to say:

"Our generous recognition accords with our interest in commanding us to foster with all our power the triumph of the Government of Admiral Kolchak, and through him the safety of Great Russia. If Russia is not with us, she will be against us—that is to say, with Germany. Germany will then be certain of having her revenge."

This warning of the French critic is conspicuous not only by its wisdom but by its rarity among the countrymen of the writer. Of all the Allies, none has acted toward Russia with such lack of foresight as France.

The French attitude toward Russia is contempt—contempt overlaying a frank regard for nothing in Russia except French material investments, railway bonds, etc. The French generally have forgotten what General Cherfils does not forget, namely, that Russia saved France again and again before America came into the war; in fact, that without Russia's gigantic assistance France would have been gobbled up in two months. France has lost Russian affection by her tactlessly frank exhibition of ingratitude, but she has converted Russia's feeling toward her into positive bitterness by blunders in policy. The greatest of these blunders was the withdrawal of French troops from the Odessa neighborhood. The south of Russia is the richest part of the whole country, and contains perhaps the largest percentage of families who might be influential in ousting Bolshevism. Russians of this stripe organized themselves to combat the Leninites on the promise of active Allied assistance. Just when the organization of loyal Russians was well under way the French withdrew their army. This obliged the Greek force, which had been fighting splendidly, to withdraw also, and left the loyal Russians as conspicuous marks to bear the brunt of Bolshevik hatred. Is it difficult to imagine how such Russians feel toward France?

In the past few weeks I have talked with many Russians in Paris. To judge by the expressions of these men, Russians to-day dislike the French even more than they dislike the Germans. The grave possibilities of such a situation not only to France but to all the Allies as well need no elucidation by me. As the French military critic said: "If Russia is not with us, she will be against us—that is to say, with Germany. Germany will then be certain of having her revenge." And he added, with the cruel force of cold truth: "That one of the two camps which will have with it the power represented by this immense Slavic country of 180,000,000 inhabitants will be master of the future."

This French military critic sees the fallacy of a theory held not only widely in France, but also cherished by not a few Britishers and Americans. For lack of a better designation, I might call this the Wall Across Europe theory.

Those who hold to this theory are guilty of giving too much attention to the issues between France and Germany, and not enough attention to the whole position of Germany and all her possibilities for the future. They are too much inclined to think that all you need do to guarantee the peace of Europe against another attack of madness on the part of the Teutons is to create a strong France. To that end they direct their efforts mainly to stripping territory and strategic resources from the western frontier of Germany and giving them to France. In other words, they are bent on building a wall across western Europe between France and Germany, behind which they hope France can be safe. So far, so good. The wall is all right, but the error of most of the persons who are engaged in building it is that they overlook what Germany may do in the east. In short, they forget that if Germany is permitted to go east and add to herself the whole strength of Russia she can then turn westward and demolish the strongest wall that the French can build. Unless there is a wall in the east the wall in the west will fall.

Russia cannot be ignored. If that is so, we would do well to find out what Russia is going to be. No one believes that Russia in the near future is going to cover so much space on the map as she did when Nicholas II ruled. But, on the other hand, a good many people are beginning to revise their opinions as to the degree to which Russia will disintegrate. Many of the fragments which flew off from old Russia are apparently being drawn back by natural attraction. Finland, for instance, seems certainly unable to stand alone. Her future is closely dependent on the future of Russia. The Finns have not made a success of self-government. Autonomy under Russian protection is probably as far as they are fitted to go. The two million Letts and the three to four million Lithuanians want independence until a strong Russia is organized, but they have expressed a willingness after that event to content themselves with autonomy under Russian protection. Estonia, Courland, Lithuania, will all be part of a Slavic federation. As to the Ukraine, that is a German invention. The Ukraine is nothing but "Little Russia," and "Little Russia" it will remain.

I am sorry that I can have no faith in the Poles. But is there much in their history or in their conduct during this war to inspire faith? The Russians are disposed to welcome a free Poland so long as it is not imperialistic. The Russian point of view was fairly well expressed by a former high official of the Lvoff Government with whom I talked the other day. Said this man:

"Russia will give the Poles all they are ethnologically entitled to, but not an acre more. I regret to say that there is already friction between Poland and Russia. There will be more serious trouble later; not war, but serious trouble. Then Poland will have a war with Germany—in fact, that will be the next European war. It will be short, and you can imagine the outcome. Indeed, from the point of view of one who wants to preserve the peace of Europe, Dantsic ought never to be Polish. It ought to be international now, and German later. The more you give the Poles, the more you hurt them—because the more certain you make their downfall. Give them Silesia now, if you like; they will not be able to keep it. This sounds cynical and pessimistic, but it is my honest opinion, and that, I understand, is what you want."

The question of the future of Bessarabia is the subject of a fierce controversy between the Russians and the Rumanians. Bessarabia is now occupied by Rumanian troops, and the Bessarabian National Council, or "Sfatul Tserii," has voted for the union of the province with Bessarabia. The Russians charge, however, that the Sfatul Tserii is not representative, being a body deliberately packed with agents of Rumania and the Bolsheviks for the purpose of giving a good face to Rumanian attempts to annex Bessarabia. The question is too involved to be judged without deep study, but certainly it is a question likely to make trouble between two countries who were allies in the recent war.

Whatever the allegiance of Bessarabia and the boundaries of Poland may be, Russia bids fair to become again what she was in the past, namely, the leading national group among all the Slavs. As such she will no doubt be in a close entente with the new Slavic states of Czechoslovakia and Jugoslavia, and perhaps also with Bulgaria. So, whichever of the two "camps" of Europe gets Russia on its side will probably have the smaller Slavic states also.

Just at present, so my Russian friends tell me frankly, the Russians feel that there is an unpleasantly wide gulf between themselves and the Allies. Why they feel this way about the French has already been explained. It was something of a shock to me, however, to have them tell me that they were fully as much disappointed in America as in France, although in a different way. They do give America credit for having wanted to act unselfishly in the Russian question, which is more than they will say for France. But just because they banked so much on America's promise they feel keenly the disparity between her promise and her performance. I ought to say here that the men from whom I get this point of view are all anti-Bolshevik; they are mostly men who belonged to the Kadet, Octobrist, or other moderately liberal parties before the Revolution. (Among the Bolsheviks it is still common to find a kinder feeling toward America than toward the other Allies.) These anti-Bolshevik liberal Russians seem to have little sympathy with President Wilson's attitude toward Russia. Some give him credit for being sincere, but say that his schemes are entirely impracticable so far as Russia is concerned. Others do not even give him credit for sincerity, and some even say that the American President is a Bolshevik for all practical purposes, and point out that Trotsky was preaching principles of the Wilsonian kind a year before the President drew up his Fourteen Points.

Strange to say, the Russians of this anti-Bolshevik type feel more kindly toward Japan than toward any other one of the Allies at present. In fact, rarely if ever has there been so much sympathy between Japan and Russia as there is today. The Kolchak people are frank in expressing their admiration for the restraint with which Japan has acted in Siberia. Being disgruntled with England, France, and America, most of the anti-German elements in Russia just now seem to seek an outlet for their feelings in a rapprochement with Japan.

The former Russian official whom I quoted above in regard to Russia's relations with Poland is of this group. He gave me the following interesting analysis of the developing situation which may drive Russia into Germany's arms, and of the possibilities which may enable the Slavic nation to escape this fate.

"I think it is of interest to you people of the Allies," said this man, "to understand the feelings of a not inconsiderable group of—I hope I may say intelligent—Russians to which I belong. We are anti-Bolshevik, we are anti-German. (I don't mean to say that to be anti-Bolshevik and anti-German amount to the same thing. A great many people have made the mistake of thinking that Bolshevism is primarily a movement backed by Germans, or, at least, a movement launched to forward the national aims of Germany. This is not true at all.) But, at any rate, we Russians of whom I am speaking, and whom in a way I represent, are both anti-Bolshevik and anti-German. To-day we recognize that there is a danger, a very great danger, alas! that Russia will be forced into a firm alliance with Germany. As we see things, it is the failure of you Allies to understand Russia and to formulate a practical policy toward Russia which makes that unpleasant possibility almost a probability. What a danger a Russian-German alliance might be to the rest of Europe, even to the rest of the world, I need hardly point out. Japan would almost certainly be forced to join it. That triple alliance would be a combination too strong, I believe, for any other combination of nations to withstand. I believe a day would come when it would wrest even from you Anglo-Saxon peoples an acknowledgment of that world dominion which Germany failed to win in the late war.

"As a sincerely pro-Ally Russian who abhors everything which German Kultur stands for, I dread the completion of the unpleasant picture which I have sketched. But if we are going to avoid that development of affairs we must all act quickly, we pro-Ally Russians and all you Allies. We can do little, you can do much. To analyze the situation dispassionately, I would say that England has the best chance of winning Russia's hand from Germany. France we distrust. Japan we like, but Japan as well as France is not rich enough and powerful enough to sue successfully for our hand against Germany. America is too far away, and can't seem to see her opportunities, anyway. England, in spite of many mistakes, of all the Allies shows the most understanding of Russia and the most appreciation of what must be done to prevent the German-Russian alliance from becoming a reality. Perhaps the best thing you others can do is to back up England, and not compete on your own account."

"You don't think there is any chance that Russia, even if temporarily seized by Germany, could eventually swallow the Germans, as the Chinese swallowed the Manchus?" I asked.

"No," replied my friend, emphatically. "On the other hand, history has shown that wherever German and Russian civilizations meet the Russian melts into the German. The only way to prevent the Prussians from acquiring and organizing the industrial, economic, and military power of 180,000,000 Slavs is to keep German Kultur from getting into Russia at all. And the only way to do that is to give us an adequate substitute for German Kultur."

"What is the first thing to be done?" I asked.

"The first thing to be done," replied the faithful lieutenant of former Premier Lvoff, emphatically, "is to show us loyal pro-Ally Russians that you trust us. From the beginning of the armistice up to a few days ago you Allies have treated Russia almost as if she were one of the enemy countries. Do you forget that we paid out more lives for Allied victory than any one of you? I do not believe you forget that, and yet up until a few days ago we Russians who came to Paris to represent the anti-Bolshevik governments of Kolchak, Denikine, Archangel, etc., were treated almost as if we were agents of the enemy. The first thing for you Allies to do is to consult Russians when you are handling Russian affairs. That is, give us all the moral support you can."

"In the second place, give us all the material support you can, except soldiers."

We are glad enough to have any volunteers come from your countries to join our forces, but the day has passed for the Allies to send a formal expedition into Russia. Such an expedition would do more harm than good. It may astonish you to know it, but it is a fact that Admiral Kolchak has been asking for the withdrawal of the American forces from eastern Russia. For reasons which are mostly psychological we can fight the Bolsheviki better now if our forces are Russian without adulteration. But all the supplies—all the shells, shoes, and soup—that you can let us have are very much needed and can be put to the best possible use."

Baron S. A. Korff, who was appointed Vice-Minister of Finland after the abdication of the Czar, is one of the best informed Russians in public life to-day, and shares in essentials the views of the official just quoted. Baron Korff, whose wife is an American, is acutely conscious of the danger that Russia may be forced into dependence on Germany. He thinks that the present formulation of the League of Nations increases that danger. He says:

"There ought to be two principles fundamental in the League of Nations. First, the League ought to be founded on inner friendship among all the members without any reservations. Second, the League ought to be founded on outer equality, by which I mean that the vital and most precious interests of each nation, such as America's Monroe Doctrine, ought to be safeguarded. Now the first of these conditions does not apply to Russia at present, but Russia can well see that this condition is lacking. The League is stillborn and is already decaying because the 'Big Three' Powers are at loggerheads. The second condition just mentioned does apply directly to Russia. Russia is not getting into the League on the ground floor, as you say, she is not to be a charter member. Then, too, the question of nationalities is handled in a way detrimental to Russia's interest. I refer to the disposition of the fate of the Poles, Letts, Georgians, Finns, etc. We are not necessarily opposed to the independence of these nationalities, even the Estonians, but we do object to having these matters settled without the consent of the Russian nation, which ought to be given through our National Assembly.

"Take just a typical case of the way Russia is slighted. The Allies have practically come to an agreement to recognize the Government of Admiral Kolchak. But the fifth group of the conditions imposed on Kolchak says that in return for recognition he must agree to abide by all decisions made by the Allies in regard to Russia, and these are decisions in which the Kolchak Government will not be consulted! Is it not plain that that is unfair, that persistent tendency of the Allies not to consult Russians in things directly affecting Russia?

"As to the present League of Nations, it is not a League of Nations at all, but a mere syndicate of conquerors. Russia is not admitted on a basis of equality. We protest emphatically against this exclusion. It is not fair to bring Russia into the League later on the same basis as Germany. To many uneducated Russians it might seem that the Allies were putting Russia on the same plane with Germany, as a conquered nation. The result is a strengthening of German influence in Russia, a most undesirable result from the Allied point of view. It seems as if the Allies were bent on doing everything possible to push Russia into Germany's arms.

"In spite of what I have just said about the League of Nations," Baron Korff continued, "I believe that in a few years we shall see a real League, based on the principles which I have stated.

"One of the few pleasant features in a situation which appears rather black to us is the new friendship between Russia and Japan. I have a great belief in friendly relations between these two nations, but no belief in a Russian-German alliance. If Russia and Japan are forced to take Germany into partnership with them, it will not be because of any liking for Germany, but simply because the other nations drive them into Germany's arms. I believe there is no real reason for rivalry between Russia and Japan. We Russians have no vital interests in the Far East. Japan has vital interests there, and I believe it will be best for the civilization of the world if Japan is recognized as the trustworthy leader of the Orient. Japan is the natural link between the East and the West.

"England, France, and America all seem inclined to trust the Japanese. Why can you not trust us Russians, the survivors of the loyal group which sacrificed more than a million lives for your cause and our cause? What would hearten us above everything else, what would do more than anything to frustrate Germany's propaganda in Russia, would be one little indication that you Allies trust us."

In short, what the Russians are asking is simply that they shall be let into the common council chamber, that their voices may be heard in affairs which affect Russian interests. Is this a large request from allies who fought valiantly for the common interest of us all for two years and a half—fought with rotten equipment, even with clubs and pitchforks in place of rifles, while a treacherous intrigue undermined the Government behind them? Is there any good reason why we should not open the door and let Russia in?

Paris, June 1, 1919.

THE MIRACLE OF THE WITHERED HAND

BY CAPTAIN HUGHES MEARNS, U. S. A.

AUTHOR OF "RICHARD RICHARD," "THE VINEGAR SAINT"

And, behold, there was a man which had his hand withered. . . . Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth; and it was restored whole, like as the other.

IN the surgical wards of the Army hospital the visitor's most common question is, "Oh, but doesn't it hurt to be shot?" The soldier patient tells the truth in the beginning—"No'm, it don't," he will say. But that reply is so disappointing that he has to change it. Either the visitor drops him instantly or, worse, begins to eye him suspiciously, as if he were some sort of a bandaged faker. So he soon learns to smile deprecatingly and say, "Oh, not much, when you git used to it," which gives the visitor the satisfying picture of a modest hero, and all is well.

But privately he may tell you how he really felt. Here is the true story—typical of thousands—of Private Street, of the Forty-eighth:

"I was walkin' along back of our barrage," he explained, "just at an easy walk; but if you tell 'em that"—meaning the ladies—"they won't believe we was ever over. Lots o' times we walked. 'Course we crouched over an' kept our eyes peeled; an' we scattered, so as not to git bunched. Y'had to watch, 'cause they was so much noise you couldn't hear nothin'. Y'd git to see they was trouble over to the left, say, by the way the men'd drop an' the way the bombers'd begin to heave at a bush. An' y'd see the rush, an' know 'at we'd got a 'nest'—An' then you'd be droppin' yourself, an' tryin' to crawl out'n the way."

"And it wouldn't hurt?"

"On'y where your nose dug into the mud. You jus' naturally fold up and go down. You know you've been hit, but you don't know where. Your toe begins to burn a little, an' you think, mebbe, you've got a plug in the toe; an' when you git a chanst you feel all over your hoof for the hole. You can't find nothin', except that the whole leg is dead; an' you begin to git weak—the stren'th is jus' slippin' away, an' the sweat spills down into your eyes, stingin' 'em with the salt; an' you reckon you'd better drag along to a hole, which you roll into.

"An' then you feel warm an' wet up under the belt, an' you put your hand up, an' you find blood all over the left hip, an' a sure enough hole. It wasn't in the toe at all! An' then you feel tired an'

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

Photo Edwin Levick
THE GEORGE WASHINGTON COMING INTO NEW YORK HARBOR

Bain News Service
PRESIDENT WILSON AND MRS.
WILSON AFTER LANDING IN
NEW YORK

THE RETURN OF THE PRESIDENT

(C) Underwood & Underwood

AT SCAPA FLOW

After scuttling the German ships in contempt of law and in violation of the armistice, German officers and sailors coolly sought safety in British ships

Central News Photo Service

THE STOWAWAY AND THE MASCOT

The stowaway, Ballantyne, who hid on the R-34 for the voyage to America and the kitten that served as mascot seem to have made friends on the way over

(C) London "Daily Mail," from Paul Thompson

CLEMENCEAU

This bust of the great Frenchman is being modeled at the Peace Conference by the English artist Mr. Derwent Wood, A.R.A.

Digitized by Google

International Film Service

THE AMERICAN COMPETITORS AT THE PERSHING STADIUM

The Pershing Stadium was opened with ceremony at Joinville, near Paris, on June 22. Here are seen the American athletes who took part in the Inter-Allied games. They won ninety-two points, and carried off the honors of the meet

(C) Western Newspaper Union

WOUNDED SOLDIERS AS FARMERS

This is one of the ways in which Columbia War Hospital (Gun Hill Road, New York City) teaches convalescent soldiers the trades and occupations they may use in civil life thirsty an' sleepy; so you sleep. When you wake up, the doc is finishin' up with you. 'Good-by, ol' leg,' you say without much carin'. An' you was wrong again. There's the ol' leg—'tain't much of a leg, but there she is."

Yes, buddy, you tell him, every guess about this war was wrong. When you charge over the top, you don't charge but walk; you don't get shot where you think you're shot; and you're sure they've cut your leg off when you have it all the time. But you've made the prize blunder just now. You say it "'tain't much of a leg," and maybe you think it never will be much; but you're wrong again, my boy. The American Army surgeon is going to make it as good as new if you do exactly as you are told and have the grit to wait.

Sergeant O'Neill, of the Third Division, insists, with a wink, that the Germans loaded a very expensive high explosive just to knock him off a cracker box. "We was safe in the woods," he said; "nobody knowed we was there, see? The 14th and 15th of July Fritz dumps everything he has—but not on us. They was busy trimmin' the edge o' the woods an' all out-o'-doors beyond. Then they stopped. I was settin' on a cracker box, me work done, everything cozy. I was enjoyin' the quiet, expectin' any minute to be relieved an' sent back for a rest, wonderin' who owed me money, when they lifts one lone little H. E. an' drops it right through the trees on me, who wasn't annoyin' nobody. Fssst-puck!" He made a gentle ironic noise in imitation of a whiz-bang. "Like a sody bottle. An' away I goes, along with twenty thousand feet of fresh split lumber an' two town lots o' land.

"Headed toward our right, I was, held by the Twenty-eighth. We was all from Pa., an' a fellow in Twenty-eight owed me six francs, so that was all right. Nice quiet evenin' for a sail, on'y the lumber was annoyin'.

"How did it feel? For the first mile or two I jus' sits on the cracker box an' watches the scenery an' smokes. Then the H. E. sent the cracker box into small bits, so I had to set down where I could. Must o' come down on me arm." He pointed to his right arm, a withered thing, a sick child's arm. There was bitterness in his tone as he added, "An' I was a blacksmith!"

"You'll be a blacksmith again," I told him.

"Oui! Oui!" said he, a phrase which the Americans have brought from France, but rarely does it mean, "Yes! Yes!" With Sergeant O'Neill's cynical intonation it meant exactly, "I've heard that cheero-junk before."

The ward surgeon was called in for verification. Without a word he went quietly at work to strip Sergeant O'Neill's left arm, the uninjured one, displaying a hairy monster of a limb. He flexed it back and forth with admiration. Then he pointed to the limp, paralyzed fellow and said, quietly but firmly: "Sergeant, if all goes well, and"—he searched the soldier confidently with his eye—"I think it will, we're going to give you back an arm as good as this one," holding the good arm up; "better, maybe."

"Oui! Oui!" said the sergeant, meaning, "Go on, pray, your story interests me," but not so ironically this time. Some of the contagion of the surgeon's strong tones had got into him, had lifted him a little out of his cynical depression.

"Yes"—the surgeon eyed his man—"I think we can be sure of it. It'll depend on you, sergeant. If you can stick it out in a hospital; if you don't quit and have your folks get you discharged before we have finished; if you follow all the directions—and they're pretty tiresome, I'll say so—we'll put you back at the forge again. You look to me like the sort of chap that would stick. You are, aren't you?"

"Oui! Oui!" smiled O'Neill, but this time it did mean, "Yes! Yes!"

Sergeant O'Neill had not yet begun to believe in the miracle. Paralyzed arms, he doubtless thought, are not made whole in these days. Private Street and Sergeant O'Neill are typical of thousands of men with paralyzed limbs who must remain in the hospitals months after the war is over and the Army has been demobilized. At this writing there are over thirty hundred such men in the hospitals on this side. In other wars such men would have been out much sooner if blood poisoning had not got them before they reached any hospital at all; but Sergeant O'Neill would have flapped an empty sleeve and Private Street would have pegged about on a wooden stump.

Just what had happened to these two men? In one case a ribbon of machine bullets and in the other case the flying fragment of a high explosive shell had severed the great nerve which supplies the limb with power. Other things had happened, too. O'Neill's arm had been broken and a part of Street's leg muscles had been torn away—small matters in modern surgery. Bones may be set and muscles may be made right again, but the slender little gray "wire" that mysteriously brings the power down from the brain is not so easily repaired.

If nothing were done, the result would be helpless paralysis with a swinging useless limb. But something is done. The procedure is first to let the wound heal. The lacerated muscles and the broken bones must be brought back to normal condition. This may take months. Meanwhile the muscles whose "wires" have been broken must be kept alive by daily massage, for without the life-giving power that comes from the gray nerve the muscles tend to shrink into an inert bundle, to become dead; nothing then can bring them back into life. The moment a motor nerve is broken the muscle begins to deteriorate and waste away. Fibrous tissue and fat infiltrate into the paralyzed limb, eating its life out like rust in iron. Besides constant massaging the muscles are propped in exactly the right position to prevent stretching. If the limb is allowed to "drop," the elongation of the muscle may become permanent; and then, like a run-down battery, no amount of successful "wiring" will bring life back into it.

During all this time a specialist of specialists among medical men, a neuro-surgical diagnostician, is watching and testing. Does the palm sweat? Are the fingers cold? How do the surrounding muscles behave? Is there shrinkage in spite of daily massage, hot baths, and electric treatment? How much? He notes small things—pink and white spots on the skin, tiny ulcerations, and the like—and is keen in the knowledge of their significance to the hidden mysteries of growth going on beneath. It is as if he were listening, microphone to ear, for the most delicate tick of life in that wounded nerve; for with the help of another specialist, the physiotherapist, he will, if he can, coax it back from the dead without an operation. Over half of the cases will recover without operating, but only because of this expert care.

Frequently the nerve is not only snipped by the bullet, but a considerable portion is missing—an inch or two. Imagine an inch of the "wire" broken in the forearm. The nerve ends must be brought together. How to bridge the gap? The arm is flexed, just as a small boy draws it up "to make a muscle," which brings the edges of the destroyed nerve together. A very delicate threading of the severed parts, then the arm is set in a rigid plaster cast and held in that position until the slow, mysterious growth takes place.

It is not so easy as fixing an electric wire, but it is quite similar. The difference is simply one of time. Weeks will elapse before "life" begins to flow down the reconstructed wire. The first signs, it may be, will be a movement of the tips of the fingers. This must be encouraged. The mind, it seems, must be taught again to make the hand raise and lower. Stretch out your own hand; gradually extend the fingers; raise one and then the other; raise the whole arm slowly. How do you do it? You don't know. A wish—and there you are! Well, that simple wishing is something which, once on a time, you learned to do. The wounded man must learn it over again.

The "wire" is repaired; life is flowing along its gray length; "wishes" fly mysteriously, and muscles contract and extend. But all is not done. The wire, you will remember, is short by several inches, and to prevent ripping the arm has been plaster-casted into a rigid V-shape. One sudden reaching forth, and the nerve would be broken again; but it will stand a deal of gradual stretching; if it is extended carefully, each day a little bit more, it will grow new cells and lengthen itself out.

Here is the danger period. The work of months can be spoiled, perhaps never to be repaired, by a single wrong motion. The expert masseuse is at the muscle every day, drawing it down in infinitesimal moves. The neuro-surgeon is by her side, watching. One day he says: "Cured! As good as new, my boy! Do you think you could sign your name to an application for discharge?"

From the mental side, these boys with snipped nerves are the hardest cases to deal with in the hospital. During the long wait until the wound becomes healed they get over the shock of being a cripple; sympathy—overdone, to be sure, but who can blame those who shower it?—has given them a heroic setting; they become used to their deformity and reconciled. They listen to the instructions of the doctor and the nurse, and understand that in time their disability may be removed; that they may some day face the world, not as a cripple soliciting sympathy, but as a whole man.

Yet, if given a vote in the matter, they would probably pack up and go home. At bottom the men are discouraged, even if their pride keeps back all outward signs. They are tired; they want to go home. Once, when I spoke of the splendid river view from the sun parlor of a certain neuro-surgical ward, one of the patients, staring without interest, raised aloft an arm bound in a cast and cried out, "Seven months in a hospital!" Splendid river views seem less splendid somehow.

The worst result comes when parents catch the undercurrent of despondency and begin a campaign to get their boy out. "He is a cripple," they say, "an honorable cripple, and we will take care of him. We are only too thankful that he is alive." They want their boy home. Treatment? Ah, what will they not sacrifice for him! Sometimes they make it particularly hard for the military authorities by filing a formal claim that they are financially able to give their son every medical and surgical care.

Can they? They cannot. The type of nerve regeneration whereby growth is stimulated in dead nerve tissue and by which paralyzed limbs are made whole has never been practiced on this scale before in civil life, and the classes of doctors—operating surgeon, neuro-surgeon, physiotherapist—who are indispensable, working together to perform this wonder, are practically all in the Army. The war has wrought miracles. This is one of them. Men with "dropped wrists" and "dropped ankles" can be restored to life uncrippled. But only the Army surgeons can do this, and only the highly specialized Army surgeons. The neuro-surgical division of the Army represents a specialty within a specialty. The ordinary family doctor—all honor to him and his special skill!—has neither the equipment nor the art to bring back life to dead limbs. And—we may as well face a disagreeable truth—there is always the possibility of falling into the clutches of the medical quack. Can the family take care of these maimed soldiers? No; not with all the money in Chicago.

The difficulties in the way are more serious than either the family or the soldier has appreciated. The position of all the injured muscles must be held at the exactly right position of rigidity. A slight wrong movement, and all is lost. Home on furlough, fêted and paraded by admiring throngs, men have suffered serious and irreparable injury without hardly being aware of it! And it is not uncommon to find that too much good cheer has aroused the fighter, who aims to prove that he is as good as ever by joyfully beating up some compatriot with his crippled hand!

Even before the operation for nerve connecting the "drop" of hand, finger, or ankle must be corrected by splints; and these must be worn night and day. The muscles must never, even for a second or two, be allowed to sag with the dead weight of the limb. In "ankle drop" cases the men are instructed to hold the foot up even while changing shoes.

Added to all these difficulties, scar tissue with its myriads of unknown blood-vessels offers an operating problem which puts the most skillful surgeon on everlasting guard. When the scar tissue stands in the way, it must be removed; and nobody knows what sort of bleeding is coming. So it is imperative that an experienced, wise man shall be at the job; which means an Army medical man.

Resetting the ends of a broken nerve is a surgical wonder; although, by the by, the doctor, most modest and reticent of men, will never say so. He takes all his marvelous doings as a matter of course, and his trained horror of personal publicity makes him the most difficult man to interview. It is a wonder nevertheless. But suppose twelve inches of nerve are smashed? Or thirty inches? Answer: Put in a new nerve! That is the real miracle of war surgery—nerve resection, or nerve grafting.

First-Class Private Hale was wounded by machine-gun bullets, August 21, 1918, in Flanders, near Dickebusch Lake. "We went over," he says, "at an easy trot. I was down with the first spray from the machine guns." He lay there until several waves of our men had been put securely across. "I knew it was all right with them," he said, "because the machine bullets stopped kicking up around me. It was shrapnel now instead." Litter-bearers wormed their way in and carried him to a regimental aid station, where his wound was dressed.

The surgeons recorded on his chart that a large arm artery was severed and the arm broken in several places. At the casualty clearing station they tied up the artery, put the arm in rough splints, and sent him to Base 8, at Boulogne. Later they noted that the bullets had taken away a large portion of the great nerve which supplies power to the hand, wrist, and fingers. In the United States Hospital No. 37, at Dartmouth, England, his wounds healed, but his hand and fingers remained limp and useless. Finally he was sent to the United States to have the miracle performed on the withered hand. Proper splinting, massaging, and electric treatment, of course, had kept his arm muscles alive; once they turn to dead fatty fiber, nothing can be done.

Among other things, Private Hale had lost eight inches of the important musculospiral nerve. The method used in his case was to transplant eight inches of a surface nerve, one that does not connect up with a muscle, stitch the ends of the new nerve with the old, and by careful daily manipulation encourage a new growth to take place.

The transplanted nerve does not begin to sprout and grow like a plant slip placed in a pot. There is no growth in the world just like this coming to life of a transplanted nerve. Wisely they call it "regeneration." From the upper ends of the old nerve life begins to move down into the branch. It is a slow movement, about one-twentieth of an inch a day! Twenty days for one inch! One hundred and sixty days for eight inches!

The grafted nerve must have a comfortable bed to lie on. If the route is short and straight, the surgeon may make it of bone, a slender specially prepared tube. Private Hale required a different sort of nerve bed, so they removed a segment of one of his unimportant veins—he will never miss it!—which made a perfect nerve conduit.

Hale was now put under a competent observer to make sure the "regeneration" was taking place, for sometimes the transplanted nerve remains dead. It is imperative to know early whether the daily growth of one-twentieth of an inch is taking place. The trained assistant will know, and will give the surgeon warning in time.

Of course he was given massage, baths, electric stimulation, and special physical exercise—all to keep the muscle from becoming so much scar tissue or from shrinking or stretching; otherwise, when the nerve has grown slowly to the end of its long journey the muscle will not be there, and all the tedious months will be so much lost time.

The main point in all these cases is the necessity of highly specialized persons in the daily care of the men. The United States offers its soldiers nothing less than the best. That is the message to the thousands of men now under treatment, and to the mothers, fathers, wives, and children who patiently and loyally await the home-coming of their dear ones. Our sympathy goes out to those who wait. It is hard. But the comforting thing is that the most gifted surgeons in the world—miraculously gifted—are in the Army; will be in the Army months after the world has settled down to the pursuits of peace. And they have surrounded themselves with the best mechanical appliances, costing small fortunes; for their special service they have trained a remarkable group of assistants; and, best of all, they are giving daily and nightly an exhibition of professional zeal, pluck, optimism, and downright hard work which is one of the finest American products of this war.

How our pride mounts, we Army men, when we think of the doctors, nurses, and the whole battalion of medical attendants, including the diet cooks and the hospital potato boys! Wherever they were sent they did a fine, effective job. Hark to the cheers when the "medics" march by in the big parade. There's a reason!

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HOPE STREET HIGH SCHOOL, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Based on The Outlook of July 16, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: The Senate Should Ratify, with Reservations; The Society of Nations; The Tactical Blunder of the Republicans.

Reference: Pages 426, 427; 435, 436, 440; 425.

Questions:

1. Professor Davenport speaks of public opinion. What is it? Is it every one's opinion? Any one's opinion? Unanimous opinion? The opinion of the majority? Is public opinion sound? Is it democratic? This question should be discussed at length.
2. Tell, with reasons, your personal opinion of Republican leadership in the Senate at Washington.
3. Explain carefully what Senator Davenport means in saying: "But there is a great current of influence which is not Wilsonian at all, and not yet interpreted by the Senate leadership at Washington."
4. Characterize the diplomacy of President Wilson. Do you like it as well as the Roosevelt diplomacy? Reasons.
5. Discuss whether it is time that American traditional policy, both domestic and foreign, underwent changes.
6. What is the difference between an amendment and a reservation as regards a treaty? Which do you advocate for the Treaty, and why?
7. Do you think the American people would put up with a rejection of the Peace Treaty? Give several reasons in your answer.
8. Do you sanction weeks, and perhaps months, of wrangling over the Treaty? Discuss why or why not. State and discuss a way out of such a spectacle.
9. State in half a dozen sentences what the value of Mr. Baldwin's article on the Society of Nations is to you.
10. Show how the nations constituting the League of Nations could live and work harmoniously together.
11. What is a tactical blunder? Tell what you think of The Outlook's editorial on what it considers the tactical blunder of the Republicans to be.
12. Should one be making up his mind now how he is going to vote in 1920? Discuss at length.

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Dedication of Mount Theodore Roosevelt; Roosevelt as a Practical Politician.

Reference: Pages 428-435.

Questions:

1. From both of the articles in this reference make out an extended list of the things in which Mr. Roosevelt believed.
2. Also from the two articles write out a long list of the characteristics of Mr. Roosevelt as set forth by these writers.

3. What does Professor Matthews mean when he says that Colonel Roosevelt was a practical politician? Explain Mr. Roosevelt's "astonishing success as a practical politician." Illustrate.
4. Both Major-General Wood and Professor Matthews maintain that Mr. Roosevelt was a statesman. What are their reasons? Who is a statesman? Was Cleveland really a statesman? Is President Wilson?
5. Discuss whether statesmen are born such or are trained to be such. Why have we not more of them?
6. Mr. Carman speaks of "the God-given blessings of our country." Name some of these. He also refers to "its [the country's] salvation for future generations to come." Explain what, in your opinion, this salvation is.
7. Are you reading as many biographies as you should? Read during the summer Mr. Roosevelt's Autobiography (Macmillan); "The Voice of Lincoln," by R. M. Wanamaker (Scribners); "Alexander Hamilton," by F. S. Oliver (Putnam); "The Making of an American," by Jacob Riis (Macmillan); "Bismarck," by C. G. Robertson (Holt).

B. Topic: The National Education Association; Americanization in the Industries; Community Service.

Reference: Pages 422-424.

Questions:

1. According to Dr. Strayer, what is the present status of education? Tell what you think of this.
2. What does he say also about the future needs of public education? Discuss the soundness of his suggestions.
3. What kind of education, in your opinion, is best? Reasons.
4. Give a summary of the Americanization that is going on in our industries. Discuss its value.
5. What does The Outlook say about community service? Why is the organization known as Community Service worth while?
6. Those interested in education and in industrial relations should read "The School as a Social Institution," by C. L. Robbins (Allyn & Bacon); "New Schools for Old," by Evelyn Dewey (Dutton); "Management and Men," by M. Bloomfield (Century).

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. A neutral is a person who does not think.
2. True liberty is found only within the law.
3. The American people do not like obstructionists.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for July 16, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Regional understandings, exigencies, status quo (427); protagonist (435); axiomatic, iridescent, disenchanting, felicitous (433); genus (434); education, labor turnover (422).

Men's wear Mat McCutcheon's

Linen Mesh Underwear

Reg. Trade Mark

For years we have been headquarters for Linen Mesh Underwear.

Despite the difficulty in obtaining this Underwear, we are in a position to show all weights in Athletic or Regular garments, as follows:

No. 80 Wallace, $3.75 per garment

No. 100 Wallace, 4.00 per garment

No. 160 Wallace, 4.50 per garment

Union Suits to order at the same price as two-piece suits.

MAIL ORDER SERVICE: Any of the merchandise described above may be ordered with complete satisfaction through our Mail Order Service.

James McCutcheon & Co.
Fifth Avenue, New York

A New Way to Sell Real Estate

No Matter
Where It Is

I got cash for my property in less than two weeks. Made sale myself so had no commission to pay. You can do the same with The Simplex Plans for Selling Real Estate. No matter where located, these practical scientific Plans will show you how to sell your property—quickly, and for cash—without employing agents or paying commissions. Investigate at once. Learn how easily you can use The Simplex Plans, just as I did, to sell your real estate. Write today (a postal will do) to

The Simplex Company
Dept. 74, 1123 Broadway, N. Y.
They will send you full particulars without cost or obligation.

Quick Results!

"Sold for cash in 19 days. Recommend your method."—Mrs. H. Carl-land, Mass. "Your method sold my farm for cash."—Mrs. L. A. Childs, Minn. "Sold my property. Your plan quickest I ever saw."—Johnson, String, N. J. "Sold my hotel for $18,000."—G. F. Stewart, Ill.

"The Most Beautiful Hymnal in the American Church"

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett, Editors

The Hymnal for the New Social Era

Adapted to all Evangelical Denominations

Prices $2 and $1.15 per hundred.

Returnable copy sent on request

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 702 E. 4th St., CHICAGO

To interest and develop your boy—

As he inclines in reading so your boy grows. Good reading habits started early assure healthy mental traits and develop ambition. The special articles, the stories, the departments in

THE AMERICAN BOY

"The Biggest, Brightest, Best Magazine for Boys in All the World"

are edited to give boys "reading with a future to it." Hundreds of thousands of American boys draw inspiration and delight from its pages every month. Give your boy this splendid start. See a copy on news-stands—$2.00 a year by mail.

THE SPRAGUE PUBLISHING CO.
3 American Building Detroit, Mich.

Coming August 1

a most surprising new-style private car

RAPID getaway; wonderful pulling power at low engine speed; a range of 33 to 70 H. P. that masters the miles and breezes over hills; flexibility to meet every driving need; as steady as a clock, without chatter or side-sway; a charming bevel-edge body, picturing the freshest and most advanced motor car beauty; lounging-room comfort; in brief, a car that makes life more worth living because it multiplies your happiness—all this you will find in the very newest Winton Six. Ready August 1st. May we send you literature?

The Winton Company

102 Berea Road, Cleveland, Ohio

Winton Oil Engines for yachts and motor ships, and Winton gasoline-electric light and power Generating Sets are manufactured by the Winton Company in a separate, splendidly equipped plant, devoted exclusively to these two products. Write us your needs.

MAZDA

"Not the name of a thing, but the mark of a service"

MAZDA is the trademark of a world-wide service to certain lamp manufacturers. Its purpose is to collect and select scientific and practical information concerning progress and developments in the art of incandescent lamp manufacturing and to distribute this information to the companies entitled to receive this service.

A MAZDA Lamp for every purpose

MAZDA Service is centered in the Research Laboratories of the General Electric Company at Schenectady, N.Y. The mark MAZDA can appear only on lamps which meet the standards of MAZDA service. It is thus an assurance of quality. This trademark is the property of the General Electric Company.

RESEARCH LABORATORIES OF GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY

Here is extra money for you

$5.00—$10.00—$20.00—or much more—each week, depending upon the amount of time you wish to give. The more time you put in, the more you will earn. This is a splendid opportunity for the man or woman—or the boy or girl—who wants more income. The work is pleasant, and your profits are immediate and generous. Write today, asking for details of The Outlook's Co-operative Profit Plan, addressing Desk F, Representatives' Division.

The Outlook Company, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City

HERMIONE THE BOLSHEVIST

Don Marquis's Hermione articles in the "Sun Dial" of the New York "Evening Sun" are always humorously clever. Hermione and her little group are discussing Bolshevism just now. We reprint her remarks by permission of the author.—THE EDITORS.

Don't you think it is terrible the way they are beginning to persecute the Bolsheviks in this country?

But, of course, it's only to be expected from America. America is so Bourgeois.

Fothy Finch brought the loveliest Russian to the house the other evening, and those were his very words: "America is so Bourgeois."

He used to be a Count before he became one of the Proletariat, he told me, . . . but never at any time has he consented to be one of the Bourgeois.

"But you Americans," he said, "are nearly all Bourgeois!"

That is what makes us so sordid, the Count said . . . for I can't help calling him the Count, although he doesn't like it at all . . . that is what makes us so Sordid and Capitalistic and everything, he said, being Bourgeois!

If we weren't so sordid we'd send millions of dollars and food and munitions to help the Bolsheviks conquer Europe, and then the Bolsheviks would liberate us, in this country, from our Capitalism.

But American Capitalists, the Count says, are so blind and stupid and greedy that they can't see what a vast benefit the overthrow of Capitalism would be, and refuse to furnish the money for its destruction.

What can you do with people like that? the Count says.

And the American Bourgeois are brutes, too, the Count says. When you go and declare war on them and bomb them for the sake of the Social Revolution they send the police and have you arrested.

They know nothing of Idealism.

I told him that I was little bit afraid of joining the Bolsheviks quite openly, because I do not like to be called a Parlor Anarchist, or anything of that sort . . . Papa is quite frightfully rich, you know.

"Lady," he said, "don't let that worry you at all. The French Revolution was largely brought on by Aristocrats."

"Yes," I said, "it was, wasn't it! And so was the English Revolution. . . . The English Revolution was won on the cricket fields of Eton, wasn't it? Or was it Oxford?"

He said he wasn't sure whether it was Oxford or Eton, as he hadn't specialized on English history as he had on French and American history, but anyhow, the principle was the same, and I should feel that in giving my checks to the Cause I was ranging myself beside Jeanne d'Arc and all the other great liberators in history.

"Though you must promise," I told him, "that none of the money I donate will be used to manufacture bombs or anything of that sort. Bombs are, after all, so frightfully Plebeian, don't you think?"

He said that they were, but that it seemed to be unavoidable that a certain amount of Plebeianism should crop out in a Social Revolution. Not all the Proletariat could be expected to have become Proletarian after having been Aristocrats. Anyhow, the main thing was to destroy the Bourgeois and Capitalism, and all the Parasites that cling to them.

And if there is anything I detest myself it is the Parasite!

Especially the Parasitic Woman.

So I coaxed another check out of Papa to help destroy Capitalism and Parasites.

These are Bond Days

SOON after the signing of the Armistice, as a contribution to current American thought and as a reflection of our confidence in America, we published a series of looking forward advertisements — reproduced on this page.

As a mark of our own confidence we have gone forward in the development of our organization to meet the growing needs of the investors of this country and Canada.

The National City Company now has correspondent offices in more than 50 leading cities. 10,000 miles of private telegraph and telephone wires put every investor, no matter where he may be, in close touch with the investment center of the country. A telephone call brings one of our carefully schooled representatives to explain National City service. These men know and can discuss with you Government, Municipal, Public Utility and Railroad bonds, Short Term Notes and Acceptances.

The bonds we offer and sell are bonds we own. Before buying we subject each issue to the scrutiny of nationally recognized experts. Here is a nationwide service at the elbow of everyone who wishes to invest in securities of the highest character.

The National City Company
National City Bank Building, New York

Forward—and at a new page!

The National City Company

THE NATIONAL CITY COMPANY
NATIONAL CITY BANK BUILDING
NEW YORK

Forward! No Halting

The National City Company

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT

All legitimate questions from Outlook readers about investment securities will be answered either by personal letter or in these pages. The Outlook cannot, of course, undertake to guarantee against loss resulting from any specific investment. Therefore it will not advise the purchase of any specific security. But it will give to inquirers facts of record or information resulting from expert investigation, leaving the responsibility for final decision to the investor. And it will admit to its pages only those financial advertisements which after thorough expert scrutiny are believed to be worthy of confidence. All letters of inquiry regarding investment securities should be addressed to

THE OUTLOOK FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York

The Best Recommendation of S. W. Straus & Co.

SIXTY-TWO per cent of our new customers come to us as the result of recommendations by our old clients. They find such satisfaction in the securities we sell and the service we render that they urge their relatives and friends to invest through us in order to gain safety, a good income, and complete freedom from care.

Safety and 6%

Our current list of first mortgage serial 6% bonds, safeguarded under the Straus Plan, includes various issues secured by properties in the largest cities, from New York to Los Angeles. They afford the prudent investor the widest diversification, complete safety, prompt payment of both principal and interest in cash on the days due, 6% interest, and choice of maturities, from 3 to 16 years. Write for valuable literature describing the Straus Plan, and ask for

Circular No. H-905

S.W. STRAUS & CO.

Established 1882

Incorporated

NEW YORK
150 Broadway

CHICAGO
Straus Building

DETROIT
Penobscot Bldg.

MINNEAPOLIS
Loeb Arcade Bldg.

SAN FRANCISCO
Crocker Bldg.

PHILADELPHIA
Stock Exchange Bldg.

Thirty-seven Years Without Loss to Any Investor

FINANCIAL COMMENT

FOREIGN FINANCE

ON Wednesday, July 9, at 10 A.M., a syndicate of bankers offered for subscription, subject to allotment, $75,000,000 Government of the Dominion of Canada two-year notes and ten-year bonds to yield about 5.90 per cent. At 1 P.M. the same day the subscription books were closed, the loan having been over-subscribed. There is no apparent evidence of "tight money" in this instance; but, on the contrary, there seems to be a great surplus of capital awaiting investment when the proper security and yield are obtainable, and this issue is regarded as one of the most attractive of recent offerings.

Official announcement has just been made to the effect that a group of Czechoslovakian banks has borrowed $6,300,000 in this country on ninety-day bankers' acceptances. The syndicate of banks advancing the money were the Chase National Bank, the Guaranty Trust Company, and the Central Union Trust Company. The loan was made, it is said, to finance the purchase of cotton here, and signalizes the opening of an entirely new field for American dollars, as formerly this financing was taken care of in Germany. This loan of $6,000,000—the first of a possible $25,000,000—is guaranteed by the Government of Czechoslovakia, and may be refunded later by a long-time and larger issue, publicly offered.

The method used in the loan to the Czech banks will undoubtedly be adopted by other European nations, nearly all of which are greatly in need of funds. Denmark, for instance, is at the moment negotiating a loan in this country, and Switzerland as well is seeking capital. It will be remembered that Belgium was temporarily aided through an issue of $50,000,000 bankers' acceptances not long ago. The Chinese loan now pending for $100,000,000 is progressing slowly, and the Republic of Mexico is anxiously awaiting some signs of encouragement from American bankers for a loan of good proportions, and is now attempting to enact the necessary legislation to provide for the resumption of interest payments on its national and railway bonds—long in default. It is possible that before long we shall forget the financial wrongs of Mexico and eagerly purchase her securities. This is the part America—the greatest creditor nation in the world to-day—must expect to play, and it is indeed difficult for any of us to realize the tremendous scope of the advantages such a course will open up to American business, banking, and commerce—in fact, it is almost beyond conception.

THE NEW INVESTORS

In an address before the Bond Club of New York, a short time ago, Paul M. Warburg discussed various problems confronting the investment banker to-day, and in commenting upon the change that has come over the investing public he said, in part:

"Looking back to conditions prevailing only one generation ago, we find a very small group of investors and a very small list of investments. Government bonds played a rather unimportant part; municipal bonds played a rôle of some importance. The main energies of the investment bankers were concentrated upon railroad financing. Then came the period of in-

We Recommend For Investment
SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO.
3-Year 6% Serial
Gold Notes.

Back of Your Bond

"WE RECOMMEND THESE BONDS FOR INVESTMENT"—a statement found on the circulars of all bond houses and somewhat trite from over-use. Yet do you fully appreciate what it means to you as an investor when made by Halsey, Stuart & Co.?

It means protection to you. It means that the bonds recommended have been subjected to searching investigations, that they have been found to measure up to exacting standards, and that they have been purchased outright with our own funds.

Nor does our sense of responsibility end with the sale of our securities. Throughout the life of bonds sponsored by our organization, we are in constant touch with the companies whose bonds we have handled. Our feeling of moral responsibility does not end until every interest coupon has been paid, and the principal sum returned at maturity.

The value of our recommendations is evidenced by the satisfactory record of the numerous issues—of which the Southern Railway Co. 6% notes is one—originated and sponsored by our organization. We could assist you, as we have many thousand other investors, in the safe investment of your surplus funds; their amount will make no difference in the character of our service.

Our current list of offerings
OM3 will be sent upon request.

HALSEY, STUART & CO.

INCORPORATED—SUCCESSORS TO

N. W. HALSEY & CO., CHICAGO
CHICAGO NEW YORK PHILADELPHIA BOSTON
209 E. LA SALLE ST. 40 WALL ST. LAND TITLE BUILDING 30 STATE STREET
MILWAUKEE DETROIT ST. LOUIS
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG. FORD BUILDING SECURITY BLDG.

As a further statement of the history of our organization, its policies, its ideals and record, may we send you our booklet OM3 "CHOOSING YOUR INVESTMENT BANKER"?

dustrial development, which opened a new investment field, the volume of transactions increasing steadily with our growing National wealth. Now over twenty billions of Government obligations have outdistanced our eighteen billions of railroad securities, and a new factor of importance looms up on the horizon—foreign investment.

"But it is not only in the character and volume of securities that this great development has taken place; even more impressive has been the change in the quality and the quantity of the investors. As a consequence of the war, the creation of wealth has proceeded on entirely new lines, and to-day we find over twenty millions of bond-holders, where in the past we had only two hundred thousand. Where heretofore investment banking addressed itself primarily to the comparatively few possessed of large incomes, taxation to-day strikes so heavily at the revenues and inheritances of the so-called well-to-do classes and interferes so drastically with the accumulation of investment funds on their part that successful distribution of large volumes of new securities can only be carried on by following wealth into the millions of small rivulets and channels into which it now flows, and where it is less subjected to the exactions of the tax-collector.

"But I believe that we may not hope for a healthy and permanent adjustment between capital and labor unless the working classes are so situated that they can save and put aside in investments a fairly substantial portion of their earnings. In this ability of theirs to save and invest lies one of the most important means of bringing back to a more normal condition our present badly distended financial structure."

GERMANY AS A CUSTOMER

Sentiment is short-lived when an opportunity for profit looms up. Shoulder to shoulder, awaiting the starter's pistol, the salesmen of England, France, Italy, and the United States are lined up on the threshold of Germany ready for invasion. They began to mobilize in Switzerland in the early spring, and it has been recently reported that some of these emissaries have already obtained tentative orders for future delivery.

Germany's needs, consisting largely of foodstuffs and raw materials for their factory products, will be large for some time to come. As the greatest source of these

GUARANTEED 6% CHICAGO INVESTMENT

Secured by real estate and buildings of old-established Company.

Issued to complete new plant needed for rapidly increasing business.

Net assets  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to 1. Net earnings 3 times interest.

Guaranteed by prominent business man.

Recommended by us after 54 years' success in this field.

Bonds of $500 and $1,000 denominations.

Ask for Circular No. 1039-Z

Peabody,
Houghteling & Co.

(ESTABLISHED 1865)

10 South La Salle Street
Chicago, Ill.

DANFORTH FARM MORTGAGES

represent the highest type of investments. They have stood the test of wars and business depression since 1858—60 years, and always worth 100%. Interest paid promptly at maturity.

FARM MORTGAGE BONDS in $500 and $1,000 denominations

For further information regarding our Farm Loans and Bonds write for Booklet and Investors' List No. 58.

A. G. Danforth & Co.
BANKERS Founded A.D. 1858
WASHINGTON ILLINOIS

Sensible Investing Simplifies Saving

Those who are distinctly successful in saving never allow their dollars to remain idle. They follow a well-defined method of putting funds to work in some seasoned stock or bond.

Every dollar invested in securities on

The Twenty Payment Plan

is a step toward the accumulation of valuable income-producing property. Descriptive booklet and our fortnightly publication will explain how simple it is to save, and how sensible investments can be made. Write for booklets 7-OL.

"Investment Opportunities"

SLATTERY & Co.
(Inc.)
Investment Securities
40 Exchange Place, New York

Financial Comment (Continued)

supplies, the United States will ultimately derive the greatest benefit.

What is considered the greatest problem in this connection is how Germany is going to finance her credits. It is believed, however, that when the curtain is drawn back conditions in Germany will be revealed as not as bad as has been expected. She probably has a large quantity of goods ready for export and completed plans for financing the necessary imports. Germany's cheap products are looked upon with much disfavor by ourselves and the other trade contenders, and the sentiment is to restrict them, if possible. In any event, it is up to Germany to bring her well-known commercial ability into play and solve this problem, which is fast becoming of greatest importance to her. And it is reasonable to assume that before many months trade relations with Germany will be well established, with all participants vying with one another for a share in the possible profits.

THE INESTIMABLE VALUE OF CHECKS IN BUSINESS

At the time the report of the National Monetary Commission was compiled it was found that more than ninety-five per cent of the Nation's business was being done by means of checks, and a study made at the present time would show a material increase in this figure. The Federal Reserve Bank of New York is now clearing more than a million country checks a week. At various times it has been suggested in Congress that a two-cent stamp tax be placed on checks, but thus far it has been impossible to estimate the revenue that would be derived thereby. The revenue gained in Great Britain by such a tax was reported as around $6,300,000 a year.

Undoubtedly such a tax in this country would tend to decrease the use of checks and increase the demands made on the country's supply of currency. Two cents is a small amount, but the shrewd business men of to-day count every cent. A great many payments, therefore, would be made in cash, and the effect of this in business is easy to foresee. Take, for instance, any mercantile business. Thousands of people run accounts in a large concern of this kind, paying by check at the end of the month. To disregard this method and pay in cash would mean, first, that the buyer must carry a large amount of cash in his pocket, and, second, that the concern must possess a larger amount of cash in order to make change for the buyer, besides increasing to a considerable extent the number of employees to handle this extra work. This currency must then be taken to the bank, and there again the method results in a great deal of unnecessary work, confusion, and inconvenience.

The circulation of so much currency is naturally a great drain on the United States Treasury, for the supply of gold, silver, nickel, etc., which the Government buys each year is limited, notwithstanding the fact that there is more gold, in bullion form, in the Federal Reserve Bank and Treasury to-day than there has ever been before.

BUY TIME TESTED INVESTMENTS

Our 6% First Farm Mortgages and Real Estate Gold Bonds have been purchased by investors in all sections now for more than 35 years without the loss of a dollar. Amounts to suit. Let us send you descriptive pamphlet "S" and offerings.

E. J. LANDER & CO., Grand Forks, N. D.
Est. 1883. Capital and Surplus $500,000.00

BY THE WAY

There has been some discussion as to the name of Vicente Blasco-Ibáñez, whose article on "The Hermit of Amerongen" appears in The Outlook this week. The "Cumulative Book Index," for instance, catalogues his books under "Blasco," with not even a cross-reference under Ibáñez. We find the following explanation in the current "Bookman": "In Spain a man's name still clings to the old Roman custom of having the surname or family name in the middle. Therefore this author's father's name was Blasco. But there is an additional custom which combines the name of his mother with that of his father, and the two are supposed to be used together. Thus Blasco-Ibáñez—not just Ibáñez. Furthermore, there is still another social distinction which rules that if any one calls a man by his mother's maiden name—e. g., calling this man only 'Ibáñez'—the implication is that his father and mother were not married. It is a curious custom, but a fact."

Speaking of Ibáñez, or Ibáñez, or Blasco-Ibáñez, or Blasco Ibáñez, a book-reviewing journal is said to have printed a pseudo-advertisement for a man to take a temporary job reviewing Ibáñez's books—evidently a shot at the rapidity with which this author's books have been brought out in English.

Now that the famous prize of £10,000 offered by the London "Mail" for the first transatlantic air voyage has been won by Alcock and Brown, and Hawker also has been richly rewarded voluntarily by the "Mail" for his intrepid attempt, the "Mail" reminds readers that in 1906 it offered a £10,000 prize for a flight from London to Manchester and a prize of £1,000 for a flight across the Channel. The first was won by Paulhan in 1910, the second by Blériot in 1909. It adds that, in derision of the folly of the flying fad, one of its contemporaries (in 1906, we presume) offered a prize of £10,000,000 for a flight of ten miles!

"I have observed," writes an "Ungentle Reader" to the New York "Evening Post," "the modern slang to be found in historical novels, so called. Mostly is it evident in translations. Not long ago I came across, in the English rendering of an obscure French romance treating of the not obscure time of Louis XV, that parvenue phrase, 'passing the buck.' . . . At this rate, I shall not be surprised some day to find a freshly 'Revised Version' using 'passing the buck' in that scene where we first in all known history find such a situation—the Garden of Eden."

The story is told that when a bellhop breezed through the lobby of the hotel whistling loudly the manager pounced on him. "Don't you know it's against the rules for an employee to whistle while on duty?" he demanded, sternly. "Ain't whistling," protested the boy. "I'm paging Mrs. Jones's dog."

A Canadian correspondent sends us a story told by a well-known Presbyterian divine: A certain matronly lady who had recently migrated to — from Scotland was making some purchases in one of our large and beautiful stores. "I have waited on you before," observed the affable salesman. "Aye," answered the Scotchwoman, and then added, "Are you Scotch?" "No, but I'm next thing to Scotch," replied the clerk, "I'm a Presbyterian." "Oh, are you?" exclaimed the woman. "Well, I used to think that the Presbyterian Church was the only church, but the times have changed and I have changed, and now I think that any church is all right that has the grace of God in it," and then she added—"even the English Church."

By the Way (Continued)

The record in meanness is well established by the lady who called at the local shop in a country village in England and gave a small—very small—order for goods, including a ha'p'orth of cat's meat. The shopkeeper was muttering angry words to himself half an hour later as he made up the order, when a flurried and breathless maidservant dashed into the place. "H-h-have you sent off Mrs. Grableigh's things yet?" she gasped. "Just doing 'em," snapped the grocer, as he struggled with a sea of parcels, "Oh, thank goodness!" gasped the girl. "Then don't send the cat's meat. The cat's just caught a sparrow."

Anecdotes of Charles Kingsley abound just now, for he was born on June 12, 1819. Smokers will particularly relish one told by Mr. A. G. Benson, essayist and son of Archbishop Benson:

My father used to tell how once he was walking with Kingsley round about Eversley, when Kingsley suddenly stopped and said: "It is no use. I know you detest tobacco, Benson, but I must have a smoke." and he had accordingly gone to a big furze bush and put his arm in at a hole, and after some groping about produced a big churchwarden pipe, which he filled and smoked with great satisfaction, afterward putting it into a hollow tree and telling my father, with a chuckle, that he had concealed pipes all over the parish to meet the exigencies of a sudden desire to smoke.

A note of correction in the New York "Times" adds to our collection of amusing misprints: "In a letter from Mrs. Florence Howe Hall in the New York 'Times Book Review' of May 25 she was made by the compositor to speak of the poet Longfellow as a 'sweet sinner,' when her manuscript had referred to him as a 'sweet singer.'"

Another is the passage quoted by "Punch" from a Paris letter in a London evening paper: "The Majestic and the Astoria, and the other innumerable hotels which house the Allied delegations, are full of the white faces of tired secretaries, whose principles have departed, or, still worse, returned."

"Poor nut," says the Boston "Transcript," was what a Western school nurse wrote on a pupil's card. The boy complained that the nurse had called him names until it was explained to him that the nurse meant "Poor nutrition."

"Junk" to most people means worthless rubbish. But a report of the United States Chamber of Commerce estimates that the total value of junk annually salvaged in the United States aggregates more than two billion dollars, a clear saving of two per cent of the total annual manufactured output of the country. In a bulletin the United States Geological Survey reports that secondary metals, including brass, lead, zinc, copper, tin, and aluminum—secured from scrap metals, etc.—recovered in 1916 were valued at more than two hundred and sixty-five million dollars. One of the serious causes of juvenile crime is said to be the ease with which stolen junk can be sold.

More American Reserve Power

REMINGTON
UMC

Painted for Remington UMC
by F. X. Leyendecker

THE strength that comes from the hills was never worth more in this country than it is today. Both to the man himself and to all about him.

No poison-pollen of Old World imperialism gone to seed can contaminate—nor any attempt of crowd-sickened collectivism undermine—the priceless individualism of the American who truly keeps his feet on the earth.

Remington
UMC
for Shooting Right

Are you one of America's five million hunters? Are you planning a trip to the hills this Fall for big game—and reserve power?

Our Service Department will be glad to help you complete your arrangements—tell you what to take, if you wish suggestions—report on good hunting districts—give addresses of best hunting camps, outfitters and guides, with their rates.

For many years we have maintained this free service to sportsmen, through a nation-wide Remington UMC organization. Now we are better than ever equipped to help you in your hunting.

Or ask your local dealer, the alert Remington UMC merchant—one of more than 82,700 in this country—whose store is your community Sportsmen's Headquarters.

Guides, Outfitters and Camp Proprietors—Write for registration blank for Remington UMC free service.

THE REMINGTON ARMS UNION METALLIC CARTRIDGE COMPANY, Inc.
Largest Manufacturers of Firearms and Ammunition in the World
WOOLWORTH BUILDING NEW YORK

Tours and Travel

THE FAR EAST AROUND THE WORLD

Annual series of Tours de Luxe visiting Japan, China, the East Indies, Australia, New Zealand, the South Seas, etc., and for the complete Tour of the World, leave during August, Sept. and October. Illustrated Booklet on request.

STEAMSHIP PASSAGES EVERYWHERE BY ALL LINES

THOS. COOK & SON

245 Broadway 561 Fifth Ave., New York
Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Montreal, Toronto, and 145 Offices Abroad
Cook's Traveler's Cheques Good All Over the World

Summer in the National Parks, California, Canadian Rockies

Motoring, camping, trapping, horseback riding, fishing, boating. Booklet. THE TEMPLE TOURS, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

Apartments

WANTED—THREE APARTMENTS unfurnished, in same building in New York City. No. 1. Containing living-room or studio, dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms, bathroom and maid's room. No. 2. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. No. 3. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. Location preferably out of the usual beaten path, something not usually rented if possible, and preferably in a private house altered for such purpose. Nothing south of Greenwich Village nor north of 72d Street will be considered. Occupancy October 1, 1919. Address CHARLES H. DAVIS, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

Hotels and Resorts

CANADA

MYRTLE HOUSE
Digby, Nova Scotia
Queen of Canadian Resorts
Ideal Climate
Golf, fishing, boating, bathing.
Cuisine the best. Booklet.
HERRICK & BELLMAN

CONNECTICUT

THE WAYSIDE INN
New Milford, Litchfield Co., Conn.
In the foothills of the Berkshires. Open all the year. An ideal place for your summer's rest. 3 hours from New York. Write for booklet.
Mrs. J. E. Castle, Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
THE LESLIE
A quiet, cozy little house by the sea
PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

MEXICO

Metropolitan Hotel
The Best Hotel in the City. In front of the Beautiful Cathedral and Flower Market.
MEXICO CITY, MEXICO
All modern conveniences.

NEW YORK CITY

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square
adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

Hotels and Resorts

NEW YORK CITY

Hotel Le Marquis

31st Street & Fifth Avenue
New York

Combines every convenience and home comfort, and commends itself to people of refinement wishing to live on American Plan and be within easy reach of social and dramatic centers.
Room and bath $4.50 per day with meals, or $2.50 per day without meals.
Illustrated Booklet gladly sent upon request.
JOHN P. TOLSON.

The Margaret Louisa

of the Y. W. C. A.

14 East 16th St., New York
A homelike hotel for self-supporting women. Single rooms $1.00 per night. Double rooms (2 beds) $1.40 per night. Restaurant open to all women. Send for circular.

MAINE

Robinhood Inn and Cottages
Bailey Island, Me., opened June 15. Bathing, fishing, sailing. For circular, Miss MASSY.

NEW YORK

Hotel Champlain

Bluff Point-on-Lake Champlain, N.Y.

HIGHEST point on lake—fireproof—every room a front room—800 acres—tennis—18-hole golf course—concrete garage—boating, bathing, fishing, motor highways in all directions. Excellent cuisine, American plan. Management Mr. J. P. Greaves, of Florida East Coast Hotels. Booklet on request.

Open June 25th

New York Booking Office,
243 Fifth Avenue

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of wild-est Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, saddle horses. Tramps to surrounding mountain peaks. Lake George and Lake Champlain. Dancing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $16 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

Health Resorts

ALDERBROOK A Summer Camp for Adults—Physical culture. Physician's care. Leaflet on request. Alderbrook, Norwalk, Ct.

LINDEN The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Doylestown, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT L. LINDEN, W. Allen, M.D. (late of The Walter Sanitarium)

CREST VIEW

For nervous and convalescent patients.
R. H. CHASE, M.D., and E. C. McDANIEL, Booklet.
Wynotie, Pa.

Dr. Reeves' Sanitarium

A Private Home for chronic, nervous, and mental patients. Also elderly people requiring care. Harriet E. Reeves, M.D., Melrose, Mass.

Real Estate

CONNECTICUT

For Rent Ledge Cottage at The Pines, Lake-wash, Conn. Delightful place for vacation. Ten minutes Lake Waconsoo. Four-room bungalow. Spacious porch. Running water. Address Miss ALMIRA CLAREVALLAND.

Real Estate

CONNECTICUT

NEAR LAKES and RIVER

80-acre practical farm and attractive home; 8-room two-story house in perfect repair; barns in same condition; on State road lined with maple trees; American neighbors; mail delivered, telephone; good schools; short distance from Lake Waramaug. Priced to make quick sale, $3,700, $1,500 cash.
J. CASSIDY, Woodbury, Conn.

MASSACHUSETTS

BOSTON, Mass. For rent or lease, an attractive furnished house, accessible to every interest. Nine rooms and bath. Rent moderate. Family or adults preferred. Address E. H. W., 16 Bond St., Boston.

NEW YORK

FOR SALE

CANNON POINT
ESSEX-ON-LAKE CHAMPLAIN
NEW YORK

1½ miles south of village, 7½ acres, partly wooded with pine, hemlock, cedar, and variety of deciduous trees. Small summer bungalow on point 30 feet above lake, commanding wonderful view of lake, Green Mountains, Split Rock Mountain and lighthouse two miles distant. Bungalow has hall used for living-room, two sleeping-rooms, bath, servant's room, veranda with 12 feet upper balcony 2½ feet, detached den and guest room, kitchen and store-room annexed. Excellent water supply from lake; Rider & Ericsson hot air engine; tank capacity 1,100 gallons. Icehouse containing small cold storage. Boat house with main sleeping quarters. Beautiful beach and bay, good harbor for boats, two buoys. Cliffs of porphyry rock rise 25 feet above the lake, forming the most beautiful natural site on Lake Champlain. Premises never occupied except by owner, who can be addressed or seen during summer months.

Mrs. ENOCH H. CURRIER

Essex-on-Lake Champlain, New York

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential section, suburbs of New York City. Half hour Grand Central; also near subway. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 50 x 100. Garages. Price $9,500. Full particulars from owner, 9,813, Outlook.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

WANTED—450 Outlook readers to represent this publication this summer—and all through the year, if you like. You can easily earn $10 a week and more, simply by using an hour or two a day of your spare time. If you want extra spending money—and everybody does—write us for details of the Outlook's co-operative profit plan. Simply address Representatives' Division, Desk 12, The Outlook, 381 Fourth Ave., New York City.

EARN $20 to $40 a week in spare time selling new Home Budget System. Twenty million Liberty Loan buyers want it; every home needs it. So simple a child can keep it; pays for itself several times over first month, in many instances. Approved by Government and domestic economists. Teaches economy; encourages thrift—actually increases buying power of money 10% to 40%—just like that much raise in salary. Tie up to a winner! Write quick. G. J. Spinner, Sales Mgr., Dept. 57, 137 E. La Salle St., Chicago.

BOOKS, MAGAZINES

FOR SALE—6 bound volumes of The Theatre Magazine—1903 to and including 1907. What is offered? 7,133, Outlook.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CM7 Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

FOR PATRIOTIC HOME MISSIONS. Wanted, two young men. One, a stenographer, high school or college graduate, to be secretary to the president. One, a college graduate, to teach mathematics. Fine location and rewarding work. For particulars address Wm. G. Frost, President, Berea College, Berea, Ky.

WANTED—Office assistant who is capable of acting as mistress of children's Protestant home. 7,150, Outlook.

HELP WANTED

Companions and Domestic Helpers

DIETITIANS, cafeteria managers, governesses, matrons, housekeepers. Miss Richards, Box 5, East Side Station, Providence, R. I.

WANTED—Capable, strong woman as assistant housekeeper, able to superintend the serving of meals. Write Heathcote Inn, Scarsdale, N. Y. Telephone 600 Scarsdale.

STRONG woman of refinement as nurse, and companion for invalid child. Pleasant home surroundings. E. H. Hufnagel, 54 E. 4th Ave., Mount Vernon, N. Y.

WANTED—Trained nurse in girls' boarding school, Philadelphia. October to June. 7,153, Outlook.

WANTED, in an orphanage, two capable well young Protestant women, one as girls' matron, the other nurse and general assistant. Training unnecessary. Salary $40 per month, comfortable room alone, board, and laundry. References. 7,170, Outlook.

WANTED, mother's helper; refinement and love of children essential. Boy of three, over-eight two older boys. Christian family. Permanent home. 7,172, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

TEACHER wanted for children's home, Bethlehem, Pa. Ages six to fourteen. Salary $40 month and board, room, laundry. Address Mrs. H. J. Meyers, Bethlehem, Pa.

WANTED—Resident teacher, lower grade and recreation. Apply Superintendent Parental Home, Louisville, Ky.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Professional Situations

WANTED—Position in a school to plan course and supervise work for non-English-speaking students. 7,154, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

WIDOW desires supervising elderly gentleman's home. South winters. References. 7,103, Outlook.

A woman of refinement would like care of gentleman's home. Capable of taking entire charge. Best of references furnished. 7,136, Outlook.

COLLEGE woman would like position, in September, as housekeeper where she can have entire charge. 7,137, Outlook.

EDUCATED woman, 34, desires position as housekeeper. Good health. Capable of taking full charge. Four years' experience. No home. Experience and tact with children. 7,158, Outlook.

YOUNG woman will combine duties of housekeeper, cook, and waitress for combined wages of three, viz., $150 month. 7,164, Outlook.

COMPANION, preferably traveling. Young woman, refined, well educated, pleasing personality. At liberty after September 15. References. No. 7,167, Outlook.

LADY desires to place her excellent English nurse with family going to England or France in early fall. Will take charge of children or invalid in return for passage. Absolutely reliable. Write Mrs. Theodore Lilley, Tolland, Mass.

HOUSEKEEPER, managing, or superintendent of institution wanted by lady of refinement. Disengaged September 1. References. 7,169, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

SECRETARY-TEACHER. Woman, experienced, successful teacher of high school English, desires position as secretary-teacher in preparatory or high school. Now in secretarial school in Boston. Specially trained for correspondence. Excellent references. Address 7,151, Outlook.

EXPERIENCED teacher holding excellent credentials is open to engagement for the coming year. Private schools only. 7,166, Outlook.

TEACHER of mathematics and French wishes position. 7,163, Outlook.

MISCELLANEOUS

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Frances Parker Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

MISS GUTHMAN, New York shopper, will send anything on approval; services free. References. 308 W. 90th Street.

GREGG shorthand. If your school does not teach shorthand, let me save you two months' expense by correspondence course. 7,165, Outlook.

GENTLEWOMAN, living out of New York, whose income has been affected by prevailing conditions will take into her home one or two children who have been deprived of parents' care. Correspondence invited. 7,171, Outlook.

Say it with Flowers

To Have Friends Be One. Remember the birthdays and anniversaries of your friends with flowers. Your local florist within a few hours can deliver fresh flowers in any city or town in the United States or Canada through the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Service. They will serve you.

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequaled for Teaching Real Americanism
Send 35c today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"
THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

PISO'S
for Coughs & Colds

TEACHERS' AGENCIES

The Pratt Teachers Agency

70 Fifth Avenue, New York
 Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools.
 and advises parents about schools. Wm. O. Pratt, Mgr.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

ILLINOIS

Northwestern University

Includes nine separate departments leading to collegiate and professional degrees.

The Colleges of Liberal Arts and Engineering, the Graduate School, and the Schools of Music and Oratory are ideally situated on the Evanston campus along Lake Michigan. New dormitories, large gymnasium, attractive environments.

The Law, Dental, and Commerce Schools are in Northwestern University Building, in the heart of Chicago's legal and commercial activities; the Medical School is in the city's great hospital center.

Write for books of courses showing special advantages. Address

LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, President,
 430 Northwestern University Bldg., Chicago

MASSACHUSETTS

SHORT-STORY WRITING

A course of forty lessons in the history, form, structure, and writing of the short-story taught by Dr. J. Berg Kessel, for years Editor of Lippincott's. 150-page catalogue free. Please address
 THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
 Springfield, Mass.

PENNSYLVANIA

AUBREY HALL

Backward and mentally defective children taught individually by experienced teachers under the supervision of an eminence nerve specialist. Torrensale, Philadelphia, Pa.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

St. John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses

YONKERS, NEW YORK

Registered in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a general training to refined, educated women. Requirements one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the Directress of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

If you want more money

You can earn $1.00 an hour in your spare time taking subscriptions for The Outlook. And you can earn as much more as your time allows. There will be thousands of new subscriptions taken in the months ahead and thousands of Outlook subscriptions are expiring. The work is pleasant, and our plan enables you to build up a steady, permanent income, year after year. Write to-day for details of The Outlook's Co-operative Profit Plan, addressing Representatives' Division, Desk G, The Outlook, 381 Fourth Ave., N. Y. City.

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122 July 30, 1919 No. 13

THE OUTLOOK IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. M. T. FULFORD, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. HOTT, TREASURER. ERNEST H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAVERS D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER

The Issue of Shantung.....	491
Secretary Baker and the Czechs.....	491
Warning.....	491
Accusations of Cruelty to Military Prisoners.....	492
Prohibition in Congress.....	492
The Pacific Fleet.....	492
The Mexican Question Again to the Front.....	493
Southern Protests Against Lynching.....	493
The Sacrifice of Serbia.....	493
Why Serbia Needs Help.....	493
Cartoons of the Week.....	494
Should the Peace Treaty be Ratified?... ..	496
The Education of Henry Ford.....	497
The Classics and Reconstruction.....	498
On Cultivating Our Parents.....	498
Should the Peace Treaty be Ratified? A Group of Letters Pro and Con.....	499
Japan's Gains from the War.....	501
Special Correspondence by Sydney Greenbie
Why China Refused to Sign.....	502
An Interview on the Shantung Provision of the Treaty with Wu Chao-chu by Jesse Willis Jeffers
Methodism's Great Missionary Centennial
Special Correspondence from Charles Stelzie
Comes the Hired Man.....	504
By John S. Pardee
The Responsibility of the Kaiser.....	505
By Vernon Kellogg, of the American Relief Administration
"Papa Yank".....	506
By Fullerton L. Waldo
When Germany Yielded.....	508
Paris Correspondence from Elbert Francis Baldwin
Back-Firing Against Bolshevism.....	510
By Lieutenant John M. Oskison
Current Events Illustrated.....	511
Visit Japan.....	516
By Marguerite A. Solomon
Homely Economics.....	516
Socialists and Capitalists.....	517
Tolstoy, Nietzsche, and Jesus.....	517
Bolsheviki and I. W. W.....	517
Weekly Outline Study of Current History
By J. Madison Gathany, A.M.
By the Way.....	518

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents.
 For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage.
 Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.00.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY

381 Fourth Avenue

New York City

Nobody ever Changes from RAMESES
 Because the wealth of Midas couldn't buy a better cigarette

SONGS OF LIBERTY

For Colleges, Public and Private Schools

Send 35c today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"
 THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

Don't Wear a Truss

Brooks' Appliance, the modern scientific invention, the wonderful new discovery that relieves rupture, will be sent on trial. No obnoxious springs or pads.

Brooks' Rupture Appliance

Has automatic Air Cushions. Binds and draws the broken parts together as you would a broken limb. No salves. No lies. Durable, cheap. Sent on trial to prove it. Protected by U. S. patents. Catalog and measure blanks mailed free. Send name and address today.
 Brooks Appliance Co., 4715 State St., Marshall, Mich.

5% Income
 Free From Federal Income Tax
 Cameron County, Texas
 Road 5½'s

DUE 1949

PRICE TO PAY 5%

Cameron County has an assessed valuation of over $17,117,406 and a population of over 30,000

CIRCULAR T X.

Farson, Son & Co.

Members New York Stock Exchange
 115 Broadway, New York

Owners' Records of
100,000—200,000—300,000
MILES.

THE ultimate mileage of White Trucks is still unmeasured. Some have rounded out 300,000 miles. Many have run 200,000 miles. Hundreds, probably thousands, have passed the 100,000 mark.

White Trucks roll up mileage years after the best ordinary truck is worn out. In the long run they involve less investment. Fewer units are required to do the work. They put off the day when new trucks replace them.

Operating and maintenance costs are also lowered by the steady volume of performance which makes high mileage records possible.

"100,000 Miles and More" is the title of a booklet containing owners' records of hundreds of White Trucks which have run more than 100,000 miles. A copy will be sent to anyone interested on request.

WHITE TRUCKS

THE WHITE COMPANY, Cleveland

The Outlook

JULY 30, 1919

THE ISSUE OF SHANTUNG

MUCH of the time of the Senate has been occupied lately in a discussion of the provision in the Treaty of Versailles which transfers to Japan the privileges which Germany held in China. As these privileges related to territory and a port on the peninsula of Shantung, the provision in the Treaty has come to be known as the Shantung provision. It is commonly but inaccurately said that by the Treaty Japan gets Shantung.

The widespread and vigorous protest against this transfer of German rights to Japan is easily understood. China was one of America's allies in the war. When the President called upon neutrals to break off relations with Germany, China at once did so, and later became a belligerent. Her part in the war was by no means negligible. Though she had no combatant troops at the front, she had thousands of laborers who did essential work which otherwise troops fit for combat might have had to do. She ran considerable risk, for German propaganda in China was very active, and in case of a German victory China would have suffered severely. To reward China by taking property which Germany had secured from China under duress and turning it, not back to China, but over to Japan, on the ground that Japan drove the Germans out before China declared war, is hardly an obviously just way to treat an ally. The Shantung provision has by no means satisfied our own peace delegates or the delegates of other countries.

China's attitude has been expressed in The Outlook by Dr. C. T. Wang, delegate of the Chinese Republic to the Peace Conference, in an authorized interview with The Outlook's staff correspondent, Mr. Gregory Mason, in its issue for June 25. It is again stated in the present issue of The Outlook by Mr. Wu, another delegate to the Peace Conference. In order intelligently to understand the situation it is well to remember certain facts.

There is no transfer of sovereignty. Germany had no sovereign rights in Shantung, and by the Treaty Japan acquires none. In practical effect, this may not seem important, for the lease and the concession held by Germany now given to Japan imply a control over Chinese territory which would not be tolerated by America if a foreign Power attempted to exercise it over American territory. Nevertheless it is well to remember that this question is not one of changing China's franchise, but is one of what amounts to a lease.

In the second place, there is no direct transfer of Shantung Province to Japan. The province of Shantung and the peninsula of Shantung should be clearly distinguished. Shantung Province has been compared to the combined area of Pennsylvania and Virginia, while the territory in which Japan has acquired concessions has been compared to the District of Columbia, being only a fourth larger than that District.

Representatives of Japan have given assurances, as in the interview of Marquis Kimmochi Saionji with Gregory Mason in The Outlook for July 2, that Japan will give back the leased territory to China "except a little land at Tsingtao;" and we should have faith in their word.

What angers the Chinese is not the size of the territory turned over, but the apparent callousness of China's allies in treating her as not one of them would think of treating a strong Power. Even if the control of Kiaochau Bay, the lease of land, and the railway and mining concessions did not give a foreign Power a stranglehold upon an enormous Chinese territory, the nominal transfer of such privileges to a foreign Power would be irritating. The fact that the transfer was the price paid for Japan's adherence to the Treaty naturally does not make it any more acceptable to China, for, as she views it, it is a price paid by her allies at her expense.

SECRETARY BAKER AND THE CZECHS

One of the most valiant achievements in history is that of the Czechoslovaks in Russia. It has elements in it of the romantic and the epic. First unwilling conscripts of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, then willing prisoners of the Russians, then vigorous and disciplined fighters against their former masters and oppressors, these Czechoslovaks found themselves on the collapse of Russia unable to do any more fighting there, unable to work their way through Germany to the western front, and out of reach of the peoples who were their truest allies. So, disciplined in the midst of anarchy, faithful to the cause which those about them had forgotten, they started across Siberia. There the war found them, and there they joined the Russians who loved law as well as liberty in withstanding the successors to the Prussian enemy—the Red tyranny.

If America ever owed anything to a group of foreign soldiers, she owes a great debt to these Czechoslovaks. Some of these Czechoslovaks are in this country now. A thousand or so of them were in Washington on July 18, and were reviewed and addressed by the President.

While these soldiers were in review the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, was being plied with questions concerning the payment of the expense of the transportation of Czechoslovaks from Siberia. Representative Wood, of Indiana, asked, in the form of a resolution, why four thousand Czechoslovaks were brought to this country and quartered at Camp Kearney when there were three thousand or more of the United States soldiers in Siberia awaiting an opportunity to come home. Mr. Baker denied the accuracy of the facts alleged. There are only twelve hundred Czechoslovaks at Camp Kearney, and no American soldiers waiting an opportunity to come home, for they have not been ordered home. Mr. Baker further stated that there was plenty of transportation if they were ordered home; that there were empty transports coming eastward; and that the bill would be paid by the Czechoslovak Government. When questioned as to his authority to use funds in this way, he said:

There is no mystery about it. Undoubtedly the funds would come from the Quartermaster's department. I certainly don't think there is any specific provision in the law for transporting Czechoslovak soldiers across the United States. But the authority given to the President in connection with his funds is certainly sufficiently elastic.

This is a case where the Roosevelt principle as to an Executive's action applies. When a thing was needed to be done, President Roosevelt did not ask whether as Executive he was authorized by law to do it, but whether he was prohibited by law from doing it. By his action in this case Mr. Baker has not only done himself, but his country, honor.

WARNING

American good nature, which is proverbial, needs watching. It ought not to be allowed to weaken our determination to finish what we undertook when we entered the war. Witnesses generally agree that American soldiers soon after entering the occupied region of Germany were inclined to forget what they had been through and what they had seen, though further acquaintance with the Germans revived their memories. On this side of the water we are encountering the revival of subtle forms of German propaganda. Though addressed to the men of the First Division as a Division order by its commander, Major-General E. F. McGlachlin, Jr.'s, warning is one that might well circulate in every part of this country among the civilian population.

We should like to quote it in full; but perhaps some of its spirit and purpose can be gathered from these sentences taken from it:

German eyes look and see, Boche ears listen and hear, Hun lips tell all the half-truths and lies, and only those truths calculated to accomplish their particular selfish objects.

Our enemy still attempts always to impose his ideas on the world. . . . Beaten by Allied arms under American impetus, he denies that he was defeated, but claims that he was deceived. . . .

Far beyond the requirements of military necessity he killed American women and children through his underseas piracy, killed and maimed English women and children through bombardment of undefended places, destroyed French mines beyond repair for fifteen years, and ruined and stole Belgian machinery for no purpose except to delay resumption of industry that his own might more greatly prosper. . . .

Having through greed inflicted infinite losses upon us and our allies, he now whines and weeps and wrings his hands that he is called upon for reparation in kind, though not in measure, for his misdeeds. . . .

Contemptible, his might is no longer to be feared, though he is dangerous. He is dangerous because without conscience he conducts an organized, unscrupulous campaign to deny his unmeasured crimes, to create mutual distrust between the Allies, to make us suspicious of each other, to plant in our minds the seeds of doubt of our principles, our institutions, and our President, to gain sympathy for his future imaginary distress.

There is nothing consistent between German public motive and American spirit and ideals. . . .

Let us see everything, hear everything, of value to our cause, say nothing to our enemy. Let us present and maintain our honor, perform exactly our duty, devote ourselves loyally to our country.

ACCUSATIONS OF CRUELTY TO MILITARY PRISONERS

What has been circulated as a matter of common report concerning the cruel treatment of National Guard and National Army men by American guards in France is under investigation by a special committee of the House of Representatives. It is, however, by no means now a matter of common report. Colonel J. Leslie Kincaid, former Judge-Advocate of the Twenty-seventh Division, has sent to the Secretary of War a letter and the copy of a report which he and Colonel Wainwright made to General O'Ryan. His report is not, and does not purport to be, the evidence of a witness, but rather a statement based on the testimony given by witnesses as heard by them.

Among the statements is the following concerning the evidence of soldiers detained in Paris while returning from leave:

These soldiers complain that at the Petit Rouget, commonly known as the Bastille in Paris, the whole atmosphere and spirit of the institution, as evidenced by the profanity, vulgar and obscene epithets used against the prisoners, appear to be a spirit of intense hatred and hostility against the National Guard. . . . Complaints were also made by the men questioned on the score of overcrowding, sanitary conditions, failure to provide either time or facilities to wash, and continual insults by the guard.

Colonels Kincaid and Wainwright describe Prison Camp No. 2 as being, according to the statements made by the soldiers, in a condition "rivaling that of Siberian prison camps and much worse than conditions which existed in German prison of war cages." They call attention to the fact that property not only of material but also of sentimental value, including official decorations and photographs of a soldier's mother and his sweetheart, were confiscated. It is also stated that the prisoners were compelled to drill "in front of muzzles of machine guns and automatic rifles, a precaution which might be justified with condemned murderers, but is hardly to be expected in the American Army as part of the routine of an ordinary camp of detention."

Such an investigation ought not to be regarded as a "post-mortem." It ought to be pressed till the outrages are disproved or established and punished. If the country is to count on the patriotic services of its citizens in future emergencies, it must make assurance doubly sure that outrages shall not be allowed to hide under the cover of military necessity until they are forgotten.

PROHIBITION IN CONGRESS

The Volstead Bill passed the House of Representatives on July 22 by a vote of 287 to 100, substantially as originally reported from committee. The failure of most of the modifying amendments proposed had previously indicated clearly the temper and purpose of the House, which throughout has stood strongly in favor of passing the bill and in opposition to any serious change. It is expected that practically the same bill will now be brought before the Senate for action.

An attempt to make all possession of alcoholic beverages a legal offense failed after an animated debate. The sentiment of the country against offensive searches in private houses was reflected in this action of the House. But the bill still forbids such possession of liquor as is evidently for the purpose of sale in violation of the other provisions of the law, and puts the burden of proof on the possessor. It permits the possession of liquor in private dwellings, but to be used only for "personal consumption of the owner thereof and his family residing in such dwelling and bona-fide guests when entertained by him."

The bill retains its original definition of intoxicating beverages as those containing one-half of one per cent, or more, of alcohol. This applies to the Constitutional Amendment as well as to the war-time bill. The attempt to separate the provisions of the bill relating to the two prohibitory measures failed entirely.

THE PACIFIC FLEET

With the coming of world peace it is possible to put into actuality the long-considered plan of making what has been called a two-ocean American Navy. We have had heretofore on the Pacific war-ships but not a fleet, nor has there been proper provision for naval building, docking, and repairing. Now it is proposed to put the two coasts on an equality in all those things.

Admiral Rodman sailed for the Pacific coast on July 19 at the head of an efficient and formidable squadron. It included six superdreadnoughts, thirty destroyers, and scores of auxiliary craft. Other ships will follow. Hereafter the Pacific will have its seaboard guarded as strongly as has the Atlantic. Attack in neither quarter is feared, nor is attack probable in the near future. But the value of naval preparedness is in what it prevents becoming possible or probable, and this is as true of one coast as the other.

The Panama Canal makes the time of the passage from the North Atlantic to the North Pacific coasts a minor matter compared with what it was when the Oregon made its famous voyage in the war with Spain. Admiral Rodman's fleet will make the first naval trial of the Canal route on a large scale, and the result will be watched with interest. The Panama Canal's value as the connecting passageway between our two fleets cannot be overestimated.

With two such extended National ocean fronts to protect, the American Navy ought to be kept in the highest possible state of efficiency, and to be large enough to serve its double guard duty adequately and impressively.

THE MEXICAN QUESTION AGAIN TO THE FRONT

Hardly a week passes by in which some new affront or injury to Americans or some new attempt to injure American investments in Mexico does not stir up anew the troublous question: When and how are normal and peaceful conditions to exist in that country? Last week it was reported that armed Mexicans had attacked a motor launch belonging to a United States war-ship on the shore near Tampico and that the sailors had been plundered and ill treated. This incident inevitably recalls that other incident near Tampico in which American sailors were arrested and our flag was insulted—an incident which led to the occupation of Vera Cruz by our forces. The present Tampico attack may not be important in itself, but it is insulting and irritating. It emphasizes the fact that the present Government of Mexico is unable to protect foreigners within that country.

No doubt apologies will be forthcoming, and also promises of punishment to be meted out to the bandits who robbed our sailors. This is exactly what has happened in the case of the American, John W. Correll, who was recently slain by Mexican bandits. Carranza's Government has just declared that it will omit no efforts to prosecute those responsible for the crime. Since the Correll murder another murder by Mexican bandits is reported, that of a British subject, Theodore Patterson, a miner in Zacatecas. And it is only a few weeks ago that American troops entered Mexico when Villa's forces attacked Juarez and incidentally fired upon the American town of El Paso, just across the bridge.

In urging that a commission be appointed by Congress to inquire into the relations between Mexico and the United States and to suggest some way to improve these relations and to make American life and property safe across the border, Mr. N. J. Gould, a New York Representative, declared that since 1910 over three hundred Americans had lost their lives by murderous attack in Mexico. Another investigator, Mr. Wallace Thompson, who was formerly an American Vice-Consul in Mexico, has gathered statistics which indicate that over $80,000,000 worth of physical damage has been done in recent years to American property in Mexico.

The basic trouble in our relations with Mexico is undoubtedly the inability of Carranza to keep the peace and enforce security throughout the country. If this inability on his part continues, it is evident that sooner or later the situation will become so serious that measures of corresponding seriousness will have to be taken. The proposal that Congress should appoint a commission to study and report on the present relations of the two countries and the responsibility for what is evil, and to propose remedies, is sound in principle and should be adopted.

SOUTHERN PROTESTS AGAINST LYNCHING

A "press symposium" of several pages has been collated by the "Southern Workman" of Hampton Institute. It includes extracts from journals in eleven Southern cities on the subject of lynching, and it may fairly claim to represent the sober-minded and patriotic white sentiment of the South. Almost without exception these extracts lay emphasis on the belief that the courts are not letting crime go unpunished and that it is an insult to the State laws and their enforcement for mobs to act as judge and jury; Judge Lynch may be called for in a raw, pioneer country, but not in civilized America.

Two things have lately called out renewed denunciation of the practice of lynching. One is a growth of sixty per cent in the total reported lynchings for 1918 as compared with 1917—there has been a slight decrease, we are glad to add, in the figures for the first half of 1919—as shown by the statement compiled by the Tuskegee Institute. It may be added that of the eighty-three Negroes lynched in the whole eighteen months twenty-three (a little over a quarter) were charged with assaults on women, and the other causes ran all the way from murder to "alleged participation in an alleged hog-stealing." The Louisville "Courier-Journal" declares that this record as to causes (which corresponds pretty evenly as to this point with those of former years) controverts by figures the common statement that lynching is due to passionate resentment when crimes against women have been committed.

The other thing which has aroused horror and deprecation in the South, as it has elsewhere, has been a recent renewal of the form of lynching that includes torture and burning at the stake. This form of surviving barbarism appears, apparently, in waves; for years little is heard of it; then a single atrocity of the kind is followed by others in quick succession. The subject is not one upon which it is pleasing to enter into detail; but that in some places public education against horrible cruelty is needed is shown by the fact that we have before us facsimiles of parts of two newspapers of last month announcing beforehand the "expected" burning of a Negro at the stake.

We believe that the true sentiment of a vast majority of cultivated Southern people is truly expressed by the Montgomery "Journal" when it says: "Lynching does us incalculable harm on the economic side. It hurts also, since it is interpreted as the evidence of a low state of civilization. The few who are lawless have the power to cast discredit upon the whole Southern people. The way to escape is through the creation and establishment of sound public opinion."

THE SACRIFICE OF SERBIA

A bulletin lately issued by the American Relief Administration said: "Serbia is undoubtedly the country most ravaged by the war. Besides its losses in food supplies and raw material and the demolition of factories and all transportation systems, Serbia has lost more of her civil population than any other country engaged in the world struggle." And Milos Savic, a member of the Central Committee for Serbian Reconstruction, is quoted in the "Economic World" to the effect that the losses of Serbia, a small and poor country, are estimated to have amounted to two and a half billion dollars exclusive of war expenses, loans from allies, etc., and that to replace these losses would now cost double the money.

Serbia "stood as a barrier in Germany's way from Berlin to Bagdad." Few of us are able to realize that if she had not so stood in all human probability the peace at Versailles would be a German peace. A free road to the East meant for the Teuton world domination—if not to-day, then to-morrow.

But Serbia barred the way till the danger was passed, and Serbia pays the penalty. In revenge her enemies attempted, not only to destroy her politically and economically as a state, but to exterminate her people, to destroy them root and branch that they might never again rise up to thwart Teutonic Kultur. Museums, libraries, universities, schools, and churches were looted and destroyed; live stock killed and carried away; timber, vineyards and orchards cut down and ruined; agricultural and industrial machinery removed to the enemies' country or wantonly wrecked; old men and women and young children tortured and killed with or without pretext. Teachers, both religious and secular, were especially marked out for destruction; and as to the fate of the younger women, mothers, wives, and daughters, read the reports of the neutral Swiss Dr. Reiss, of the University of Lausanne, and of the American Committee of Public Information.

WHY SERBIA NEEDS HELP

The beginnings of modern Serbia date from the year 1804. Though not

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

Darling in the New York Tribune

YOU'D HARDLY RECOGNIZE IT AS THE SAME ANIMAL; NOW, WOULD YOU—

WHEN THE SENATE GETS IN THE RING WITH THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS,

Copyright, 1919, New York Tribune, Inc.

AND WHEN THE PRESIDENT CONDUCTS THE PERFORMANCE

WHICH?

Bronstrup in the San Francisco Chronicle

ADDING TO HIS COLLECTION

Nelson Harding in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle

THREE LITTLE ELEPHANTS

TWO CARTOONISTS MAKE USE IN CONTRARY WAYS OF THE WELL-KNOWN EMBLEM "HEAR NO EVIL; SEE NO EVIL; SPEAK NO EVIL"

Reid in the Omaha Daily Bee

"OURS NOT TO REASON WHY"

From Le Pétrole-Mêle (Paris)

OUR DEAR TOURISTS

He: "That castle was built by Charlemagne."
She: "Fine! But why the deuce did he build it so far from the railway station?"

Low in London Opinion

Small Son (excitedly): "Dad! Albert 'as just been an' fallen off the end of the pier!"
Overwrought Father: "Halbert! Mother, did we 'ave a Albert?"

Watts in the Sphere (London)

THE PUBLIC STATUES OF LONDON MIGHT BE EMPLOYED FOR THE PURPOSE OF CONTROLLING TRAFFIC AT DENSELY CONGESTED SPOTS

possessing great wealth in money, the people of the Peasant Kingdom have been rich in contentment, for they occupied a country of small farms where each family owned its own land, often the same fruitful fields for which its men in the past had fought and bled for a thousand years. Ninety per cent of the people are agricultural. The land that fed the peasant was his; not even the Government itself could take it from him for debt.

We have the testimony of an English traveler that even in 1897, when the ox still trod out the grain and the chaff was winnowed from the wheat as in the days of Ruth and Boaz, so great is the fertility of the soil that the Serbian farmer, after supplying his own needs and making his yearly contribution to the communal granaries—his sure defense against want in bad years—could still, if he chose, lay up half the value of his yearly crops. The same traveler, Mr. Herbert Vivian, placed the average yield of hay from unown meadows as high as six tons to the acre.

Placing the value of one year's harvest in Serbia at about four hundred million dollars, Mr. Savic declares that the enemy seized three harvests. The invaders destroyed 130,000 horses, 6,000,000 sheep and goats, 2,000,000 pigs, 1,300,000 cattle, and more than 8,000,000 poultry—this in a purely farming country, where all agricultural machines, every implement down to the most trivial, had also been carried away or destroyed! But for the food of America, this meant quick starvation for ninety per cent of the Serbian people. It still means a prolonged and stern struggle for the merest necessities against fearful odds. And it means that Serbia is confronted by another vast problem, altogether new to her, upon the solution of which depends the future of the entire race—the care and protection of a multitude of helpless and destitute children. The Serbian Minister of Child Welfare places the number in Yugoslavia at “above half a million—eighty-five per cent of the cases in dire need of medical treatment.” It is physically impossible for ruined, disorganized Serbia herself to give that care and protection.

The picture drawn by the late Hamilton W. Mabie is essentially as true to-day as it was in 1915. He wrote in The Outlook, November 3, 1915: “These children are not orphans in the ordinary sense. They have not only lost their fathers and mothers, but they have lost all personal relations with the world. Many of them are in parts of the country which is strange to them; they do not know who their relations are, some of them do not know their own names. . . . Perhaps never in the world has there been such a pitiful condition as that of these thousands of friendless, homeless, shirtless children.” He added, “The problem is not only physical, it is also moral. Those of the children who survive are in danger of becoming beggars and criminals.”

Since those words were written, to the natural horrors borne by these children have been added the fear and merciless cruelty of man during three years of Teutonic and Bulgarian frightfulness.

SHOULD THE PEACE TREATY BE RATIFIED?

ON another page we print some letters on this question from readers of The Outlook. They are perhaps typical of the various shades of opinion in the country regarding the League of Nations. We do not undertake to answer each query or comment in these letters, but use their publication as an occasion to restate briefly our own position.

Riders: Legislation by “riders” is unequivocally bad and should never be tolerated even when the object which the “rider” is designed to obtain is good. A “rider” is a clause which is tacked on to an important bill, although its subject is foreign to the general purpose of the bill, and is not an integral part of it. Legislators who employ “riders” hope that they will be carried through by the reluctance of their colleagues to delay the passage, often vital to the country, of the bill itself.

Thus the immediate passage of the Agricultural Bill was necessary for the maintenance of the vital work of the Government. The repeal or continuance of daylight saving had nothing to do with agricultural appropriations. The repeal should have been considered, even if desirable, by itself. The League of Nations, even if undesirable, is not only germane to the Treaty, but is a part of the Treaty. A legislator having the ultimate interests of the country at heart should always vote against “riders;” he may or may not vote against a bill because he objects to one of its sections or clauses. Those who oppose the League of Nations, if logical, should oppose it, not on the ground that it is a “rider”—for it is not—but on the ground that it is an objectionable section of a bill which should be defeated if the obnoxious section or clauses are not removed by amendment.

Should there be amendments? Our judgment is that there should not.

For at least a quarter of a century enlightened statesmen have been trying to establish machinery for settling, as far as possible, international disputes by judicial procedure. The world war, suddenly and dramatically, convinced the world of the necessity of some international tribunal. The five great nations most instrumental in winning the war have, after laborious conference, devised such a plan. They amended the plan and attempted to safeguard the special interests of the United States on receiving suggestions from American statesmen not actively participating in the Peace Conference. The plan provides a method for future amendments if they should be found desirable, as they doubtless will be, after the plan is put into operation. It also provides a simple method of withdrawal for any nation that does not like the plan after it has tried it. In ordinary personal or business contracts and agreements such provisions would be considered liberal and extremely safe for the contracting parties. Nations are simply individuals acting on a grand scale. A principle which is safe in individual relationships is safe in national relationships. If the present opportunity of trying international judicial procedure, supported by thirty-two nations of the world, is rejected, who knows when mankind will have another such chance? If the United States Senate amends the Treaty, it will in fact reject it. The Treaty will have to go back to a reconvened Peace Conference at Paris for concurrence. Can the Conference be reconvened? Will it occur if reconvened? Do we want to run the risk? The Outlook thinks not.

Reservations: Will “reservations” destroy the Treaty? No, if they are put in supplementary form and in general terms. If, for example, the Senate should say of Articles VIII and X that it accepts them with the clear understanding that the final authority regarding reduction of armaments or participation in war by the United States rests in Congress, no harm could be done. But the necessity for such reservations is not apparent to us. For in these matters the explicit language of the Covenant is that the action of the Executive Council of the League shall be simply recommendatory and advisory. The danger of reservations is that they may be framed as to make practical interpretation of the Covenant difficult.

For these reasons, while we do not object to simple reservations, we should advise, if asked, against them. They seem to us in danger of increasing rather than diminishing the difficulties of the situation. The common-sense course is to start the machine, see how it works, and modify it after observing its operation.

The Duty of the Republican Party: We repeat what we have already said about the tactical blunder of the Republican leaders. If we were those leaders, we should, from a purely party point of view, ratify the Treaty as soon as possible. Our political aim would be to get the Treaty out of the way and leave nothing for the President to debate, no opportunity for him in his projected campaign this summer to put the Republican party in the position of obstructionists.

Whoever wishes to be a leader of the American people must look toward the future. He cannot lead by merely criticizing the actions of the past. If Lincoln had simply attacked the preposterous doctrine of Buchanan that a State had no right to secede, but that if it attempted to secede the Nation had no right to coerce it, he never would have been elected President. He led a campaign, not of obstructive criticism, but of constructive statesmanship. In 1916 the Republican party managers devoted themselves almost wholly to criticism of their opponents and made almost no constructive pronouncements as to the European war. Mr. Hughes was beaten. Are the party managers going to repeat that mistake?

Constructive Problems: The problem before our country and before the whole world is: How can we make our industrial institutions correspond in their spirit to our political and educational institutions?

How can we so reorganize our transportation system that it shall provide justly for the interests of the railway owners, the railway workers, and the railway users, including both shippers and travelers?

How can we secure a management of our telegraph and telephone systems so as to make intercommunication in this country prompt, efficient, and economical, so that the whole system shall be open on something like equal terms to all the people, as is our postal system?

What can we do to secure for all the people of the United States the benefit on just and equal terms of those raw materials which are essential to human welfare and, indeed, to human life—fuel, light, and food?

What can we do to set in motion those social forces which shall make for a more equitable division of property and better opportunity for the physical, mental, and moral development of all the people, and put an end to the slums which are pestilential plague-holes in many of our factory and mining towns, and in our great cities?

Farming appears to be almost necessarily individualistic; manufacturing, almost necessarily highly organized. What can we do to protect the welfare of the farming community from the too great power of the organized industries on which the farmers necessarily depend?

The present condition of organized industry is too often that of chronic and suppressed hostility between the laborers and the capitalists; they should be partners, united by a common interest and working for a common welfare. What can we do, not merely to prevent the ruinous strikes which imperil the peace of the whole community, but to cure this false attitude of suppressed hostility?

In one sentence, What is the next step for us to take in perfecting that American brotherhood which will unite men of various races, classes, traditions, prejudices, and religious faiths in one truly free and truly co-operative commonwealth?

The man who can point out the direction in which the Nation should move for the solution of these problems will be our leader; the journal which can throw real light upon these problems will not lack for interested and appreciative readers; and the party which can propose a solution or partial solution which seems to the American people just and practicable will secure their votes.

But whoever desires to lead or to act for the American people and in their interest must not waste his time or theirs over the problems that are past, must not halt or hesitate to take up new problems, and must not fear to arouse the bitterest opposition by the Anarchists on the one hand and by the autocrats on the other.

THE EDUCATION OF HENRY FORD

AMONG the famous definitions will undoubtedly hereafter be included some made by Henry Ford. According to him, as a witness in court, "aggression" means to burglarize, "apostle" means "helper," "treason" means "anything against the Government," "preparedness" is the same as "militarism," a "mobile army" is a "large army mobilized," and "an idealist, I think, is a person that can help make people prosperous."

In explaining some of these definitions Mr. Ford succeeded in making them somewhat more obscure. For example, in admitting that he was an "ignorant idealist"—using the word in the sense of one who makes people prosperous—he added, "I believe I can do it a little." In explaining further his idea of treason as anything against the Government, he was asked, "By whom?" and answered, "By an Anarchist, I guess." When he was asked, "What did you mean when you said that treason was something that was against the Government by Anarchists?" Mr. Ford answered, "It was against militarism, or it was militarism."

The words which he thus defined are all words which Mr. Ford—or rather his publicity agent whom he hired to write for him and for whose writing he repeatedly acknowledged himself responsible—used in a campaign of newspaper advertising to educate the people. He used words without knowing their meaning. It was as if he were to spend money without knowing its value. When Mr. Ford uses the word "idealist," it is as if he were giving a check for a million dollars under the impression that it might be worth perhaps a hundred dollars or two.

Mr. Ford's testimony was given in a suit which he is bringing against the Chicago "Tribune" for libel, because the "Tribune" spoke of him as an Anarchist. It was natural, therefore, that the "Tribune's" counsel should cross-examine him about his ideas of anarchy. This is a part of the cross-examination:

"Now, going back to the question that we were referring to: You don't seem to be very clear what a condition of anarchy would be, do you, Mr. Ford?"

"War, I guess, is a condition of anarchy, as much as anything."

"Anybody who was in favor of war would be an Anarchist?"

"Not in favor of war."

"Isn't any one who is in favor of anarchy an Anarchist?"

"I was in favor of war when we got into it."

"Do you question that a man who is in favor of anarchy is an Anarchist?"

"He might not be."

"Can you suggest any idea that anybody who is in favor of anarchy is not an Anarchist? Isn't that the real test?"

"I don't know. I cannot suggest anything."

"You cannot tell whether a man who was in favor of anarchy is or is not an Anarchist?"

"He may be in favor of some phrase [sic] of it."

"What phrase?"

"He might be in favor of some of it."

"You would not recognize that a man who was in favor of a continuation of anarchy would be an Anarchist, do you?"

"I don't know, I am sure."

Naturally, as Mr. Ford regards an Anarchist as necessarily a man who throws bombs, he resents being called an Anarchist.

Mr. Ford does not seem to think that ignorance is a limitation. On the contrary, he takes the position that if he wants any facts he can hire some one to get them for him. As a consequence, he is quite ready to acknowledge his ignorance of history and dismiss it as a matter of no consequence. "Do you know," he was asked, "when the United States was created?" "I could find it in a few minutes," replied Mr. Ford. And when he was asked again, "Do you know?" he answered, "I don't know as I do, right offhand." He admitted that he had heard of the name of Benedict Arnold, but when he was asked who he was Mr. Ford replied, "I have forgotten just who he is. He is a writer, I think."

But Mr. Ford has been educated. He acknowledges it. Once he called those who advocated preparedness "murderers;" and he still thinks, in a way, that professional soldiers are murderers; but he admits now that under certain circumstances it is well for a country to be prepared, and he seems unwilling to put General Pershing or General Grant into the category of murderers. Once he thought it possible and reasonable to stop the war by a peace expedition; so he fitted one out at great expense and went himself to Europe to get the boys out of the trenches; but now he has learned that the war in which America joined was not to be stopped that way.

Yes; Henry Ford has been educated. But at what expense? It has been said that the best way for a person to learn a foreign language is to set himself up as a teacher of it. It may be best for the alleged teacher, but how about the pupils? Mr. Ford has been learning about government, citizenship, military defense, and the principles of liberty and justice for which men from time immemorial have been willing to fight. He has learned of these things by undertaking to be a teacher of them. As a result of his education he has given his country patriotic service, but his education has been costly. The cost of his education is not to be reckoned merely in the dollars that he has expended upon the process, though they run into the millions; its greatest cost has been to the people whom he has undertaken to educate.

Mr. Ford is an advocate of efficiency. Is his method of education an efficient method? Is it necessary to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars and to impart to others the confusion of mind which the pupil suffers from in order that the pupil may acquire a little knowledge of history and government and the principles of law and liberty?

There is a simpler method. It is one which has been adopted by the American people and costs much less than that employed by Mr. Ford. It is the method used in our schools and colleges. It is followed by our public school system. It is a method used by men who have had less schooling than Henry Ford; it was the method which Abraham Lincoln adopted. It is the method of studying what men have done in the past, the results of their experience, the records of the best that they have thought, and the means that they have used to express themselves. That method is by no means perfect, but it provides the pupils who really give it a full trial some better education than Mr. Ford has received, and the tuition fee is something less than a million dollars per pupil.

THE CLASSICS AND RECONSTRUCTION

LAST week reference was made editorially in The Outlook to recent utterances on the abiding value of the classics by Dr. John H. Finley and by a writer in the "Atlantic Monthly." Now comes a novel contribution to the discussion in a pamphlet on "The Classics in British Education." It is written by the Director of the British Museum, Sir Frederic Kenyon, and is notably moderate in its views and generous in its recognition of the claims of other than classical subjects.

But what makes the pamphlet of special interest is the fact that it is one of a series put out by the British Ministry of Reconstruction. It is just as much a part of the governmental plans toward the after-the-war building up of the nation as are other pamphlets in the same series on Housing, Commercial Forestry, and Raw Materials. In other words, in this great English effort for reconstruction the need of the kind of culture and training that is acquired through a classical education properly combined with scientific and practical courses is assumed and arguments adduced to that effect. From comparative statistics of students' success the conclusion is drawn that "for the all-round training of the citizen the claim of the classics to hold the premier place has not yet been shaken," and there is abundant testimony "to the value of a broad, humanistic training as a basis for work in quite other fields than the classics or literature." A broad, general scheme is presented; science and literature, the usual English branches and foreign languages, the technical and the cultural, should be combined, it is urged, in the earlier stages and a choice of thorough and sensible specialization provided for at the right stage of advance. Thus may best be obtained, it is held, the prime object, "the training of human beings in mind and character as citizens of a free country."

Another point of interest is that this official British document urges that "intellectual aristocracy" should not be confined to the well-to-do; that the working classes need an infusion of cultural and literary teaching; and it is claimed that there are signs that leaders in education for workmen recognize this and would welcome, as one of them says, "a redistribution of the opportunities for classical studies." And when the founder of the Workmen's Educational Association remarks that he hopes to see the day when an intellectual workman may enjoy his Homer in the original the author of the pamphlet refuses to consider that a fantastic ideal.

It is then, apparently, not because of a survival of tradition, but as a part of a new movement for reconstituting civilization and setting high standards that we find just now coming from three different quarters pleas for fair play for the classics.

ON CULTIVATING OUR PARENTS

THE admonishment of the Fifth Commandment is singularly tactful. It cannily refrains from enjoining obedience. The stark fact of abstract obedience to any one is repellent to every independent mind, whether that mind is five years old or fifty, while honoring has a securer foundation in human impulse. Honor is an attitude conspicuously exempt from responsibility to reform its object, whether that object is one's father or one's son. In our earliest acquaintance with them we had no difficulty in honoring our father and mother, for the simple reason that their personality then appeared to us so mysterious and so potent that we could do nothing else than respect it. The exhortation of the Fifth Commandment was therefore addressing itself, not to our infancy, but to our later age, when, having come to years of indiscretion, we should feel called upon to re-educate our parents, to bring the dear old fogies abreast of the times and make them over to suit our taste as once they felt it incumbent to make us over to suit theirs. Every one who has ever been sixteen and recovered from it knows that the Fifth Commandment perceived what was needed.

Even when one has safely emerged from the terrible teens one may still ponder with profit the only genial exhortation of the Decalogue. Perhaps even stern Moses desired folk to feel friendly toward their forebears. The word honor implies respect for the essential freedom that is the foundation of all friendship and conspicuously of that intimacy between parents and children which, however we may gloss the fact, is actually rarely existent. Against this spontaneity of comradeship two tendencies are potent. A dutiful child is prone to feel responsibility for his father and mother, and to have an impulse at anxious moments to put a skittish parent under some form of moral restraint. Indeed, even physical restraint is all too common, of course kindly not crudely administered, but none the less effective for being expressed in constant "don't, dears," rather than in bolts and bars. If we really honor our parents, we shall leave them free, even at a cost.

Another and more selfish impulse sometimes prevents our enjoying our fathers and mothers as much as we might:

most of us cherish an inner resentment that our parents do not understand us better, forgetting the strain they are under—due to having known us all our lives—of having to merge into one astounding composite all the myriad selves we have been since first they met us. It may easily be that at five or at fifteen our personality was so offensive that no parent could be expected to perceive that we ever afterward outgrew our evil condition. Even when our parents' recollections of us have been agreeable, it is but natural that they should revert to the lifetime habit of regarding us as infantile. Perhaps also they are loth to relinquish their attitude of protection and of precept. We grow tragically self-sufficient with maturity. Sometimes the only way for a parent to pierce our engrossment is by pin stabs of fussiness. Sometimes the only way to reach us is to irritate us, but this is only when we ourselves have locked the doors of intimacy so tight that love has no language of admittance except nagging.

The fact is, parents are often worth a child's cultivating even when that child is grown up. Parents, however, are extremely elusive in friendship. A child must be patient, not precipitate. Parents often have rare confidences to make, but in order to receive these sons and daughters have to be themselves of rare imaginativeness. Margaret Ogilvie had a son to whom she appeared eternally a girl, but not many sons have Barrie's imagination, and so not many sons have such maternal companionship to remember as he commemorates in his life of his mother. It is more incumbent on the young to understand the old than on the old to understand the young, for the old are heavy with experience, and experience tends to stultify the imagination by its pain and poignancy. If you really want to get at a parent, you should endeavor to make him comfortable in your presence, so that wisdom, hesitant and shy if you are young and arrogant, will come forth from him confidently. Sometimes a parent's thoughts are very different from what we had supposed, but the best way of eliciting them is by submitting to the old habit that controls their utterance, the old habit of thinking us little children.

A recent story is built on the poignant thesis that the best thing one can do for a parent is never to let him know he has grown old, even though his over-confidence lead to peril of life and limb. The author puts into a daughter's mouth words that few of us would have the courage to embody in our treatment of our parents. Anxious coddling is an insult, she maintains: "If all we can do for them is just to keep their poor old rusting machinery oiled and working—at whatever cost to pride and manhood and usefulness—if that's the price they have to pay for just keeping alive, is it worth the cost? What do a few years more or less matter so long as one is living to the very end?"

The essence of comradeship is letting others have their adventure at whatever cost to us or to them; for parents this means letting people have their adventure from the beginning; for children, letting people have it to the end. All of us have had to be children, many of us have had to be parents. The best way of getting even with the grim necessity is, if a parent, to stop being one as early as possible, and if a child, to remain one as long as possible.

SHOULD THE PEACE TREATY BE RATIFIED?

A GROUP OF LETTERS PRO AND CON

I

I HAVE read the editorial in the June 25 Outlook on "The Daylight Saving Rider" with interest and absolute approval.

But what puzzles me now is how you can advocate the acceptance of the rider (League of Nations) on the Peace Treaty. Surely a rider is a rider whether it is attached to the Agricultural Bill or to the Peace Treaty; both are employed for the same purpose—to slip something over on the people that will not bear the "acid test."

To my mind, the use of the rider device is just as reprehensible for a Peace Commissioner as it is for a Senator. Especially objectionable is the rider conceived by a Peace Commissioner who was repudiated at the last election; who went abroad at a critical time on his own authority against the wishes of the majority of the people; who delayed peace, and was only able to carry out his threat to weave his rider into the Peace Treaty by giving up vital rights and privileges of the American people.

It seems to me that if this rider passes the American people will have indeed lost "to a measurable degree the principle of self-government and to [have] substitute[d] oligarchy."

(MRS.) JAMES D. DAVIS.

Tionesta, Pennsylvania, July 7, 1919.

II

I find myself unable to resist the temptation to criticise The Outlook for its lack of consistency regarding legislation by rider. If there is any one thing that you have persistently condemned it is this, and I had always supposed that your criticisms were a matter of principle; but I have been brought to a questioning attitude on this point by your recent course. If the repeal of the Daylight Saving Law by making it a rider on another bill is a thing to be condemned on principle, on the theory that a matter of this importance ought to stand or fall on its merits, how can you reconcile yourselves to the support of the League of Nations as a rider on the Peace Treaty? Why shouldn't it, too, stand or fall on its merits? The very obvious answer is that if it were to be submitted to the Senate for ratification, in accordance with the plain intent of the Constitution, it would fail, and so the President in the carrying out of his threat has so intertwined it with the Peace Treaty as virtually to force the Senate to approve something that it disapproves or to disapprove something that it approves.

Your editorial "The League of Nations in the Senate," in The Outlook of June 25, is a virtual acknowledgment of this fact, and yet I have not seen a word of censure from you on this very evident attempt to deprive the Senate of its Constitutional right—a duty as well as a right—to pass on this momentous thing on its merits. What a chance you are missing for a ringing editorial asserting your adherence to the anti-rider principle, even though it might result in the defeat of something that you favor, for I can hardly bring myself to believe that you want the League of Nations established by this most transparent chicanery—or do you?

<sup>1</sup> An editorial called out by these letters will be found on another page.—THE EDITORS.

I wouldn't want my own position misunderstood. I believe that there is more than a mere bit of humor in dubbing the thing "the League of Hallucinations." I believe it to be a very accurate naming of it. I want to see it defeated in the Senate, but I am perfectly ready to "take my medicine" if the Senate can be brought to ratify on a fair and square test, but this test can't be had as the case now stands.

Just now I am especially interested to know if your opposition to legislation by rider applies only to the things that you are opposed to. There may be a touch of railery in this letter, but I seriously think that you are in a very indefensible position. May I add that I think the repeal of the Daylight Saving Law was a serious mistake, however it may have been accomplished, and that I am as much opposed to rider legislation all the time as you are part of the time?

C. F. HILDRETH.

Freeport, Illinois, July 8, 1919.

III

I have been a reader and a friend of The Outlook for a long time, because it has stood for genuine, practical Americanism of a high order. It was therefore a source of keen disappointment when you embraced internationalism. I have hoped that you would get back to the practical idealism of Theodore Roosevelt, but instead you have floundered from bad to worse, until you now have the temerity to say that because the American people are an adventurous people we should risk our birthright in a gamble with internationalism.

Such a statement is unworthy of you. If we who believe in an unimpaired, uncompromised nationalism, who hold that our country should deal justly and honestly with all nations but take orders from none, are in the minority, it will be a pity, but nevertheless I must stand for the United States of America first, last, and always. I must not lend any support to any agency of the propaganda of internationalism.

I ask you to please cancel my subscription.

I will add just this: If the United States should be rushed into ratifying the present League of Nations Covenant by reason of the tricky tactics employed, it will not be by reason of the fact that the people of this country have deliberately renounced the Americanism of the past in favor of the new programme of World Socialism.

HARRY H. CALVIN.

League for Preservation of American Independence, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, July 2, 1919.

IV

In your issue of July 9, in the article entitled "Ratify the Treaty," you enumerate in the "simplest terms" what the Treaty will do—as you see it. In that enumeration appears no word of what happens to China. You rejoice in security against foreign despotism for Czechoslovakia and Poland and in the uniting of the civilized nations to protect each other and the people under their guardianship from future aggressions, but you say not one word of the part of the arrangement which violates all the important principles upon which the League of Nations is supposed to be founded (justice, honor, self-determination, and the rest), viz., the handing over of Shantung to Japan. To buy adherence to the League by one of the most infamous acts in history is a sad omen for the ability of the League to carry out its professed principles in the future. A lasting peace cannot be obtained through injustice. You must be aware of the facts in regard to China and the policy pursued toward her by Japan. If you are not, you can easily ascertain them. Such a book as "China and the World War," by W. R. Wheeler (Macmillan), will enlighten you. If you do already know the facts, it is inconceivable that a journal privileged to give out so many of Theodore Roosevelt's utterances can be untrue to his principles and gloss over the truth.

Those of us who hope for a real, effective League of Nations, but who believe that the end does not justify the means, are heartsick to see such a journal as yours lending itself, tacitly or outspokenly, to the support of an act in direct opposition to all we hope the League will do—an act without any foundation of honor or justice.

SIDNEY L. LASELL.

Siasconset, Nantucket, Massachusetts,
July 13, 1919.

V

I have taken The Outlook for a number of years. I am an out-and-out Republican, but I think and trust that I am one in the broader sense. I have heretofore looked to The Outlook as being, if not a Republican, a patriot first and a partisan afterwards. An American patriot, in my conception, is one who has the privilege and the duty of thinking.

But The Outlook, apparently, no longer expects its readers to think. So it would appear to be a rather dangerous journal for those to read who won't think. I refer to your article of July 16 on "The Tactical Blunder of the Republicans."

In the suggestion contained in the second paragraph of this article you say, "We are tired of fighting and appeals to force." This looks very pretty on paper, but does The Outlook really believe it? If we really are, won't we be just as tired, forsooth, after an opportunity to contemplate as we are now? And if we really are and want a change, won't we see that we get it after contemplation? Some of us doubt, when we look back over history, that the world is tired of fighting and appeals to force. Some of us think that, though it says it is, it really likes them—which is perhaps why we fear that the League of Nations is but a scrap of paper. Writing down and subscribing to our pretense won't purge us of the sin.

You call the League an "experiment," and yet you ask your readers to be sure they get this experiment, with something rather vital to Americans, even though they may later be sorry.

Again, what has The Outlook come to that it would deny, as it does in the suggestion of the sixth paragraph of this article, the right of every American citizen to think and act through his Constitutional representatives in crises such as the present? The Constitution, as you say, perhaps has its defects; but it is at least true that the people by their own choice—that is, by all their representatives—put them there.

The Outlook is becoming quite Willoughbyesque in speciousness. Shall we, the Republicans, take this step, this "experiment," just to be sure that the Democrats shall not have the chance to compound the wrong which, through not taking thought, we may find, too late, it contains?

At least The Outlook might have had the delicacy, I think, not to parallel this article with the one bearing the titular illustration of a tablet "In Memory of Theodore Roosevelt—The American."

I should say that The Outlook needs to clean house.

JOHN W. STEWARD.

Paterson, New Jersey, July 18, 1919.

VI

I want to congratulate you on the editorial "The Tactical Blunder of the Republicans," on page 425 of The Outlook for July 16. I am satisfied that the majority of the people of this country feel, first, that it is absolutely not a partisan question, and, second, that the League of Nations should be adopted as it stands, to be later corrected and amended as may be found necessary.

In one of his recent speeches Lloyd George made the statement that "had there been a League of Nations in 1914 the great war never would have occurred," and he was right about it. I believe also that the majority of the people are in favor of the tripartite treaty of Great Britain, France, and the United States for the protection and defense of France in the event of an unprovoked attack on her by Germany.

L. B. YAPLE.

Chillicothe, Ohio, July 17, 1919.

VII

Your editorial "Ratify the Treaty," in your July 9 number, is one of the best, if not the best, on the subject.

You say, however, that it would have been wise if the President had followed McKinley's wise course in consulting with the Senators.

I would refer you to page 374 of "The Education of Henry Adams." John Hay writes: "I shall see all my treaties slaughtered one by one, by the thirty-four per cent of strikers and kickers."

On page 394, speaking of a treaty which ought to be ratified in twenty-four hours: "The Senate wasted six weeks on this one and ratified it with one vote to spare," etc. He says further: "They [the Senate] will reject any treaty on any subject with England. I doubt if they would accept any treaty of consequence with Russia or Germany," and winds up this paragraph: "Is it worth while for me to keep up this useless labor?"

While Willoughby recognizes the fact that the Senate can be called in while negotiations are in practice, he also recognizes the fact that it is not done as a rule. When the President did consult, it was in the matter of local treaties, if I may so call them—those with the Indians, etc. But not with a complicated treaty such as the one now being acted upon.

Imagine what would have happened if he had associated with him some of the strikers and kickers referred to by Hay in the pages I refer you to.

I do not recall just now where, but either Moore or Willoughby refers to the fact that Presidents are loth to associate with them in the negotiation of treaties Senators of the opposite political faith, because of the inconvenience of the same.

If McKinley and Roosevelt were best by a Senate of their own party, what can be expected from a Senate opposed to politics and "striking" for political advantage?

CHARLES S. BRAND.

New York City, July 17, 1919.

JAPAN'S GAINS FROM THE WAR

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE BY SYDNEY GREENBIE

IT took Japan several days to reconcile herself to the armistice. Previously, every rumor of peace brought about a slump in the stock market. Yet so certain was industry that the war would go on indefinitely that no abatement in its activities could be felt. So when November 11 came it took a little sarcasm from the foreign press to stir Japan to a show of some satisfaction. For a couple of days only foreign houses displayed flags in jubilation. Then Japan recalled that she too was an Ally and the various Chambers of Commerce threw all "bearing" aside and brought out their flags, saki, and geishas, in riotous joviality. Officialism donated unto itself a banquet upon the public recreation grounds to which only officials and a few representative foreigners were invited. And after they ate all there was to eat and drank all there was to drink and played with all the geishas there were to play with (wives are never invited) they left the grounds for the common people to swarm about the remnants. Thus the East thought it had manifested its pleasure that the world had been made safe for democracy.

Why this hesitation? Because Japan was not really in the war. No country in the world has gained more and suffered less than Japan. She gained materially and she gained socially. At this time, when the nations are balancing their accounts, it is well for us to give a little summary of Japan's profit and loss from the war.

I will not dwell on the acquisition of the Marshall Islands, which lie so conveniently between the Hawaiian group and the Philippines, and not inconveniently distant from the Southern Hemisphere. I will leave Shantung to speak for itself, if its voice has not already been silenced, as was that of Korea. I will limit myself to the question of legitimate gains (if war profits can be regarded as such) to which Japan is as much entitled as any other individual or group which supplies the materials of warfare and to such social gains as can be directly traced to the war.

First, then, come the material gains. Of these Kobe is perhaps the best example. No port in the Far East has come up so stridently as did Kobe during the war. Were it not for the silk trade, Yokohama would have completely fallen out of the race behind Kobe. Now this is significant. Yokohama lies near the capital (Tokyo), and will always be a distributing center for the Empire. Commercially and geographically, however, Japan has become the center of the business of the Pacific. During the war Japan's exports increased so tremendously that a port more on the direct highway of the world's trade was necessary. As such none was more suitable than Kobe, and it rose to the situation. Where up to the outbreak of the war Kobe's foreign settlement (where all the export and import trade is handled) was largely under the control of foreigners, to-day the Japanese have well-nigh ousted them. All the desirable business sites have been bought over by Japanese narikin<sup>1</sup> establishments at enormous prices, in many cases the Government giving every possible financial support to natives. One foreigner disposed of a piece of property which cost him about $12,000 for $225,000. And to-day splendid modern structures crowd the former settlement—the pride of the Japanese.

Industrially, Japan has simply been seething with activity. No contract was ever turned aside; it was easy enough to fail to supply the material afterwards. Scandals in commercial circles were rife. Whereas other countries had to submit quietly to innumerable embargoes that England and America found necessary to impose on the export of their materials, Japan always found some way of having them loosened for her sake. When negotiations were under way for the construction of merchantmen, Japan so prepared her plans that, under whatever circumstances, she would come out with from 175,000 to 450,000 tons of shipping ahead of her pre-war situation, while supplying the Allies with her old discarded types of vessels. She is now the mistress of the Pacific.

Of all this activity, Kobe was the center. From my house, at the other end of the city, I could hear the sound of the pneumatic hammers far after midnight. Four years ago Kobe was a promise; to-day its dockyards, its steel mills, its steamers, give it the appearance of a city of tremendous size. Its population has reached nearly 600,000, and it is the fifth largest city in Japan. Houses are as scarce as they are in New York. Smokestacks darken the sky with streams of smoke. And all because a war broke out in Europe, twelve thousand miles away.

So great was the increase in trade and business in all Japan that for two years the railways and telegraphs and post office have been rendered virtually helpless. Telegrams could be delivered much more quickly if sent by train and letters with more certainty if sent by special messenger. The extent of inefficiency in these various branches of service would form the basis for an article in itself. Yet with all the prosperity salaries in Government departments still ranged from $6 to $50 a month. Only two per cent of the people earn more than $1,000 a year. In place of increase in salaries the Government offered marks of distinction and honor, expecting that good subjects would rejoice over small favors.

Yet the war intensified social conditions markedly. It made narikin of coolies who in another generation will be seeking vacancies in the House of Peers. It has drawn the outcasts from their isolation into industrialism and forced them upon the social consciousness in unprecedented ways. It has increased the cost, though it has not yet raised the standard, of living. On an average, Japan still has more poverty and suffering and absence of individual development than most other civilized countries. But the conditions under war have made the average Japanese less contented with mere rice and daikon (a vegetable shaped like a radish, pickled, and with a strong, unpleasant odor). He has seen how his neighbor in a couple of years became a rich man. Though the masses are much poorer than they ever were, a very few have obtained great wealth. While the war brought the peoples of Europe and America down to a basis of necessity, curtailing all luxuries, for many in Japan it meant the reverse—the shunning of simple living. Of that they had had more than their share.

<sup>1</sup>The word narikin can be translated by our parvenu. It comes from the Japanese chess and is used when one of the pawns is jumped across the board. It is much more than a man who has just become rich—one who has made a bound for riches.

Another source of gain to Japan has been in knowledge of military science. She has been able to look on and learn at a loss of only some two thousand men. That is a gain which may sooner or later have to be put in the debit column.

Some of the monetary gains are no less doubtful. It is felt in Japan that those who secured these material advantages are doing little to retain them. They have not placed either themselves or their country on a firm trade basis, having sought immediate progress more than a good reputation for business ethics. And that is a definite loss to Japan which some of its people are viewing with alarm.

Let us now turn to the social gains. What emotional, political, moral, and intellectual advantage has Japan which she did not have before the war? Emotionally there has been but a slight awakening. Sympathy with the wronged, with the suffering, has touched her but little. Politically there has been considerable discussion of democracy, but mighty little of its real significance has penetrated the crust of imperialism. You hear among the students in the higher schools (of which I was an instructor) considerable talk about democracy, and they have even gone to the point of holding demonstrations for the extension of the franchise. But the true meaning of democracy is not understood. Even the leaders in that vanguard naïvely advance a vague statement said to have been made by the first Emperor, Jimmu Tenno (who is largely wrapped in myth), about how much his rule depended upon the people, as proof that from time immemorial the basic principles of their government have been democratic.

Intellectually and morally Japan has learned that education and honest business are national assets. As the result of the increase in foreign trade, she has found it necessary greatly to increase her educational facilities. Commercial schools are being raised to the status of universities and the whole educational administration is undergoing considerable changes. But, unfortunately, morally Japan has not applied, so far, the principles she has taught her young men. The breaking of contracts, the passing off of material inferior to that agreed upon, would form a chapter in a study of Japan by no means to her credit.

One of the most satisfactory gains from an Occidental point of view has been that Japan has been forced to think outwardly on international affairs. She looked abroad, for instance, and saw the extent to which women helped win the war, and was somewhat alarmed. Japan realized that should her women be placed in the same position as were the women of the West it would not go well with the land. The condition of woman may, in consequence, some day be improved. There is a dim light of hope.

These social gains are, however, insignificant in comparison with the monetary gains.

There is one great weakness in modern Japan which leaves all her gains—social and material—on an unstable foundation. Unfortunately, consciousness of this danger is almost wholly lacking. Whatever gains may be accredited to Japan in any sense cannot compensate her for the isolation in which she is left as the only great autocracy still standing in the world.

WHY CHINA REFUSED TO SIGN

AN INTERVIEW ON THE SHANTUNG PROVISION OF THE TREATY WITH WU CHAO-CHU BY JESSE WILLIS JEFFERIS

WU CHAO-CHU, delegate to the Peace Conference from the Constitutional Government of China, and son of Wu Ting-fang, twice Ambassador to the United States, recently passed through New York on his way to Washington. When asked why China refused to sign the peace treaty, Wu Chao-chu responded as follows:

"While the other Great Powers were engaged in the war with Germany Japan took advantage of the situation to press her Twenty-one Demands, which aimed at the political and economic domination of China.

"The provisions relating to Shantung, which the Chinese Government signed with Japan under duress, were that China should agree to any arrangements which Japan might thereafter make regarding the disposition of German rights in the Shantung Province; that the Japanese Government would restore Kiaochau to China, providing Japan be granted an exclusive concession to be designated later, and also that Japan should have the option of building a new railway in Shantung.

"The 'exclusive concession' was no less than the port of Tsingtao, situated in the Bay of Kiaochau. This port was seized by the German Government in 1897, because of the killing of two German missionaries in China, and in March, 1898, the Manchu Government was forced to conclude a lease with Germany, giving her control of the port for a period of ninety-nine years. This treaty, forged by the mailed fist of the German Junkers, also provided for the passage of German troops in a zone around the Bay of Kiaochau and the granting of railway and mining rights in the province of Shantung.

"The port of Tsingtao is a strategic and commercial stronghold of vital importance to the safety and economic life of China. It has a fine harbor, excellent docks, and strong fortresses, upon which the German Government has spent millions. It is also a popular summer resort. According to present plans, Japan intends to put into the concession the important features of the port and return to China the bathing beach and a few hotels.

"Thus Japan has secured control of the gateway to Shantung Province, with an area of 36,000 square miles and a population of 38,000,000. It is an integral part of China and has been so for centuries. It is also the birthplace of Chinese civilization, for here Confucius was born.

"When in 1917 America broke off diplomatic relations with Germany, she invited all neutrals to do likewise, in order to show the world's unanimous disapproval of German militarism. When China received this invitation, she responded immediately, and was the first of the neutrals thus to take action. Later China declared war upon Germany and at the same time announced that all treaties made with her enemies were thereby abrogated. The Powers at war with Germany thereupon sent notes of congratulation to China, indorsing her attitude, which amounted to an express recognition of the fact that the treaty granting Germany rights in the Shantung Province was canceled, and that these rights automatically reverted to China.

"When the Peace Conference opened, it soon became evident that Japan had a hold upon the delegates, the nature of which did not appear upon the surface. Later it was discovered that this was nothing more nor less than the secret understandings entered into with Japan by the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia. They were arrived at after China had sent a note to Germany threatening to break off diplomatic relations unless she relinquished submarine warfare. It was promised Japan that her claims to the Shantung Province would be supported at the Peace Conference, provided that she would use her influence to compel China to declare war against Germany. But the bitter irony of the situation was that Japan had continually brought pressure to bear upon China to prevent her entering the war against Germany.

"Until the Fiume incident, when the Italian delegates withdrew from the Conference, America remained China's best friend; but the added danger that Japan might withdraw from the Conference if her demands were not granted threatened the establishment of the League of Nations. Certain French newspapers then announced that Japan might follow the example of Italy. If these countries should withdraw from the Peace Conference because of the opposition of President Wilson to their demands, who would be responsible for the failure of the League of Nations? No matter how moral or legal China's claims might be at the Conference, the Powers felt bound to fulfill their secret understandings with Japan, in spite of the fact that Japan's Twenty-one Demands upon China were made under duress and wholly oblivious of the fact that Germany had no rights in the Shantung Province to which Japan or any other country could lawfully succeed. And so America gave way and the so-called rights of Germany in Shantung were transferred to Japan.

"Later the Chinese delegates were informed that all former German rights were to be given over to Japan, unconditionally, and this agreement the Chinese delegates were asked to sign. Whereupon they protested, first orally, and subsequently in writing.

"It was announced that Japan had agreed with the Powers that Shantung would later be returned to China; but no definite time was mentioned when Japanese control should end. It is interesting to note here that Japan promises to return to China sovereign rights in Shantung, although Germany never asserted any rights of sovereignty.

"The Chinese delegates agreed to sign the Treaty with Germany, subject to a reservation of the three articles relating to Shantung. But they were told that they must sign without reservations. The position of the delegates was a most delicate one. Not to sign would be an admission to the world that the Allies were divided, thus strengthening the cause of the common enemy—Germany. To sign meant the betrayal of the whole Chinese nation, that is arrayed unanimously against any such step.

"In obedience to the will of my people the Chinese delegates refused to sign, so that a state of war still exists between China and Germany, making necessary the conclusion of a separate treaty of peace.

"From her experience at the Peace Table China has learned several important lessons. First, she knows that America is her staunch and sincere friend, having championed China's rights, and at last giving way only when the possible withdrawal of both Italy and Japan menaced the League of Nations. With the final result the American delegation was as much disappointed as the Chinese.

"China is well known for her pacific settlements of disputes, despising the thought of being compelled to resort to barbarous methods of war, such as have been exemplified by the horrors of German militarism. But she also realizes that the millennium has certainly not yet come—the age of peace when right shall triumph over might."

METHODISM'S GREAT MISSIONARY CENTENNIAL

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE FROM CHARLES STELZLE

SUPERLATIVES alone can do justice to the Centenary Celebration of American Methodism, just closed in Columbus, where for nearly a month not only the followers of John Wesley but those who owe allegiance to other great leaders of Protestantism thronged the Ohio State Fair Grounds, which cover over one hundred acres.

One of the chief reasons why the Celebration was held in Columbus was because this is the center of American Methodism. The Methodist Church, North and South, was responsible for this enterprise—the first time that these two great churches have got together on a really comprehensive programme, and it was noted that the attendance was very largely from the South.

The Celebration cost Methodism a million dollars; it was attended by a million people; it was held, in part, to celebrate the raising of one hundred and sixty million dollars for missions. It was a jubilee engaged in with an abandon that for once made the world understand that the Church could do a big thing in a big way.

Eight great buildings housed exhibits from every part of the world. Nearly twenty thousand people served as "stewards" and other helpers during the Celebration. The music was rendered by thousands of singers, and there were bands and orchestras and quartettes and soloists of National reputation.

The pageant "The Wayfarer," written by Dr. J. E. Crowther, of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Seattle, Washington, was one of the greatest productions of its kind ever seen in this country. Every night the great Coliseum, which seats about seven thousand people, was packed and thousands were turned away. Reserved seat tickets could scarcely be purchased from their owners at any price. Most extravagant offers were made to the management by theatrical producers to repeat the pageant in the big cities of this country. At least one fact was demonstrated in the popularity of the pageant—namely, that the masses of people will go to see and hear a production which is distinctly religious in character and which has practically none of the objectionable elements which theatrical managers say the public is demanding.

On the other hand, it is unquestionably true that many prominent leaders of Methodism who were opposed to the theater saw in "The Wayfarer" a remarkable opportunity for using the drama for the teaching of great religious doctrines.

The costumes and scenic effects were designed by Livingston Platt, of New York, and the beautiful combinations of colors, not only in this regard, but in the general lighting effects, for which Laurence H. Rich was responsible, made a profound impression upon the audiences.

World travelers who were present at the Celebration declared that the exhibits were of so high a character and were so ably presented by the stewards and the hundreds of lecturers as to make it possible for one to obtain a liberal education in the religions and general customs of the people in almost every part of the world.

The managers of the Celebration felt that this alone justified the expenditure of a million dollars for the production of the Celebration's features. It will now be much easier to talk missions to Methodists.

In a most interesting fashion the problems of American life were presented. A New York East Side street was shown and an attempt was made to vivify the every-day life of the tenement dwellers.

A great deal of attention was given to the industrial problem, not only in the exhibits but in the life plays and demonstrations, of which there were scores in the various buildings.

For example, the Bolsheviks and the professional labor agitators called a "strike" of "workingmen," and in the mass-meetings which they held an opportunity was given to present the other side of the question in open forum discussions.

This was one of the most effective parts of the programme presented at the Celebration. The influence of the centenary upon thousands of workers who took part in many ways was invaluable, and this also would have justified the expenditure of the great sum required to put on the Celebration.

The five hundred college men and women who spent a month serving as stewards got a new idea of what the work of the Church actually means—to say nothing about the thousands of other workers who were not college students.

The Church has learned as never before the value of publicity in pushing its work. No other single enterprise of the Protestant Church in all of its history obtained as much publicity as did the Centenary Celebration. High-grade "graphics" dealing with the great problems and work of the Church were widely used. A supplement to the "Ohio State Journal" was issued daily dealing exclusively with the Celebration and its programme. Very carefully edited and selected literature was widely distributed.

Never again will a religious body engage in a great campaign without securing the co-operation of the newspapers and other periodicals. Money was also spent for newspaper advertising, to say nothing about immense posters which were freely used throughout the State.

It must not be imagined that this Centenary Celebration was merely a glorified camp-meeting or an old-fashioned missionary concert. There were enough of these elements to satisfy the most devout Christian, for the devotional and evangelistic meetings were given great prominence; but the Celebration was principally educational in character.

There were twenty-four great days, every one a feature day, with men of National and in many cases international prominence speaking to immense audiences.

The Minute Men who took so splendid a part in the raising of the Methodist millions helped to make Minute Men Day a great success by their fine enthusiasm.

On July 1—the day that the country went dry—the big guns of prohibition held a field day the like of which has never been seen.

Most of the great denominational bodies sent their executives to the Celebration to study it with the view of utilizing in their own work such features as could be adapted to their own programmes, and it is altogether likely that the Interchurch World Movement, which will soon launch what will probably be the greatest campaign in the history of the Church, will conduct a somewhat similar enterprise on its own account.

The Director-General of the Centenary Celebration was S. Earl Taylor, who is also at the head of the Interchurch World Movement.

COMES THE HIRED MAN

BY JOHN S. PARDEE

JUDGE BEASLEY doesn't know what we are coming to. Used to be so that a man who was in business ran it. The Springfield Mercantile Company was Philetus Crawford. He ran it. The Springfield Manufacturing Company was Zenas Potter. Every one knew where to find him. The First National was Henry Grierson's bank. He managed it—read every letter that came in, wrote every letter that went out, and wrote them all in his own hand. Thomas Brown and S. T. Wilcox owned the dry-goods store. And they ran it. They created the business, they financed it, bought the goods and sold them, knew where everything was on the shelf, and how much every customer owed, and what every one in the store was doing every minute. All dead or moved to California. Business in Springfield isn't what it used to be. Not a substantial concern left that is conducted by its owners. It's all done by hired men.

The Brown & Wilcox Company, at Main and Second Street, is still the biggest store in town—bigger and brighter and busier than when Thomas Brown sat in the office and S. T. Wilcox busied himself on the floor. Years ago, when the old gentlemen began to feel comfortable, they eased themselves into a corporation, keeping a general oversight but turning the active management over to younger men.

Now their estates hold a controlling interest and the names of Brown and Wilcox appear only in the corporate title. Their heirs are represented by A. G. Simcoe, who was attorney for the partners, but his knowledge of the business begins and ends with the annual meeting. Even their understudies have vanished. R. B. Farson, who got his training under them, is still president of the company, but since he graduated into the First National he hardly looks into the store more than once a month. Carter, vice-president and general manager, is an importation. Phillips, assistant manager, and Wright, sales manager, were unknown youngsters in the days of Brown and Wilcox. Between them the present managers own about ten per cent of the stock. As Judge Beasley says, the owners never come near the store. The business is supervised by a banker and a lawyer; it is run by hired men.

Across Main Street is the First National Bank, mostly owned by estates. Some of its dividend checks go to California and some to New York. A lawyer represents the Grierson heirs. Farson, who is cashier and practically manager, has ten thousand of the stock in a million-dollar capital. The live directors are young business men who furnish connections more than capital.

Over on Front Street is the Springfield Mercantile Company, originally Philetus Crawford, wholesale groceries and provisions, lime, salt, and sundries. When he died, the company brought Bates back to be general manager. Bates, who formerly traveled for the company, was making good in Centerville, where Old Man Crawford staked him to a business. The company fixed him out with an attractive salary and a small interest to be paid for from the earnings. The owners give him a free hand. Another business owned largely by estates and run by hired men.

Beyond the tracks is the Springfield Manufacturing Company. Owned by estates—except the bonds which Zenas Potter willed to Bethany College and a block of the preferred held by Dr. Vernon, who married into the family. The business is owned by widows and orphans, and is run by hired men.

So all through Springfield, so in a thousand Springfields. People who own business do not run it; people who run business do not own it. Just hired men.

For that matter, look at the railways, and Standard Oil, and United States Steel. Nobody in particular owns them. The directors, who are elected by proxies, have blocks of stock which are conspicuously large only among a swarm of infinitesimals. Ownership is impersonal; the business is run by hired men.

Notwithstanding Judge Beasley's quivering comment, business has fared well under hired management. Thomas Brown and S. T. Wilcox never dreamed what a hive the Brown & Wilcox Company would become. It does more business, turns its stock quicker, carries more lines, and displays a livelier assortment. What do you suppose the fine old men who founded the First National would say if they saw the way the bank goes after business? In Grierson's day one had to be introduced by unimpeachable sponsors before he was privileged to open an account. Now Tim Collins's wife pays her monthly bills by check, Tony Caprelli banks the daily proceeds of his peanut sales, and little Annie Franklin enters unabashed to deposit her handful of pennies. A department for women, a department for savings, a sub-department for children, a window for bonds, a booth for War Savings—what would Henry Grierson say?

Remember how Old Man Crawford used to stand in his shirt-sleeves in the Mercantile Company's doorway? Remember what a tight grip Zenas Potter kept on the Manufacturing Company? Bates in the wholesale house and Kelly in the factory start more new things in a week than their revered predecessors would have stood for in a lifetime.

So all through Springfield, so in a thousand Springfields—closer buying, brisker selling, livelier collections. The abdication of the owner in favor of the hired man lets more vim into business than it loses.

In the good old days when a man's business was his own, its limit was the amount of capital he could swing and the force he could swing it with. Its life was what its maker gave it. When he lost his grip, dry rot set in; when he died, it was sold or wound up. A strong individuality might be projected posthumously, as when Peter Wilkins's business was carried on by Jenkins & Fordyce, successors to Peter Wilkins, or when T. Perry & Sons was continued by the boys. But business seldom survived beyond the first successor or the second generation.

Corporate methods have changed business from a hardy annual to a perennial growth. In the beginning the corporation was merely the financial background for a man—Grierson was the bank, Crawford was the Mercantile Company, Potter was the Manufacturing Company. But the corporation has developed from a device into a creature with strength of its own, ways of its own, a spirit its own. Several of our Springfield corporations are not only stronger than any one man's capital, more vigorous than any one man's energy, but actually more human than the personalities of Grierson and Potter and Crawford. The loyalty to the house in these modern concerns is more vivid than the boys ever felt who worked for the old masters.

As in Springfield, so in a thousand Springfields. The reign of the hired man under impersonal ownership is amply vindicated.

Management by hired men is not the whole story of the changing order. In the veteran days a business man was king of his domain. He fixed hours and wages and made the rules. It shocked him when his commoners asserted their obstreperous way. Teaching them their place was part of his business duty. There is no doubt at all that labor troubles hastened Zenas Potter's end. It was the unions. He could have stood it to wrestle with his own crew, though dictation from men who worked by the day was simply monstrous. But the interference of outsiders was more than he could stand. Never mind whether the terms were easily met or oppressive; it was working under the union scale not his scale, union hours not his hours, union conditions not his conditions, that broke his sturdy spirit.

That is all a matter of course to the new generation of shop managers. Kelly, who sits in Zenas Potter's office, takes the unions as part of the natural order. In fact, when the grievance committee calls his first move is to draw his old union card from his wallet. He would have them remember that he came up from the ranks and has not forgotten how things look to the man at the bench. But Kelly has a new set of troubles.

He burst into Al Simcoe's office the other day as red in the face as Zenas Potter in his purplest moments. "What do you suppose those darned fools want now?"

That's Al Simcoe, who is being initiated by his father, with some misgivings, into the management of the Potter estate. A. G. read law in an older lawyer's office; Al Simcoe went to college, where he acquired some curious notions. He recognized without explanation that "those darned fools" referred to the men who work for the Manufacturing Company. "Give it up," he said; "the earth perhaps?"

"They got that long ago," said Kelly. "It's the moon they're after now; they want to be represented on the Board of Directors." Just as Zenas Potter might have said: "They want to tell me how to run my business, dictating what wages I shall give them and how many hours a day the shop shall run. Of all the—"

Kelly felt just like that.

"They're crazy," went on Kelly. "It's all right for them to have a say about hours and wages and all that. I'm with them. But they've no call to interfere with the business." And Zenas Potter himself could not have spoken more reverently of "the business."

"Well," said Simcoe again, "they may be right at that. What's the harm? One workman on the Board would not be a majority, and I'm not sure but we could hold them better if one of them was on the inside. We've opened the books to them already, and the only trouble was we couldn't get them to see what the figures meant. Blest if I know—as long as they are bossing the ranch, anyhow, maybe they would do it more intelligently if they had some responsibility. Let's think it over."

And Kelly went away in amazement.

Perhaps that is the answer to Judge Beasley's perplexity—apoplexy more likely if it comes on him suddenly. It may be that in the business of the future the rank and file are going to join with ownership and management in giving the direction. In at least one instance it has been done. The owners of one of the largest retail stores in the United States have turned their business over to the employees. First the enforcement of discipline was given to committees, then the adjustment of grievances, and finally the buying and selling and the control of policies. Probably the conditions were extraordinary; perhaps the experiment would fail nine times out of ten. But at least in this one instance the hired men and women of all grades have had the wholsey in the business and the business survived.

The British, who do things differently, are feeling their way toward a composite direction of industry. The faculties of ownership and management meet with labor representatives with equal voice in industrial councils which will compass the decision of large policies. It is a new parliament of capital and labor whose judgments are expected to be conclusive upon those who make the laws.

These are signs of the times. The man who works with tools wants to have a say about the business in which he works as a member, and not as a subject of the concern. As much as may be wholesome for the business he probably will get it.

The drawing together of owners, managers, and wage-workers is the hopeful sign. There are also portents. A man holds forth nightly on the curb in Second Street. His person is ill-favored and his talk is ill-flavored. His notion of a happier state is to suppress the owners and managers and let the workers below the rank of foreman run everything. His stock in trade is rancor and bitterness. His whole theme is discord. He lives in a distorted world and all he sees is tinged with madness. The disquieting sign is that the madman gets a hearing and leaves a wake of sullen discontent among fellows of steadier minds.

As in Springfield, so in a thousand Springfields. The times are so out of joint that sometimes it seems as though unless the business world can find a way to set things right things will go all wrong—as Russia fell in total confusion.

Americans will not easily believe that this world is going to be run even for a season by men whose minds are unhinged. America has a footing which Russia lacked. In our public affairs all sorts and conditions of men, according to their several abilities, have a fair chance to be heard. The unpleasant person on the curb in Second Street may point out disagreeable exceptions, but in the main it is the rule. So we have a right to believe that a people whose genius has carried them thus far will find a basis for democracy in business—that fair balance in which ownership, management, and labor will get due representation.

Dreadful as it may seem to Judge Beasley, the continuous process of democracy refuses to be stayed. The world, which is learning to do with public servants in place of kings, which is managing to get its work done under hired managers in place of masters, will find a way by industrial councils, by shop committees, and by other shifts to give full representation in the conduct of affairs to all who have part in them. Demands which would have been blasphemy to Zenas Potter, which are appalling to as modern a manager as Kelly, are scarcely perturbing to young Simcoe, a looker-on in business. To his mind, the new demand is merely an extension of the franchise.

There is a new voice in the world. At close range the air vibrates with the high notes—the strident protest of Judge Beasley against impending change, the voice of unreason shrieking on the curbstone. Standing a little farther off, one hears the dominant undertone. Confused murmurs swell into a steady note. It is the hired man, struggling to his feet, intent to have a say in all affairs of which his life is woven.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE KAISER

BY VERNON KELLOGG

OF THE AMERICAN RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

THERE seems to be much difference of opinion about trying the Kaiser for his crimes. Men of the law differ about the legality of such a proceeding; diplomats, about its advisability. Professors of political science discuss the form and organization of the German state and military authorities discuss the form and organization of the German army, to the end of determining where responsibility for the behavior of the state and army really lies. Von Bethmann Hollweg has asked that he be tried instead of the Kaiser, because he was responsible as Chancellor. Von Hindenburg asserts that as Chief of Staff he should be tried instead of the Kaiser, because he was head of the army. Both of them should be tried—they both had much authority and lent it to the commission of crime. But neither should be tried instead of the Kaiser—they never had that much authority. Ludendorff has not yet come forth with a declaration and offer like those of Bethmann Hollweg and Hindenburg; and before he finished he had more authority than either of them. If he does come forward, or if he can be dragged forward, by all means let him be tried, too; but even he is not a sufficient substitute for William Hohenzollern, the man who had the real authority and used it—the All Highest in command in actuality as well as in title and assumption.

Not that the Kaiser issued personally all orders that determined in detail the behavior of the German armies and navy or the German occupants of invaded territories, any more than any All Highest or generalissimo of any army issues personally all orders to his forces or people; any more than Haig or Pétain or Pershing, or Foch, over them all, did; or Lloyd George or Clemenceau or Wilson did. But no determination of German general policy or behavior was made without the knowledge and general consent—indeed, usually the formal and specific consent—of the Kaiser. And his personal authority and responsibility, his personal orders, were not limited to general matters; they descended to many matters of detail.

Who is the Chief of Staff of the German Army? He is the direct representative of the Kaiser in issuing commands to the armies. He issues commands to men of higher military title than himself. Von Falkenhayn, who succeeded von Moltke, gave orders to von Hindenburg and Mackensen when they were Field Marshals and he was but Lieutenant-General. He did this as direct personal representative of the All Highest Command, the Kaiser, who knew what orders he was issuing.

When the Great German Headquarters was at Charleville—which was from early in the war until von Hindenburg succeeded von Falkenhayn as Chief of Staff—the Kaiser and von Falkenhayn were continually together whenever the Kaiser came to Charleville. Von Falkenhayn was his mouthpiece. The Kaiser did not want to supersede von Falkenhayn; he had to, after the failure at Verdun, in order to meet the demands of the people for a popular hero. Von Hindenburg's winnings in the east had made him that popular hero, and the Kaiser, in order to bolster up his people and draw from them the needed further sacrifices, had to give up as his Chief of Staff a man he liked personally for one he disliked. And because this new Chief of Staff had as chief of his own staff a man of greater capacity, brutality, and ambition than himself, to wit, von Ludendorff, the Kaiser had to make a special position and title for him. So von Ludendorff became Obergeneral Quartiermeister, thus outranking the actual General Quartiermeister, von Freytag, another personal favorite of the Kaiser, who, instead of remaining at Great Headquarters, traveled about with the Kaiser in those continual flittings from point to point of victory—Kaiser victories, as they were called whenever they were big enough to be called anything.

It was common talk at Great Headquarters that the Kaiser knew about everything and had a hand in everything. For a long time many of the General Staff officers were very bitter because London was not bombarded by Zeppelins and airplanes. It could easily be done, they said; it would work havoc with London, would frighten the English people to the surrendering point, and if it killed a lot of women and children, well, it would serve the "damned English" only right—the English were always the "damned English," for if it had not been for them the war would have been over quickly. But the bombing could not be done because the Kaiser would not allow it. And when it was done it was because the Kaiser did allow it. Is this personal responsibility or not?

Governor-General von Bissing, German ruler of Belgium, was a personal appointee of the Kaiser, and was not responsible to General Staff or Berlin War Office or Foreign Office, but solely to the Kaiser. The things that happened in Belgium happened by order of a man responsible solely to the Kaiser. Immediately after the shooting of Miss Cavell and the outburst of indignation from the world von Bissing and his chief political adviser, von der Lancken, and the Military Governor of Brussels, von Sauberzweig, were summoned to Berlin to get a personal wiggling from the Kaiser for their "diplomatic mistake." And immediately thereafter the other two women condemned to death by the same court martial at the same time with Miss Cavell for the same offense had their death sentences commuted to imprisonment for life. And soon after, by the Kaiser's personal instruction, another woman condemned to death at Liège enjoyed a similar respite. This is to the Kaiser's credit—to the credit of his diplomacy. But I am not trying to point out the Kaiser's credits or crimes—only his responsibility.

Soon after von Hindenburg was made Chief of Staff he and von Ludendorff made a hurried trip to the west front to see personally the situation there. Their previous personal knowledge of the war was of matters in the east. As they passed through Belgium they saw the idle Belgian workmen—idle because, with factories wrecked and machines sent to Germany or destroyed, there was no work for them to do except work for the Germans, which they would not do. When they reached the front, the new Chief of Staff and the Obergeneral Quartiermeister saw the need of more soldiers in the trenches in western Flanders and northern France. So when they got back to Berlin an order came to the Governor-General of Belgium to send Belgian men to Germany, who were to replace German workmen to be sent from the German war factories and coal mines to the west front. And the terrible deportations began.

The deportation of Belgians to Germany to be compelled to work there had been urged frequently before on Governor-General von Bissing by the military authorities; but he had always refused to issue the order. He believed that it would make too great difficulties for him in his quasi-civil administration of Belgium and interfere with his peculiar special mission of winning the Belgians over to Germany! But after von Hindenburg and von Ludendorff got back to Berlin, where the only authority over von Bissing resided, the order for the deportations issued from the reluctant Governor-General.

Now I am neither man of law nor diplomat, neither professor of political science nor military authority, and I have no competent opinion to express as to the legality or the diplomatic advisability of trying the Kaiser, nor as to the position and responsibility of the Kaiser in the German state as determined on a technical basis. But I have a very definite opinion as to the position and authority, and hence responsibility, with which the man William Hohenzollern was clothed before and during the war in the minds of the German military and civil authorities and the German people. They understood that he had all power and authority; and if the war had been a successful one he would have had all credit for beginning, carrying on, and winning it. If his vanity, unmorality, and blindness led him to be in many things a tool of shrewder, self-seeking, more unmoral men; or if such principal agents of his own choosing as von Ludendorff gained what may have been to him a humiliating degree of personal authority before the war was over, he can plead that at his trial in London. But never during the war until the days of the revolution was his assumption of authority, and hence responsibility, surrendered by any word of his or abased by action of his people. From beginning to end, from the Potsdam conference of July, 1914, to his abdication and confession of guilt—guilt to Belgium and France, guilt to his own people, and guilt to humanity by cowardly flight in November, 1918—William Hohenzollern assumed and, up to the measure of the possibilities of one man, actually had the responsibility for the crimes of Germany in connection with the great war. Wiertz painted the truth about Napoleon; Raemaekers has painted the truth about the Kaiser.

"PAPA YANK"

BY FULLERTON L. WALDO

AUTHOR OF "AMERICA AT THE FRONT"

IT was Sam Jolivet's job to drive one of the big American motor trucks, bulging with supplies, slam-banging through the choking white dust toward the front and back again; a child sat perked and smiling in the door of her village home with a white rabbit in her lap and a dancing light in her eyes, and waved her hand at him when the car went honking and rumbling past and cried, "Vive l'Amérique!" as mightily as she could.

Later she learned to call, "Good-night!" and was proud of herself because she had made a beginning of learning that queer and twisted American language; and these two words she shrilled by way of greeting whether it was high noon or twilight.

She was only fifteen years old, and yet she could and did cook a four-square meal one day for a band of nine hungry truck-drivers, and Sam Jolivet got the best part of the last pet chicken; and he did not know that the rabbit also went into the pot to help feed him and his mates.

While she lugged in the scalding soup with all the bones in it she smiled as bravely as though her heart were not breaking for the rabbit, and her grandmother, who had no teeth worth mentioning, smiled too, and her smile followed the little girl around the room like a spot of sunlight as the rabbit used to follow her.

One of the doughboys found somewhere about his person enough bad French to discover that the little girl was named Yvonne and that she lived alone with her grandmother. They had not much to live on but memories. The father had been killed in the trenches the winter before:

the mother had died of consumption two years ere the war began. The grandmother, who was the mother's mother, could hardly hobble to Mass past Jeanne d'Arc's statue to lay her sorrow at the feet of the saints in the smile of the Blessed Virgin. But, seated on a bench before the house, filling her good ear with the gossip of the street, she could do a little sewing, which kept alive herself and the "petite ange" and the gibbering rats in the wall.

Sam Jolivet ate much and said little, and before the second drumstick was picked clean he had formed a resolution.

Yvonne was bright and good and very pretty. She deserved a chance. He had always wanted to adopt a French orphan, since he could not endow an entire asylum. Here was opportunity in sabots flopping at his door.

"What'd you do with an orphan, Sam?" one of his mates had laughed at him when first he broached the project in the large luxury of an off hour under the spruces of the Vosges. "Wanna marry her?"

"No," Sam answered, solemnly. "I got a little money saved up, and I'd take some of that, and put most of my pay with it, because there's nobody at home it needs to go to, and I'd see that she had a good education at a convent school in Montreal I know about and some nice clothes to wear. I'm never going to marry. I never in my life made enough to support a family, and I've seen and I've known what it is to be poor, and I wouldn't think it was right to sentence a family to slave and starve as I've had to do since I was a kid. I want to make her happy and I want her to be free."

Yvonne did not know what thoughts were passing through Sam's mind when he called her to him and praised her for the dinner.

She only knew that he was tall and wholesome, like the poplar trees along the roadway, where the birds had lived before the white dust behind the motor trucks smoked them out.

He smiled like the sun on the fields after rain. She had trusted him from the first quick flash of her childish intuition; she was sure America must be a very fine place if it was full of men like him.

After that Sam came back many times, and finally, in French that broke in pieces on his tongue like an army biscuit, he managed to ask the old grandmother if she would let this flower and lamp and staff of her sundown years be sent far, far away to the convent school in Montreal.

You can imagine what uphill, six-cylinder work it was to persuade the old woman, and how red and hot in the face Sam and his French became. The little girl herself was wild for the plan of "Papa Yank," as she had learned to call him. She was present during most of the long-drawn debate. The old woman and the child had been too close all their lives to have any secret from each other now. The slightest gap-toothed mumble of Grammere was clear as a bell to Yvonne.

After the reluctant consent had been won, it took tedious months of correspondence with the school in Montreal, and finally (to say nothing of notary and priest) the help of some hospital nurses who were opportunely returning to Canada; but at last the little Yvonne had safely crossed the sea in the charge of these good women, and was—her letters seemed to show—as happy as one long summer holiday in her new, strange life.

To "Papa Yank" she wrote lengthily, letters which at first needed the chaplain to unravel, and at last were couched in tolerable English. There were love and kisses every other line, and inquiries about grandmother many times repeated, and black grief when grandmother died of heart failure soon after New Year's Day. Sam usually had three or four of these letters in the pocket of his O. D. shirt over his heart, where he once kept the little white bag of tobacco with the dangling yellow string.

He would halt the other boys even in the middle of the road to share the news with them. Sometimes the Sisters wrote. "Sister Mary says she's the head of the class in arithmetic." "Sister Angelica says that she's as good as gold and never gives any trouble." Sam's infatuation for his ward became the by-word of his associates, but he took their raillery with the grin of imperturbable good humor. For the day had been named when he was to sail for America, and he vowed that his first leave in God's country would be spent in a flying trip to Montreal to see for himself how it was going with Yvonne.

Sam's parents, too, were dead; he was an only child. Yvonne was home to him. Yvonne was all. He painted pictures of her in his mind and forgot the dust and the thirst and the shells and the Germans and everything except the rule of the road, fondly imagining what Yvonne would grow to be. He made of her an image that outshone the princesses in the dimly remembered fairy tales. He saw her, crowned with light, ministering to the poor of a great city, moving among them with a fragrant laden basket on her arm, like a Salvation Army lass or a Red Cross girl or a Y hut worker—women who had given him a new idea of womanhood by their devoted work for the dough-boys at the front. She would draw to herself helpless infancy and childish old age. She would be the natural confidante of all who were in trouble.

Some true, good man would seek her out and win her hand, and she would make a home for him. She would be a joyful mother of children. Her "Papa Yank" would come and find her the soul of her homestead, the center of an adoring family circle, the star in the sky of all her neighborhood.

These thoughts raced through his mind like the Lachine Rapids as his train bore him over the river to Montreal. His mind, indeed, was a jumble of sweet fancies for the years to be and dear realities for the months that lay behind. Still he wore the uniform in which she had seen him when they parted, and still there hung about his neck under the uniform the silver crucifix on its chain which she had taken from her own white throat and impulsively conferred on him. He thought more of it than if it had been the Congressional medal.

How beautiful she was! She knew it, too, the little minx! Her foster-father hoped that since she left France the adulation she was sure to have from strangers had not turned her head. He hoped she was the same at heart as when she swirled away in a rattle-trap car with the Canadian nurses, wiping her eyes and throwing him kisses. He wondered whether she spoke English well. He wondered—

Then at the convent school there was a sudden light as she to whom he had said farewell in France flashed into the room. He was almost bewildered. She must have seen on her walks in Montreal how other girls wore their hair, how they used their eyes, and what graceful tricks they played with their hands. A little girl said good-by to him—a young woman greeted him, demure, matured, pictorial.

"Yvonne!"

"Papa Yank!"

They kissed and clung to each other.

"Yvonne, are you happy here?"

"No, Papa Yank."

Yvonne drew back, and with soulful dark eyes regarded her benefactor, holding the ends of his sleeves in her slender fingers.

"Why, Yvonne?"

"I—muss—be—free!"

"What do you call freedom? Can't you do just about what you want here?"

"No, Papa Yank. Pray—read—sing—walk—sew. That is not free!" She stamped a tiny shoe he had paid for and pouted, with a defiant toss of her black ringlets.

"What else do you want, Yvonne?"

"A man—came here," she answered, slowly. "He is—my fazzer's bruzzer. He was—always—in New York for many years. One of ze nurses, I tell her about him while we are at sea. When we get to New York—she write to him. He come here. He have what you call ze show—ze burlesque show. He want me. He make me rich. A thousand dollar! He give me fine clothes. And diamants, he say. And pearls. I shall be great—and everybody say, 'Oh!' and kiss my hand—and my name is in ze electricity light—and in ze top of all ze newspapers. Oh, so fine! I shall so happy be when I go away from zis place."

Sam at first could not believe she meant what she said.

"You don't really mean to go away from here and leave all these people who have been so kind to you and—"

"You were ze one zat was kind. Zese not. Not at all. Zese take ze money you send for me, but zey care nozzing for me. I mus' go—out in ze world. Ze great, beautiful world!"

He talked with her for an hour, and another hour, and half an hour more; and he could not wake her from the glittering hallucination that held her. He told her all the perils that beset a young girl in the life that she proposed to live. He told her how hard and rough and cruel men would be. He pleaded and the tears came in his eyes, and she was touched, and she cried on the sleeve of his blouse as she sat with her hand in his. But he could not change her set intensity of purpose. The more she cried, the more determined she seemed to step into the lure outspread before her feet. Of course no harm could happen, she insisted. Was it not her uncle, the brother of her father?

"You must choose," Sam finally said, "between this man with his burlesque show and me."

"I—haf chosen," said the girl. "Long ago I chose. I will be free! Papa Yank, you will not kiss me good-by?"

But he was gone.

As the train rolled out on the international bridge Sam opened the window. He took from his neck the silver crucifix that she had given him. He held it in his hand a wistful moment, then he hurled it from the window, and the glint of it was like one last flicker of a dying hope of the heart ere it was lost in the ceaseless onrush of the river to the sea.

WHEN GERMANY YIELDED

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE FROM ELBERT FRANCIS BALDWIN

MONDAY evening, June 23, we had just sat down to dinner on the terrace of the Tavern du Panthéon, that excellent restaurant on the corner of the Boulevard Saint-Michel and the Rue Soufflot—the rue leading straight to the great dome of the Panthéon, only three blocks away. We had hardly begun dinner before a dozen great American camions came tearing up the Rue de Médecis (which enters the boulevard opposite our corner on the other side) and went at a great pace up the Boul' Mich'—the popular title given to the Boulevard Saint-Michel. Each camion had two great American flags waving, one from the front and one from the rear, and as the machines went at top speed we had a sight of at least twenty-four well-nigh continuous American flags standing out perfectly straight against the green of the Gardens of the Luxembourg, on the other side of the Rue de Médecis and the Boul' Mich'. Every camion was packed with our doughboys, who were gesticulating and shouting with voices already so raucous from much shouting that we could not hear what they said. But every one jumped at one conclusion—that Germany had finally accepted the Allies' conditions and was ready to sign the Treaty of Peace.

In a twinkling, and as if by magic, the streets were filled with Parisians cheering our boys—an eloquent and spontaneous proof of the relations between France and America.

In a few seconds we heard a heavy boom. It was the first gun from a battery over at the Invalides, a mile away, which had begun the traditional salvo of one hundred and one guns. Then the church bells began to mingle their grave voices with that of the cannon. But the automobile sirens had already begun their shrill cry, this time not announcing, as usual, imminent peril to pedestrians in the streets, but a peace at last conquered for every one.

Pedestrians, people in autos and buses and carriages, all seemed satisfied and almost every one bore a smile. In all cafés and restaurants there was joyous animation. Every one was impelled to get up and raise his glass and drain it to the honor of France, America, all the Allies. At our restaurant the slow-moving waiter, who a moment before had seemed a rather oldish person and weighted down with cares, suddenly became young, and with radiant face came briskly up bearing a tray full of something or other, and before putting it on the table exclaimed: "Messieurs et Mesdames, il faut que je vous dise 'Dieu merci'! C'est fini. Il a duré presque cinq ans. Pensez-donc, maintenant enfin la paix!" In each restaurant or café where there was an orchestra you can be mighty sure that the "Marseillaise" was played immediately, every one in the street, too, listening, erect, still, and with hat in hand. In many a place where there was no orchestra some client who had confidence in his voice would rise and pour forth the melody of the immortal hymn, all those about joining in the chorus: "Le jour de gloire est arrivé!"

One could not be better placed to see a typical Parisian crowd than were we on our terrace, from which we overlooked the wide expanse of the centering streets at the top of the hill crowned by the Panthéon. Of course the Boul' Mich' was instantly at its best. It has always exhibited more exuberance than has any other avenue in Paris, because it is close to the University and the great schools. Its leafy shade makes it agreeable for any one. Student processions were organized at once and went up and down carrying flags, crying: "Vive la France!" "Vive la Paix!" "Vivent les Alliés!" and singing that most popular of student songs at present, "Madelon." What a whirlwind there was in this street! The air was thick with acclamations and applause. Behind these student processions came another, one infinitely more moving; it was made up entirely of men who had been wounded. No one could see them pass without emotion. No one could without reverence look upon their stars and their palms, their red and green ribbons. One read in them the pluck and grit, the danger and wounds, of the past which made possible the victory of the present. And now we gaze above the crowd and find that meanwhile the houses have become gay with flags. There are always many flags flying in Paris, but on the evening of June 23 it took but a short time to add as many more. The colors were the more vivid in the evening sun, for on this next to the longest day in the year the sun was still glorious between six and seven o'clock. There were great flags bordered with gold fringe which blotted out an entire window; but there were others, little bits of flags, which you saw being placed by children. And these little flags seemed to me far more symbolic than did the others of a war in which French fathers gave themselves, even to laying down their lives, so that they might assure to-morrows without fear to their babies.

And later, at the theaters and at the opera, sometimes sung or recited both outside and inside the theater, there was the "Marseillaise" again. From the balcony of the Opera House Mademoiselle Marthe Chenal, the great soprano, interpreted the anthem from the balcony to a dense crowd that extended far along the boulevards in every direction. The artist sung the "Marseillaise" as she had never sang it before, and the various actresses who, with liberty cap and robed in the tricolor, recited the lines of Rouget de Lisle in the various theaters recited them as never before. No one fortunate enough to hear these lines from such women can ever forget the occasion. Even in the hour of triumph there seemed to me to be in their voices the note of a greater resolution, just as there seemed to be a greater souplesse and magnificent abandon in their gestures, more of dramatic fervor, indeed, in the impact. Nothing could have been a finer climax to the evening's fête. It had to be "La Marseillaise." Nothing else or less could have so relieved the vast multitudes tense with emotion. Nothing could have so expressed popular satisfaction and national joy.

Thus every one wanted to celebrate one of the greatest dates in history. And yet all this blaze of color and movement and sound did not equal that when the armistice was announced. Why?

The time between November 11, 1918, and June 23, 1919, has given Frenchmen opportunity to see more clearly than ever their enemy's character, their own internal perils, and thus their doubly darkened future. It is an increasingly darkened future for all the world as well.

It is true that France is heartened. Especially are those Frenchmen heartened who remember their country's isolation in 1870-1. They take pride in their army, now far ahead of the German army:

they look about and note that their country is environed by allies and friends, fervent admirers of the marvelous military élan which distinguishes France, and who acknowledge the heroic fiber by which she has won her present place in the world. These Frenchmen, remembering the forty-four years of German provocation and of French humiliation, these are they who now breathe the deepest sigh of relief. One can appreciate the precious quality of their joy, for some of them remember that on this very date exactly forty-nine years ago, namely, on June 23, 1870, in Bismarck's office in Berlin, he discussed with Moltke and Roon and others an attack on France which would be begun by a proposition to put a Hohenzollern prince on the Spanish throne. That discussion did indeed become the beginning of the war of 1870, and that war was the precursor of the present war.

My French friends avoid saying "the late war." They do not believe that the present war will be really ended before the last article of the Peace Treaty shall have been fulfilled, and that will take fifteen years or more.

But France has the same determination to meet Germany face to face, jusqu'au bout, which she had at the first battle of the Marne. And with France, as all lovers of France know, determination does not mean merely something heavy and gloomy and somber. There is always the Gallic and gracious élan of which I have spoken. And, too, better than other peoples the French know how to appreciate this quality when they find it in others. For example, the other day, when I was at Belleau Wood, a French officer who had been close to our troops there a year ago said to me: "Ah, Monsieur, j'admire du fond du cœur vos soldats américains; ils se sont fait tués le plus élégamment."

Frenchmen are soberer now than they were seven months ago, when the armistice was declared, because they are more disillusionized. In the first place, they did not expect that it would take so long to frame a Treaty of Peace. Most Frenchmen echo the opinion of the best Frenchman I know, one in exalted station, who said to me: "The Peace Commissioners made their great mistake when they included the framing of a charter for the League of Nations in the framing of the Peace Treaty. They could have included in the Treaty an agreement to stand by the principles of a League of Nations and to frame a charter for it without taking all the time necessary to put together the details of the actual Covenant. This was what France wanted, but she was outvoted. It was an especially cruel thing for her thus to be outvoted, for more than any other nation she needed an immediate decision as to peace terms. The result has cost her an immense amount of money in daily interest due from Germany, and also the wearing down of an immense amount of national patience." Those of us who think that the League of Nations would never have been established unless it was established just as it was cannot help appreciating the peculiarly poignant economic and financial situation here.

In the second place, though assuring to France her lost provinces, though providing for an offset to her destroyed mines by the temporary possession of those in the Sarre Basin, the Treaty does not provide sufficient guaranty for reparation to be made either in money or in kind. This prevalent conviction was bitterly accentuated when, on June 16, it was announced that the Peace Commissioners had actually revamped the Treaty in favor of Germany, giving to her economic, financial, and territorial concessions, most of them more to the detriment of France than to that of any other nation. In the words of M. Auguste Gauvain, editor of the "Journal des Débats" to me, "We have paid a disproportionate price for our desire to seem exactly just towards the Germans."

Again, there is the matter of Poland. Frenchmen now know, through direct sources, that the Germans have formed a great military organization to prevent Polish reconstruction as described by the Treaty, and that this organization must be offset by another which presumably can only come from France—from France, which needs demobilization as no other country needs it! Concerning the Polish situation M. Clemenceau, the French Premier, has just said: "We must look calmly and resolutely into the face of the actual facts. With them in view, to throw the bridle over the neck of the Boches is simply to see them giving themselves up at once to aggression and violence. One must be on one's guard against any surprise."

Yes, indeed. Two surprises were even then on the way. Within the hour the French learned that the Germans had burned the captured French flags which by the Treaty were to be returned to France, and at Scapa Flow had scuttled the German fleet, handed over as a ransom last November for the total disaster with which the Allied armies were then threatening Germany. Thus the Germans have already torn up two articles of the Peace Treaty.

In the destruction of the German fleet Frenchmen naturally see the culminating and most impressive proof that the Boches intend to decline their responsibility for the execution of the peace conditions. Of course the German admiral at Scapa Flow had no right to act in a hostile manner. He, with all the crews of the interned fleet, was a prisoner of war, and thus without authority to give military orders. Moreover, as the fleet had been given by the German Government into the hands of the Allies as a pledge, this pledge could not be withdrawn or destroyed by the debtor's individual act. The sinking of the fleet, however, is still incomprehensible to the majority of Frenchmen. Neither they nor the English, for that matter (for the London "Times's" headline last November read: "Surrender of the German fleet"), yet realize that the ships were not really surrendered, but simply interned. This regrettable decision was reached by the Inter-Allied Commission, composed of navy representatives from England, America, France, and Italy. The decision was contrary to the views of the naval advisers of the British Admiralty, but, the decision once reached, the Inter-Allied Commissioners felt that they had no power to place guards upon the German ships, and their decision of course made any prevention of scuttling impossible. The British Admiralty had no right of access except in a very formal way, and, being only interned, the Germans were properly guarded by their own men. Had the ships been surrendered and not interned, they would of course have passed to the control of the country in whose ports they lay, and that country would have been responsible for their safety. As to the real origin of the deplorable and humiliating affair, the question has already been raised in the House of Commons as to whether "it is not a fact that the British Prime Minister earnestly and strongly pleaded for the surrender of these ships, but was overruled by President Wilson." This question was not answered by the Government. On the other hand, it is reported that the American and French Commissioners vainly urged internment in neutral ports. In the French Parliament the Government has been asked for explanations, and also for an indication of what is going to be done to remedy the detriment caused to France by the destruction of the fleet, for the proportional loss to France is greater than that of any other participating Power.

Finally, the French are not oblivious to the contrast between the Germany of three months ago (struggling with acute Bolshevism but having a more docile attitude towards the Entente) and the Germany of to-day, whose language and actions remind one of the kind that distinguished Hohenzollern rule. Although there is a new German Cabinet, there seems no change from the arrogance of the Brockdorff-Rantzau set. Why should there be when the heads of the new Cabinet, Bauer and Erzberger, were Secretaries of State under William II? If there are any really convinced democrats and republicans in Germany, they themselves should resent the presence of these imperial servants at the head of a so-called German Republic—at least that is the expression used in the final acceptance of the Peace Treaty, a change from the previous expression, "Reich," generally interpreted as "Empire," but also liable to interpretation as "realm." Many Frenchmen have genuinely expected that a new Government would bring new men to the top. These Frenchmen are therefore disappointed and disgusted to find that in Germany there is still a disposition to hang on to the old "Potsdam gang," the old directors of affairs, even when Germany knows that she must get new directors if she is to live in peace with other people. If Germany does not yet know it, France and the rest of us already know it—Germany can never reform herself unless she breaks every bond that binds her to those responsible for the war.

Even if Germany signs, as she now says she is willing to do, there will be two delays. First, as to the Commissioners. We are not sure that any one has yet been clothed with authority to sign, though four days have passed since Herr von Haniel said that Germany would sign.

The second delay, one to which Frenchmen attach far graver importance, is found in the provisional Constitution of Germany as passed on February 10, 1919, at the National Assembly at Weimar. This article reads: "Treaties with foreign states . . . must be approved by the National Assembly and by the Commission of States." This would seem to indicate a ratification by the present Parliament and by a commission from the various German states, which would be simply the old Bundesrat of the late Parliament. The French say, however, that the Commission of States may mean an individual approval by every state in Germany, acting by itself before the meeting of the Commission of States, and, with this interpretation, the military chiefs and pan-German agitators, resolved to prevent the execution of the Treaty, have a fruitful field for their activity by delaying the many necessary ratifications. There might have been a possible way to check them in this scheming, and that was, before Germany's signature to the Peace Treaty, to compel her agreement to a protocol which shall determine the latest date for complete ratification.

Thus, though menaced by internal dangers (because of traitorous movements masking under labor strikes), and with the necessity of turning their faces homewards, Frenchmen feel, it seems to me, as would foresters asked to leave a burning wood before they had stamped out all the scattered flames. No matter what necessity at home, those foresters naturally want to watch that forest still. I hear them also asserting that, to keep the forest free from fire in the future, not only are they needed, but as well an armed league of those who have already helped them put out the fire.

Paris, June 27, 1919.

BACK-FIRING AGAINST BOLSHEVISM

BY LIEUTENANT JOHN M. OSKISON

The American Relief Administration has from the beginning, under the far-sighted guidance of Herbert Hoover, bent its efforts, not alone to the immediate necessity of supporting with food the war-exhausted nations of Europe which the armistice released from the domination of the Central Powers, but the equally exigent need of building up their political, financial, and business stability as a safeguard and guarantee of their future. The distribution of food relief was the first and fundamental requirement, since only so could their very lives be saved, and only on the basis of tranquillity which the banishment of the menace of starvation afforded could the next steps in national rehabilitation be taken. But these next steps were prepared for by Mr. Hoover while he was sending food into their territories as fast as available ships and inland transportation made it possible.

As long ago, therefore, as March 11 Mr. Hoover addressed notes to the Governments of Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Poland, and Serbia, urging them at once to organize national commissions of the leading commercial men of their nationalities to establish their own provisions for supplying themselves with food, developing a system of credits and commercial machinery that should soon work out into the importation not only of foodstuffs but of the raw materials on which their resumption of normal commercial life and sound economic relations with the rest of the world must rest.

Mr. Hoover has consistently held the position that there must be a responsible and law-observing government in any nation before the American or Allied Governments could undertake to send in food supplies—witness the response to the petition from Russia.

In his work of directing the distribution of relief intelligently and efficiently Mr. Hoover has had the assistance, through the co-operation of General Pershing, of a considerable number of men who are experts in various lines now in the American uniform in Europe. Lieutenant Oskison, a trained observer and writer, is one of this number, and this article from him is an account of an investigating trip of a group of such officers. In it Lieutenant Oskison shows the spirit which animates these Army men, still patriotically devoting their efforts to the great American ideal, although many of them doubtless long to return to the United States, as they might if they chose, since the need for their military service is ended.—THE EDITORS.

IT was a few days after the March revolution in Hungary and the overthrow of the Karolyi Government by the Bela Kun communist crowd that I joined a small group of American Army officers on a trip from Trieste to Vienna, to Prague, back to Vienna, and then to Belgrade. They were in the service of the American Relief Administration, and their object was to stimulate by personal conference with officials of the various new states which have been erected out of the fragments of the old Austro-Hungarian Empire the resumption of normal economic interchange. It was a hard mission, as I shall show later.

Pulling out of Trieste, the group settled into its first conference. The officer in charge began to outline the plan and policy. One of the first things he said was this:

"We're really back-firing against Bolshevism. You fellows are all familiar with the old Western method of stopping a prairie fire? I imagine most of us have seen it in operation. Now let me show you how it applies to our job down here."

Until you have seen it you can have no idea of the paralysis that has come upon the peoples of central and southeastern Europe. Paralysis is the right word. You get it into your head, after weeks of observation, that this wide land with its multitude of vigorous human beings is like a big man who has fallen from a cliff and shattered himself into complete paralysis. He has been under treatment of some sort for five months, and he is just beginning to wriggle his toes.

Hungry people, people out of work, people with daughters going on the streets instead of into the factories (which are closed), people ragged and barefoot, people whose savings are melting under the strain of keeping life in themselves, people who see their country's currency degenerating into a value only one-fifth of what it once was—these, so to speak, are the aching members of that great paralyzed body. They are seeking a cure. The old doctors were thrown out when the Central Powers crashed and revolutions broke Austria-Hungary into fragments.

Bolshevism is a cure-all. Its promoters are as shameless in their claims as any street vender of a snakeroot remedy discovered by an old Sioux medicine man and guaranteed to heal tomahawk wounds or ease an aching tooth. It is the sort of thing we all would like to believe. To the hungry and hopeless of German Austria and Hungary and Serbia and Rumania and Bulgaria it might very well seem the one way to economic recovery.

Bolshevism cares nothing for national boundaries, national pride, racial cohesion. It has a naïve belief that ordinary economic practices are no more essential than are men called kings. Throw everything into a pot, they say, and let everybody feed out of the pot—in some miraculous fashion the pot will continue to be filled. How? They should worry!

What the world heard directly after the armistice of November 11 was that Germany would rather sink into the economic slough of Bolshevism than make an effort to pay the tremendous indemnities certain to be imposed. That was a danger, as American investigators agreed. But the danger to Germany was slight as compared with that in the old Austro-Hungarian Empire.

I get back to the group of American officers in conference in the car.

"The big job," said the head of the group (though I do not pretend to quote him literally), "is the re-establishment of former economic relations between the peoples who have been segregated into the

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

Underwood & Underwood

A GROUP OF SUN SPOTS

This remarkable photograph shows with distinctness some of the enormous "sun spots" which have lately engaged the attention of astronomers. The photograph was taken at the Mount Wilson Observatory, near Pasadena, California, through a telescope specially mounted on a tower sixty feet high

(C) International Film Service

THE SCUTTLING OF THE GERMAN FLEET

Photographs just received in this country show actual incidents of the Scapa Flow destruction of the German fleet. In this picture the Hindenburg has sunk in rather shallow water and is resting evenly on the bottom

International Film Service

SIGNATURES TO THE TREATY OF PEACE

The signatures to the Treaty of Peace and the seals attached occupied several pages. Above at the left are shown the signatures of President Wilson, Mr. Lansing, Secretary of State, and Mr. White. At the right appear the signatures of the two German representatives, Herr Müller and Dr. Bell

(C) Linnell "Daily Mail," from Paul Thompson

THE KING'S PEACE PROCLAMATION

There is a mediæval aspect in this scene. The English Garter-King is publicly reading King George's Proclamation of Peace from the balcony of Friary Court, St. James's Palace, in London

Paul Thompson

BASTILLE DAY IN BROOKLYN

While the great French celebration of Bastille Day (July 14) was going on in Paris America's sympathy with her French ally was shown in Brooklyn, when these palms and wreaths were laid by American girls on the graves of French sailors in the United States National Cemetery various states. Go back to the revolutions that created Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia and trimmed German Austria to the size of an American county and isolated the Magyars in Hungary. They were the outcome not so much of hatred of the Hapsburgs as of a fierce desire to secure their own identities. Each new state was determined that it should live. Each was jealous of its neighbors and suspicious of its neighbors' intentions. Each pushed its claims for territory to the limit. Each felt the release of old bonds, and determined to avoid being tied up anew.

"When you consider that the old Austro-Hungarian Empire was held together by the interdependence of its elements economically and the co-ordination and control of transportation and communication, you can understand the dead stoppage which occurred when railways and telegraph and telephone lines were cut into fragments. And this chaos was further confused by the action of each of the new states in segregating the currency which happened to be in its possession and stamping it so that it could not be passed anywhere else.

"Then quarrels developed over the division of war materials, over the division of the assets of the Austro-Hungarian banks, over the responsibility for war debts, over the division of railway cars, engines, and railway materials. When the first representatives of the American Relief Administration made their entry into this region, they found nobody willing to deal with his neighbor.

"The Czechoslovaks were fighting the Poles over the Karwin coal mines, they were fighting the Hungarians over Pressburg; the Hungarians were at war with the Rumanians over Transylvania. Production in the coal-fields which had for generations supplied the needs of Central Europe had dropped to one-half of normal of the mines in operation and many mines were closed. The Italians and the new Yugoslav Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes were watching one another across the armistice line, each with blood in its eye.

"How could normal commerce go on between the states under such conditions? Never were conditions better for the spread of Bolshevism. And out of Russia the agents of Bolshevism were coming to excite the people to try their remedy. They were like the old outlaw hunters of the West who used to set the prairie afire in a score of places in order to drive the game in front of their guns. They had money and a fund of promises from Lenine, and they used both recklessly.

"The Allies—Italy, France, Great Britain, and the United States—decided that help must be given. A programme of relief was agreed upon; in the face of facts as to the great source of food supply, the major share of the programme had to be borne by America.

"The first essential, of course, was to send as much food as possible. A programme calling for the delivery of some 185,000 tons of breadstuffs and 15,000 tons of fats (pork products) per month for five months, ending June 30, was undertaken for the relief of the people of the old Austro-Hungarian Empire and Serbia and Montenegro. Our part was to secure through the United States Grain Corporation in America sufficient materials to fill the programme, from the Shipping Board the ships required to bring the stuff over, and arrange for the receipt of it by the Governments. Our job, theoretically, was over when the representatives of the Yugoslav and the Czechoslovak Governments receipted at the ports for the quantities agreed upon. But in fact getting food away from the ports has been the hardest part of the programme, because the limited supply of available engines and cars and the desperate shortage of coal led to serious disputes over the furnishing of equipment and coal. Then the food traffic began to run into border blockades of a military and political character. It seemed to us who had been inspired with a notion of the urgency of the relief programme that these people really were indifferent to suffering and death from starvation; otherwise, how could they put so many trivial obstacles in the way of getting our food through.

"Still, the untangling of the food movement snarls was a part of the day's work. It required all the diplomacy of an interallied commission, all the patience we could summon. We used threats and persuasion and cigarettes—everything we had ever heard of—to conciliate men who were exalted by a new nationalist spirit and full of hate and suspicion of their neighbors. In one case to secure the passage of our food trains across a border closed because the military authorities of one nation said that its flag had been insulted by soldiers of the adjoining state we had to appeal to the Supreme War Council in Paris and have the absolute direction of food traffic placed in the hands of Mr. Hoover, the Director-General of Relief for Europe. Whereupon we became railway operators as well as diplomats!

"But for the second part of the job we have undertaken it is fortunate that our powers have been enlarged and that we have had to come into intimate contact with the members of all the Governments. The fact that we are Americans, that we are representatives of President Wilson and backers of his theory of the self-determination of peoples, that we are not suspected of selfish designs, and that we are from a country which is known in Europe as the home of big business—these have made it possible for us to act as mediators. For example, the Czechs have surplus sugar and more coal than any other state of the old Empire. German Austria is in desperate need of both sugar and coal, and herself has surplus salt and certain manufactured products. The states adjoin, the railways cross the border; it ought to be simple for the business men of the two countries or the Ministers to get together and trade. But it isn't. When we get to Vienna, we shall hear what the German Austrians say is holding up this commerce. Then we shall go on to Prague and hear what the Czechs have to say. We shall go to Belgrade and take up with the Ministers of the Yugoslav Government certain questions that have come up to block the trading of wheat and corn and pork from the Banat and Batchka provinces into Hungary and German Austria.

"We can bring Governments to an understanding of one another and can in a sense guarantee the performance of contracts. Through the power granted by the Supreme War Council in the matter of transportation control we can assure square dealing between the states in the use of railway equipment."

Again my apologies to the officer who presided at this conference if I have put into his mouth things he did not say. I have, at least, tried to quote the substance of his talk.

We came to Vienna, the hungriest city in Europe, the most hopeless because of the complete stoppage of her manufacturing. Within an hour three Viennese business men representing very great interests were in conference. I have certain notes made at that conference and have numbered eleven separate trading proposals which our officers were asked to help realize. For instance, it was said that an association of business men of Vienna had arranged to secure 65,000 tons of coal from the Dombrowa district of Polish Silesia if transportation could be obtained and if we could get from the Czechoslovak Government a guarantee that the trains would be permitted to pass unmolested across that territory. Again, 40,000 tons had been optioned by another group, who proposed to distribute the coal to idle factories. Another contract with the Poles involved the exchange of manufactured goods from German Austria for 3,000 cars of potatoes—500 for the Railway Workers' Union, in order to satisfy the most pressing demands of these hungry and discontented men. Another committee from a neighboring state had come to place an order at Vienna for the construction of ninety locomotives.

Said the spokesman for these business men:

"I have just come from a meeting of the employees of the Chamber of Commerce in which was discussed the formation of a soldiers' and employees' council, with the ultimate object of setting up a communist government. If we can get food and coal here, this movement may be headed off.

"We have made a contract with the Hungarian Government (the communist crowd) for the unhindered transport of goods from German Austria to Rumania and the Ukraine in exchange for oil and food. You agree that we cannot live on the food the Allies are kind enough to send us—remember that there are some 5,300,000 people of the 7,000,000 in German Austria who at the most liberal estimate can produce only two-thirds of what is required to feed themselves—and so we ask you to do what you can to help us put through these trades.

"Specifically we should like you to secure for us the safe-conduct of trains to and from Poland and the Ukraine. If you could secure the opening of the Danube to traffic, you would not only help us but Czechoslovakia and Hungary. You would also make it possible for us to secure foodstuffs from the northern districts of Yugoslavia, where there are said to be 300,000 fattened pigs for sale. We have a contract with one agricultural society in those districts involving 120,000,000 kronen; but we can't move the products we have contracted for unless you can come to our assistance. In the Ukraine we know that there are thousands of cars of grain waiting to be sent out, because I was there last October to buy foodstuffs worth a billion kronen. In the harbors of Ukrainia I believe there are from five to ten thousand cars of grain we can purchase. Over there the krone is worth its old value. Help us to re-establish traffic on the Danube, and we can send manufactured goods and the poor Russian prisoners still in our country and bring back food.

"We have for exchange limited supplies of agricultural implements, steel, paper (especially print paper), chemicals, and salt. The season for salting pigs is at hand [this was early in April], and the 6,000 tons of surplus salt we have is in great demand in Ukrainia and northern Yugoslavia."

Two days later, at Prague, I heard the story of the Czechoslovaks. In conference with the Americans were three Ministers of the new Government, each with his proposals for securing our co-operation. I heard it explained that the Government could not enter upon contracts with the Government of German Austria because technically it was an enemy state, and I noted the telegram which was sent off that day to Paris by the chief of our mission requesting that this difficulty be removed. I heard threshed out the difficulties the Czechs had encountered in supplying coal and sugar to German Austria in exchange for cattle and machinery. I heard the promise made by the Minister of Transport that every assistance possible would be given in the movement of 3,000 cars of seed potatoes across Czechoslovakia from Germany to German Austria. I heard and saw what was arranged by the American officer charged with perfecting communications by telephone and telegraph into and beyond the country. I saw the chief of the Government system of communications working that day with a large force installing telephone and telegraph equipment in the Relief Administration's office. I met the officials who are co-operating with the American director of the child-feeding programme in Czechoslovakia—among them President Masaryk's daughter.

To hasten the better understanding between these neighbors, our mission took from Vienna to Prague an official from the German Austrian Food Controller's office who is most familiar with the sugar situation and an official from the Office of Public Works who knows most accurately the coal needs. Here, as in Vienna, I could not help seeing that the Government people believe thoroughly in American good will and in America's disinterestedness. They are leaning heavily upon us, in the expectation that we will be their most effective allies in fighting off that condition of hunger and unemployment which leads inevitably to Bolshevism.

Three days after the Prague conference we were in Belgrade. Here was called a conference with four Ministers of the new Yugoslav Government—the men in charge of finance, of commerce, of food, and of transportation. English, French, and Serbian had to be used, and in the three hours we talked a wide variety of economic proposals were taken up. Could we secure for Yugoslavia salt from German Austria? It was urgently needed by the pig-owning people. Could we help in getting motor cars for the country in order to set up some more or less adequate transportation system to supplement the broken main railway lines and stub-end lines of Serbia? Could we do anything to get the Danube opened to traffic? That was essential to the resumption of normal trading relations with Rumania and Czechoslovakia and German Austria.

We urged a relaxation of the Yugoslav order closing the country's boundary against German Austria, an order made to keep Bolshevik agents out, but so rigidly interpreted that even food traffic between the countries was interfered with. We pointed out the necessity of loading cars sent in with salt and manufactured products from German Austria with foodstuffs; and we took up the question of releasing flour grains from those northern provinces that have a surplus. We arranged to have submitted lists of products which might be exported to the United States in order to establish further credit and build up an export trade.

Serbia is desperately in need of materials for repairing her railways, her railway equipment, and her telegraph and telephone lines. For instance, this list of absolutely necessary material for starting work in the railway repair shop at Nish was submitted to us; remember that this is essential to start 75 men at work where 1,200 were employed before the war:

	Kilogrammes.
Tin . . . . .	5,000
Lead . . . . .	3,000
Antimony . . . . .	1,000
Zinc . . . . .	500
Phosphor bronze . . . . .	100
Graphite . . . . .	200
Graphite pots for smelting purposes; of 100 kilogrammes capacity, 5; of 120 kilogrammes capacity, 5; of 60 kilogrammes capacity, 15.
Copper and iron for foundry use, belts for transmission, tools to keep up standard-gauge and narrow-gauge lines of track.

Our communications expert was supplied with a long list of essential parts for telephone installation by the official in charge of the lines in Belgrade and northern Serbia.

These new Governments which have been erected on the ruins of the old Austro-Hungarian Empire are struggling to establish a régime under which the people will have a square deal. They are actually struggling with the economic problems which would confront Bolshevik leaders who came into power. Lenin in Russia and Bela Kun in Hungary are learning that international trade and finance and transportation must be maintained if people would live.

The Government Ministers who confer with the American officers of the Relief Administration are just as determined as the Bolsheviks to keep their countries free of the old autocracy of wealth and the exploitation of class by class. Their task is difficult; they are undertaking it with the knowledge that they are working against hunger and unemployment, against political unrest, against the active propaganda of agents sent out by Lenin and his crowd. They are largely untrained in government routine. They are working against time. Will they survive until the new crops? Can they guide their countries through the political and military tangles that are threatening to overthrow them and lead to bloody war over boundaries? Our American members of the Relief Administration who are in touch with them daily know with what anxiety these questions are discussed.

In a sane, in an orderly fashion these struggling Governments are trying to accomplish what the Bolsheviks promise to accomplish by revolution and fantastic disregard of all economic laws. They are offering food instead of proclamations, and straining every resource in order to get the food. They are seeking the raw materials needed to start idle factories instead of turning the people loose to loot the banks, the stores, and private homes. They are attempting to re-establish communications and transportation systems because they know that they are essential to life; by contrast, Bolshevik control has meant the disintegration of transportation through control by committees of workmen ignorant of technical problems.

It is in this sense that back-firing against Bolshevism is going on. It is because their efforts to stop the spread of an economically insane doctrine are important to the peace of the world during the next few years that the American Relief Administration, which is charged with the distribution of food supplied through the Congressional appropriation of $100,000,000 and through other financial arrangements in the case of German Austria and Hungary, is co-operating. This is the explanation of why America is not only sending food into Central Europe, but is also lending the aid of her representatives in re-establishing normal economic interchange.

VISIT JAPAN

BY MARGUERITE A. SALOMON

"Passports may be obtained for men and their families for travel to the Orient (except Siberia) for health and recreation"—so reads the bulletin issued by the United States Passport Bureau. For the first time, then, since the war one may visit Japan, China, and the Philippines for pleasure. The lifting of the ban against travel to the Orient comes at a specially fitting time, especially for tours to Japan, and every American who can take the trip should, for the attention of the Japanese at present is centered on the United States. Nothing would tend to create a better feeling between the two countries than for citizens of the United States to visit Japan. Besides, there is an educational value in such a trip just now which is very important. During the past year large numbers of prominent Japanese have come to the United States, mainly for the purpose of studying us. They come here to see how we live, how we act, and to get, if possible, our view-point. On the other hand, Americans who have visited Japan are in the smallest minority.

The trip to Japan is not so serious nor so great an undertaking as most persons believe. Allowing sixty days from the Atlantic coast, one can make a very fair and comprehensive tour which will include all the points of interest. Of course a more extended trip is desirable, as is the case with any tour, but two months' time is ample to see all of Japan proper.

In planning this trip the most essential thing is to decide just when to go. The end of March or the first of April and the end of September or the first part of October are the best times to leave the Pacific coast. Both the winter and the summer months in Japan are very trying to one who visits this country for the first time. The winter is extremely cold and it often snows very heavily. The Japanese homes, tea-houses, theaters, temples, and museums are not heated, and it is hard for the foreigner to become accustomed to the chilled rooms. Besides there is the grave danger of catching cold in these places. The roads are also very bad in winter and it is difficult to get about. On the other hand, summer weather in Japan is almost unbearably hot. One can get relief, to be sure, in mountain resorts like Karuizawa and Miyashita, but it is almost impossible to visit cities like Tokyo, Kyoto, Kobe, or Osaka in the summer-time with any degree of comfort. Added to this the summer usually brings most unpleasant typhoons, and the mosquitoes are especially annoying. June in Japan means the nyubai, or rainy season, and naturally one would not want a trip marred by an entire month of rain. One's whole impression of the country may be spoiled by visiting it in the wrong season.

The question of route is the next important thing to consider. For those who have never visited Japan my suggestion is to choose the southern route for the outbound trip and the northern route for the return journey. The southern route starts at San Francisco and allows for a stop of about a day at Honolulu. It is a most enjoyable experience. This is the longest route and takes several days more than the northern, but the weather is usually very fine, and one is well repaid for going that way. In returning by way of the north (landing either at Vancouver or Seattle) several days can be saved, thus allowing a longer stay in Japan. The southern route averages about eighteen days, and the northern route can be made by certain steamers in ten days.

The third important consideration is the question of clothes. One rarely finds a traveler to the Orient who takes exactly what is really needed. Most persons labor under the assumption that Japan has a tropical climate and that heavy clothes are not required. This is a mistake. For the southern route summer clothes are necessary at any season from the third day out of San Francisco to about the second day before reaching Yokohama. After that, if one travels during the months suggested above, it is best to have fairly warm things. A heavy coat will always be found necessary. The question of shoes is a very important one. A good stout pair of walking shoes should be in every equipment. There are no pavements to speak of in Japan and the little stones which are strewn over the roads to help settle the dust are very hard on one's shoes. It is also necessary to have a pair of shoes which can be slipped off and on very easily, for shoes have to be taken off in temples, in tea-houses, in Japanese theaters, and in Japanese homes. Woolen socks and stockings are also found very useful, for the traveler who is not accustomed to walking about in his stockinged feet finds the cold floors very uncomfortable; and it is well to take along a pair of soft woolen bed-socks, to be worn over the stockings, especially when walking over stone floors.

In order to see the most of Japan in a short time map out in advance some sort of plan of sightseeing. The following places, to be visited in the order in which they are given, include every important point of interest to the traveler: Yokohama, Kamakura, Tokyo, Nikko, Lake Chuzenji, Miyashita, Nagoya, Kyoto, Nara, Osaka, Kobe, and Miyajima. The length of time to be spent in each will depend upon the time at one's disposal. Roughly, the minimum time to allow for each should be something as follows: Yokohama, two days; Kamakura, one day; Tokyo, two days; Nikko, two days; Lake Chuzenji, one day; Miyashita, three days; Nagoya, one day; Kyoto, one week; Nara, two days; Osaka, one day; Kobe, one day; and two days at Miyajima. From Miyajima the return trip can be made to Kobe for embarkation to the United States, or one can go directly to Yokohama and board the ship there.

All hotels in Japan are conducted on the American plan. Rates range from ten yen ($5) a day up. Japanese inns charge about the same rates as the hotels. The hotels are conducted in foreign style, with foreign beds and foreign meals. The inns are purely Japanese, serving Japanese meals and the guests sleep on the floor.

While in cities like Yokohama, Tokyo, Kobe, Osaka, and Kyoto there are a limited number of motor cars and taxis for hire, the general mode of conveyance is by jinrikisha (or kuruma, as it is really called in Japan). There are standard kuruma rates, which can be obtained from the hotel clerk. It is always best to know before you start on a trip the exact fare. This often avoids unpleasant encounters with the kuruma-ya (the man who pulls the rikisha). Also it is well to have addresses written in Japanese before starting for any particular point. The hotel clerks are most obliging in this detail and will gladly write the addresses. This saves much time and annoyance in locating a destination.

There is really no difficulty about the language in Japan, for almost every storekeeper and kuruma-ya can speak a little English and English-speaking guides can always be secured.

A very helpful aid is the Japan Tourist Bureau. A branch of the Tourist Bureau can be found in almost every railway station, and its headquarters are in Tokyo. The Japan Tourist Bureau is a part of the Imperial Government Railways System, and it issues dozens of very useful pamphlets and maps of all points of interest in the Empire, all of which can be obtained free of charge.

For shopping the tourist will probably find Yokohama most adapted to his needs. The products from every corner of the Empire can be found here in hundreds of attractive shops.

The currency of Japan is not unlike that of the United States. There are copper one and two sen pieces, nickel five sen pieces, and silver ten, twenty, and fifty sen pieces. Paper currency is also issued in denominations of ten, twenty, and fifty sen, and one, five, ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred yen notes. The value of the sen is about half a cent (gold) and the yen about fifty cents.

Finally, it is well to remember that the word "hurry" has no place in the Japanese vocabulary, and the tourist who understands this perfectly is assured a happy trip.

HOMELY ECONOMICS

Mr. Theodore H. Price writes to us that his "article upon 'Some Homely Economics' seems to have struck a responsive note" and that he is "getting many letters about it." He sends one of these letters, which we print herewith. The writer of this letter, an Outlook subscriber in Kentucky, indorses Mr. Price's warning against the dangers of extravagance. Some readers, we think, who recognize these dangers will see a distinction between indulgence in ten-dollar silk shirts and the use of automobiles. What some regard as luxuries others call necessities. In the list of necessities Mr. Price himself included tobacco. Not everybody would place it there, though a good many men would if they were as frank as Mr. Price. The fact is that thrift does not necessarily mean stopping progress in the standard of living—as indicated by graduation from buggies to automobiles—or even the deprivation of the pleasant things of life, but the denial of those things whose cost is incommensurate with their value to the user. The French, who are proverbially skilled in making and enjoying some of the best things of life, from food to the fine arts, are also proverbially thrifty. The letter which Mr. Price sends us follows.—THE EDITORS.

I have read and re-read your article, "Some Homely Economics," in The Outlook of July 9.

It is an excellent and timely warning of a real and impending danger. Were I to find any fault with it, it would be to say that you treat the subject in too light a vein.

The tendency to useless extravagance is an immensely serious matter. Living as I do in a small inland town, with a population, "counting the whites," of something less than 20,000, and with little personal knowledge of the habits of other communities, I am, judging the balance of our country by what I daily see, impressed with the belief that we are the most lavishly, wildly, foolishly extravagant people on the face of the earth, spending what we earn, not in betterments, but in unnecessary things that perish in the using.

Our community, especially our farm people, are prosperous and patriotic. We have put nearly three million dollars in Liberty Bonds. Our bank deposits are nearly twice what they were in 1913, and yet I am sorry to say that little seems to be going into farm improvements, better houses, better fences, barns, tilling of lands, good roads, or better schoolhouses. It is going, I say, into things that perish in the using.

A few instances for illustration:

A retail merchant of our town recently told me that he had ordered a half-dozen pairs of ladies' fancy dress shoes which he could not sell for less than $12 a pair; he was afraid to order more. But these half-dozen pairs were quickly snapped up. A farmer came into his store. He had just been paid for his crop of tobacco. Out of the proceeds he paid for six fancy silk shirts at $10 each—$60. These would seem to me to be the acts of light-headed, foolish people were it not for the fact that I see around me every day, almost hourly, just as incredible evidences of foolish waste.

The disease manifests itself here, and I judge all over the country, in the automobile craze. There are now very many more automobiles in this county than there were buggies a few years ago; many of them—most of them, in fact—are owned by people who really cannot afford such a luxury, and, say what you will about the useful purposes to which automobiles may be put, they are ninety-nine per cent mere luxuries. An automobile for the average family is an expensive vehicle; its life is short, and its upkeep very considerable. But on a Saturday, in addition to those owned by the town folk, you can see hundreds—yes, hundreds—of them driven in by farmers whose lands need draining, tilling, and other improvements. The automobile, to my mind, is a greater economic problem than the tariff; it is next to the League of Nations in importance.

I hope you will keep up the discussion. Surely our people can be educated, if only slowly, to a little common prudence. Don't call it "Homely Economics." It is a matter of vast, vital, far-reaching importance.

Although I am now nearly eighty years old, I am almost afraid that I shall live to see the evil consequences of our wasteful habits. It will be hard to live through the time of depression that is sure to come.

MALCOLM YEAMAN.

Henderson, Kentucky.

SOCIALISTS AND CAPITALISTS

Every so often—but not so very often—the "conservative," by which we mean also the preservative, press carries an imprint that shows an adult, matured understanding of revolutionary tendencies. It happened in our issue of June 4, at the hands of Mr. Price, and it was refreshing.

We are in danger of making one costly mistake. We are prone to pass judgment upon a doctrine that has been built around a basic idea, and to accept or reject the whole thing rather than to take up the basic idea alone, to see what it is made of or to estimate what can be done with it.

It is possible that such leading lights as Karl Marx and John Stuart Mill were not free from this unphilosophic failing.

For instance: Socialism is a principle of social dynamics that implies collective interests and socially sympathetic motives. But Socialists have burdened themselves with a programme that calls for a war upon the Capitalist system. But Capitalism is also a principle, more newly discovered than Socialism, and one that the leaders in capitalistic enterprise have not learned to use to its full potencies. Both they and the Socialists imagine that it is a class function, necessarily in conflict with Socialism.

Neither Capitalists nor Socialists appear to realize that these two principles are jointly in historic conflict with another, a principle that was old ten thousand years ago and that is dominant in every hamlet and city on the globe to-day. That is anarchy, a daily, universal experiment that always fails to work, and that has its "philosophic" school looking forward to its "adoption" in a vague future of perfected and super-enlightened humanity.

Our immediate task is to understand that Socialism and Capitalism as basic ideas represent parallel efforts on the part of a growing social intelligence to overcome the crudities of prehistoric anarchism as it remains with us, and the achievement of order and efficiency in social and business activities.

Socialists refuse to admit that big business is doing the world's work to-day better than it was ever done before; Capitalists have not the business sense to see that Socialism means the universal triumph of their big idea; every possible share of stock sold in advance and dividends rolling in as fast as a common interest in getting out the work as fast and as well as it can be done can accomplish the feat.

So anarchy continues to breed, plan, and make war, so far as it still rules, within and between the nations.

Hollywood, California.

A. GEORGE.

TOLSTOY, NIETZSCHE, AND JESUS

With the signing of peace has fallen the philosophical house and fortune of Friedrich Nietzsche.

Nietzsche says, "Hate!" Yet if we did not hate, we would not strive against evil. Jesus must have hated evil when he drove the changers from the Temple. He also must have believed in the use of force. On that day and on the day he arraigned the scribes and Pharisees he was probably not a "Christian gentleman." Yet in his discourses he wandered in the idealized land of the non-resistance of evil. When the stars shine on a summer night, we say, "Henceforth whosoever shall smite me on the right cheek, to him I shall turn the other." But the next day, in the conflict of many interests, when put to it, we fight. And it is well that we do, for evil unrestrained is evil triumphant.

Tolstoy taught Russia the doctrine of the non-resistance of evil, just as the early Christians taught it to Rome. Tolstoy thought that if you do away with police and courts and most institutions restraining men peace will reign and men will love one another. He thought that the strong would help the weak. This implies, of course, that the weak, as well as the strong, would propagate. Nietzsche also favored the abolition of most government institutions restraining men, not in order that peace might reign, but that hate might reign and that violence might have a free hand. Out of the hate and the violence the strong only would survive. They alone are fit to propagate. Why burden the strong with the weak? The strong should be helped, not the weak. The weak breed only more weak. It is the strong that should carry forward the stream of civilization. Strange antagonists, Tolstoy and Nietzsche! Both starting from freedom, one points to the golden city of love, the other to the bloody city of power.

Nietzsche was right in the hope of a humanity always stronger. But his method was wrong. The future of mankind lies, not in war and conflict, but in artificial selection. Surely the state has the right to demand that its citizens shall be well born. Surely it has the right to say to the unfit, "Thou shalt not bring forth sons and daughters of degeneracy." All of which, however, need not deny them marriage.

Tolstoy's golden city of love is the vision of all dreamers. But Tolstoy's method, like Nietzsche's, was wrong. Given freedom from restraint, men do not love, but devour one another, as in Russia now under the Bolsheviks. Instead of brotherly love, Russia will have nothing but blood and more blood, until the Man on the Horse appears. It is the Terror again, Robespierre proclaiming love by way of the ax.

Nietzsche's doctrine has been tried and has failed. The madness of his pages as a guide to nations has contributed to the untimely death of over ten million persons. As Rousseau was the philosophical mouthpiece of the French Revolution, Nietzsche was the dialectic spokesman of Prussianism—the doctrine that murder, arson, pillage, so long as they contribute to Germany's material benefit, would be justifiable in the sight of God, if there were one, and are for the ultimate benefit of the human race.

Henceforth Nietzsche will have only historical interest. Sword-rattling as a philosophical system is silent forever. Nietzsche's bust has fallen and is dust. No cement of the intellect can restore it, no worship of brutality ever again can give it human semblance. Had the Germans succeeded, the ethics of Christianity would have perished. But the doctrine of the will to power has been defeated by the doctrine of the will to service. The integrity of the earth has been maintained. Nietzsche has been defeated by Jesus. MAX EHRMANN.

Terre Haute, Indiana.

BOLSHEVIKI AND I. W. W.

I do not agree with Mr. Price when he states in his article in The Outlook of June 4 that Lenin and other leaders of the Bolsheviks and I. W. W. have "simply focused heartaches."

It seems to me that they have simply focused backaches. In other words, I believe that the average Bolshevik and I. W. W. hate work, and prefer to live on the savings of others.

They do not talk of creating new industries, but always propose to take from the rightful owners the control of business which is already organized. In their ignorance, they do not realize that any business depends for its success on the brains of the managers, and not on the muscles of the workman.

There always have been, and always will be, loafers and thieves, regardless of hours and wages.

Many of the Bolsheviks and I. W. W. are unmitigated rascals, and the world would be a better place to live in if they were shot.

The solution of the Bolshevism and I. W. W. question rests with the police rather than with the sentimentalist.

Hartford, Connecticut.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

THE SCARBOROUGH SCHOOL, SCARBOROUGH-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK

Based on The Outlook of July 23, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The President Reports to the Country; Makes a Comparison; Appeals for Support; The President, the Senate, and the Treaty.

Reference: Pages 457; 464-466.

Questions:

1. According to President Wilson, as reported in The Outlook, why did America enter the world war? A critic of President Wilson's interpretation of why America went to war says that "nowhere in the declaration of war made by Congress in April, 1917, is there a remote suggestion of the ideal set forth by Mr. Wilson." Read the war declaration by our Congress. Read all of what President Wilson says on this point. Why did America enter the war? Discuss. 2. President Wilson speaks of the new order of ideas and of the old order of ideas. Make several comparisons of these two sets of ideas. 3. In The Outlook's "Poll of the Press" a number of editors make considerable sport of President Wilson's continual reference to the "ideals" and the "vision" for which the war was fought. Have visions and ideals played a considerable part in American history and in the history of other leading nations? Are nationality, manifest destiny, religion, democracy, and patriotism essentially ideals? Be specific, illustrate, and discuss at length (see bibliography below). 4. Discuss whether President Wilson made "too great concessions to the alleged imperialistic designs of our own allies." 5. Discuss also "whether the liberty of the United States to determine its own foreign policy has been sufficiently safeguarded" in the Treaty. 6. Tell what you think of this comment by the Des Moines "Capital": "The thing to do is to adopt the Covenant, Treaty and all, and fight the other difficulties out afterwards." 7. Name and discuss several lessons Americans should learn from the study of this topic. 8. The following books deal with these questions: "The Power of Ideals in American History," by E. D. Adams (Yale University Press); "The Spiritual Interpretation of History," by Shailer Mathews (Harvard University Press); "In Our First Year of War," by Woodrow Wilson (Harpers); "American Patriotism in Prose and Verse," by J. M. Gathany (Macmillan).

B. Topic: Why the Kaiser Should be Tried; The Hermit of Amerongen.

Reference: Pages 462, 463; 469-472.

Questions:

1. Vicente Blasco-Ibáñez hopes that

William II will shoot himself. Explain his position. 2. The Outlook hopes that the Kaiser will not shoot himself. Restate its reasons. 3. With which are you inclined to agree? Why? 4. How does Vicente Blasco-Ibáñez characterize William II? Does it seem to you that this picture of the Kaiser is overdrawn? Reasons. 5. On the whole, does history show that "divine-right" monarchs are superficial and worthless beings? Illustrate liberally. 6. What is the public law of nations? Discuss its character. 7. Discuss these two statements by Vicente Blasco-Ibáñez: "Life is nothing but a web of absurd realities." "There is no reason to suppose that life is just or logical." Are these expressions satire or sound moral philosophy? Distinguish.

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: The Irish Question in America.

Reference: Page 459.

Questions:

1. Tell frankly what you think of the reception and conduct of Mr. de Valera in America. 2. Discuss whether, in your opinion, he is hindering more than helping the Irish cause. 3. What do you think is the ultimate object of the agitation of the Irish question in the United States? Is it to get the American Government officially committed in favor of Ireland as against England, and thus cause war between Great Britain and America? Describe the consequences of such a war. 4. Do you agree with The Outlook in saying that American citizens of Irish descent should abstain from violent agitation of political matters in another country? Reasons. 5. Is President Wilson unstatesmanlike in refusing to champion the wishes of the Sinn Feiners? Discuss. 6. Tell with reasons whether the action of the American Senate in voting for a hearing for the Irish cause by the Peace Conference was a piece of reckless party politics.

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. A revolutionist in a modern democracy is a political criminal. 2. History shows that Americans as a race are more sentimental than reasonable. 3. The Irish live in the past—their grievances are historical.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for July 23, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Mountebanks (465); pedantries, gullible persons, simian ability, inexplicable (469); canonized, Protean character, crises (470).

BY THE WAY

The British Foreign Minister, the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, lately gave leave to representatives of an Edinburgh museum to dig for antiquities on his estate near the city, promising that all finds should become national property. To their joy they turned up a mass of silver plates and church vessels, perhaps fifteen hundred years old, and a few Roman coins. Many of the pieces bore emblems of early Christianity. They were battered and were probably spoils seized by ancient pirates and intended for the melting-pot.

Apropos of alleged confusion in America's ideas as to why she is at the Peace Conference, some one remarks: "We seem to be in Europe on much such a mission as Mark Twain told about in his prospectus of chartering a comet for a sight-seeing trip. 'We shall,' he said, 'visit the fixed stars, but such stars as need fixing we shall fix.'"

Bishop Partridge is a collector of anecdotes about ministers. Here is one of his stories: "I once asked a minister how he had got through a certain service. He answered, grimly: 'Well, Bishop, the service was soothing, moving, and satisfying.' 'Yes,' I said, a little puzzled. 'Yes, exactly,' said he. 'It was soothing, because over half the congregation went to sleep. It was moving, because half of the other half left before I was through. And it must have been satisfying, inasmuch as I wasn't asked to come again.'"

The eccentricities of filing systems are boundless. One is related by a soldier of an officer who was looking in vain for records of the Sunday morning service. "They are filed under 'H,'" the sergeant in charge of the files told him. "Why under 'H'?" "Because it begins at half-past nine, sir."

A Cleveland reader, in response to a query in "By the Way" as to why Bridgeport, Ohio is distinguished by having the longest bar in the world, says:

"I would suggest that you obtain a map of Ohio, if one can be secured in New York (the State has recently been explored by New Yorkers, at considerable risk of their lives from hostile Indians, and has been mapped sufficiently well for our purpose), and find the town in question. This town is in the southeastern part of the State, on the Ohio River, one of the tributaries of the Mississippi. On the other side of this river, which has its head-waters in New York near Salamanca, is a city called Wheeling, the metropolis of a State called West Virginia. This State has, you may remember, been dry for several years. 'Dry' is an expression which probably has no meaning for New Yorkers, but which is reasonably familiar in Ohio outside of the Indian Reservations. For several years the Indians would ferry the thirsty inhabitants of Wheeling across the Ohio River to this town of Bridgeport, where they could slake their thirst, and since the construction of a bridge across the river the rush of temporary residents to this State has been so great that the bar in question had to be enlarged."

It used to be said that sailors sometimes mistook seals for the fabled sirens. Modern science reverses the fable. It is said that a phonograph has been put to a very novel use by seal hunters of the Pacific. It is set up near the rendezvous of the animals, and soon its music attracts their attention and they lift their heads well above the water.

By the Way (Continued)

A hunter reports that he has been able to shoot large numbers of them while they are under the spell of the sounds so strange to their ears.

Says a wise philosopher in the Topeka "Capital": "It doesn't do any good to hurry unless you have something to do when you get there."

Among the experiences in library work for soldiers is the following: "I knew one private soldier who conceived a fervent admiration for Ouida through taking 'Moths' out of the battalion library under the impression that it was a work on entomology, a subject in which he was deeply interested."

What is the oldest tune? London "Answers" says that it is the one known to us as going with "For he's a jolly good fellow." It has been said that this tune was brought back from the East by the Crusaders, and that the ancient Egyptians learned it from the Babylonians. This idea, which apparently was first suggested by Chateaubriand, who heard Arabs singing the tune, is mentioned only to be scouted in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians." Two centuries ago the air was sung by the French to their satirical song "Malbrouk s'en va-t-en guerre," which became immensely popular in its revival at the time of the French Revolution and is said to be the only tune Napoleon could sing.

So much has been said in criticism of our air mail system that it is pleasing to read in a Post Office Department bulletin that a record of ninety-nine per cent was made by the Air Mail Service between Washington and New York for the month of June, covering a mileage of 11,118 and carrying 15,643 pounds of mail. On the Cleveland-Chicago division a perfect score of one hundred per cent was obtained.

The young lady, says the San Francisco "Argonaut," had purchased a book in a department store and tendered a ten-dollar note for it. Then she began to read. Finally the change came, but the girl demurred. "I want another book," she said. "But you asked for that one," insisted the clerk. "I know it," she answered, sweetly, "but I've read it while I was waiting for my change."

The engineer, says an exchange, had become tired of the boastful talk he heard from the other engine-drivers at his boarding-house. One evening he began: "This morning I went over to see a new machine we've got at our place, and it's astonishing how it works." "And how does it work?" asked one. "Well," was the reply, "by means of a pedal attachment a fulcrumed lever converts a vertical reciprocating motion into a circular movement. The principal part of the machine is a huge disk that revolves in a vertical plane. Power is applied through the axis of the disk, and work is done on the periphery, and the hardest steel by mere impact may be reduced to any shape." "What is this wonderful machine?" was asked. "A grindstone," was the reply.

The teacher, relates London "Tit-Bits," was giving the class a natural history lecture on Australia. "There is one animal," she said, "none of you have mentioned. It does not stand up on its legs all the time. It does not walk like other animals, but takes funny little skips. What is it?" And the class yelled with one voice: "Charlie Chaplin."

Help—not Too Late, but when most needed

When a father dies without life-insurance, the mother and children are the ones that suffer most. The POSTAL LIFE recently received a very touching letter from a sorrowing wife whose husband put off protecting his family until it was "too late."

Women and children are indeed the ones to whom an insurance policy means most. It is help—not "too late," but when most needed.

Here is a letter to the POSTAL from a thankful wife, whose husband did not leave her unprotected:

On Saturday I received my check on the life of my husband. Words cannot express what a help that check will be, as I am left with a little boy to bring up. As soon as he can be insured it will be with the Postal Life. I thank you for your promptness and kindness.

This typical letter and picture tell the story—a story of protection, performance and promise. The father protected his family; the Company paid the death-claim promptly; the mother promised to stand by the Company—and she will.

That's co-operation all along the line. That's what has built up the POSTAL LIFE from small beginnings. That's what has helped to make it the Company of safety, service and saving.

Find Out What You Can Save

on any standard form of policy, whether to protect your family or to make you independent in old age.

Simply write a line mentioning THE OUTLOOK for July 30 and giving (a) your exact date of birth, (b) your occupation. No agent will be sent to visit you, but full insurance particulars will be promptly forwarded—by mail only. Address,

POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

WM. R. MALONE, President
511 Fifth Avenue, cor. 43d St.
New York City

Strong Postal Points

FIRST: Standard Policy Reserve. Resources more than $9,000,000. Insurance in force, $40,000,000.

SECOND: Old-line legal reserve insurance—not fraternal or assessment.

THIRD: 96% dividends guaranteed in your Policy and the usual contingent dividends paid as earned.

FOURTH: Standard policy provisions, approved by the New York State Insurance Department.

FIFTH: Operates under strict New York State requirements and subject to the United States Postal Authorities.

SIXTH: High medical standards in the selection of risks.

SEVENTH: Policyholders' Health Bureau provides one free medical examination each year, if desired.

Tours and Travel

CHRYSANTHEMUM SEASON

in the Far East

Join the AMERICAN EXPRESS tour under personal escort leaving San Francisco October 17 for a wonderful visit to Japan and China at the best season of the year.

ROUND-THE-WORLD extension of same tour. Write for itinerary.

AMERICAN EXPRESS

Travel Department

65 Broadway, New York
23 West Monroe St., Chicago
Market and 2d Sts., San Francisco

Summer in the National Parks, California, Canadian Rockies

Motoring, camping, trapping, horseback riding, fishing. Booklet. THE TEMPLE TOURS, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

Apartments

WANTED—THREE APARTMENTS

unfurnished, in same building in New York City. No. 1. Containing living-room or studio, dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms, bathroom and maid's room. No. 2. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. No. 3. Containing living room or studio, bedroom and bath. Location preferably out of the usual beaten paths, something not usually rented if possible, and preferably in a private house altered for such purpose. Nothing south of Greenwich Village nor north of 72d Street will be considered. Occupancy October 1, 1919. Address CHARLES H. DAVIS, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

Hotels and Resorts

MASSACHUSETTS

HOTEL PURITAN
Commonwealth Ave. Boston
THE DISTINCTIVE BOSTON HOUSE
Globe travelers call the Puritan one of the most homelike hotels in the world.
Your inquiries will be gladly answered and our booklet mailed.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little house by the sea. PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

NEW YORK CITY

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square
adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

Hotel Le Marquis

31st Street & Fifth Avenue
New York

Combines every convenience and home comfort, and commends itself to people of refinement wishing to live on American Plan and be within easy reach of social and dramatic centers.

Room and bath $4.50 per day with meals, or $1.50 per day without meals.
Illustrated Booklet readily sent upon request.
JOHN P. TOLSON.

MAINE

Robinhood Inn and Cottages
Bailey Island, Me., opened June 15. Bathing, fishing, sailing. For circular, Miss Massey.

NEW YORK

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of wild-est Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, tennis, saddle horses. Tramps to surrounding mountain peaks, Lake George and Lake Champlain. Dancing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $16 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

Rye Seminary Inn

RYE, N. Y. 7 acres of beautiful grounds. 3 minutes from station. Only 30 guests. Trolleys to bathing beach. Open June 15 to September 15. 50 minutes from New York. Rates per person $25.00 weekly up. Telephone Rye 32.

Health Resorts

Crest View Sanatorium
Greenwich, Ct. First-class in all respects, home comforts. H. M. HITCHCOCK, M.D.

Health Resorts

"INTERPINES"

Beautiful, quiet, restful and homelike. Over 25 years of successful work. Thorough, reliable, dependable and ethical. Every comfort and convenience. Accommodations of superior quality. Disorder of the nervous system a specialty. Fred. W. Seward, Sr., M.D. Fred. W. Seward, Jr., M.D., Goshen, N. Y.

LINDEN The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Doylestown, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LUFFINCOTT WALTER, M.D. (late of The Walter Sanitarium)

CREST VIEW

For nervous and convalescent patients.
R. H. CHASE, M.D., and E. C. McDANIEL, Booklet. Wyncote, Pa.

Dr. Reeves' Sanitarium

A Private Home for chronic, nervous, and mental patients. Also elderly people requiring care. Harriet E. Reeves, M.D., Melrose, Mass.

Country Board

AFTER SEPT. 15. Board for four ladies in a pleasant home with modern comforts. For reference and information address Miss Farr, Box 307, Saybrook, Conn.

COUNTRY BOARD, New Jersey.
Nurse's private home accommodates few convalescents and elderly people requiring care. 65 Halsted St., East Orange, N. J.

COUNTRY BOARD, NEW JERSEY. PRIVATE HOME desires elderly lady guests. Excellent table. Trained nurses in attendance. Phone 8273, Newark, N. J.

Real Estate

CONNECTICUT

FOR SALE OR LEASE

Attractive country place of 80 acres located on State highway, 7 miles from Pomfret Station, Conn.

Colonial type, weathered shingled house, 15 rooms and 8 baths. Wide entrance hall with living and dining rooms each 33 by 18 feet opening off, both with large open fireplaces. Large pantry, kitchen, storeroom, and servant's dining-room. House heated by hot-air furnace; 2 separate systems supply water to house and stable. Large barn, garage, workshop, hen houses, ice house, ice pond, wonderful springs, well with well sweep, garden house, etc.; ample pasturage and tillable land and large acreage of natural timber. House stands 1/2 mile from highway and commands wide view of hills and valleys for many miles; 12-ft. piazza extends 3 sides. Abundance of shrubbery, fine shade trees, also rose garden, vegetable garden, and practically all varieties of fruit, also grape arbor. An ideal home for either summer or permanent occupancy. Arrangements can be made to include all farm equipment in sale or lease. House largely furnished with antique furniture, the purchase of which might be entertained. Cellar under entire house. Everything in excellent condition. Address the owner, W. D. GLENN, Phoenixville, Windham Co., Conn.

MAINE

FOR SALE

ON PENOBSCOT BAY
OPPOSITE CASTINE

Fine old estate. About 300 acres, 1,000 cords wood, some timber, 1200 ft. shore frontage. 14-room house, 2 barns, orchard. Also adjoining farm 8 acres, 7-room cottage and barn. Good repair; now occupied. Sold as a going concern with stock and tools at $11,000. JONES SISTERS, West Brooksville, Maine.

MASSACHUSETTS

Summer Hotel For Sale

One of the best propositions on North Shore. Beautiful hillside, with bathing beach; most wonderful location; a small inn, 45 rooms; always turns away more than are accommodated; in good repair, part new; room for large extension; present owner retiring. 387, Outlook.

NEW JERSEY

FOR RENT, Furnished. Attractive live home at Morristown, for August. Twelve rooms, three bedrooms, garden, garage. Rent $200. Possibly cook. 845, Outlook.

Real Estate

NEW JERSEY

SUMMIT, N. J. 87 New
$50,000 Suburban Residence FOR SALE. Lot 150 x 400 ft. 13 rooms, 3 baths, basement and attic. For circular apply W. H. GRANT, 155 Fifth Avenue, N. Y.

For Sale, at great sacrifice

14-ROOM HOUSE, 2 baths, 2 verandas, all improvements, 1/2 acre on hill 8 minutes from depot. New York suburb. Excellent opening for school or boarding house. Suitable for sanitarium. Tenafly, N. J. 833, Outlook.

NEW YORK

FOR SALE

CANNON POINT
ESSEX-ON-LAKE CHAMPLAIN
NEW YORK

1 1/2 miles south of village, 7 1/2 acres, partly wooded with pine, hemlock, cedar, and variety of deciduous trees. Small summer bungalow on point 30 feet above lake, commanding wonderful view of lake, Green Mountains, Split Rock Mountain and lighthouse two miles distant. Bungalow has hall used for living-room, two sleeping-rooms, bath, servant's room. Veranda 80x12 feet, upper balcony 55x12 feet, detached den and guest room, kitchen and storeroom annexed. Excellent water supply from lake; Rider & Ericsson hot air engine; tank capacity 1,100 gallons. Ice-house containing small cold storage. Boat house with man sleeping quarters. Beautiful beach and bay, good harbor for boats, two buoys. Cliffs of porphyry rock rise 75 feet above the lake, forming the most beautiful natural site on Lake Champlain. Premises never occupied except by owner, who can be addressed or seen during summer months.
Mrs. ENOCH H. CURRIER
Essex-on-Lake Champlain, New York

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential section, suburbs of New York City. Half hour Grand Central; all modern subway. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 50 x 100. Garages. Price $5,500. Full particulars from owner, 9,815, Outlook.

WEST VIRGINIA

SALE, Corner Lot five college town in Alleghenies. Delightful climate. Two houses, city water, gas, electricity, garden, well, fruit. Attractive proposition for boarding or three-family apartment. Rents readily. Insured two years. No taxes six years. $2,500 cash, $5,000 six years' time. 851, Outlook.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

WANTED—450 Outlook readers to represent this publication this summer—and all through the year, if you like. You can easily earn $10 a week and more, simply by using an hour or two a day of your spare time. If you want extra spending money—and everybody does—write us for details of the Outlook's co-operative profit plan. Simply address Representatives' Division, Desk 2, The Outlook, 381 Fourth Ave., New York City.

BOOKS, MAGAZINES

FOR SALE—5 bound volumes of The Theatre Magazine—1903 to and including 1907. What is offered? 7,133, Outlook.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CMF Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

FOR PATRIOTIC HOME MISSIONS. Wanted, two young men. One, a stenographer, high school or college graduate, to be secretary to the president. One, a college graduate, to teach mathematics. Fine location and rewarding work. For particulars address Wm. G. Frost, President, Berea College, Berea, Ky.

WANTED—Experienced man who can take charge of kitchen, bakery, pantry, dining hall, laundry, housekeeping, and supplies and engage employees in institution near Philadelphia serving five hundred people. 7,181, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

WANTED—Refined, educated girl to accept permanent home in Christian household as mother's helper; children three, six, and eight. 7,188, Outlook.

LARGE family, simple country place, want to employ refined woman as cook. Three other employees. Professional servant not wanted. Mrs. Stanley Bright, Reading, Pa.

HELP WANTED

Companions and Domestic Helpers

WANTED—Cook and chambermaid—waitress for American family with three children living in Greenwich, Conn., all the year. Excellent wages and best conditions; considerate treatment. Must be thoroughly competent and of superior intelligence and character. Mrs. Wm. H. Fahn, Greenwich, Conn.

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

TEACHER wanted for children's home, Bethlehem, Pa. Ages six to fourteen. Salary $50 month and board, room, laundry. Address Mrs. H. J. Meyers, Bethlehem, Pa.

WANTED, August 24, governess for child four years old. American, Protestant. One who can speak French preferred. Permanent position if satisfactory. 7,179, Outlook.

INQUIRIES already coming in for teachers in all subjects for 1919. International Musical and Educational Agency, Carnegie Hall, N. Y.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Business Situations

YOUNG WOMAN, college graduate, with five years' business experience, desires secretarial or stenographic position in a girl's or boys' boarding school or college for the coming winter. 7,175, Outlook.

WANTED—Position in doctor's office, young lady of some experience. 7,183, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

BY young lady of refinement, position, companion to elderly lady. References exchanged. State wages offered. 7,174, Outlook.

COMPANION, traveled extensively, nursing experience, good household manager, well educated, references, desires position. Write, care Cheshire, 74 Farrington St., Flushing, L. I.

YOUNG LADY, slightly hard of hearing, wishes position as companion. Understands lip-reading. Christian. References. 7,176, Outlook.

WANTED—Position as managing housekeeper or companion by middle-aged widow of experience. References furnished. 7,180, Outlook.

A woman of refinement would like care of gentleman's home. Capable of taking entire charge. Best of references furnished. 7,184, Outlook.

LADY desires to place her excellent English nurse with family going to England or France in early fall. Will take charge of children or invalid in return for passage. Absolutely reliable. Write Mrs. Theodore Lilly, Tolland, Mass.

EDUCATED COUPLE, without children, seeking place in fine family; man, Hollander, as secretary-companion, invalid care, supervisor; woman, French, as electrician, companion, French teacher, speaks English, French, Dutch, Latin, German. Would travel. Excellent references. 7,187, Outlook.

By refined middle-aged woman as companion, mother's helper, or nursery governess for two children. References. Address Mrs. Smiddy, P. O. Box 586, Rye, N. Y.

Teachers and Governesses

TEACHER of mathematics and French wishes position. 7,183, Outlook.

KINDERGARTNER, with fourteen years' experience, desires position for autumn in New York City. 7,185, Outlook.

GOVERNESS OR NURSERY GOVERNESS. Mrs. Charles H. Davis recommends most highly an English governess who has been with her for three years and is leaving in September. Address Miss J. M. Perry or Mrs. Davis, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

YOUNG lady, college graduate with two years' teaching experience, desires position as governess or tutor for the following year. Excellent references. 7,190, Outlook.

MISCELLANEOUS

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Frances Parker Memorial Hospital, Brunswick, Me. J.

GREGG shorthand. If your school does not teach shorthand, let me send you two months' expense by correspondence course. 7,165, Outlook.

M. W. Wightman & Co. Shopping Agency, established 1895. No charge; prompt delivery. 44 West 22d St., New York.

SUB-NORMAL children can be placed ideally with well-trained, experienced women. 7,177, Outlook.

YOUR WANTS IN EVERY LINE

of household, educational, business, or personal service—domestic workers, teachers, nurses, business or professional assistants, etc., etc.—whether you require help or are seeking a situation, may be filled through a little announcement in the CLASSIFIED COLUMNS OF THE OUTLOOK. If you have some article to sell or exchange, these columns may prove of real value to you as they have to many others. Send for descriptive circular and order blank AND FILL YOUR WANTS. Address

Department of Classified Advertising
THE OUTLOOK
381 Fourth Avenue, New York

The thrill you get as the band goes by!

—Or hearing the greatest bands on the Victrola!

How often do you get the chance to hear the mighty brass band of Sousa as it goes swinging past? Once or twice in a lifetime, perhaps. But on the Victrola you can hear it any day—with the same brave inspiration as if the big band was actually marching by.

Not only Sousa's Band, but Pryor's also. And Conway's and Vessella's and the United States Marine Band, the Black Diamonds Band of London, Band of H. M. Coldstream Guards, Garde Republicaine Band of France, Banda de Alabarderos of Madrid—all the best band music of the world.

These famous organizations make Victor Records because their leaders consider them the best records in the world.

Victors and Victrolas in great variety from $12 to $950.

There are Victor dealers everywhere and they will gladly play for you any band music you wish to hear.

Important Notice. Victor Records and Victor Machines are scientifically coordinated and synchronized in the processes of manufacture, and should be used together to secure a perfect reproduction.

New Victor Records demonstrated at all dealers on the 1st of each month

"Victrola" is the Registered Trademark of the Victor Talking Machine Company designating the products of this Company only.

Victrola

Victor Talking Machine Co., Camden, N. J., U. S. A.

SOUSA and his Band

Digitized by Google

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Dr. Esenwein

for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, especially valuable for its full reports of the literary market. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

150-page illustrated catalogue free
Please address

The Home Correspondence School
Dept. 58, Springfield, Mass.

ESTABLISHED 1897 INCORPORATED 1904

TEACHERS' AGENCIES

The Pratt Teachers Agency
70 Fifth Avenue, New York

Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools. Advises parents about schools. Win. O. Pratt, Mgr.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

PENNSYLVANIA

AUBREY HALL

Backward and mentally defective children taught individually by experienced teachers under the supervision of an eminent nerve specialist. Torrens, Pa.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

St. John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses
YONKERS, NEW YORK

Registered in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a general training to refined, educated women. Requirements one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the Directress of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

BEA CPA ACCOUNTANCY
The Highest Paid Profession taught thoroughly in a few months of home study by new system. FREE BOOK International Accountants Society Dept. 528, 2528 Michigan Ave., Chicago

Northwestern University
School of Commerce
A University Professional School

OFFERS

1. To high school graduates a four-year combination course (with the College of Liberal Arts) leading to the degree B. A. or B. S.
2. To students who have had two years of college, a two-year course leading to the degree B. A. or B. S., and a three-year course leading to the degree Bachelor in Business Administration.
3. Opportunities to specialize in Business Administration, Accounting, Banking and Finance, Merchandising and Advertising, Factory Management, Traffic and Transportation, Foreign Trade, Labor Administration, etc.
4. A location which enables the school to utilize the opportunities of Chicago for the scientific study of business.

Write for booklet of courses

Northwestern University School of Commerce

412 Northwestern University Building
Lake and Dearborn Sts. Chicago, Illinois

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122 August 6, 1919 No. 14

THE OUTLOOK IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. M. T. FULFORD, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. BOYD, TREASURER. ERNEST H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAVERS D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER

The Proposed Alliance with France.....	525
Further Problems of Peace.....	525
Two Dilemmas in the Prohibition Bill..	525
The Shipping Strike Settled.....	526
The Strike in the Air.....	526
"Stability" in Mexico.....	526
Traveling Salesmen and the Ballot.....	527
Community Visiting.....	527
The Community Spirit.....	527
Cartoons of the Week.....	528
Mr. Taft, Mr. Hughes, and the League of Nations.....	530
The Guide of the Nations.....	531
By Lyman Abbott
Father Victory.....	532
Racial Tension and Race Riots.....	532
On a Barbless Hook.....	534
By Harold Trowbridge Pulsifer
The Fourteenth of July at Paris.....	535
Staff Correspondence by Elbert F. Baldwin
What the Pacific Northwest Thinks About the League and the Treaty.....	537
By Frederick M. Davenport
The New Nation of Asia.....	539
By Charles W. Holman
Italy—and the Next War?.....	542
Staff Correspondence of The Outlook from Gregory Mason
Christiana's Ring (Poem).....	544
By Amelia Josephine Barr
The New Great Thing: A Story of Adventure.....	544
By Keene Abbott
Current Events Illustrated.....	545
Weekly Outline Study of Current History	550
By J. Madison Gathany, A.M.
U. S. Army Motor-Truck Train on Transcontinental Demonstration Tour.....	550
Mr. Pasich and Albania.....	553
Was Ireland Ever United?.....	528
By the Way.....	554

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents.
For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage.
Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.56.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY

381 Fourth Avenue

New York City

Double Service From One Socket

Why do without light when using your electric light socket for the washer?

The BENJAMIN TWO-WAY SOCKET

Gives extra outlets to single sockets. At Your Dealer's

No. 92 34-350 25 CENTS EACH

BENJAMIN ELECTRIC MFG. CO. Chicago New York San Francisco

ONE MILLION FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUNDS OF POWDER FOR THE FEET.

That is what the government sent last year to make the soldiers' and sailors' feet comfortable and fit for the kind of war they fought and finished.

IN PEACE AND WAR

For over 25 years Allen's Foot-Ease, the Antiseptic, Healing Powder for the Feet, to be shaken into the shoes and sprinkled in the foot-bath, has been the standard remedy for all aching, swollen, hot, tired feet, blisters and sore spots and for the instant relief of corns, bunions and callouses.

Thousands of people sent packages of Allen's Foot-Ease to their sons, brothers or sweethearts in the army and navy, because they knew from experience that it would freshen and rest their feet, make their shoes comfortable and walking easy. Those who use Allen's Foot-Ease have solved their foot troubles.

"The Most Beautiful Hymnal in the American Church"

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett, Editors

The Hymnal for the New Social Era

Adapted to all Evangelical Denominations

Prices $92 and $112 per hundred.

Returnable copy sent on request

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 702 E. 4th St., CHICAGO

Earn While You Learn

Take a position with the Brooklyn Public Library and join its Library Training Course where students are paid $50 per month after one month's experience. No examination necessary. Other positions carrying higher salaries are also open. For further information apply to Brooklyn Public Library, 26 Brevoort Place, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Base and Floor one continuous piece.

IMPERIAL SANITARY FLOOR

Put On Like Plaster—Wears Like Iron

It is a composition material, easily applied to plaster, concrete, or other solid foundation—1 and 2 to 2-1/2 in. thick—Does not crack, peel or come loose from foundation.

It presents a continuous, fine-grained, smooth, non-slippery surface, practically a seamless tile—No cracks, crevices or joints for the accumulation of grease, dirt or moisture—Is noiseless and does not fatigue.

The Best Floor

for Kitchen, Pantry, Bath Room, Laundry, Porch, Garage, Restaurant, Theater, Hotel, Factory, Office Building, Railroad Station, Hospital—all places where a beautiful, substantial and foot-sure floor is desired.

Your choice of several practical colors. Full information and sample FREE on request.

IMPERIAL FLOOR COMPANY

1100 Cutler Building, Rochester, New York

On the Market 10 years

WAS IRELAND EVER UNITED?

The Outlook of July 9 publishes an article by Everett P. Wheeler, under the heading "Common Sense about Ireland," to which, with your kind permission, I wish to say a few words in reply.

Mr. Wheeler states that there never was a united Ireland, independent of Great Britain, and to prove this assertion he quotes from Justin McCarthy, the historian, as follows:

"The island was divided among native chiefs, who concerned themselves mainly about their local interests, and had, no doubt, their natural rivalries."

This cannot be taken to mean that the people were divided, but evidently refers to the land; and the fact that the people were concerned about their local affairs proves that they were not engaged in strife or civil warfare.

True, Ireland was divided into four petty kingdoms, but all were subject to one monarch, called the "Ard Ri," or King of Ireland, whose seat was at Tara, where also was located the principal Council, or Parliament, which represented the whole nation.

History and legend both record that this form of government lasted several centuries, and unless there was some degree of cohesion and unity among the people it could not possibly have endured for such a length of time.

The real disunion in Ireland began with the advent of the Norman barons and their followers, and when her Ulster was hatched by religious intolerance which came on the heels of the Reformation, and which has been kept alive and fostered to the present day by every conceivable means as a guard against the danger of unity.

In his brief summary of Irish history Mr. Wheeler cites a number of "indisputable facts," of which the following are samples, namely: that O'Neil proclaimed himself King of Ulster and was killed in an affray by Scottish settlers; that Edmund Burke was the greatest Irish statesman and advocated the union of Ireland with Great Britain; and that Grattan's Parliament refused to pass a bill for Catholic emancipation.

O'Neil never proclaimed himself, nor was he proclaimed, King of Ulster. He was a chieftain who fought against the armies of Elizabeth for a period of ten years, till, finally overwhelmed by superior numbers, he escaped to Rome, where he died an exile.

Edmund Burke was an English statesman, and represented the English constituency of Bristol in the English Parliament, was paymaster of the army, and was the recipient of a large pension. I would consider him very foolish to ruin his career and lose his emoluments by advocating Irish freedom.

Grattan's Parliament never discussed a Catholic emancipation bill; such a measure was never introduced to that body, as it was absolutely unnecessary; the mere fact of the existence of an Irish Parliament acted automatically in the emancipation of the Catholics.

The Act of Union was brought about by coercion, intimidation, and bribery, a transaction stigmatized by Mr. Gladstone as the most shameful and criminal in the annals of history. (See Gladstone's speech on introducing the Home Rule Bill in 1886.)

H. McMANAMY.

New York.

What Is Nerve Force?

NERVE Force is an energy created by the nervous system. What it is, we do not know, just as we do not know what electricity is.

We know this of Nerve Force. It is the dominant power of our existence. It governs our whole life. It is Life; for if we knew what nerve force were, we should know the secret of life.

Nerve force is the basic force of the body and mind. The power of every muscle, every organ; in fact, every cell is governed and receives its initial impulse through the nerves. Our vitality, strength and endurance are directly governed by the degree of our nerve force.

If an elephant had the same degree of nerve force as a flea, or an ant, he would jump over mountains and push down skyscrapers. If an ordinary man had the same degree of nerve force as a cat, he could break all athletic records without half trying. This is an example of Muscular Nerve Force.

Mental Nerve Force is indicated by force of character, personal magnetism, moral courage and mental power.

Organic Nerve Force means health and long life.

It is a well-balanced combination of Physical, Mental and Organic Nerve Force that has made Thomas Edison, General Pershing and Charles Schwab and other great men what they are. 95% of mankind are led by the other 5%. It is Nerve Force that does the leading.

In our nerves, therefore, lies our greatest strength; and there, also our greatest weakness—for when our nerve force becomes depleted, through worry, disease, overwork, abuse, every muscle loses its strength and endurance; every organ becomes partly paralyzed, and the mind becomes befogged.

The noted British authority on the nerves, Alfred T. Schofield, says, "It is my belief that the greatest factor in the maintenance of health is that nerves be in order."

Unfortunately few people know that they waste their nerve force, or will admit that it has been more or less exhausted. So long as their hands and knees do not tremble, they cling to the belief that their nerves are strong and sound, which is a dangerous assumption.

How often do we hear of people running from doctor to doctor, seeking relief from a mysterious "something-the-matter" with them, though repeated examinations fail to indicate that any particular organ is weak or diseased.

It is "nerves" or "you are run down," the doctor tells the victim. Then a "tonic" is prescribed, which temporarily gives the nerves a swift kick, and speeds them up, just as a fagged-out horse may be made to speed up by towing him behind an automobile.

The symptoms of nerve exhaustion vary according to individual characteristics, but the development is usually as follows:

First Stage: Lack of energy and endurance; that "tired feeling," especially in the back and knees.

Second Stage: Nervousness; sleeplessness; irritability; decline in sex force; loss of hair; nervous indigestion; sour stomach; gas in bowels; constipation; irregular heart; poor memory; lack of mental endurance; dizziness; headaches; backaches; neuritis; rheumatism, and other pains.

Third Stage: Serious mental disturbances; fear; undue worry, melancholia; dangerous organic disturbances; suicidal tendencies, and, in extreme cases, insanity.

It is evident that nerve depletion leads to a long train of evils that torture the mind and body. It is no wonder neurasthenics (nerve bankrupts) become melancholy and do not care to live.

If only a few of the symptoms mentioned apply to you, especially those indicating mental instability, you may be sure your nerves are at fault—that you have exhausted your Nerve Force.

Nerve Force is the most precious gift of Nature. It means everything—your happiness, your health, your success in life. You should know all there is to learn about your nerves; how to relax, calm and soothe your nerves, so that after a severe nerve strain you can rebuild your lost Nerve Force, and keep yourself physically and mentally fit.

Paul von Boeckmann, the noted Nerve Culturist, who for 25 years has been the leading authority in America on Breathing, Nerve Culture and Psycho-physics, has written a remarkable book on the Nerves, which teaches how to soothe, calm and care for the nerves. The cost of the book is only 25 cents (coin or stamps). Bound in elegant cloth and gold cover, 50 cents. Address, Paul von Boeckmann, Studio 330, World's Tower Bldg., 110 West 40th St., New York City. You should order the book to-day. It will be a revelation to you and will teach you important facts that will give you greater Physical, Mental and Organic Nerve Force. If you do not agree that this book teaches you the most important lesson on Health and Mental Efficiency you have ever read, your money will be refunded by return mail, plus the outlay of postage you may have incurred.

The author of Nerve Force has advertised his various books on Health and Nerve Culture in the standard magazines of America during the last twenty years, which is ample evidence of his responsibility and integrity. The following are extracts from letters written by grateful people who have read the book:

"I have gained 12 pounds since reading your book and I feel so energetic. I had about given up hope of ever finding the cause of my low weight."

"Your book did more for me for indigestion than two courses in dieting."

"My heart is now regular again and my nerves are fine. I thought I had heart trouble, but it was simply a case of abused nerves. I have re-read your book at least ten times."

"The advice given in your book on relaxation and calming my nerves has cleared my brain. Before I was half dizzy all the time."

A physician says: "Your book shows you have a scientific and profound knowledge of the nerves and nervous people. I am recommending your book to my patients."

A prominent lawyer in Ansonia, Conn., says: "Your book saved me from a nervous collapse such as I had three years ago. I now sleep soundly and am gaining weight. I can again do a real day's work."

[Advertisement]

Digitized by Google

Have you tried me lately?

Wherever you go, these midsummer days, you should be enjoying Robt. Burns' cool, companionable aroma—a fragrance due to full Havana filler made palatably mild by skilful curing of the clear Havana.

Robt. Burns comes in three convenient shapes — Bouquet, Invincible, and Longfellow. The Longfellow size is foil-wrapped.

The Robt. Burns quality is identical in all three sizes. If you approve the modern Havana quality, it's merely a question of selecting your favorite size.

Wherever men travel throughout the United States they will find Robt. Burns cigars.

General Cigar Co.
119 West 40th Street, New York City

Robt. Burns

CIGAR

3 NATIONAL SIZES 11¢—2 for 25¢—15¢

Invincible Size
2 for 25¢
(13¢ for 1)

The Outlook

AUGUST 6, 1919

THE PROPOSED ALLIANCE WITH FRANCE

IN transmitting to the Senate the special treaty with France by which the United States would agree to help in defending France against German aggression, the President urged it not only on the ground of our special obligation to France, but also on the ground of the special exigency which will exist pending the organization of the League of Nations. He declared that it was an arrangement "not independent of the League of Nations, but under it." Announcing that Great Britain volunteers the same promise, he interpreted the agreement as follows:

Two Governments who wish to be members of the League of Nations ask leave of the Council of the League to be permitted to go to the assistance of a friend whose situation has been found to be one of peculiar peril, without awaiting the advice of the League to act.

For some reason not as yet forthcoming it has been assumed that this proposed special treaty with France was withheld from publication in the United States when it was known in France and England. On July 24 it was read as news in the United States Senate by Senator Brandegee. As a matter of fact, it was published in the United States broadcast on July 3 and 4, at the very time it was published in the London "Times" and in the "Figaro" of Paris. This complaint concerning an imaginary grievance has diverted public attention from a complaint which, whether justified or not, has a basis of fact.

According to this agreement as framed in Paris and accepted by the President, it is provided (in Article IV) that "it shall be submitted to the Senate of the United States of America at the same time as the Treaty of Versailles shall be submitted for assent to ratification."

On July 10 President Wilson submitted the Treaty of Versailles to the Senate, but did not submit the Franco-American treaty. In fact, he distinctly said that he would reserve submission of that treaty to a later date. Of course, although the individual Senators were aware of the treaty and might have had the text of its provisions before them, neither the Senate nor any committee of the Senate could officially act upon it or have it under consideration as a matter of business which has any parliamentary rights until it was formally and officially submitted to the Senate.

Whatever the reason was for requiring that it be submitted at the same time as the general Treaty, it was sufficient for placing that provision in the text. It was the one provision by which the President was bound by the mere fact that he had negotiated it.

It has been said on behalf of the President by Senator John Sharp Williams that the purport of that provision was to make it certain that the two treaties should be before the Senate at the same time, and that as soon as the Franco-American agreement was submitted the two treaties would be before the Senate at the same time. That, however, is not the wording of the provision. There are few things which a nation should make with so great care, and, when made, should guard and keep so scrupulously as a promise.

Now that the treaty has been submitted, it can be officially considered. It is not a rash pledge that is proposed. In effect it is simply an assurance to France that America will not leave to France alone the responsibility of repelling any assault upon the victory which America helped to win. Mere fairness to the partner that is closest to peril requires that we give her this assurance.

FURTHER PROBLEMS OF PEACE

Five years ago last week Austria-Hungary launched its attack on Serbia. Last week Austria and Hungary, separated from one another, shorn of territory occupied by their formerly subject peoples, and shaken by political disturbances and physical violence, were objects of special consideration by the Peace Conference in Paris. On July 8 Austria had received the rest of the terms which had first been handed over to her on June 2, shortly after her delegates arrived at St. Germain. Austria has now, therefore, practically the full text of the Treaty as the Peace Conference proposes it. As in the case of Germany, ample time was given to Austria to consider the terms and to make suggestions for modification. Dr. Renner, the head of the Austrian delegation, has declared the terms to be so severe as to be impossible of fulfillment.

Of course Austria's case is different from that of Germany. The Austro-Hungarian Empire has disappeared. Austria itself, as it survives the wreck, represents only a minority of the people of the old Empire, and cannot carry all, or even one-half, of the burden which might have been laid upon the Empire if it had remained intact. Somebody, however, has got to bear that burden. The question has been how to distribute that among the various peoples formerly constituting the Empire, and particularly how to apportion it between those peoples who constitute openly enemy states and those peoples who have been absorbed by the Allied and Associated Powers. It is an exceedingly difficult question. It is too complicated to set forth in anything less than a treatise. It is plain, however, that at best the Austrians will have to carry a burden of great weight for many years to come.

Hungary is a much more disturbing factor at present than Austria. The Peace Conference has announced that unless the Government of Bela Kun, which has been attempting to form a kind of partnership with the Bolsheviki of Russia, is overthrown the Allies will not lift the blockade. The difficulty seems to be that a considerable proportion of Bela Kun's strength has been due, not to his Bolshevism, but to what we in America would call his jingoism. He wants to keep within Hungary as many of the subject peoples as possible. So there has been fighting between the Hungarians and Czechoslovaks on one side and the Hungarians and Rumanians on the other. There has been a lack of strong and firm policy at Paris.

While representatives of the Great Powers have been discussing plans as to what they are going to do in future years, they have failed to act with firmness or with much evidence of co-operation in dealing with such wars as these Hungarian-Rumanian and Hungarian-Czechoslovak wars in the present. The Hungarians are still an enemy people, and it gives only an impression of weakness to attempt to withstand their aggressiveness by offering them threats when the Powers ought to act unitedly in enforcing obedience to the terms of the armistice. What is needed is the exercise of police power.

TWO DILEMMAS IN THE PROHIBITION BILL

On July 22 the bill to enforce both war-time prohibition and the Prohibition Amendment was passed by the House of Representatives.

In framing this measure the legislators encountered two difficulties for which it is not easy to see a satisfactory solution.

In the first place, the question arose whether it would be permissible for people to have and keep intoxicating liquors in their homes. If it were made illegal for any one to possess liquor in his private dwelling, it would be almost, if not quite, impossible to make such a provision effective without instituting a system of search into private houses that would create resentment as an invasion of the liberty of the citizen. On the other hand, to let it remain lawful for a person to keep liquor in his home would be to allow a great advantage to people with sufficient money to enable them to lay in a stock of liquor for years to come. It is said by Mr. Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, that a great deal of unrest among wage-earners has been caused by the fact that they are not permitted to buy their beer from day to day, while wealthy men with well-stocked cellars can have their wines and whiskies. The House of Representatives has chosen the second horn of this dilemma and has made it not unlawful to possess liquor in a private dwelling occupied by the owner, provided the liquor is used for consumption by himself or his family or bona-fide guests.

The other obstacle concerned the legal method of enforcing the law. If violations of the law were left to trial by juries, it is feared that the observance of the law would be far from uniform. In certain places, it is thought, public opinion for the enforcement of prohibition would not be vigorous enough and general enough to make it possible to get jurymen who would convict violators. So the bill has been drawn in such a way as to take the enforcement of the law out of the hands of juries entirely. Any place where intoxicating liquor is made or sold in violation of the law is declared to be a nuisance, and anybody maintaining it is to be regarded as guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to fine. The United States District Attorney or any other officer designated by the United States Attorney-General may institute a suit of injunction to restrain the defendant from conducting or permitting the continuance of such nuisance. Then the person selling the liquor can be proceeded against for violating the injunction. In this proceeding the judge himself may summarily try and punish the defendant for contempt of court, with a penalty of fine up to $1,000, or imprisonment up to twelve months, or by both fine and imprisonment. The objection to this is that it deprives the accused of trial by jury, and trial by jury has been the recognized foundation-stone of British and American jurisprudence. The method adopted is open to the same objection that has been directed against the use of injunction proceedings in labor disputes.

When this bill comes before the Senate, these two features of it should be subjected to special scrutiny.

THE SHIPPING STRIKE SETTLED

The agreement reached between the forty thousand seamen who have been on strike in American ports and the ship-owners was so reasonable and so amicably arranged in the end that it seems an immense pity that a compromise should not have been reached before the strike instead of after. Some five hundred vessels were held up for about two weeks in port, international trade was injured and hindered just when every effort should have been used to carry it on vigorously, and the public both here and abroad were unnecessarily inconvenienced. Some time a system of adjusting such differences without rushing into industrial war will be perfected.

There were three points at issue: the men asked for higher wages, shorter hours, and the recognition of their branch of the International Seamen's Union. The ship-owners were willing to advance wages, so that the first demand was merely a question of bargaining and adjustment; they were willing also to shorten the hours, although there was a practical difficulty in arranging the watches so as to reduce every sailor's work to the eight hours to which the men insisted that their work be limited—and in the end this matter too was adjusted; they were willing (or came to be willing) to recognize the union also, but not to agree that only union men should be employed—here once more a compromise was reached by an understanding that union men and Americans shall be preferred when they are available. The "closed shop" on board ship was certainly a novel issue. Unions among seamen have probably come to stay; in Great Britain, certainly, they were a powerful influence in the war and patriotic influences as well.

What is true of this seamen's strike is true of the recent British coal strike, which for a time threatened industrial injury on a vast scale. Patient study of the situation on the part of the Government and sensible concession to the miners had their effect, and the immediate danger appears to be over.

The labor question is always a business question, and compromise is the soul of business. Less heat and more business sense on both sides is the way out in most labor troubles.

THE STRIKE IN THE AIR

Certainly flying can be said to have come into its majority now that it has achieved its first strike. The strike in question has been among the employees of the Postal Air Service and was caused by the discharge of two postal fliers who refused to take up their planes in weather which they believed was unsuitable for flying.

The original attitude of the Post Office Department towards its flying employees was expressed in a telegram from Second Assistant Postmaster-General Praeger in regard to the reinstatement of two pilots discharged for insubordination. Mr. Praeger telegraphed: "Orders regarding Pilots Smith and Lee have not been revoked. They came into the service as every other pilot, with the knowledge that they must comply with the Department order to fly with the mail, and where flying conditions are such that they cannot operate have the option to resign. If they refuse to carry out the orders of the Department and fail to tender their resignations, removal from service must be made. Every pilot is expected to carry out his duty in accordance with his oath and sense of loyalty to the service and to aviation in general."

Again, in a statement made to a correspondent of the New York "Times," Mr. Praeger said: "There's a specific agreement between pilots and the Post Office Department, when they enter the service, that they must fly when the mail is ready or resign and allow other men to fly. This is clearly understood. All pilots came into the service with this absolute knowledge and understanding. The mail must fly on schedule. If the men do not feel like flying, they are dropped."

It seems that the pilots were absolutely justified in demanding that the decision as to whether or not pilots shall leave the ground shall be placed in the hands of men who are themselves fliers. Not even railway trains or steamships have yet reached the point of development where they can proceed with utter disregard of the elements. To make such a demand of air pilots at this stage of the art of flying exhibited a Prussian disregard for human life.

We are glad to record the fact that the Post Office Department has receded from the untenable position which it at first assumed, and that the strike has now been definitely settled on the basis of the following agreement:

In inclement weather it is left to the judgment of the manager or superintendent of his division whether or not the weather is suitable for flying and if it is safe for the pilots to take the air. It is felt that the judgment of the manager of the division will be sound; but if the pilots still refuse the manager will himself take a plane and go aloft, thus demonstrating to the pilots that the weather is safe.

"STABILITY" IN MEXICO

According to Mexico's Ambassador to the United States, "Mexico has a stable Government and foreigners are accorded every protection." Mr. Bonillas admits that there are a few bandits at large, but thinks that is the natural aftermath of a civil war. But our Ambassador to Mexico lately told a committee of Congress that fifty Americans had been murdered in Mexico in the last two years, and that no one had been punished by the Mexican Government—surely strong proof that Carranza's rule, if not "unstable," is wretchedly inert. But it is unstable; no other word describes an administration which lives from day to day in danger from revolution on a large scale, as shown by the recent attack on Juarez.

Ambassador Fletcher, who certainly was not inclined to advise drastic measures toward Carranza, would not affirm that the United States was getting satisfactory redress for injury and damage to its citizens. All other evidence is positive that we are not getting such redress. There have been since the fall of Diaz, Mr. Fletcher said, two hundred and fifteen Americans slain in Mexico; the National Association for Protection of American Rights in Mexico (the American Government ought to be such an association) puts the number at three hundred and ninety-six. American troops have crossed the border many times to drive marauders away. It is probably true, as our Administration admits, that the bandits get arms through non-enforcement of the embargo that still exists. That seems to be evidence of instability on both sides of the border.

The situation is so bad that the other day Representative Hudspeth, of Texas, in the House, urged withdrawal of recognition of the Carranza Government and military occupation of Mexico by American forces until a stable Government has been established. At all events, it is increasingly evident that this country should take stock of its Mexican policy, see how much of the old "watchful waiting" assets (or liabilities) are left, and what profitable dealing with the question may be adopted for the future—profitable, that is, for the honor of this country and the safeguarding of its citizens and their rights.

TRAVELING SALESMEN AND THE BALLOT

There are about six hundred thousand commercial travelers in this country. Recently they have effected a National organization in order to take up in a large way questions that concern them as citizens and in their business relations. One such matter is that of voting. It is said that some of them have not voted for twenty years; certainly every year many thousands of their votes are not cast because business compels them to be far away from their residences on election day. It is easy to say that patriotism should lead them to insist on plans that would bring each man home to vote, but business men know it is impracticable. As it is, says the "Traveler's Forum," the organ of the organization, thousands of dollars are expended by the travelers in returning to register and again to vote. But when the distance is great the cost, as well as the loss of time and disarrangement of route plans, makes it inevitable that neither the traveler nor his firm will make the sacrifice.

What is the remedy? An Absentee Voting Bill has been passed by the New York State Legislature which allows the voter to mail home his properly authenticated ballot from a distance, to be cast in his home town by an authorized representative, a method similar to that adopted in allowing drafted men to register from a distance. An amendment to the State Constitution is needed to carry out the plan, and such an amendment will be put before the people next November. Other States may follow; but, as an enormous number of the commercial travelers live in New York, a large measure of relief will be afforded by that State's action.

The plan, if properly safeguarded, seems to us practical and just. The men affected are intelligent and valuable citizens, and they should be encouraged in their interest in public affairs, not deterred from participation in political action. They ask to be admitted to what they call "full citizenship" in this way.

It is interesting, apart from the ballot, to see how organization is bringing out among these men discussion on matters of common business interest. They are already talking in their "Forum" about discriminating taxes and legislation, tips, privileges, and other rights or injustices. Evidently their organization is going to grow and to be an active influence in business and in civil life.

COMMUNITY VISITING

An experiment in community visiting has recently been made by Mr. B. R. Hieronymus, community adviser of the University of Illinois. The cities were Bloomington, Decatur, Springfield, and Peoria, typical Illinois towns, about two hours apart. In a rich agricultural country, they are alike in climate; in population they are 35,000, 45,000, 60,000, and 100,000—near enough in size to make comparisons valuable; they are alike also in character of population, for no one of them is primarily a factory town.

The ten visitors from each place represented city commissions, chambers of commerce, Optimists' and Rotary Clubs, social workers, and various organizations.

For four days they traveled together on the interurban electric roads, reaching each city at ten in the morning.

One city showed co-operating agencies, the next community gardens, the third public health, and the last recreation. But unconsciously each town showed more than was listed on the programme. The close interlocking of the associated charities and the county dispensary, of the tuberculosis association and visiting nurse service, with Springfield's public health work surprised the co-operating group from Bloomington. Peoria, with its splendid endowed recreation center, found golf courses in her neighbor's parks. The boys of Decatur, organized to clean up the town and rewarded with a trip to the State University, showed co-operation and health and recreation all in one. Each town had, too, certain individuals who were forced into the limelight—the woman responsible for the new county hospital, the city commissioner who manages a neighborhood garden four blocks square, the woman who started infant welfare stations, and so on.

THE COMMUNITY SPIRIT

Typical of the new spirit aroused by this week of visiting is the comment of an Optimists' Club representative who was not interested in community activities; he frankly said that he went because he had to, and ended by taking his wife for the last two days. "I always thought that social service and community uplift were highbrow things away over my head. Why, these are things any club could do—ours at home. Success seems to depend on one or two individuals who see the need and see the vision, and then get to work and do it. Did you notice that every one of these towns has school-houses with more attractive grounds than ours? Why don't we have landscape-gardened schoolyards?"

One of the results of this experiment was the realization of what their own town was doing, which came to some of these men and women, who confessed their surprise at the showing made. And each group gradually lost the bragging attitude with which its ten members started. The we're-the-finest-town-in-Illinois talk of Tuesday was entirely absent by Friday night. Cocksure of themselves, boasting of their achievements, they ended in hearty admiration of their neighbors; they asked how to start a crippled children's clinic, whether the city could spend money to plow vacant lots for gardens, and what would the State Board of Health advise them to do.

Each representative reports back to his organization, so the story of this community visiting will go to fifty or a hundred members of each of ten groups in four

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

Darling in the New York Tribune

Copyright, 1919, New York Tribune, Inc.

MAYBE THERE ISN'T GOING TO BE MUCH LOSS OF LIFE, AFTER ALL

From the World (London)

AFTER THE OPERATION

Pax: "How thankful I am to be out of the doctor's hands."

From L'Asino (Rome)

PEACE IN SEARCH OF HERSELF

TWO FOREIGN CARTOONS ON PEACE

Greene in the New York Evening Telegram

ANOTHER "IGNORANT IDEALIST"

Thomas in London Opinion

AT THE UNEMPLOYMENT BUREAU

"Any danger of a job this morning, guv'nor?"

From Karikaturen (Christiania)

Distracted Professor: "Find that confounded child and take it away. It keeps on squalling for no cause whatever!"

From Kasper (Stockholm)

"At first I was very glad to have my decoration. But I am sick of it already!"
"Why?" "Because everybody asks me why I got it."

towns, and to near-by villages as well, for each hostess city invited its immediate neighbors for the day. The results of this experiment may stretch over years, but the tangible result that shows now is sufficient to warrant carrying out this plan in other places.

MR. TAFT, MR. HUGHES, AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

FROM correspondence recently published, it is apparent that Mr. Taft and Mr. Hughes are seeking in common a basis upon which the Republican members of the United States Senate can vote for a prompt ratification of the Peace Treaty and the Covenant of the League of Nations.

Mr. Taft's suggestions were made in letters to Mr. Will Hays, Chairman of the Republican National Committee—letters which were not intended for publication, but found their way into print from duplicate copies given to the press in a manner not yet explained.

Mr. Hughes's proposals were made in reply to a letter from Senator Hale (Republican), of Maine. Saying that "rather than take the Covenant as it now stands I am very certain that considerably more than one-third of the Senate would refuse to ratify the Treaty altogether," and adding that "as far as I am personally concerned I do not want to see this happen, and I do want to see some plan devised whereby the United States may safely enter the League of Nations," Senator Hale asked Mr. Hughes whether reservations would not accomplish this object, and, if so, what the reservations should be. Mr. Hughes replied with a plan which we quote in full later in this article.

The importance of the public stand thus taken by Mr. Taft and Mr. Hughes is very great. They are both Republican statesmen of the first rank; they are both political administrators, Mr. Taft having been President of the United States and Mr. Hughes Governor of the State of New York; and they are both constitutional lawyers of eminence and experience, Mr. Taft having been a United States Circuit Judge and Mr. Hughes a Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. Taft recognizes the political situation in the Senate by attributing much of the opposition to the Treaty to the "very serious mistakes of policy committed by Mr. Wilson," in particular the partisan character of his Administration, his appeal for support on partisan grounds, and his emphasis of partisan and personal elements in negotiating the Treaty. Mr. Taft reiterates that he is "strongly in favor of ratifying the Treaty as it is,"

and believes that any defects in the structure of the League can be remedied by amendment after the plan is put into operation, but suggests certain reservations in the hope that they "may satisfy the genuine objections of the Republican friends of the League." Mr. Taft's proposed reservations would (1) allow the United States to withdraw unconditionally at the end of ten years; (2) make it impossible for self-governing colonies or dominions to be represented on the Council of the League at the same time with the mother country; (3) leave each nation free to decide declarations of war in accordance with its own constitutional procedure; (4) state that subjects like immigration and the tariff are domestic questions not to be controlled by the League; and (5) reserve the Monroe Doctrine to be administered by the United States.

Mr. Hughes defines the following as the point of view from which the question of ratification is to be approached:

There is plain need for a League of Nations, in order to provide for the adequate development of international law, for creating and maintaining organs of international justice and the machinery of conciliation and conference, and for giving effect to measures of international co-operation which from time to time may be agreed upon. There is also the immediate exigency to be considered. It is manifest that every reasonable effort should be made to establish peace as promptly as possible and to bring about a condition in which Europe can resume its normal industrial activity.

He implies that amendments which would impair the main provisions of the Covenant might have to be referred back to the Peace Conference or to the nations that are parties to the contract and are therefore to be avoided as postponing concerted international action in favor of peace. But it is his opinion that certain reservations may be made which would not impair the Covenant and therefore would not be objected to by the other contracting parties. Mr. Taft does not believe that reservations are necessary, but, as they are unobjectionable, proposes them as a means of compromise to secure ratification. Mr. Hughes, however, regards reservations as necessary in order that in establishing the League "we should not make a false start." His reservations he puts in the form of the following proposed resolution:

The Senate of the United States of America advises and consents to the ratification of said Treaty with the following reservations and understandings as to its interpretation and effect to be made a part of the instrument of ratification:

First—That whenever two years' notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations shall have been given, as provided in Article I of the Covenant, the Power giving the notice shall cease to be a member of the League or subject to the obligations of the Covenant of the League, at the time specified in the notice, notwithstanding any claim, charge, or finding of the non-fulfillment of any international obligation or of any obligation under said Covenant; provided, however, that such withdrawal shall not release the Power from any debt or liability theretofore incurred.

Second—That questions relating to immigration or the imposition of duties on imports, where such questions do not arise out of any international engagement, are questions of domestic policy, and these and any other questions which according to international law are solely within the domestic jurisdiction are not to be submitted for the consideration or action of the League of Nations or of any of its agencies.

Third—That the meaning of Article XXI of the Covenant of the League of Nations is that the United States of America does not relinquish its traditional attitude toward purely American questions, and is not required by said Covenant to submit its policies regarding questions which it deems to be purely American questions to the League of Nations or any of its agencies, and that the United States of America may oppose and prevent any acquisition by any non-American Power by conquest, purchase, or in any other manner of any territory, possession, or control in the Western Hemisphere.

Fourth—That the meaning of Article X of the Covenant of the League of Nations is that the members of the League are not under any obligation to act in pursuance of said Article except as they may decide to act upon the advice of the Council of the League. The United States of America assumes no obligation under said Article to undertake any military expedition, or to employ its armed forces on land or sea, unless such action is authorized by the Congress of the United States of America, which has exclusive authority to declare war or to determine for the United States of America whether there is any obligation on its part under said Article and the means or action by which any such obligation shall be fulfilled.

We hope that it may not be as long and difficult a process for the United States Senate to frame and agree to reservations as it was for the Peace Conference to draw up the original document. It is certainly to be hoped that the Republican members of the Senate, with the concurrence of their Democratic colleagues, can in the very near future unite upon some clear and concise resolution of interpretation like that suggested by Mr. Hughes.

Advocates of immediate ratification of the Treaty and the Covenant believe that the provisions suggested by Mr. Hughes are already explicitly or implicitly in the original document. But if they are there no harm can be done in repeating them in fuller or clearer language. Such repetition may, as Mr. Taft suggests, satisfy genuine doubts and objections, and thus enable the sincere advocates of judicial procedure as opposed to militarism and war to unite in a common effort which multitudes hope will prove to be a decisive step forward in the evolution of human government.

THE GUIDE OF THE NATIONS

IN the issue of The Outlook for August 15, 1914, the issue which announced Germany's invasion of Belgium, I wrote, in an endeavor to interpret the meaning of the inevitable world war and to forecast its probable results, the following sentences: "We believe with Hegel that God has a plan and that history is nothing but the working out of his plan in human affairs. And we believe that the Austrian Prime Minister and the German Emperor have made a fatal mistake in leaving this truth out of their reckoning in their endeavor to destroy the great democratic movement in Europe." From that day to the present time I have never entertained a doubt as to the outcome of the war. My only fear was that the American people, falsely led, would fail to understand the meaning of the times and the duty to which conscience and honor summoned them.

These sentences disclose the faith by which in my public teaching, whether from pulpit, platform, or press, I have been uniformly guided—the faith that God is in his world directing its great movements, and that the secret of success in life—real success—consists in studying these movements and in giving our best endeavor to understand God's purpose and to co-operate with him in accomplishing it. Omar Khayyám, using a not unfamiliar figure, compares life to a game of chess played by Destiny:

"Impotent Pieces of the Game He plays
Upon this Checker-board of Nights and Days; Hither and Thither moves, and checks,
and slays,
And one by one back in the Closet lays."

I accept the figure, but give to it a different interpretation. The chessmen are not "impotent pieces." They are living men and women. The object of the game is the education of these men and women. They have minds and wills of their own which the Master respects. The pawn wishes to be a knight; the knight, to be a castle; the castle, to be a bishop; the bishop, to be a queen. Some of these living chessmen wish to thwart the Player's will. Some of them care for no will but their own. And the problem of the divine Player is to work out his splendid purpose with their willing co-operation when it can be secured, and when it cannot be secured to work that will out through their resistance, their indifference, and their ignorance. So he used Pharaoh to set Israel free; Nero to demonstrate to pagan cynics the spiritual power of Christian enthusiasm; Voltaire by his pen and Napoleon by his sword to break up the soil of eastern Europe that others might sow therein the seeds of human liberty. Whatever influence I have enjoyed as a public teacher has been due, not to any foresight of my own, but to my sincere endeavor to read the hidden will of God in the events of current history and to tell others who had less leisure for such study than myself what that will seemed to me to be.

In 1856, at twenty-one years of age, I fell under the spell of Henry Ward Beecher's eloquence, which inspired with passion the Christian principles inculcated by my father. Slavery had been abolished in the North, partly because it was unprofitable, partly because it was wrong; it had been abolished, despite great opposition, by England in the West Indies and in India; the slave trade had been declared piracy by the united action of England and America; a too timid conscience in the South was beginning to protest against it, and a too bitter hatred in the North was beginning to denounce it. The divine purpose of emancipation seemed to me as clearly written in 1856 as in 1863 when Abraham Lincoln issued his Emancipation Proclamation, and I left the law for the ministry, inspired by the hope that in the pulpit I could serve that divine purpose better than at the bar.

Some students trace Socialism back to the writings of Plato. But that Socialism, in our present use of that term, is modern is demonstrated by the fact that the word did not exist prior to 1835. In that great movement for industrial justice I saw a continuance of the movement which had abolished slavery from all Anglo-Saxon lands and serfdom from Russia. And I set myself to study its meaning and lend what little influence I could to imbue it with a divine spirit and guide it to a divinely ordered end. This desire was one of the chief motives which led me in 1876 to accept the invitation of Mr. Beecher and join him in the editorship of what was then the "Christian Union," and I have ever since labored by voice and by pen, in spite of what I regard as the false philosophy of state Socialism, and in spite of the errors, the extravagances, and the crimes of some labor leaders, to secure for the workingman such conditions that the Golden Rule would not be an inconsistent motto to inscribe on the entrance of every factory and every mine. In this great social movement of our time I have enlisted because, despite the human infirmities of those who are carrying it on, I believe that it is a movement toward the kingdom of God on the earth.

Before the beginning of the present century I had become impressed with the world tendency toward organization in industrial, religious, and political institutions. The discovery of steam, the invention of machinery, and the resultant division of labor had created the organization of capital, and in self-protection the organization of labor had inevitably followed. The division of the Church into warring denominations, and the consequent loss both of spiritual efficiency and public respect, had begun to awaken in the Christian Church a desire for either organic union, federation, or co-operation. National necessities had created an Italian Kingdom out of hostile provinces, a German Empire out of hostile states, a British Empire out of separate colonies, and in America a sovereign Nation out of a confederation of sovereign though not independent States. The spirit of organization was said to be in the air. But such movements are not in the air; they are in the hearts and consciences of men, and it is in the hearts and consciences of men that we are to look for God. Therefore, in 1895, when the first definite and practicable proposal toward a world organization in our own time was made at Lake Mohonk by Edward Everett Hale, I was ready to welcome it.

My faith in a League of Nations does not rest primarily on a study of the provisions of the present proposed League, though I have given them some examination; nor on the conflicting counsels of statesmen, though I have read the arguments of publicists both for and against the League. The movement toward a democracy of nations appears to me to have all the marks of a divinely ordered movement. It is an attempt to realize a vision which world prophets have seen from the days of Isaiah to the present day. It expresses the hope of a universal brotherhood. It assumes that there exists in democratic peoples a real though imperfectly developed spirit of mutual trust and confidence.

I am perfectly aware that some students at least as intelligent and devout as myself think that the present League of Nations will disappoint this hope, and so will check or divert this democratic movement. I agree with them in condemning the undemocratic methods which have been pursued by the President in negotiating that League. I think it is marred by some serious defects and by some unfortunate ambiguities. Nevertheless I believe that it is an important factor in the progress of the world toward democracy and that its adoption by the nations concerned will tend to strengthen the spirit of trust and confidence and to lead forward toward a realization of the hope of an international brotherhood.

It has the approval of practical statesmen of people as widely separated in their traditions and ideals as those of France, Italy, England, and the United States; of classes in society as widely separated as those represented by President Lowell, of Harvard University, and Mr. Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor; and of men of religious faiths as widely separated as those represented by Rabbi Wise and Cardinal Gibbons. No doubt there is peril in going forward, but there seems to me to be greater peril in retreat. I am willing to set sail with Columbus to seek a new continent; with Luther to undertake the establishment of a reformed faith; with Wesley to employ new methods of Christian activity; with Jefferson and Hamilton to enter upon a new experiment in government; and I was as ready in 1915, when the League to Enforce Peace was formed, to embark with Taft and Lowell in this new adventure as I am to-day when it has been accepted by representative statesmen of the four greatest Powers of the world.

I am not an expert in either constitutional or international law, and must trust to experts in whom I have confidence to settle the legal details in the League of Nations. As the President did not seek the advice of the Senate, his Constitutional adviser, nor, so far as is known, of any men in either party who are eminent in constitutional and international law, the request of those who desire some explanatory reservations added by the Senate to the League as proposed does not seem to me unreasonable. Personally I am willing to follow the counsel of Mr. Hughes, who recommends the adoption of the League with some interpretative reservations, and of Mr. Taft, who has declared that no reservations are necessary, though some are desirable. The League of Nations is Mr. Taft's child; he will not willingly imperil it. There is no better authority on constitutional and international law in the country; he will not ignorantly imperil it. Reservations which are not necessary but which seem desirable to some Senators who honestly desire a League might well be adopted in order to secure their approval. And incidentally the adoption of such reservations would be a legitimate way of protesting against the undemocratic methods of negotiation which the President has pursued. All that I have wished to do here is to reaffirm my faith in a League of Nations and my willingness to accept any reservations which competent authority assures me will not imperil its acceptance by other nations.

I have hesitated to write publicly so freely of my personal spiritual faith, but I believe that I am speaking for thousands of men and women who share that faith with me, who know little or nothing of either constitutional or international law, but who are as eager for a brotherhood among the nations as they are for brotherhood in industry and religion, and who dare take for themselves and their children whatever risks are necessarily involved in the great experiment.

LYMAN ABBOTT.

FATHER VICTORY

ANY one who saw Clemenceau preside at the Peace Conference in Paris will always have in his mind a picture of quiet and restrained but irresistible energy. Neither of the terms of affection which the French use in speaking of him is really adequate. In his ability to wait until his object comes within reach and then to spring like lightning upon it he is "the Tiger;" but that is only one, and not the most significant, of his qualities. In the paternal relation which he seems to bear to the people of France, bringing to them in his good time the gift of success in resisting the Prussians, he is indeed "Father Victory;" but that does not make him the universal figure that he is. Even those who do not like the way he handles their pet political and social beliefs, and who regard him consequently as a "bad old man" and a materialist hopelessly unregenerate, cannot withhold the tribute of admiration that is implicit in their very attacks upon him. He has a way of carrying out what he undertakes to do. He does it suavely as becomes a Frenchman, but he does it crisply and cleanly as becomes a Frenchman and a fighter too. It is not surprising, therefore, that he chose the other day to challenge those who were challenging him and that he came off triumphant. By a vote of 272 to 181, on July 22, Clemenceau received the vote of confidence he asked for. It was just a year before to the day that he came back from the front and announced to a people who had not yet dared hope, "We have won the war." This time, with equal venturesomeness, he told that same people, more than eight months after the armistice, that it yet remained to secure the peace.

Like every other people, but perhaps with more reason than most others, the French are impatient for the resumption of life freed from the fetters and obstacles of war. Here in America we feel the burdens of the high cost of living and make our complaints and wonder how long the Government will be in bringing that cost down to something within reason; but the increase in the cost of living here is not to be compared with what the French know. They call it the "dear life," and they have named it well, for it is not merely the conveniences and luxuries of living but life itself that is dear in France. M. Chaumet was sponsor in the French Chamber of Deputies for an interpellation on the high cost of living; and M. Clemenceau accepted the challenge with French gaieté. "I am willing to retire," M. Clemenceau said, "if M. Chaumet will succeed me." It is reported that even the Socialists could not suppress their amusement at the way the old Premier offered his burdens to the challenger. "We are facing the liquidation of the greatest catastrophe the world has ever known," continued Clemenceau. "You may forget it, but I, who am struggling with these difficulties, have a right to mention them. A barbarous nation has set fire to the four corners of the world, and for five years the most abominable war in history has held sway, and you desire that on the very day that the signatures are placed at the bottom of the Peace Treaty the ante-bellum status prevail. Gentlemen, to console myself for the reproaches which you addressed to me, I have merely to think of those which will be leveled at my successor." The vote was taken, and Clemenceau, victorious, left the Chamber, saying, "This is a mere skirmish. The real battle is coming."

This is the man who saw France through. In years to come Americans may learn that this too is the man who not only saw America through as well as France, but who saved America from some of the blunders which her inexperience and her over-trustfulness in theories might have led her into. Clemenceau has been called a realist, as if that were a reproach. In fact, it is one of his greatest virtues that he never loses sight of the facts that are before his eyes. Sometimes it seems to be a rare virtue. And Clemenceau has proved that it is perfectly compatible with a sound and unquenchable idealism. Indeed, the only idealist that gets very far is the one who either voluntarily takes account or against his will is required to take account of facts. Perhaps the greatest service that Clemenceau has rendered in the Peace Conference has been not only in taking account of facts himself, but in requiring others associated with him to take account of facts too.

RACIAL TENSION AND RACE RIOTS

DURING the last weeks of July our National capital witnessed race riots which recall in many ways the outbreaks which occurred in Atlanta in 1906. Following the riots in Washington equally serious racial warfare broke out in Chicago. In both cities uncontrolled mobs swept through the streets with the lawless bravado of Mexican bandits. In both cities white hoodlums, acting upon the stimulus of racial hatred, seized upon trivial incidents and unproved crimes as an excuse for indulging in man-hunts.

The Outlook has received from a special correspondent in Washington, who was an eye-witness of many of the scenes of disorder in that city, an impartial account of the tragic hours which disgraced our National capital. Since the situation in Washington cannot be judged without a clear comprehension of the facts, we quote here at length from our correspondent's narrative:

"Between June 25 and July 7 four or five attempts to commit rape, one of them successful, occurred in an outlying quarter of the city. Descriptions of the assailant in the several cases convinced high police officials that only one Negro was responsible for these crimes. Following July 7 a few other instances were reported, some of which proved groundless, others were merely cases where women were jostled by Negroes; but the public, not weighing the evidence, came pretty generally to believe that an epidemic of crimes against white women was abroad. The wife of a soldier returning from her work shortly after ten o'clock, July 18, was jostled by two Negroes, but within call of several white men. The case furnished the immediate cause of the first riot, which occurred in the southwest section of the city on the following (Saturday) night. A mob of four or five hundred, led by soldiers who sought to avenge what they held to be an attempted assault on the wife of a brother soldier, were dispersed by the police and provost guard after beating two Negroes, one of whom was fifty-five years old. Early Sunday morning a policeman in the southwest section was shot and badly wounded by a Negro whom he had challenged. Between ten o'clock and midnight Sunday night groups of soldiers, sailors, and civilians (none of these groups formidable) pursued and attacked individual Negroes on Pennsylvania Avenue between Seventh Street and the Treasury, carrying their operations to the north front of the latter, and even as far as the White House. Innocent Negroes going home from their work were dragged from street cars and brutally beaten.

"Failure of the police to check the rioters promptly, and in certain instances an attitude on their part of seeming indifference, filled the mob with contempt of authority and set the stage for the demonstration of the following night. In behalf of the police, it may be said that their number—about eight hundred and forty to a population estimated by the Census authorities a year ago as at four hundred and one thousand—has long been complained of as wholly inadequate. Fully a third of the force, moreover, are new men, chiefly discharged soldiers and unfamiliar with their new duties.

"In the early hours of Monday morning the attacks on Negroes were carried into sections where the black population is heavy. The whole Negro element of Washington became suddenly aware of a war on their race, which spared no man of color and stopped not to determine whether or not he belonged to the large class of industrious and orderly Negroes in the city. Always more or less suspicious of the white police, who in Washington outnumber the Negro police about twenty-seven to one, and believing that a Negro on arrest is treated more harshly than a white man, by Monday night the colored population held themselves to be without police protection. The mob element among the blacks then armed for war, while many of the better element of their race armed in obedience to the first law of nature.

"That night, the determined efforts of the police, aided by cavalry, infantry, marines, and citizens, were powerless to quell the mobs that surged through the principal business streets and in the black districts. The result was that two whites, one of them a policeman, and two blacks were killed, and hundreds, instead of scores, as on the previous evening, wounded. Subsequent deaths as the result of the riots and their aftermath have brought the number of fatalities up to seven.

"On Tuesday evening and throughout the remainder of the week, except for the presence of military patrols, the streets of Washington have presented an air of unusual quiet.

"The mobs that broke the long record of good order in the National capital—for since 1867, when the Know-Nothing party imported a band of thugs from Baltimore to stage an election riot, there has been no demonstration of factions worthy to be called a riot—were made up almost wholly of boys between eighteen and twenty-five years of age. In part these were composed of young roughs of the city. The rest were soldiers and sailors, either discharged or from near-by camps, and from their appearance doubtless of the hoodlum element of their home towns. The hours they enjoyed in the lust of man-hunting may make these latter especially dangerous in returning to their homes and communicating to their companions the mob spirit. No less dangerous, however, to law and order in this country is the existence of a considerable class in the population, in Washington as well as elsewhere, who, while taking no active part in mob violence, still hold to the belief that only an indiscriminate war on the Negroes can check the individuals who from time to time attempt crimes on white women. How futile the weapon is, however, is seen by the fact that on the third night of the rioting in Washington, still another attempt to assault a white woman was reported just outside the district line in Maryland.

"Before this country entered the great war the Washington police were better acquainted than they are at present with the Negroes of that city and in the main regarded them as law-abiding. Of late, with the great influx of a new and temporary population, generally white, have come many Negroes, and of this number some of vicious character from the States farther South. High wages paid Negro labor during and since the war have, moreover, tended to increase such ill feeling as already existed in certain classes of the whites against the Negroes, in that the less thrifty of the latter have made poor use of their opportunity—stopping work as soon as they had their week's unusual wages—and some others in their prosperity have become too assertive. This is an indictment to which the great body of Negroes in Washington should not be subjected. The long record of peaceful relations between whites and blacks in the city, where each race is dependent upon the other to an extent unknown to the majority of American cities, should for the good of all concerned be resumed at once. Indeed, on the day after each night's disorder there was no indication on the streets or in places of business that the usual relations between the two races had been at all affected. The leaders of the colored people in Washington have in the past month again and again offered their aid to assist the authorities in apprehending Negro offenders."

According to the newspaper accounts, the Chicago riots, which have been fully as serious, if not more so, than the Washington disorders, were set in motion by an incident at one of the bathing beaches. A Negro boy, it is said, drifted over on a raft from the section of the beach devoted to Negroes to that reserved for white bathers. Stones were thrown, and bathers on both sides of the line of demarcation took up the quarrel. The disorder rapidly spread beyond the beaches, until by midnight on July 28 it is stated that some fourteen men had been killed and seventy-six wounded; and a few hours later the number reported killed reached thirty and the number injured amounted to hundreds. Of course to say that such a social disaster was "caused" by the incident at the bathing beach is like saying that a single match was the sole cause of the loss of life and property in any of the great munition explosions which occurred during the great war. A match can start a conflagration, but it can do so only if it is placed in proximity to explosives and inflammable material.

Even if it is true, as our correspondent from Washington believes, that the Washington riots were purely local in origin, it cannot be denied that the whole situation between the races in America is full of social dynamite, and only careful and courageous action of the officials who are charged with maintaining order and the good judgment and restraint of leaders, both white and colored, can forestall disaster of even greater magnitude than that which has already occurred.

What are the underlying causes of the situation which exists in this country today? The causes are complex and not easily to be determined; but some of the elements which enter into these causes may be summarized here.

The Negro is to-day growing increasingly prosperous. With prosperity he has become more and more an economic rival of white men laboring within the same industrial field. With prosperity has come a natural and wholesome desire for increased social and political independence. The high prices paid for cotton during the war taught many Negroes a way out of the agricultural peonage to which in many sections in the South they had been subjected. The high prices paid for all kinds of labor during the war gave to Negroes, unskilled and skilled, an opportunity to enter industries and sections of the country into which they had never been able to penetrate before. With this growing opportunity for independence of action came a natural revulsion against the enforced servility to which the bulk of the Negro race has been subjected. Nor can the factor of military service be ignored as one which has increased, not only the self-confidence of our Negro citizens, but also the desire to see that self-confidence, developed in the service of the Nation, acknowledged by the Nation at large. With this growth in self-confidence there has been, naturally, an increase in the defects of that quality—self-assertiveness and obtrusiveness. The road from racial servility and racial arrogance to interracial courtesy is one which large elements of our population, both black and white, have found hard to traverse.

That this impulse toward better social conditions for the Negro has aroused passionate and primitive resentment in many parts of the country, chiefly among whites who are nearest to being on an economic plane with the mass of Negro labor, is a matter for careful and speedy consideration by the Government. In times of disorder in a democracy it is, moreover, natural for the people to look to their elected leader. On such occasions in the past the Presidential office has proved to be a channel for the expression of the National will and an instrument of National action.

ON A BARBLESS HOOK

BY HAROLD TROWBRIDGE PULSIFER

AROUND the shores of the little lake great spruce trees shot up from the water's edge. Here and there the lighter green of birch and swamp maple fringed the circle of somber and towering evergreens. A wood duck and her brood paddled across the pond, the long V of their wake vanishing only as it disappeared in the lily-pads that covered the shoals. There was no wind and the sun was high in the sky.

It was a perfect day—for everything but fishing. The shallows and the deeps alike refused to give up the living rainbows that lurked within them. From lily-pads and sunken rocks not even the swirl of a back fin rewarded the single fly that dropped ever so lightly at the end of my nine-foot tapered leader.

Noon came, and my boat was headed for the shore. As we turned homeward a patch of lily-pads caught my eye. "Wait," I said; "there's one spot I haven't cast over yet. Hold her up while I change flies for the last time to-day." My guide back-paddled slowly as I searched through my fly box for a feathered insect that bore promise of appealing to the taste of some fastidious trout. "Try that gray drake we had on last night. It worked good then," volunteered the paddle wielder. "It's not dusk now," I objected. "There's no living insect like that gray drake within a mile of this pond, and Mr. Rhead's feelings will be hurt if I use one of his flies without previously conducting a scientific research into the family antecedents of all the winged life of northeastern America." To all of which my guide only responded, with suspicious patience, "Put it on, mister."

So I put it on, despite the knowledge that I was violating all the canons of the law according to Mr. Louis Rhead, and began to lengthen out my line until I had enough to reach the inviting-looking pads some forty feet away.

Then I let the fly drop into the water. I said "into the water," but the expression is inaccurate, for the water rose up to meet the descending fly. Have you ever seen a beaver dive? Just such an upheaval burst forth from the water. My reel sang and my rod arched its back like an angry cat.

But this is not a story of "how I caught a trout without the use of dynamite." It is not even a story at all. If I have lured any reader thus far under false pretenses, I ask to be forgiven, and if the reader happens to be an angler I beg him or her to go on.

As I was saying, my reel sang, my rod arched, and in due course of time my trout decided that discretion was the better part of valor and came in towards the boat to negotiate a surrender with full military honors. For a moment I watched him, sixteen inches of perfect trouthood, and then, slacking my line, bade him depart in peace. But he refused to depart. I brought him back to the boat. My guide slipped the net beneath him, and after carefully wetting his hand, held him up to take out the hook. What a beauty he was, black of back, golden of belly, and spotted as vividly as any trout that has lived all his life in swift cold water!

But the hook did not slip out as easily as I had hoped it would. I saw my guide's fingers deep within the trout's distended jaws. "It's down in his throat," he said, anxiously. "There! now I've got it." He held the trout over the edge of the boat and let him slip gently into the water.

For an instant the fish floated right side up—then he keeled over, and, his white belly gleaming up through the water, sank slowly out of sight. My guide and I looked at each other in silence. "You and I have been fishing," I said at last,

"most of the time for the last three seasons with barbless hooks. From now on we fish all the time with barbless hooks and nothing else." "Mister," said my guide, "I am with you."

Thus ends the reading of the text and begins the sermon. It is a sermon that is not intended primarily for those who fish the exhausted streams that abound in long-settled regions, though perhaps they may find something of profit therein. It is a sermon intended for those who go afield to wild waters where more fish are to be found than any man's frying-pan can hold.

Twenty and thirty years ago the great majority of those who fished in wild waters carried home all the trout they caught and then threw away the fish they did not desire to eat. At one preserve with which I happen to be familiar the story goes that the old-timers kept barrels standing in front of the club-house in which to deposit their surplus catch. These barrels, when filled to overflowing, were taken into the woods and buried.

Happily, a generation has grown up since then which knows not this ancient extravagance and which has come to look upon the man who brings in more fish than he needs for his own use as a creature not distantly related to the genus Sus—and no credit to his porcine cousins at that!

But not bringing in fish and returning these same fish to the water unharmed are not necessarily synonymous actions. Burying a barbed hook in a fish's throat is not the only way to kill a trout. A trout will frequently die if the protecting slime that covers its body is broken by the dry hands of the careless angler. Trout will die, too, if their gills are bruised either by the hands of the angler or the meshes of his net. They will die if their tongues are torn, or if they are stunned by the over-zealous angler who strikes hard enough to send them hurtling through the air to land with a thud against the side of his boat.

From this catalogue of sudden death there is but one path of escape. It is a path that has been known for years, but there are few, very few, anglers who follow it even at this late date when we have learned to talk so glibly of "conserving our National resources." In the contest between fishing conversation and fishing conservation conversation has won out by enough rods, links, and poles to equip a regiment of surveyors.

Why is it that so few anglers have become converts to the barbless hook? If angling is the art that so many users of barbed hooks aver it to be, surely no finer development could be found than the simple substitution of barbless hooks for the tearing and mutilating instruments now in use in practically all waters.

The slowness with which the barbless hook, which is simply a grown-up edition of the bent pin of childhood, has made its way towards popularity with fly-fishermen is hard to understand. It is not because fishing with barbless hooks is an art only within the province of the expert. I am only a passing angler, yet I have landed without any great difficulty pound-and-a-half trout on a barbless No. 10 in quiet water, have caught half-pounders in swift water, and have even brought safely to net several landlocked salmon, of no great size, but with all the pyrotechnic instincts of their athletic clan.

I lose only a few more fish on a barbless hook than I do on its barbed and barbarous cousin. And to offset this trifling and well-deserved loss I have learned more about the proper handling of rod and line from a single season's use of the barbless hook than I could otherwise have learned in several years' experience with the ordinary hooks of commerce. What I catch I deserve. What I do not wish to keep I know I can release without damage, and generally without handling of any kind. In one morning's fishing out of fifty successive fish which I hooked I found it only necessary to take three out of the water in order to release them from the line. The rest were dropped, when I assented, merely by slacking my line for an instant. And of the three taken out of the water two dropped off as they came over the side of the boat, and only one required an instant's touch before the hook could be slipped from his jaw. If you were a life insurance agent, would you prefer to insure the lives of those fifty fish or of fifty others held tightly between thumb and index fingers while some great man giant tore a barbed hook from their mouths?

There is one reason, perhaps, why barbless fishing has not gained ground as it should. Very few fishing-tackle stores carry barbless hooks, and those that do carry only a limited variety of flies tied upon these excellent instruments. The hooks are, to the best of my knowledge and belief, imported at present from England, and the angler who really desires to equip himself completely with barbless flies must go to the trouble of ordering a set especially tied.

It is true that the barbs can be broken or filed from the regular hooks of commerce, but it is hard to approach by such a process the smoothness of the real barbless hooks. But it is very well worth while trying as the first step of the angler's initiation into the cleanest and fairest type of fly-fishing that exists. First, break or file the barbs from your hooks, and then when you have become converted to this partial form of barblessness, go to your fishing-tackle dealer and keep asking for flies tied on barbless hooks until he finds them for you. If you create a demand, your dealer will create a supply. At least that is what some economists tell us.

Do not be afraid to join the slowly growing fraternity of anglers of those whose password is, "We put 'em back alive." The first evening when the fish are rising well try out a barbless fly. You may lose a few fish which otherwise you could have caught. But not many. Once on the hook, play your fish delicately, keep him deep and well out from the boat or shore until he tires. Never give him an inch of slack line if your frying-pan is looking to you to fill its sputtering maw. What you get you will deserve by all the canons of good fishing, and when you lose or put back fish your dreams will not be troubled with the speckled and reproachful ghosts of trout that will never rise to another Parmachene Belle!

THE FOURTEENTH OF JULY AT PARIS

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE BY ELBERT FRANCIS BALDWIN

Paris, July 14, 1919.

4:30 A.M. Gare St. Lazare. Even at this very early hour Paris is full of people and movement. Motors, trams, auto-buses, are going full tilt, passers-by too.

5 a.m. Boulevard Montmartre. You have to walk a mile on these Grands Boulevards before you can cross them at any cross streets. On either side of the Boulevard stands a solid line of soldiers, shoulder to shoulder.

5:30 a.m. Louvre. The crowd pours through the street arteries under the great palace of the Louvre and wears a smile of relief. For after a fortnight's chilly, cloudy weather the sun is shining on this day of days for France. It is her birthday.

6 a.m. Pantheon. The sun doubles the gayety and effect of the decoration colors. In any event, there would have been decorations a-plenty to-day to mark the liberty won in the French Revolution a century and more ago. But these that we see this morning are unprecedented decorations.

6:30 a.m. Luxembourg Gardens. And so, sitting at a second cup of coffee, I behold this morning a Paris of never so great a population. Thousands of visitors have spent the night in the open air.

7 a.m. Place de la Concorde. Hereabouts the streets, squares, bridges, are jammed with people; windows, balconies, roofs, and even chimneys, are black, brown, blue, red, yellow, with the costumes of men, women, and children who have already taken their places in order to see the parade. Nor are they the first. Here and there you find whole families who have been sleeping on their own camp-stools which they have brought with them from afar and eating out of capacious lunch-baskets. All night the trees bordering the Place and along the Avenue des Champs Élysées have been bearing human fruit. Boys and men are there, like so many birds.

7:30 a.m. Élysée Palace Hotel. Our Army men have been occupying this hotel as a headquarters, as have the English the Hotel Astoria, between us and the Arc de Triomphe, just up the Champs Élysées a few blocks. Both hotels are now black with humanity even to the siren on the Astoria roof. In that noted hostelry William II expected to lunch after he entered Paris!

8 a.m. Avenue du Bois. The sun is now full upon the Triumphal Arch, close by. The chains which guard the entrance to the Arch have been removed.

The ceremony will be begun by a delegation of a thousand men from those who have been maimed in the war. They will advance through the Arch to the cenotaph erected last week to the memory of the dead in the war and will salute that altar before taking seats reserved for them. (The first thought of France always goes to her dead.) Very many of the mutilés have one leg, one arm, one eye gone. Many are on crutches. Nearly all wear medals—the Croix de Guerre or the Legion of Honor or the Médaille Militaire. Some cannot walk; some, with both legs gone, can never walk. These are wheeled on long, low chairs by the more able-bodied wounded or by nurses. Some of the mutilés are totally blind and are led by their comrades. But their faces are transfigured. Tears streaming down his face, one of the blind exclaimed: "I feel it all. I see!"

8:30 a.m. Avenue de la Grande Armée. From my perch here, to which I hastened half an hour ago, I can watch the procession pass along this, its first street, and can also see it pass under the Arc de Triomphe near by. With the broad Avenue des Champs Élysées, the equally broad Avenue de la Grande Armée forms a west-to-east line through the Arch. The ample sidewalks are densely crowded; it is hard to wedge your way through. Those persons who have not been able to elevate themselves over the heads of others on chairs, stages, or step-ladders have discovered that, after all, they are favored; they are now gazing up into the tilted tinted glass signs over the shops, which perfectly reflect what is going on in the middle of the street.

A cannon booms, its echo taken up by the cheering thousands on the sidewalks and balconies and roofs and wherever they can find place. The procession is starting from the Porte Maillot, which leads from the suburb of Neuilly into the city proper.

In less time than one would fancy a squadron of the Republican Guard, in gala attire, comes in sight, a serried rank of red, black, white, and glittering brass.

Then a space of twenty yards or so, and a mighty shout rises from the people. For there, riding side by side, are Joffre and Foch. The two Marshals appear like two slowly moving statues, representing the genius and glory of France. They seem to unite all a warrior's qualities—the cold head, the warm heart; originality and initiative, energy and efficiency; finally, the readiness to sacrifice, whether themselves, their men, or their territory. Of course the two Marshals stand specially for the Marne; one for the first battle there, nearly five years ago, and the other for the second battle, a year ago. The relief of the crowd on seeing Joffre actually in the parade finds quick expression. By an incredible and painful oversight or intention (which recalls the treatment of General Wood at home), the name of the hero who had saved Paris in 1914 had not appeared in the official announcements. "L'Intransigeant" and other papers made such a protest that the blunder was atoned for as far as could be. As he passes "Papa Joffre" looks portlier and more paternal than ever. But those of us who are his special admirers fancy that we detect a sadness in his face—as of one who had met a new disillusionment. Foch's attitude towards his senior is admirable—he always keeps his horse just the least bit in the rear of Joffre's mount. Each Marshal wears the uniform in which he has become best known: Joffre in black dolman and red trousers and Foch wholly in gray.

As Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Forces, Foch leads detachments from those forces. First comes Foch's Staff, a large body of well-mounted officers. Then (as seems appropriate to us Americans!) come our own detachments in their alert, special West Point step—a hundred and thirty instead of the usual hundred and twenty steps to the minute. Our men are in ideally exact block formation. Step and formation receive instant and enthusiastic appreciation from the people. It is inspiring to see our flag and to observe every one saluting it. French hats come off quickly to it, their wearers remembering that the presence of our troops probably saved France from a German peace. But the American onlooker thinks, "We might have sent men two years sooner."

Our soldiers are headed by martial, stern-looking General Pershing. His cap visor and his chin seem on about the same angle.

The composite battalion of infantry, made up of the best men from all the divisions, is followed by a naval detachment, which is getting even greater applause from the crowd. Yet, despite the bands' "Over There," all our men look a bit solemn, and a voice near me rings out: "Souriez un peu."

The "smile a little" has its effect upon the heavier-moving, less military-looking Belgians who follow more smilingly, General Guillaing at their head. Their appearance in the mass is more soldierly, however, than that indicated by the occasional Belgian one sees on the boulevards, with the absurd little tassel on his cap. One forgets the tassels nevertheless now that he sees the battle-scarred flags surmounted by the Belgian lion and bearing names tragically memorable to all the world.

Following the Belgians come the British. Field-Marshal Sir Douglas Haig, Commander-in-Chief, leads them. One thinks of a Briton as more impassive than a Frenchman, yet of all the generals so far Sir Douglas acknowledges more continually than does any other the spectators' plaudits. Next to the satisfaction of finding Marshal Joffre in the parade is the people's pleasure in seeing Marshal Haig there, for they had not been informed that he would be. As have been all Parisians throughout the war, so the people about me are much impressed by the British officers' smart appearance. To-day they are equally impressed by the scarlet, gold-fringed flags—some of those flags tattered with much history-making. The onlookers are now frankly admiring the supple, muscular quality of the men trudging by, the bare-kneed Scotch and the bluejackets being the most warmly received. As the latter swing along, who can escape the conviction that they represent the mightiest single force in the world to-day? And to the American spectator the thought is not absent that but for them the Boche might have appeared in force at our own doors also.

Now come the Italians, briskly moving to the strains of their national anthem. I expected to hear a sharp comment or two concerning the crisis at Fiume the other day between some French and some Italians, but there are no such comments about me—only hearty applause, which the Alpini well deserve. Besides, the French can hardly forget the blood from the south spilled for them in the Champagne, where the Italian regiments lost half their effectives.

Now follow the Japanese, looking very picturesque in their red-bound caps. Apparently the French have never seen a Japanese on horseback, and are agreeably surprised to see a number of them astride, yet the Japanese seem only so many bobbing Sphinxes, each wearing an inscrutable smile, the more inscrutable because of the proximity of the Chinese.

And here is another surprise—the Greeks, no longer in the short white skirt, but in tight white trousers.

Of all the nations, the Poles, now passing, are getting the most strenuous applause so far, save that for America. They are not many in number, but as their white eagle heaves in sight the past history, present plight, and future dreams of Poland seem to find vent in responsive shouts of sympathy.

Now follow the bronzed and swarthy Portuguese; well set-up Romans; nervous-looking, resolute Serbs; strange-looking agile Siamese; and, finally, the men who seem to come closest to the Poles in Parisian esteem, the Czechoslovaks, in dark-blue caps and many wearing the red foutragère won in the French army.

But where is Russia?—not Bolshevik Russia of the past year, but the Ally who sacrificed two million men that this Peace Day might come? Where are the representatives now in Paris of those martyrs?

Now there is appropriately a pause of some moments before the second half of the procession appears. It is led by the Commander-in-Chief of the French Army, the hero of Verdun, Marshal Pétain. He looks younger, he is more athletic and buoyant, slenderer, and more graceful than his portraits show. He sits his white horse with juvenile ease. He smiles frankly.

Behind him rides one who ought to be the fourth Marshal of France—Castelnau, who saved Nancy and the east front. Every one notes the black brassard on his arm; every one is saying, "He lost all his sons in the war."

A similar movement of sympathy there is as one-armed Gouraud rides by. He is the symbol of duty and sacrifice. Of the other generals, Mangin, the square-jawed, gets the lion's share of applause. All know the story of the final phase of the war and of Mangin's tenacity in grappling with the Boche, in downing him, and in holding him down.

But what shall we say of the poilu himself?—our poilu too, as he seems, for not only did he fight from the first day to the last day of the war, he fought for all of us. There are many of him, representing the twenty-one corps of the army proper, a company from each regiment which had earned the foutragère of the highest rank. They pass by to the music of the "Chant du Départ," the "Marche Lorraine," the "Sambre-et-Meuse." They pass by bearing flags full of holes.

Then come the armies of the Orient and of Africa—yellow and black-skinned men, in their midst a scarlet-robed cavalier riding majestically along on his Arab steed with its gold harness.

Now follow men from the navy. Admiral Ronarc'h at their head; the cavalry.

with General Féraud ; the artillery, with General Herr ; the airmen, with Fonck as the central figure.

The procession has taken two hours to pass. But other men also follow—the heroes who have given their lives for La Patrie. They indeed do not merely follow. They are everywhere. One feels their presence in all the ranks of marching men.

WHAT THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST THINKS ABOUT THE LEAGUE AND THE TREATY

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

Mr. Davenport has just returned from the Pacific Northwest, where for purposes official and unofficial he has been inquiring into the sentiment of the people of that part of the country with respect to the League of Nations and the Treaty of Peace. He finds in that virile section of America a strong feeling that the League and the Treaty ought to be ratified, but also an equally powerful conviction that the interests of the United States should be thoroughly safeguarded by Senate interpretations which will give this country such a wisely flexible relation to the League Covenant that we shall not be entangled into weakness but left free for the highest moral leadership and service among the nations.—THE EDITORS.

I HAVE formed a habit of going into the West to find out what America is thinking. If you give the East time, you will get the American reaction there. But the democratic reactions originate in the East with difficulty. There are more distractions and cross-currents in the National life this side of the prairies. What the West is thinking usually soon in substance America will be thinking—with certain modifications in judgment that will be made by the conservative East. Out where the great reaches of prairie horizon and the peaks of the Rockies are there is instinctive America ; homogeneous, human folks full of a prosperous energy and a native practical idealism.

I went out this time over the Northern route, through Minnesota, the Dakotas, Montana, Oregon, and Washington. Montana, northern Wyoming, and southern Alberta in Canada constitute this year a great drought belt, and the condition of the crops and the cattle is extremely hazardous. Horses in Montana are being sold for a song, and the transportation system of that section is being organized to ship out great numbers of sheep and cattle for water and grazing in the States farther east. But in Minnesota and the Dakotas, and in most of the other great Western States, the crop outlook is generous in the extreme, wheat ninety-five per cent perfect and other grains in proportion.

Barns filled with plenty, granaries overflowing, how sufficient unto itself the great Central West is ! That is the reason that for once the natural instinct of the West failed early in the great war. The whole thing was too far away, too removed from the real, too disconnected with the actual ! So now, I think, the prairie West has given none too much thought to the problems of readjustment following the war. The prairie West does not know, does not need to know, the meaning of the word reconstruction. Take any one of the many self-sufficing cities of plenty, like Aberdeen, in South Dakota, a city of seventeen thousand souls. As I stood on the corner one evening and talked to a well-informed citizen of the community he said to me : "There are no poor people here at all. At least not since we went dry, a few years ago. Nobody in jail, the sheriff nothing to do. Most of the farmers live in town and go out each day to their work, leaving a hired man on the place. Some farm land is worth $200 an acre near town. Common laborers get fifty cents an hour, carpenters seventy-five and eighty cents. The rate for harvest hands was fixed last year by the Commercial Board of Aberdeen at $5 per day and board."

I marveled at the vast array of autos parked in the main street in the cool of the evening and the further stream of them in both directions. Just then a rather antiquated trolley bumped by. "Trolleys here are bum," said my friend, "and the main reason is that everybody has an auto and everybody gets out in the evening for a joy-ride." I observed a strapping young woman riding by astride a very good saddle horse. "Is there much horseback-riding out here any more ?" I asked. "Not so much any more. Everybody has an auto in the wheat country. That young woman on horseback is the head waitress of the leading hotel here." It is no use stopping in Aberdeen to find out how to mend the world. She simply does not need mending in Aberdeen !

But when you get into the Pacific Northwest, into Washington and Oregon, it is different. Out there the West is far more sensitive, more acute in its reaction upon present international relations. Out there the Pacific West realizes that it is close up against the great war problems of the coming centuries. And the Pacific Northwest is worth listening to in this critical hour. And this is their reaction so far as I have been able to gather it from listening-posts of vantage.

The folks in the Pacific Northwest think it is a mistake to pound the President. They don't want to see him pounded. The more of that, the more the Republican cause is weakened by men of the Sherman of Illinois or the irreconcilable Borah type. They regard this sort of thing as political antics, as straining to make an issue. They are beginning to get into a critical temper of mind themselves, but they prefer to stick to the main question. It is not so much their adoration of the President. They express a great deal of quiet disapproval of the President. It is rather their sense that we are confronted with an issue too profound to be muddled with aspersions upon personalities.

The Northwest has been in some danger, and still is in some danger, of being stampeded for the Wilson League of Nations by post-war emotionalism, by a feeling of yearning for peace. "We want a League of Nations"—as a slogan, a shibboleth—if played upon skillfully without check or criticism, might become as deadly to genuine patriotism and insight now as "he kept us out of war" was in 1916. And so when the President got off the George Washington the other day and, seeing the masses of his countrymen assembled to greet him, began to repeat, "I believed, and now I know, that the American people want a League of Nations," a shiver passed through the backbone of the more thoughtful people in the Northwest, even on a very hot day. "There he goes again," reflecting men began to say ; "now for another rush of emotional sentiment that will drive the country off its feet, as in 1916." There is no doubt either that the people of the West do want a League of Nations. And the party or the political leadership denying it to them in substance would have rough treatment in that section of the country in the coming Presidential conflict. The thing which thoughtful men fear is, not ratification of the substance of the Covenant and permanent union with our allies, but the uncritical, unreserved acceptance of certain proposals in the instrument which have an iniquitous look from the standpoint of the welfare of America and the world.

In the Pacific West the Shantung settlement is the provision which will act as a center of anchorage, while the mass of the people are getting into a frame of mind to sit up and take due and proper notice of the whole programme of Versailles. Nowhere on the Pacific coast is there friendship for the Japanese. On the other hand, the earlier attitude toward the Chinese has entirely changed. The whole Kearney sand-lot hostility has passed away. The steady efficiency, the modesty, the trading honor of the Chinaman, have won their way completely on the coast. "I would rather do business with a Chinaman than with a white man"—you often hear this. But the coast distrusts the Japanese. Insidious scheming to get the advantage, lacking integrity, silently pushing the white man out of his seat on the land, in the restaurant, the hotel, the shipping industry, everywhere—this is at the present time the established reputation of the Japanese on our Western border. How unjust this wholesale judgment may be I have not the information or experience to say. But there is no doubt as to the universality of the opinion.

Shantung is a red flag to the Pacific West. They believe out there that Japan is entering upon the penetration of China with the assiduity and perfection of another Germany. So prominent and able an American as McClatchy, of the Sacramento "Bee," after a careful examination at first hand of the Japanese news service, reports that many Chinese newspapers have already been bought up by the Japanese and that a news service at less than cost is already furnished from Japan to many of the other Chinese papers. Here is a superior channel for the silent penetration of the mind of China, says McClatchy, so that it will become unconsciously servile to the political and industrial policies, the ideas, the leadership, of Japan. There is also widespread belief on the coast that Japan controls the present Chinese Government through bribes and will attempt to continue this course of corrupt penetration.

It would be too much to say that the whole coast is awake to the present peril of the Shantung provision in the Treaty, but the leaders of thought are, and the whole soil is fertile for the opposition which is sure to increase. Thoughtful men in the Northwest say that we are laying up for ourselves a day of wrath; some day, if we allow the Shantung settlement to pass without at least an enormous moral protest, we shall face the great catastrophe in Asia which we have just now faced in Europe.

"But what are you going to do about it?" says Ole Hanson, in a merry and scrappy mood. "While we were for the time being too halting and pusillanimous to go to the rescue of a stricken world France and England, driven to desperation, called upon Japan to aid, and Shantung is the price. What have we to say?" Much for the sake of Japan and the world, as well as America, is the serious answer of the coast. It was timid leadership which kept us out of the great war until it was almost too late; it shall not keep us now from deep moral protest about Shantung while yet there is time. Perhaps we cannot amend Shantung out of the Treaty without indefinitely postponing peace, which is a course unthinkable, but when we ratify the Pacific coast believes that we should confess before the world the reason for our share in the compounding of this great wrong. The Shantung settlement is contrary to our more enlightened foreign policy, to the policy of Hay and Root and Roosevelt. It is no answer for Japan to maintain that it is the extension of the Monroe Doctrine to the Far West. It is nothing of the sort. The Monroe Doctrine on our Western Hemisphere has always protected the principle of freedom and nationality, and that not for ourselves alone. When we have seemed to infringe upon this principle, as in Central America in the case of a few petty and hopelessly backward communities, nevertheless it has been in the practical spirit of the protection of the freedom of the Western Hemisphere against the spread of the miasma of disorder, and we have acted in a very limited way. We have never attempted the imperialistic penetration of Japan in China and Korea. There has never been the slightest taint of imperialism about the Monroe Doctrine in the modern foreign policy of America. It has never been necessary for any commission of the Council of the Federation of the Churches of Christ of any nation to launch against us what the Commission of the Federation Council of America launched the other day against Japan in the matter of Korea, when, after long study of the situation in that unhappy island, the militaristic Government in power in Japan was charged by the Commission with having made the defenseless people of Korea the victims of massacre, ruthless suppression, and widespread brutality. The report appears to substantiate the charge that the Japanese colonial system which has been forced upon the Koreans is thoroughly Prussian in its military severity and in its treatment of the native population. Everywhere in Korea, it is stated in the report, the sword is the emblem of authority, and is even worn by male school-teachers in the school-room.

The Pacific coast believes that America should at least make a strenuous moral protest against the moral disaster of the Shantung settlement; not at all in the spirit of the wholesale condemnation of the Japanese Government and people, and distinguishing clearly between the reactionary and autocratic forces, on the one hand, and, on the other, the anti-militarist liberals of Japan who are slowly gaining the ascendancy. Thus will two ends be achieved—the strengthening of the hands of the great body of powerful Japanese liberals and the making more sure the carrying out of the unwritten promise of Japan to return Shantung to China after a period of reconstruction. Why the unwritten promise, says the Pacific Northwest? If Japan is to give Shantung back to China, why not put it on paper? In private matters we think suspiciously of men who say that they intend to do a thing but will not put it on paper.

It is not all idealism with the coast either. But the materialism of the situation happens strongly to reinforce the idealism. Forty-six million dollars' worth of American exports passed through Puget Sound to the Orient in the month of February alone. Europe will soon again produce her own manufactures and ask mainly for food from the United States. But the seven hundred millions of Asia, if Japan does not interfere, will furnish a limitless market for the manufactures of America.

The Pacific coast is canny enough to see this also.

The simon-pure, blown-in-the-bottle League Covenanters of the Northwest look askance at the French pact by which we agree with England to go to the help of France against Germany. This super-pact, say the League radicals, is an acknowledgment that something stronger than the League is needed to keep the peace of the world. And it is a dangerous acknowledgment to make. But the wiser heads agree that nothing could be more popular in this country than a pact by which America would go again to the help of France in a great emergency. France has always been standing at the Marne for civilization, and it is time, say they, that she knew she may have help at any hour of her need. At least America will feel that way until the future of the League is assured.

The Pacific Northwest wishes the League and the Treaty ratified. There can be no doubt about that. But just as the Northwest is strongly American, so, in my judgment, it will take strongly to the doctrine of reservations to safeguard America for her task of unique service to the world. As the most effective propagandist for the League Covenant in that part of the country, a man who is also a Republican said to me: "Granted ratification, we have no objection at all to reservations that will leave the United States free to act out herself, that will leave her in such a position that she will gradually gather to herself the friendship of the world." We were talking about Article X of the Covenant, in which the members of the League undertake day by day to sit in at disputes which involve external aggression against the territorial integrity and political independence of members of the League, and in which also we undertake to help to enforce the will of the League. "It is up to the Republican party to insist," said my sturdy Northwest covenant, "upon the League Covenant being made as flexible as possible as far as the United States is concerned. For us to mix in the petty quarrels of South America and Europe would be to diminish our prestige and our capacity for moral leadership. The natural attitude of the United States is a judicial aloofness that will make her will and purpose of the utmost value to the world in a great emergency. We are not fitted by tradition or experience to sit day by day at the political council table of the status quo."

Curiously enough, however, the Northwest does not wish Article X cut out. The Article seems to them important from the standpoint of the protection of small nations. But as for America's relation to the Article, they would like our position clearly stated in terms of the hands-off policy of our tradition, excepting those emergencies which are truly international in character and would be so regarded by the American Congress and American public opinion. They would like to see the relation of America to Article X defined in terms of a reasonable and flexible aloofness. Here is a job, in the phraseology of reservations, for a master hand. They all agree that Elihu Root is the man to try it. I found that the Root reservations were as well known and as much respected among the thoughtful people of the State of Washington as they are in the city of Washington. The Northwest will stand clearly for reservations in the interest of a pure Americanism. Out there they look for the Republican party to assert a strong American position. They wish the League Covenant ratified, but they expect the Senate also to safeguard America for her unique service to the world.

En route Eastward, July 22, 1919.

THE NEW NATION OF ASIA

INTERNAL STRIFE IN RUSSIA PRODUCES A SEPARATE GOVERNMENT IN SIBERIA, WHOSE PEOPLE ARE RUSHING RECONSTRUCTION EFFORTS AND FACING THE FUTURE WITH HIGH HOPES—AMERICA'S GREAT OPPORTUNITY THERE

BY CHARLES W. HOLMAN

When Herbert Hoover reached America, a few weeks after our declaration of war on Germany, and set about forming an organization that was to become the nucleus of the United States Food Administration staff, he invited Mr. Charles W. Holman, of Madison, Wisconsin, to take charge of the section having relations with the Nation's farm journals. In the spring of 1918 a possible world shortage of vegetable oils loomed big, and he sent Mr. Holman to Japan and Manchuria to make first-hand studies of production and stocks. Upon finishing his work in Manchuria, Mr. Holman was ordered to travel in Siberia and make various studies of the food supply and of the commercial organizations dealing with food. He first entered Siberia in the late summer of last year, and traveled from Vladivostok to Omsk, a distance of about four thousand miles. He took plenty of time to penetrate below the surface of Siberian life, and he did not confine his interviews to officials or business men. He visited Russians in their homes from the highest to the humblest, and he discovered that, despite the strange and tragic happenings in that land, they are, after all, just folks with plenty of common sense and with sanity that is now asserting itself. In this issue is presented the first of two articles by him giving a résumé of important social and political happenings in Siberia, and his conclusions deduced from a seven months' first-hand study among the people who are making the New Nation of Asia.—THE EDITORS.

A NEW nation has sprung up in Asia; its citizens, believing in the new freedom, may soon join the world family. That new nation is Siberia, the snowy domain on the northern rim of the Eastern world—a vast expanse, greater than Europe, of farming, mountain, and timber lands, rich in game, fur, and minerals—whose inhabitants are just glimpsing their own future as co-members of a commonwealth with a destiny all its own.

War, revolution, and Bolshevism overtook these people. They supported the war, welcomed the Revolution, and threw off Bolshevism as a poisonous thing. In that series of remarkable calamities that fell upon them they found a sense of national unity in their struggles. Still loyal to Russia, they have also come to feel that Siberia is something apart from Russia—something all their own.

Cut off from the mother country by natural land divisions and separated from contact with the good people of Russia by the Red Army which they are fighting in the Ural Mountain region, Siberians have been forced to "go on their own" in matters of government, and to seek assistance from the outside without regard to European Russia's problems. Those who now lead the people will have nothing more to do with Bolshevism except to fight it; therefore if the terrorists do not fall from the disintegration of Russia internally, since the Allies appear to have determined upon a policy of non-interference, the Siberian Government will undoubtedly announce the incompatibility of Bolshevism with the Siberian people's ideals, declare their independence of Russia, and ask for recognition as a new nation.

Two things only stand in the way of such action at the present time:

1. Hope that a peaceable solution of Siberian problems will greatly influence the problem in Russia and the Siberian Government will gradually be recognized as the All-Russian Government.

2. Fear of Japan's aggressive policy in the Orient.

In its favor there is some reason to believe that Siberian autonomy would be a very good means to prevent a spread of Bolshevist doctrines eastward and to block whatever ambitions Japan might have in Russian territory on the principle of the right of weaker nations to international protection.

Those who formerly believed that exterminating Bolshevism in Siberia might be the means of ending it in Russia are now more inclined to consider the possibilities of Siberia as an independent unit of the Russian peoples. They see more clearly that popular government in Russia will be difficult so long as the country attempts to maintain itself as a whole. The area is too vast, the natural divisions of interest too varied, and the per capita progress in education too backward. Some think that the problem will be easier to solve if the people will form themselves into governmental units based upon natural land divisions and economic interests. Against this plan is a strong national pride which Americans understand very well. It is the same kind of pride that manifests itself now and then when some practical person suggests dividing the State of Texas or reforming the Constitution of Arkansas.

RECENT EVENTS FIRE SIBERIAN HOPES

Recent events in Siberia strengthen the impression that it will seek autonomy and receive recognition. The most important of these was the agreement by which the present dictator of Siberia, Admiral Kolchak, whose administration is known as the Omsk Government, arranged for the great Trans-Siberian Railway system in the territory acknowledging his authority—something like four thousand miles of line—to be taken over and operated by an international commission representing his Government, the United States, Italy, England, Japan, and France. Further, France is assisting the Admiral's Government by training his troops and England is aiding by furnishing equipment and munition to his armies. The United States also is doing something, having sent approximately eight thousand soldiers there to guard the railway, and now, by the terms of the arrangement, will operate the Trans-Siberian Railway on the American plan. Our plan of railway operation has also included the lending of several million dollars to the Russians for rehabilitating the Siberian system.

Economic causes may further influence Siberian hopes of autonomy; for the wise Russian living there knows that he cannot have trade relations with the mother country so long as Bolshevism reigns. The problem may be a long time in working itself out in European Russia, and he cannot afford to wait, for Siberia is destitute of nearly every article in a long list of imports and Siberian industries are well-nigh paralyzed for lack of essentials which can only be had from some outside supply. He is beginning, therefore, to think it out in somewhat the following way:

"Even if the Allies feed Russia, they will be very conservative about it, and will be more likely to draw upon the Siberian surplus food supply than their own because it is closer. They will be very reluctant to let in machinery parts and other things that city industries will need, because such will encourage the Bolsheviki.

"Now we are anti-Bolsheviki, but we must convince the Allies that we really are, in order to procure a free trade intercourse. That is to say, we must practically give bond that the materials we import will not go into Russia to sustain the Lenine cause. The best way to do that is to convince the Allies that we Siberians are capable of running our own affairs, that we seek recognition of a government formed on liberal rather than revolutionary lines."

A GROWING SYMPATHY AMONG THE ALLIES

Sympathy for recognition of the Kolchak Government has been growing among the Allies, who have apparently abandoned hope of outside influence solving the internal problems of European Russia. They are now inclined to support the Kolchak Government, on the theory that it is showing a competence and a general support making it worthy of recognition.

Advices made public on April 19 by the Russian Ambassador to the United States have tended further to strengthen public confidence in America in the Kolchak rule. These advices from the Omsk Government's Minister of Foreign Affairs stated that the ready money in the state bank and treasury, which had been robbed by the Bolsheviks, had been increased from 213,000,000 rubles<sup>1</sup> in July of last year to 1,500,000,000 rubles.

Abolition of restrictions on deposits in credit institutions had during the first two months of the present year increased current accounts in private banking institutions by over 100,000,000 rubles. The payment of taxes and customs duties had increased from 925,000 rubles during the month of last July to over 12,000,000 rubles in February.

Receipts from railways, post, and telegraph amounted to over 105,000,000 rubles in February, or four times the amount taken in last July.

But the Government is running at high expense, having a military bill of over 30,000,000 rubles monthly and a railway deficit of 100,000,000 rubles monthly. It is also lending money to private institutions for the development of the natural resources of the country as well as extending credit to private banks. Its total monthly budget is approximately 600,000,000 rubles.

Against the deficit thus created the Kolchak Government has issued treasury notes to the extent of 3,500,000,000 rubles, of which on March 22 about 1,500,000,000 rubles had been put into circulation.

The Government is also taking steps to eliminate from Siberian affairs the Russian currency; if this were not done, the immense quantities of paper money in European Russia would be liable to swamp the new Government's attempt at reaching a financial soundness.

As a means of restoring financial confidence the Government is holding in the state banks bullion reserves amounting to over 23,000,000 ounces of gold and approximately 14,300,000 ounces of silver.

The Government is also actively purchasing gold and platinum with its treasury notes and storing them for the protection of its credit. Two-thirds of the gold produced in Russia comes from Siberia, and ninety-three per cent of the world's platinum supply is to be had in the Ural Mountains, mainly on the Siberian slopes.

Manifestly the Kolchak administration cannot put itself on a good financial footing unless it swings loose from its present dreams of being an All Russian Government, asks for independence, issues its own money and absorbs all the former Russian currency in circulation in Siberia, and fixes a time after which Russian money will not be accepted for exchange of goods. That done, the Siberian people are in excellent position to readjust themselves quickly for trade with the outside world; and there is little doubt but the world will welcome such action.

IMMEDIATE EFFECTS OF RECOGNIZING THE OMSK GOVERNMENT

Kolchak has applied for recognition as the de facto Government of All Russia. In my judgment, it might be impracticable to grant him such consideration, for the body of the Russian people are not within his present jurisdiction or the present capacity of his Government to control. But to recognize his administration as the Government of an independent Siberia would be to save a large part of the world from Bolshevism and give to the new Russia that is to spring up in Siberia a chance for a future all its own. Some day that will probably come about, anyway.

Assuming recognition of Siberia as an independent state, what might we expect to be the immediate reaction?

1. Goods will move into Siberia more freely and all exports will move out, thus restoring the sadly disturbed balance of trade in that country.

2. A marvelous increase of population may be expected to pour into Siberia from stricken Russia; for the news of the peace and prosperity will have an immediate effect on the migrations of peoples.

3. Industries will revive and new industries will start up, so that Siberia can become industrially self-sufficient.

4. America and the other big nations will profit exceedingly by the reopening and development of an international trade with the Siberians. Opportunity will also be ours to share in the development of the internal resources by sending experts and builders who will show the Siberian people how to make the most of their opportunities.

FERTILE LANDS AND GROWING CITIES MAKE NEW NATION POSSIBLE

I went into Siberia after Bolshevism had been overthrown and stayed several months. I found many signs that the people were realizing their isolated position and feeling by virtue of this realization a certain degree of national unity. If social demoralization had not overtaken Russia, perhaps this striving for nationality would not have been conscious for many years to come. Yet nature seems to have prepared the land to be inhabited some day by an independent nation.

The map shows northern Asia cut off from Europe by a chain of mountains, the Urals, that extend to the limits of the land. Rich mineral deposits lie mainly on the eastern slopes. The eastern watershed of these mountains drains toward the river Ob, one of the three great streams of Siberia, which, with their tributaries, constitute a remarkable arrangement of connected watercourses, enabling the people to transport commodities and communicate with each other by water routes. One may cross Siberia entirely by means of river travel, making only two or three portages. The Yenesei and the Lena Rivers, respectively, open the west central and east central regions to the Arctic Ocean through their tributaries. The Amur, in eastern Siberia, runs toward the Pacific Ocean and affords a wonderful outlet for farm products from the rich valleys that it drains. Mountains on the south in western Siberia form a natural barrier against the Mongolian peoples.

From the Urals eastward for nearly fifteen hundred miles stretches as fertile a land as the world affords. Within this area alone, inside the crop zone, will some day be a population greater than Germany now has. In middle Siberia woodland and mountain land alternate with valleys until one comes to the treeless sections bordering Manchuria. All in all, Siberia is separated from all other parts of the world except northern Manchuria by distinct geographical contrasts which isolate her and make a natural land for a new civilization.

Siberia has in all about three billion acres of land. Within her crop limits are 320,000,000 acres subject to agricultural development, while only 20,000,000 have been put under the plow. Notwithstanding the northern altitudes in which the country is situated, there are climatic reasons for good crop production. The winds that come from Turkestan blow warmly over the western part in spring and summer and give a short but quick growing season. In winter, however, the winds come from the north, bringing a temperature that averages from 20° to 40° below zero, Fahrenheit, and occasionally falls to below 50°.

The steppes, or plains, make an unparalleled opportunity for development of grain growing, and Siberian farmers have already gone in for it on a somewhat extensive scale. They get good yields too, in spite of their somewhat careless methods of farming, because the soil is still young and strong.

In western Siberia the grain production averaged an annual export of more than forty million bushels prior to the war. At the present time large reserves of wheat are held on farms by peasants. In all these western provinces hay is grown in abundance, and oats, of which the army has great need. Barnaul, Semipalatinsk, Blisk, Achinsk, Kainsk, Novonikolaievsk, and Omsk are the great centers for marketing grain.

<sup>1</sup> The exchange value of the ruble at the present time is about ten cents American gold.

From Kurgan to Omsk and beyond Novonikolaievsk the dairy industry has reached considerable proportions. In 1917 more than 76,500,000 pounds of butter products were handled by one of the large co-operative organizations which had been designated agent for the Siberian Government's butter monopoly. In villages as far away from the railway as 160 miles, following the route of the railway, are some 3,000 creameries farmer-owned and operated on the co-operative plan. These creameries were built mainly after the Danish patterns. They send their butter to the large centers, where district offices assemble, grade, and prepare it for shipment. The sale of the butter for most of their creameries is handled by a central office at Omsk. Before the war this butter went by rail to two ports on the Baltic, to be shipped from there to England and other butter markets of the world. When war plunged the country into confusion, the dairy business was growing rapidly in Siberia. With the ejection of Bolshevism, the creamery organizations plan to revive world marketing and will compete with Denmark and the United States for European and South American trade.

But as one approaches middle Siberia, or that part dominated by Irkutsk and Chita, where the plains give way to mountains with small valleys, there is not sufficient food grown to feed the population living in both town and country. These districts import from western Siberia mainly, the majority of the people being occupied in city industries or in the mines which abound. They also draw upon Manchuria for large supplies of foodstuffs and for merchandise.

Until the railway was built and for a long time afterward river steamboats carried a large percentage of the local traffic, agriculture and factory development following their courses. With the advent of the railway cities located at the juncture of rail and river grew with phenomenal rapidity. Since the Bolshevik gained ascendancy in European Russia refugees have swelled their populations to almost double what they were at the beginning of hostilities. The refugees forced on these cities many problems of relief in connection with overcrowding, lack of bedding, rise of death rate from typhus, tuberculosis, and other causes incident to the peculiar condition of the time. At present the principal cities and their populations are: Kurgan, 30,000; Omsk, over 450,000; Tomsk, 175,000; Novonikolaievsk, 200,000; Chita, 40,000; Blagoveschensk, 30,000; Khabarovsk, 20,000; Vladivostok, 150,000. In addition Harbin, located in the Russian concession of North Manchuria, has about 125,000 people. There are numerous smaller communities both on and off the railway. In the principal places there are many industries, plenty of newspapers; between them there is always more travel than the railway can possibly handle. All of this has tended to make the Siberians feel acquainted with one another, and acquaintance has led to some team-work.

A PEOPLE WITH A FREE PAST

There is a different side to the historical development of Siberia from that which ordinarily has reached the public knowledge. There was so much of tragic interest in the system of settling Siberia as a penal colony that the world rather forgot the preponderating facts of development in that land. The picture of the political exile becoming a prosperous citizen and somewhat reactionary as a result of his wealth has not yet been drawn; yet such transformations occurred in many a community. And some of the big names to be found in Siberian cities to-day—names known all over Russia—were borne by political discontents who a generation or two ago were sent out to the new land by a fearful Government and then forgotten. These discontented ones, after their terms of imprisonment or surveillance were over, felt at home and attracted to their land of exile and stayed on to make their fortunes in the new Russian world.

Other settlers were the Cossacks, those military families with special privileges, who were offered the choicest of the valley lands that skirted the frontier, which were settled on them by the Government to protect the Empire from outside enemies. The Cossack families grew up with a love of their country, and their children have no thought of life anywhere else. If they were to go into European Russia, they would in all likelihood return, just as the Westerner of the United States generally goes back home after a short visit to our Eastern cities, glad to have had his trip, but just as glad to get home again. It is much the same kind of a spirit, only it is modified by the long winters wherein there is so little light that it casts a gloom over the land; but the same gloom is also in old Russia.

Other settlers were peasants from land-hungry Russia, lured to try their fortunes in the wilds, with imagination inflamed by the Government colonization agents. These peasants were offered unusual opportunities when they settled in colonies. The Government encouraged transplanting of parts of villages from land-hungry districts, and granted to a village in Siberia a title in perpetuity to a large tract of land, giving occupancy rights to each male child of about forty-five acres of land. The Government allowed the settlers to arrange among themselves for the distribution of farms and the terms of tenure. The old Government provided for loans to settlers to help them get started in their new life. But these loans were rarely collected, and nobody thought much about repaying them, since upon particular occasions in the life of the royal family thousands of families would receive a remittance of their indebtedness.

But the method of settlement was businesslike and carried on by experts, who located desirable tracts, surveyed them, and in many ways offered valuable aid to home-seekers. When a group of families acquainted with one another in an overpopulated farming village of old Russia determined to try their joint luck in migrating to new lands, they took with them their customs and their methods of conducting themselves. They received also aid of various kinds from the local and provincial zemstvos.

These settlers, on reaching Siberia, dropped all remembrances of their life in Russia so far as they could. Likewise they dropped a certain respect for ancient institutions, such as the Orthodox Church and the Government. They also forgot in a measure the nearness of their former life to serfdom; for they were transplanted in a country without landlords, where a peasant was almost as good as any other person. In fact, many of the leading town citizens were the sons of peasants living out in the country districts. Life was not easy for these people; they carved a living out of new lands and sold their products for small money returns. Until the railway came, developing industry, and the war produced a rise in the prices of commodities to farmers all over the world, the Siberian peasant got only a little more from his products than was necessary for him to obtain in order to live. But he was a free man nevertheless, and he gloried in the fact that no landlords were around. He scratched the soil, for he was not overly educated, and he did not appreciate the value of modern implements until later years. But his lands were strong and there was a growing demand for his products, and he was making some important discoveries in connection with the operation of certain industries by means of co-operative societies that would later be of great importance to him.

In the towns a great trade grew up. At first the trade with Siberia was largely in the hands of certain well-known syndicates, who established chain stores and trading posts to the northern reaches of the rivers. These syndicates purchased from tribes and peasants farming products, pelts, and products of home-industry handicraft. They encouraged aborigines and settlers to get into their debt, just as did the large companies dealing with the early growers of California fruit products. They purchased raw products at low prices and sold their goods at Skylock quotations. Gradually the people relieved themselves to some extent of this economic servitude. They found competitive markets in the fairs, which they began in Siberia just as they had been running in Russia. Several big fairs finally became several hundred smaller ones; to these fairs came purchasers from Europe and America in the days after the railway was built.

HOW THE RAILWAY PRODUCED A SENSE OF NATIONALITY

In the eighties Siberia had attained about the same stage of development as had the American colonies in 1776. Wagon trails and river routes formed the only means of communication. A great Imperial highway extended from Petrograd to Irkutsk. Along this highway the traders went, and along it the guards marched their prisoners to the mines of the Transbaikai. The overland trip was made on foot and took about two years; the trail was marked by many graves of prisoners who could not stand the journey's strain.

But a railway penetrating this country had long been a dream of the governing classes, and a few far-visioned ones saw in it a great strategic means of defense against enemies from the east who might some day try to grab Siberia from Russian sway. So on May 19, 1891, the first spade of dirt was thrown by the Grand Duke Nicholas, later destined to be deposed by his people and now thought to have been murdered by the Bolsheviks. This ceremony took place in Vladivostok.

It was a great feat of railway engineering to connect the Pacific with Petrograd; there were numerous mountain ranges to be crossed or tunneled. But the feat was accomplished and many parts of the line were double-tracked. The old Government equipped the line with rolling stock and motive power that compared favorably with that possessed by any country outside of America. The tracks laid were broad-gauged. The freight cars at first were of the small eighteen-ton variety. The passenger cars ranged from finely built first-class compartment cars to fourth-class with no conveniences. There were about two engines for every mile of track. Numerous division points and roundhouses, excellent machine shops, fine stations, and pretentious general office buildings comprised the property.

Built as a part of the Imperial policy of defense, the road was not expected to make a profit and was never run as such. Its principal aim was to encourage Siberian development, to sustain large numbers of employees at satisfactory wages, and to serve as a military arm in case of war. Particularly was this the view taken in North Manchuria, through which a branch of the railway was extended, by agreement with the Chinese Government. There the Government not only built a splendid line, but also substantial brick and stone houses for the employees, who occupied them rent free; erected splendid railway club buildings, paying most of the operating expenses of these clubs; encouraged co-operative buying among the employees, and in general cared much more for their welfare than do most private railway companies of America. In the railway towns of North Manchuria the road itself is the direct representative of the Government and must carry on those expenses in addition to transportation operations.

Where an avowed governmental policy was to have as many Russians earn a living from and off the railway as possible graft crept into every nook and corner of the system. The employees worked short hours and devised many ways of obtaining and taking "squeeze." For instance, car shortages had a miraculous way of appearing when cars were needed and disappearing when shippers slipped money into the outstretched palm of railway officials. It generally turned out that those who knew the ropes got their goods through always, while those who did not simply had to worry along until they learned that "squeeze" opened all doors in the old official life.

But the Russians felt that these were minor matters, after all; for Russian colonies flourished and life was pleasant, while railway control prevented the Japanese from including North Manchuria in their efforts to obtain greater trade domination of this new country. That very anti-Japanese feeling, together with the growth of population and increasing ease of communication, contributed to the enlargement of the Siberian people's sense of national unity. It often happened that when they talked of Russia they really meant Siberia.

A second article on Siberia by Mr. Holman will appear in The Outlook next week

ITALY—AND THE NEXT WAR?

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE OF THE OUTLOOK FROM GREGORY MASON

"THERE have been two enemy countries before the Peace Conference, beaten Germany and victorious Italy."

This remark, made to me by an editor of the influential "Corriere della Sera," I think, is typical of the way most of his countrymen feel about the treatment Italy has received at the Peace Conference. It is unfortunate, and may in the future prove to be more unfortunate than we can now guess, that this great and growing member of the Allied group should be left to nurse a feeling of sullen hate toward every one. But that is about the way Italy feels now.

Part of this soreness may be due to Latin sensitiveness. But for most of it is there not a substantial justification? Why, as the Italians ask, should they alone of all the Allies be pointed at as imperialists? Is it not true by almost any fair test, as the Italians say, that if their peace claims are imperialistic the peace claims of most of their allies are also imperialistic? I am not taking sides or expressing an opinion one way or the other, but am only suggesting that it is important for America and Italy, which have had so many mutually helpful relations, to try to understand each other.

Then has not the essential difference between the peace claims of Italy and the peace claims of her allies been just this: that the peace claims of Italy have offered deprivation to a now entirely friendly state, namely, Yugoslavia, while the peace claims of France, England, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, etc., have offered injury only to the common enemy? Is not that the reason why Italy's demand for additions of territory is denounced as "imperialistic" while not even a whisper of protest is heard against awarding to England, France, Czechoslovakia, and others large slices of new soil?

Japan, by the way, is in the same boat with Italy; the reason some public outcry has been raised against her programme of war rewards for herself is that it affects the interests of another Allied state—namely, China.

The Italians themselves, of course, have been shrewd enough to recognize the reason underlying the protests against their claims. I have before me a booklet of Italian propaganda in which several pages are devoted to statistics intended to show that if Italy's demands are imperialistic the demands of some of her allies are even more so. Thus, figures are given showing that the percentage of aliens in Alsace-Lorraine and in parts of Germany and of old Austria-Hungary claimed by the Czechoslovaks and Jugoslavs is higher than in districts asked for by Italy, such as Istria and Fiume. And thus the Italians try to emphasize the fact that the Croats, Bosnians, and Slovenes have been among the fiercest enemies of the Allies throughout the war and ask how Italy's just claims can be held up by the opposition of these recent enemies. Thus also Signor Salvatore Barzilai, one of the Italian delegates to the Peace Conference, said to me:

"These pretensions which the Croats oppose to Italy's just claims seem very peculiar coming from people who up to the last moment took an active part in the war, fighting with a peculiar energy against Italy."

Perhaps any settlement reached in the controversy between the Italians and the Jugoslavs will be adhered to; at any rate, it is unfortunate that the Tardieu agreement giving autonomy to Fiume was not approved by the Jugoslavs. The breach that has been opened between the Italians and the Jugoslavs may be long in closing, if, indeed, it does not widen. All the sympathy and understanding of those of us who are friends of both the Adriatic nations will be required to bring them together in an amity which will leave no opening for the growth of another European war.

The unpopularity of President Wilson in Italy to-day is colossal. This extends generally to all Americans. A few Italians attempt to discriminate, seeing that most of the American colonies in Italian cities have been inclined to take the Latin point of view. Thus my Italian journalist said to me:

"The danger is that, although Wilson stands alone on this issue among American statesmen, he will succeed in making all Americans hated by Italians."

In some respects the anti-American feeling in Italy seems almost to have been as bitter as it was in Spain at the beginning of the Spanish-American War. Two American officers told me that the proprietor of a restaurant in Rome asked them to leave with their dinner only half finished because an Italian officer who had just entered said that he would not eat while Americans were there.

Unfortunately, several things have occurred to keep the feeling high. The announcement that Japan had been granted what she asked for in Shantung brought out a rumble of protest from all over Italy. "And yet they say that Italians alone are imperialistic," was the complaint. Rumor has it that when President Wilson in a secret session of the Big Four, a day or two after the Shantung matter was settled, referred to the Pact of London as "imperialistic" Signor Orlando jumped to his feet, shouting:

"And what about Shantung?"

Afterward the Italian statesman is reported to have described President Wilson as being "more Jugoslav than a Yugoslav."

The now famous, or infamous, Pact of London has been battered about like a shuttlecock. Italy was willing to give up the Pact when she thought that her revised demands were to be granted, but when she felt the full strength of the opposition to her new demands she decided to cling to the full letter of the Pact. Hence she announced that she had changed her mind about giving up the Dodecanese Islands to the Greeks and would hang on to them by virtue of the Pact of London. This brought the Greeks into the controversy in full cry, which did not lessen the general hubbub. But the Italians said, with a good deal of force:

"You cannot make the Pact of London work against Italy both ways, and never for her. You cannot deny us Fiume one minute because it was not awarded to us by the Pact of London, and the next minute say that we are not entitled to the Dodecanese Islands, to which our claim is recognized by what you call that 'outrageously imperialistic secret treaty.'"

There has been an element of surprise about the opposition to Italy, which has made the injury to her feelings all the more poignant. "How can you compare us Italians with the Yugoslavs?" an Italian business man said to me. "It shows a lack of intellectuality on your part. They are mere barbarians, just entering the purlieus of civilization. Our country is the mother of Western civilization."

Moreover, there have been several issues beyond the direct question of territory which have irritated the Italians. One has been the question of commercial interests behind governmental opposition to Italian claims. The Italians say that the Cunard Line has been working tooth and nail to have Fiume be made Jugoslav or international. The reason is, say the Italians, that the Cunard Line has long been guaranteed a minimum number of immigrants from Hungary each year which it transports to America from Fiume, and that the Italian immigration laws in regard to requirements for health, food, etc., aboard ship are stricter than the English line likes. The Italians declare, however, that these restrictions are to the advantage, not only of the immigrants, but of America as well, which will profit by receiving a higher grade of immigrants, or at least by receiving immigrants in better physical condition.

Another question which has nettled the Italians is the shipping question. They object to the Allied proposal to pool all the ships captured in Adriatic ports and then distribute them among the various Allies in accordance with the rate of losses suffered from enemy submarines. By this arrangement England would get more of these ships than any other nation, but the Italians point out that England has already replaced many of her losses with newly constructed ships, whereas the Italians, who lost almost half their merchant marine, have built hardly any new vessels. The Italian argument is that the ships taken in the Adriatic ought to be considered as belonging to the port of registry. By this method the Italians, of course, would get the ships captured by them in Trieste. The fairness of this is all the more evident, they say, inasmuch as many of these ships were built largely by Italian capital. (About three-quarters of the capital of the Austrian Lloyd is said to have been put up by Italians.) Italian food is eaten on these ships, and the vessels are manned mainly by Italian sailors.

"It's all a question of money—money, money, money," say the Italians. "On every point Italy is treated as if she were a beaten enemy, because she is not within the magic financial circle. Now our extreme Socialists are saying: 'We told you so. You see how little you are going to get for all your service and subservience to foreign capital. The French, British, and American capitalists will get all the plums. You see how foreign bankers control you.'"

There is a good deal of that sort of talk among the extreme Socialists of Italy. While the national crisis over Fiume and Dalmatia served to bring most of the parties closer together, in a sense it was easily capitalized as good propaganda by the proletarian internationalists. For it is not difficult for these Italian nationalists to make out a plausible case for the contention that Italy is being given a "dirty deal" in the race of national expansion. It is not only the Fiume and Dalmatian question that is used as an example. "Look at the matter of colonies," you hear the Italian in the street say. "France and England are dividing up the German colonies. What does Italy get? By the Pact of London, at least, Italy was to have had the Dodecanese Islands and a big piece of land in Asia Minor around Adalia. Now, while England and France are going to get a lot in Asia Minor, we are told that the Pact of London is a disgraceful secret treaty which we must give up. Well, what are we going to get in Asia Minor? Is Italy the only nation that is asked to practice this new altruism and self-denial?" And so on. It has even come to a pass where the threat is openly made that Italy may be obliged to return to her old alliance with the Teutons. I quote the following from a booklet of Italian propaganda:

"Italy indeed, as she was once compelled to do, might selfishly find her safety in renewing her alliance with the Central Powers coalition, of which France and Great Britain would be alone to bear the brunt, since for a long time to come they will not be able to count on Russia to withstand a resuscitated Teuton might.

"Such an alliance would certainly be looked upon as the greatest misfortune here, but Italy might nevertheless be obliged to make a virtue of necessity if her strategical position should again be such as to imperil her very existence."

Although economic considerations have been, after all, perhaps the most powerful factors with both Italians and Slavs in the Adriatic controversy, it is surprising to what an extent the Italian launches his argument from the basis of Italy's military necessity. The talk of a coming war on the Adriatic is frank and frequent, and the Yugoslavs are openly named as the enemies of Italy in that war. I quote again from Italian propaganda:

"Italy is no imperialist nation. Her modern history gives ample proof of this. . . .

"The youthful Yugoslav nation, instead, has already before its birth given proof of a formidable appetite. It claims nothing less than to extend its territory to the Tagliamento!

"Its present maneuvers to gain possession of the entire Hapsburg fleet, in opposition to the rights of a logical proportionate distribution of the Austro-Hungarian inheritance, as well as to the agreements already concluded among the Allies, shows still more clearly what a danger this state may prove in the future.

"If, therefore, she is not rendered powerless to injure, as soon as ever she has constituted herself as a nation and regulated her internal affairs she will presumably take steps to carry her purposes into effect, endangering thereby the peace of Europe." (The italics are mine.)

And so on. Neither Italians nor Yugoslavs scruple at all to speak of the coming war between their countries, although it does seem to me that more of the talking is done by the Italians.

Perhaps this is because they are more worried than the Yugoslavs. Although with much less to fear in the near future on military grounds, they have more to fear than the Yugoslavs on economic grounds. The Italians are distinctly worried about the economic future of their new ports on the Adriatic, because the economic life of these ports depends largely on the patronage of the hinterland which belongs to their economic rivals. Why should one not suppose that the Yugoslavs, and indeed the Czechoslovaks, Austrians, and Hungarians, will patronize the Yugoslav ports rather than the ports of the Italians, with whom none of these nations is on very good terms? The Yugoslavs tell you triumphantly that such will be the case. The Italians do not hide their fear that it will be, and they remember a number of significant moves made by the Yugoslavs during the controversy over Fiume. One was the threat that unless the Italians helped the Yugoslavs to get Fiume the latter would boycott the Italian railway feeding that port by preventing the egress of Yugoslav and Hungarian produce.

It is no use ignoring facts. It will help no one for us to hold up our hands and say:

"Horrible suggestion! It is impossible to believe that the Yugoslavs and the Italians, both dear friends of ours, will ever fight each other."

The fact is that both Yugoslavs and Italians are talking frankly about the possibility of fighting each other, and that indications are already visible of the sort of economic warfare which often leads up to military warfare. There is room on the Adriatic, however, for both Italians and Yugoslavs, and a tragic war can be averted if the Great Powers exert themselves to the utmost to make the League of Nations a vital reality. By the energetic and tactful action of all the other nations which are interested in avoiding another European war it is possible to lead both Italians and Yugoslavs into an adjustment of their difficulties satisfactory to both sides. It is possible, but it is not easy. It would perhaps involve a political mandate to Italy; it would certainly involve the economic freedom of the port; and it might even result in an independent State of Fiume.

Messina, Sicily, June 9.

CHRISTIANA'S RING

BY AMELIA JOSEPHINE BURR

"But she gave Mr. Standfast a Ring"

I

I can hear the River
Singing where she went. . . .
Here I wait my summons
Patiently content,
In my heart the memory
Of a perfect thing,
Bright upon my finger
Christiana's Ring.

II

Valiant was her soldier,
Greatheart was her guide,
Christian was her beacon
To the other side.
What a little share was mine
In her journeying!
Yet—it was to Standfast
That she gave a ring.

III

Heaven can make no richer,
Earth cannot destroy
The divine completeness
Of my slender joy.
Gold of God's refining
Pure from his own fire
Is the finished circle
Of my soul's desire.
*I shall cross the River,
I shall meet the King,
In my heart her memory,
On my hand her ring.*

THE NEW GREAT THING

A STORY OF ADVENTURE

BY KEENE ABBOTT

"IT'S this one, or another one, will some day be getting clean across, I'm thinking, with wings only to go on."

Faded blue eyes looked up from the newspaper headlines which blazoned the daring start of the Australian aviator in that famous effort of his to journey through the air over the Atlantic Ocean, and while Michael Delahunty commented upon this spectacular enterprise his gaze traveled skyward, above the windbreak of glossy-leaved cottonwood trees that were beginning to shed their seeds in languid flurries, like tiny snowflakes idly balancing. After an interval of museful speculation he added, with conviction:

"A brave lad, surely. And we have to be brave, every mother's son of us that would be poking our noses into adventure for the help of any new great thing that's a-borning."

What new great thing, I wondered, had this man helped into being? It was hard to picture him, now so gray and stooped with toil and years, as one who had "poked his nose into adventure."

At the Delahunty cottage, where I stopped to ask for a drink of water, I had arrived dusty and leg-weary from my cross-country tramp through a region of Nebraska that had once been the great hunting domain of the red man, the very heart of the buffalo country. And, my thirst having been quenched at the pump, I now pleaded fatigue and the favor of a seat under the box-elder tree, on a bench beside that reminiscent gazer at the blue sky.

"A big labor it was," he presently observed, "a big labor, and risky." His old head wagged solemnly as he went on: "Let you be starting across the ocean for

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

(C) Cinefant, from Press Illustrating Service

AN ABYSSINIAN MISSION

The three members of this Mission lately visited Washington to congratulate President Wilson on the conclusion of the war. The Mission was headed by his Royal Highness Dedjazmatch Nadao (in the center of picture)

International Film Service

A CZECHOSLOVAK PARADE

About a thousand Czechoslovak war veterans recently paraded in Washington before President Wilson. They fought in Siberia, and their appearance shows the type of the men who made such marvelous marches through Siberia, fighting the Bolsheviki as they marched

Digitized by Google

(C) Underwood & Underwood

THE AMERICAN FLAG ON LORD NELSON'S FLAGSHIP

When Secretary Daniels visited Portsmouth Harbor (England), our flag was for the first time hoisted over Nelson's famous flagship, the Victory

International Film Service

THE PACIFIC FLEET ON ITS WAY

Admiral Rodman, in command of the new Pacific Fleet, recently left Hampton Roads on the long voyage through the Panama Canal to the Pacific

THE GERMAN FLEET IN SCAPA FLOW

We are all the more pleased to present this photograph of the German Fleet lying in Scapa Flow, where later it was sunk by German treachery, because a former picture, printed in The Outlook of July 9, which purported to be a picture of the German Fleet, was discovered after it was printed to be not that at all, but a picture of the British Fleet lying at anchor in the Firth of Forth—an error which some of our readers have discovered and pointed out to us. We are indebted for the present picture to Rear-Admiral Ralph Earle, of the Navy Department at Washington

THE GERMAN FLEET IN SCAPA FLOW 28th NOV. 1918 T. KENT

International Film Service

THE RACE DISTURBANCES IN WASHINGTON

Motor cycles, such as that shown here with its armed soldier, troops, and even, it is said, tanks, were held in readiness to suppress threatened extension of the mob violence in Washington

(C) Underwood & Underwood

VICTIMS OF MEXICAN VIOLENCE

Mrs. Mary Correll and her son, Joseph Correll, have just told before a committee of Congress the tragic story of the killing of the husband and father, John W. Correll, the American ranch owner lately murdered in Mexico by a band of desperadoes. The Mexican authorities seem to have done nothing to punish this outrage the Irish coast, or England itself, with wings only to go on, and that will be no more dangerous, maybe, than we were having it here, within three miles of this, in the years gone by. A green sea he's gone over, the flier-man, and it's a green sea we were making a way across to travel on.

"It's not water I'm meaning, of course, but grass and prairie, and a terrible ache and bigness of it. And the way across? That would be the railway, the first one; that would be the Union Pacific itself, and it now holding its fiftieth anniversary a short while ago, in the month of May, this year. A small piece in the paper I do be reading about it—a small piece only. And so it will be with flying. In the fifty years coming it won't be thought of much, surely, that somebody has gone the way of the air clean over the ocean, with a gas engine giving him the grand shove and the impudent wings of him a-scratching at the blue sky."

Impudent! I liked that word; it made me think how impudent must have seemed the screech of the locomotive when that noise first startled the ancient silences brooding over the great plains. He had been here then, this Michael Delahunty. He had seen the line extended west, beyond Fort Kearney, into this, the great hunting region claimed by the Sioux. He had been here when track-laying operations had gone on inside soldier picket lines, when men marched to work to the tap of the drum, when arms had been stacked on the dump, when General Cessment's track train of a thousand workers had to be constantly on the alert to repel attack.

Yes, a great adventure, this industrial enterprise; for against the intrusion of the railway the Indians strove desperately. But of what avail were stealthy onslaughts and harassments many times repeated? Iron tentacles gripped the land. By November 1, 1866, rails had been laid to the crossing of the North Platte. Every day from then until now immense clangors, terrifying shrieks, have rent and jarred the primordial majesty of the great plains.

It was of the time over fifty years ago that Michael Delahunty told me his tale—a wild tale, a tale so richly colored that I could only wonder how much of it was fact and how much the picturesque garnishment of a Celtic fancy. So when I was once more back among books I made it my quest to see whether I could find records of the episode he described. And now, with all due apologies to him, I here confess that I was surprised to find, not merely one version of it, but several. Those to be read in the records of the Nebraska State Historical Society are sufficiently matter of fact; but in "The Fighting Cheyennes" there is an account, related by an Indian eye-witness and carefully reported by Mr. George Bird Grinnell, which quaintly substantiates the chronicle as I heard it told by Michael Delahunty.

The red man, one Porcupine by name, says that early in August, 1867, he and his native associates paused to gaze at something new to the country. Far off a curious insect, elongated, with many joints, came crawling and crawling. Smoking, too! Yes, it smoked in front as it crawled, and grumbled. Once it even yelled. When it did that, a white-plumed war-bonnet floated up and streamed backward and dissolved.

Marvelous! They had never heard of such a thing.

The astonished observers, it appears, were by no means dumfounded by that fearsome sight. No, not even frightened; but interested and curious.

When first noticed, the grumbling object seemed very small; but it kept coming, coming, and growing larger all the time. Obviously it was not an animal. It could not belong to the natural world.

"As it came on," Porcupine affirms, "we said that it looked like a white-man's pipe when he is smoking."

Lodges of the white man move on wheels. They are wagons drawn by horses, or mules, or oxen. Sometimes you see a number of wagons trailed one behind another and drawn by one team of oxen. But this thing had nothing to make it go.

Porcupine tells that after the Cheyennes had seen it approach, and grow large, and pass by, and finally disappear, they rode down from the ridge for the sake of examining the ground, to see what kind of a trail had been left by that most strange procession of wagons linked together.

"Not long after this," the Indian relates, "we talked of our troubles. We said among ourselves: 'Now that the white people have taken all we had and have made us poor, we ought to do something. In these big wagons that go by on the metal road there might be things of value, maybe clothing. If we could throw these wagons off the iron they run on and break them open, we should find out what is in them, and could take whatever might be useful to us.'"

"Red Wolf and I tried to do this. We got a big stick, and just before sundown tied it to the irons, and sat down to watch and see what would happen. Close by the track we built a fire."

The object approaching turned out to be something quite different from the expected train. It was a hand-car. Porcupine describes it as an object with something that moved up and down.

"When the men saw the fire," he adds, "they worked harder, to run by quickly, but when they struck the stick everything jumped high."

The Cheyenne mentions two guns found on the hand-car. Upon inspecting them the Indians pulled something, and the guns broke in two and the barrels fell down. These were Spencer carbines, the first breech-loading arms that men of this southern branch of the tribe had ever seen.

Porcupine avers that those who had fallen from the derailed hand-car got up and ran away, but were overtaken and killed. The next activity of the Indians was to extract spikes and bend the rail-ends upward, giving them also a sidewise wrench. How the natives waited for the train, once these preparations had been completed, is aptly visualized by the Cheyenne report:

"Looking east over the level plain, we saw a small light, low down.

"Some one said, 'The morning star.'

"No," said another; "that is one of those things we have seen."

"No," said another; "the first has gone out, and another is rising."

Two trains, in truth, were coming, the headlight of the second being not very far behind the first. Indians on the best ponies were sent eastward along the track. They were ordered to yell and shout, with the idea that they might "frighten that thing."

Assuring themselves that the first light was actually on a train, the scouts started to return, riding as hard as they could. It was impossible to go fast enough. Before they could report to their chief the train overtook and passed them.

"Some fired at it," Porcupine reports. "One tried to throw a rope over the engine. But it was hard to get close. Horses took fright and ran away."

The worst about it was the way "that thing" yelled. In addition to its screeching wails, it made a very loud noise—puffing, throwing out sparks, going faster and faster, until it came to the broken rail-ends. There it jumped into the air. The cars all crashed together.

Why the Indians should have kindled a blaze near the track is not explained; but that one burned there is sustained by Delahunty. He began by saying:

"It would not be a full moon that night; it would be a half-moon shining. Something had gone bad with the telegraph. I heard them saying; and the night operator was just after having his orders, all the way from Omaha, telling him would he send out the section gang and see where the line would be down, and be patching it up, maybe, the way messages could come through again from the west country.

"It's my brother Jim was running the gang, and it's Wallace himself, the night operator, got five other men along, and they starting out, with the four of them pumping the hand-car. They pumped it the same as brother Pat and myself would be aching our backs all day long, and us working the two-handled force-pump for filling the railway water tank.

"The telegraph line could be bad grounded or cut entirely. A buffalo it could be, had pushed the pole over, with the scratching of himself and rubbing his itchiness. Only you couldn't tell of course what thing at all would be bringing destruction to the telegraph wire. The boys, every one, had their guns by them; for it's no man could know if it might be the devil and all would come busting off the reservation. And they would be looking for where was the line broken. And the wire of the telegraph, betwixt and between the poles, was not like a harp-string stretched, but was having a down curve and brightness to it, like a string o' glass, because of the half-moon shining.

"Well, and the queer thing they do be seeing presently—a little fire burning on the ground. And for why would a fire be burning in the still night, and nobody near, and never a sniff o' wind speaking a whisper to it? The men pumping along never left off their wonder at the strange thing it was, so lonesome and quiet, like a death candle burning.

"Then come something else for the wonder of them and amazement. A bump it was, and a jump it was, and a big knock and a heave and a tumble. The hand-car was off. She was gone clean off the track!

"We had no coal at that time. Wood only they burnt in the engines. 'Twas a big stick fallen off the tender, I'm thinking, was picked up to straddle the rails and be fastened there with lengths of telegraph wire twisted tight. It would be that, surely, that ditched the hand-car. And right away after comes a yell and a screech and a galloping, and guns shooting and arrows whuzzing. Out of a draw come the horses; they come charging out of a draw, where it's clean hid they'd been, against the time coming for this diversion and entertainment.

"Wallace, the night operator, put his two feet in motion to split the night air like a reindeer running. Never a scratch did he get. And there was John Kern came out of it, with no hurt to him. And then there was Pat Driscoll. Something was going 'whisht-whisht' in his boot. Blood, sure! And it was that. A sorriness of some kind had got him from the screeching wild time he'd been into. At Plum Creek we had the shirt off him to see would he be bad hurt or not, and it was a flesh wound only, and him that proud of it he would be pulling his shirt off any day to let you see where he had his sore place."

After the hand-car "sorriness," as Delahunty called it, had been finished, the Cheyennes broke and bent the rails at the joints. "Tools were used for it," he said. "Yes, for the section lads would be dropping everything beside the track—crowbars, wrenches, shovels—when the train was gone down and the day's work over. So, it's a job the Injuns made of it; sure, and it was now a neat, clean, clever, murdering, intelligent job.

"It would be Kenny, the conductor himself, comes running east from the bust-up, and he with a red light for stopping the second train, the way she will not go knocking into the wreck. She was loaded, I mind, with rock and material for building the roundhouse at Sidney, and myself had a look at her backing the three miles and a half a mile to Plum Creek station. And it's the two of us, other Pat and me, will be fair nimble to shove his two children into the engine, and their mother with them, and my own woman along, too, for the safety of her. They would all get taken east to Elm Creek, or further, maybe, for I wouldn't care how many a fair, fat, and lengthy mile. The further the better, thinks I; but it's Elm Creek only the train backed to, and there she lays up the night through against orders in the morning for the engine to pull out west again.

"It's fifteen men of us, or twenty, goes with her, the gang of us on a flat car she was pushing ahead of her. And the guns we had! An outfit altogether with more prickles to us than a sand-bur has, or a cocklebur, or a porcupine himself.

"Sun up, or after, we could see a far smoke coming gray in the blue o' the morning. The wrecked train burning! 'Twas that, surely, and the Injuns after setting fire to her.

"It would be a slow, careful grumble of wheels we took with us. But not slow enough for me to be well suited; for it's a thirst I had on me till a tub of water wouldn't make spit to moisten my mouth with. Let you be any kind of a fighting man, with a carbine, and ammunition and all, but it's a grand thirst you will be having, and a queerness inside you, to stand there on a flat car, for a target as big as the County Cork and bare-damn-Injuns to shoot at you.

"Who that was there that day will be forgetting the strange sight it was? The prairie splashed white with flour from the box cars broken open. Goods and groceries dumped out, stuff scattered, new boots having their tops cut off for leather the Injuns would be wanting, the devil only knows for why.

"We watched them racing their ponies up and racing their ponies down and around, the whole boiling of them, and laughing and screeching and cavorting and taking shots at us and cutting crazy capers. Bolts of calico—many bolts—were gone loose into long streamers. Loose, I'm telling you, and the grand whirl of banners they made, being tied to the ponies' tails, and flying and fluttering and kiting till they would be mad things wagging and snapping their fingers in the face of the blue sky's wonder at them."

The spectacle, as thus described, is confirmed by Porcupine, who tells that the Indians "tied bolts of calico to their horses' tails, and galloped about, and had much amusement." He further relates that as the train-wreckers were going away with their plunder another train came up, this one from the west. "Many soldiers got off," he says, "but they did not attack the Cheyennes."

General Dodge was a passenger on that train. Formerly in command of the Department of the Missouri, he had conducted Indian campaigns for two years before resigning in March, 1866, to assume charge of the Union Pacific construction work. He has referred to the wrecking episode as a raid by Chief Turkey Leg's band, but the Cheyenne authority names Spotted Wolf as the actual leader.

From the copious store of carbines and rifles in the private car of General Dodge he is said to have armed a score of men—discharged employees and adventurers—for this emergency. He himself is reported to have led that force into the fight. There is nothing to show, however, that much fighting was done. The prankishness of the Indians evidently continued until they grew tired of the fun and rode away with all the loot they could carry.

The derailment of the engine resulted in two deaths. Porcupine mentions a third member of the train crew to lose his life—a man who is said to have come running along the track before he was killed by the Cheyennes. This, however, is not substantiated by Delahunty. But he told me:

"The engineer was after dropping down out of his cab, and the driver crushing the life out of him. The fireman's remainders I never did see, not having the heart for it; but it's bad scalded he was, I heard them saying, and burnt black. And I will be having always a kindly thought for poor Handerhan, a section lad from the ditched hand-car. Clean husked naked he was, and sticking full of arrows.

"Again, there was Thompson. Poor Bill Thompson! It's a hard thing to believe, if you hear it told, the thing that happened him after the hand-car jumped the rails. Through all the scalping of him he lay still, with never a quirk nor a quiver to him, as if destroyed he was entirely, with no more life to him than tallow has or a cedar log from Lebanon. But the power was in him yet, the way he would be crawling off into the grass, and on and on. Clean to the section house he crawled, and was picked up in the morning when the train from the west was coming, and it's myself had his scalp for him that had been found in the grass where the red stains were. It had been dropped, I'm thinking, from the belt of the savage man that had it."

No more shocking to look at than an example of the wigmaker's craft, that relic is on view to this day in the museum of the Public Library at Omaha. Brought to town August 7, 1867, it then floated in a tin pail filled with water. A man with a bandaged head carried the pail. At the railway station he was helped into a buggy and driven hurriedly to a doctor's office. But—futile haste! Although he might attain his fourscore years—which he really did—he was to learn that the scalp could not be made to grow again upon his head.

When Delahunty had finished telling me, with minute particularity all about that "still, wild night," as he called it, he smoothed his hand along the barrel of the carbine he had brought out of the house to show me. While he opened and shut the breech-block of the old gun he added, with finality:

"So there you have it, everything full and complete, as I've seen and heard it told; and each word a true word, to let you know the kind of railroading we had when all this valley land where the corn-fields do be whispering would be wild grass land for buffalo only, with no stone, tree, farm, or crop of any kind."

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

THE SCARBOROUGH SCHOOL, SCARBOROUGH-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK

Based on The Outlook of July 30, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Issue of Shantung; Why China Refused to Sign.

Reference: Pages 491; 502, 503.

Questions:

1. What is the Shantung provision in the Peace Treaty? What are the facts which The Outlook tells us it is well to remember in order to understand the Shantung situation? 2. Explain at length why the Shantung provision has become a real issue. 3. Restate carefully why China, according to Wu Chao-chu refused to sign the Peace Treaty. Do you praise or condemn the Chinese peace delegates for the action they took? Reasons. 4. Discuss whether the way in which the Peace Conference has treated China is contrary to America's historic policy toward China. 5. One critic characterizes the Shantung situation as a matter of injustice, deceit, brutal force, and unfair dealing. Weigh each characterizing word carefully. Does this critic exaggerate the Shantung situation? Tell, with reasons, why. 6. Read in connection with this topic "China and the World War," by W. R. Wheeler (Macmillan).

B. Topic: The Mexican Question.

Reference: Page 493.

Questions:

1. The Outlook speaks of the Mexican question. What is that question? 2. Explain how Mexico got into its present plight. 3. The Outlook sanctions the suggestion that Congress appoint a commission to inquire into relations between Mexico and the United States and to suggest what should be done. Has Congress any right to do this? Explain what results might follow such an investigation. Would it be a wise thing for Congress to do? Tell why or why not. 4. Describe President Wilson's Mexican policy. Give, with reasons, your opinion of it. 5. Is it the duty of the American Government to protect Americans and American property in Mexico? Is it America's duty also to protect nationals of other foreign countries in Mexico and their property? Discuss. 6. Tell what you think of this statement and why: "We [America] can easily step into Mexico and enforce a reasonable respect for justice and decency if the occasion requires." 7. Would you be willing to have the League of Nations settle the Mexican problem? Reasons. 8. Two valuable books for reading about conditions in the past and at present in Mexico are "Porfirio Diaz," by David Hannay (Holt), and "Mexico under Carranza," by T. E. Gibbon (Doubleday, Page).

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: Prohibition in Congress.

Reference: Page 492.

Questions:

1. Report the provisions of the Volstead Bill which passed the House of Representatives July 22, 1919. Tell what you think of each of these provisions. 2. Explain the steps by which a bill becomes law in our Federal Government. 3. Give your reasons for believing or not believing that the possession of alcoholic beverages should be a legal offense. 4. What is the Anti-Saloon League? Describe its methods. Are they democratic methods? Is this League, in your opinion, aiding or damaging the prohibition cause? Reasons. 5. Discuss whether the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment and the action in Congress on the Enforcement Bill show that the American people are becoming indifferent toward the idea of personal liberty as it was conceived of by the framers of our Constitution.

B. Topic: The Education of Henry Ford.

Reference: Editorial, 497, 498.

Questions:

1. Is this editorial merely a matter of satire? Explain your answer. 2. Define accurately all the words specially referred to in the first paragraph of this editorial. What is libel? 3. Who is an Anarchist? Mr. Ford spent thousands of dollars in trying to stop the war and in trying to keep America out of it. Considering the causes and the objects of the world war, were his endeavors anarchic? Discuss. 4. What is education? When is a person educated? The Outlook thinks Mr. Ford has been educated. Has he? 5. Compare Henry Ford's method of getting facts with Abraham Lincoln's method of getting an education. What is the point to be made? Discuss its significance. 6. What, in your opinion, is the connection between democracy and education? Explain at length. 7. In connection with this topic read "The Meaning of Education," by N. M. Butler (Scribners), and "Schools of Tomorrow," by John Dewey (Dutton).

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. The foundations of government should be examined anew every generation. 2. Leadership in business is more important than leadership in politics. 3. Henry Ford is a good American.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for July 30, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Negligible, duress, franchise, mining concessions (491); bandits, Congress (493); bona-fide, the Constitution (492).

THE NATION'S INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS

Believing that the advance of business is a subject of vital interest and importance, The Outlook will present under the above heading frequent discussions of subjects of industrial and commercial interest. This department will include paragraphs of timely interest and articles of educational value dealing with the industrial upbuilding of the Nation. Comment and suggestions are invited.

U. S. ARMY MOTOR- TRUCK TRAIN ON TRANS- CONTINENTAL DEMON- STRATION TOUR

ON July 7 the first transcontinental army motor-truck train started from Washington for a cross-country run to the Pacific coast. The train consists of five passenger cars, thirty-five trucks, two ambulances, six motor cycles, two tank trucks, two kitchen trailers, two water-tank trucks, one engineer-shop truck, one officer work truck, and one searchlight truck. This run will serve as a Nation-wide demonstration of the need of good roads. In connection with road-building Secretary Baker has ordered that the road-building equipment which our Army used in France be returned and distributed among the various States for use in the construction and maintenance of Federal-aided highways.

It is predicted by Mr. G. A. Kissel, President of the Kissel Motor Car Company, that the conclusion of this trip will be the signal for a greater adaptability of the motor truck to the Nation's transportation requirements. Secretary Baker states that "this is the beginning of a new transportation era." While, no doubt, he had reference to the possibilities of transcontinental trucking from a military standpoint, he could, with equal truth, have said it from a commercial point of view.

Mr. Kissel goes on to say: "I look for great results from this cross-country trip, foremost among them being, of course, the adaptability of the motor truck for long-distance transportation, which I believe to be an assured success. The motor truck of to-day is built for long and hard service. In most cases the manufacturers and designers are hard-headed business men with practical experience in the hardships and obstacles motor trucks must overcome to do the work required of them.

"The second result will be a close-up view of the road conditions of America. Two hundred odd men who will accompany this fleet of trucks will have brought forcibly to their minds the necessity of America 'taking off its coat and rolling up its sleeves' to build more roads and improve present ones. If this coast-to-coast truck train falls behind schedule, it will be because the condition of some of the roads was not taken into consideration, or that we have not a clear idea of how few good roads we have when the country's total road mileage is taken into consideration. I think that every good roads association in every city, town, and village through which this truck train will pass should use the event as a big publicity feature, pointing out to the local people the urgent necessity of reconstructing their roads and building new ones. Every good roads or-

The Dictaphone for Early Morning Dictation

The executive who gets the early morning jump on his mail has the best chance to leave the office for a healthful hour on the links, a spin in the car, or a turn on the lake.

The Dictaphone is a mighty big help, because it cuts out all the delays made necessary by writing each letter both in shorthand and on the typewriter. You generally can get out your dictation during the cooler hours, then forget it. So can your secretary.

Phone or write The Dictaphone Branch Office nearest you for a 15-minute demonstration in your office, on your work, or write The Dictaphone, New York City.

THE DICTAPHONE

Registered in the U. S. and Foreign Countries

Dept. 118-H, Woolworth Building, New York City

Branches Everywhere

Write for Booklet, "The Man at the Desk"

There is but one Dictaphone, trade-marked "The Dictaphone," made and merchandised by the Columbia Graphophone Company

"The Shortest Route to the Mail Chute"

Vacation Lands made more delightful

Money is the most important item in any tourist's outfit. Money takes him on his trip and brings him home again. Money makes his trip pleasant and agreeable or it fills the trip with petty worries and annoyances.

The kind of funds is most important. If you ask your banker what is the best kind of travel funds he will probably say "travelers' cheques." If you ask him what is the best kind of travelers' cheques he is almost sure to say

"A.B.A." American Bankers Association Cheques

You can buy these cheques at leading banks in every important city and town in North America. Ask the nearest bank to tell you more about these "A.B.A." Cheques—"the best funds for tourists." Or write for full information to

BANKERS TRUST COMPANY
NEW YORK CITY

This is the money-making opportunity The Outlook offers you

If you want extra money, simply drop us a line (a post card will do), addressing it as given below. You will receive a blank to be filled in. Then in due course you will receive a certificate appointing you an authorized representative of The Outlook, together with a convenient little book of order blanks which may easily be carried in your pocket or handbag. There is no responsibility on your part—none but the careful handling of the money you receive and your statement that you will make a serious effort to introduce The Outlook to new subscribers. For this interest and activity on your part The Outlook will pay you what is really a remarkably high compensation—a far higher commission than that paid by most publications.

You do not have to "sell" The Outlook to the sort of people who ought to read it. It is only necessary to make a mental list of the homes in your neighborhood in which you believe The Outlook should be a regular weekly visitor—and, if they are the right kind of homes, you will merely have to tell them about The Outlook in your own words and in your own way—and the chances are strong that they will be more than interested. This means money for you and regular money, month after month, and year after year. Write to-day, addressing Desk G, Representatives' Division, ganization in the country should feature this transcontinental trip in its meetings and in the local papers, pointing out what a wonderful thing it would be for local concerns, as well as for the development of the community at large, if good roads were built to promote and invite increased transportation, both passenger and freight.

The Outlook Company, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City

U. S. Army Motor-Truck Train on Transcontinental Demonstration Tour (Continued)

"Every business organization, every chamber of commerce, advertising club, and all booster clubs in every city should start a whirlwind campaign to keep progress with this transcontinental trip, pointing out how good roads cut transportation time as well as transportation cost, how good roads help to produce good times, how good roads increase realty values and decrease the cost of not only commodities and necessities but the high cost of living, by providing a cheaper means of getting goods and food to the merchants' shelves.

"This first transcontinental motor-truck trip will convince farmers as no other means could of the adaptability of the motor truck to long-distance hauling. There are thousands of farmers who do not yet believe that the motor truck is competent to transport their produce over long distances. These farmers, even though their farms are many hundreds of miles from the nearest center, can take advantage of the use of the motor truck for long-distance transportation, which this transcontinental trip will prove. Once agricultural America as a whole employs motor trucks to transport its produce to market, the cheaper its produce can be sold at the market, because it can deliver more produce in less time and at less cost. Remember, the cost of transporting wheat, corn, rye, all the fruits and vegetables, is the biggest part of production cost. Once this cost is reduced, its selling cost can be likewise reduced.

"Therefore it is up to every farming community to give serious thought to the motor truck and its potentiality in helping solve the transportation demands made upon agricultural America to feed not only America but the world, to transport not only field produce but live stock. The motor truck has proved its success in comparatively long distance hauls, such as three hundred miles from farm to market. The success of this transcontinental trip will prove to the farmer that, no matter how far away the market is from his farm, the motor truck is the logical means of transporting the results of his labors to the market. Once the farmer gets the big idea that the motor truck is the logical solution, the question of good roads throughout agricultural America will be solved in no time at all.

"Another object of this U. S. Motor Corps transcontinental trip is for the purpose of enlisting young men to serve in the Corps—young men to be sent to schools in September. Consider what this education means to the future of motor-truck transportation in the United States. When it is considered that the economy and efficiency of motor-truck transportation does not rest entirely on the motor truck, but equally so on knowing how to properly drive, handle, and take care of the truck, it can be seen what a big asset to the country these young men will be after they have been thoroughly schooled and graduated into first-class motor-truck operators and dispatchers. Without a doubt, one of the results of this transcontinental trip will be that in every city where the train passes through or stops hundreds of young men who want to get ahead will quickly seize the opportunities which the Motor Transport Corps offer them.

U. S. Army Motor-Truck Train on Transcontinental Demonstration Tour (Continued)

"Consider the immense saving to owners as well as to the country, the increased service the motor truck will render owners when in the hands of young men who have been through Uncle Sam's Motor Truck Transport Schools and have become graduated A-1 motor-truck experts.

"Another lesson this first cross-country trip will teach us is the condition of America's highways as a help to motor trucks in rushing troops, supplies, and equipment from one city to another or from one State to another in times of internal trouble. While I hope such an emergency may never arise, it is one that we should provide against and be on guard to 'nip in the bud,' and we can only do this if our highways are developed enough to get all the speed, dependability, and performance that are built into trucks. Such highways will also enable the city police, fire and water departments, to extend their area of operation, which in itself is a big asset to the community.

"I think that Secretary Baker and officers of the U. S. Army Motor Transport Corps are due a vote of thanks, by not only the motor-truck industry, but by each community, its landowners, taxpayers, and business men—in fact, every branch of our commercial and social structure—for endeavoring to demonstrate to us what must be done to bring the country's transportation facilities up to one hundred per cent efficiency.

MR. PASITCH AND ALBANIA

May I express my surprise at the words of Mr. Pasitch, the First Delegate of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes to the Peace Conference in Paris, in the interview given to Mr. Gregory Mason, reported in The Outlook of June 18.

"Now every people," said Mr. Pasitch, "has the right to defend its liberty and its national development. The peoples who have had to support the yoke of foreign domination have conceived such a hatred for the policy of enslavement and despoilment of other people's land that they would never themselves think of adopting such an imperialistic policy. We are a peaceful people, we have never enslaved foreign tribes or nationalities. . . . People have reached a state of development where there is no longer any excuse for denying them the right to govern themselves."

If that is true, by what justification did Mr. Pasitch, when Prime Minister of the Serbian Government in 1913, at the London Conference, claim Dibra, Jacova, and the greatest part of Albania in the late vilayet of Uskub to be Serbian? Here all the inhabitants are Albanian, and now, as first delegate of the Serbs in the Paris Peace Conference, Mr. Pasitch is claiming to annex the northern part of Albania too. Is this in accord with the principles of nationality, or with the principles in the name of which this war has been conducted against violence and imperialism and secret treaties based on the law of conquest? That is the question. CHARALAMBIS GERMENTIS.

Greenthorne, Edgeworth, Near Bolton, England.

A Permanent Durable Cleaner

Cleaning, like heating, should be one of the permanently installed features of every home. House cleaning is done quickly, easily, and thoroughly with the Arco Wand. Dust and lint from mattresses, upholstery, curtains, rugs, etc., is instantly removed and piped away. No work at all to use the Arco Wand—it makes cleaning a pastime.

ARCO WAND VACUUM CLEANER

Makes the housewife independent of the servant question.

The ARCO WAND is useful all over the house, and its efficiency is so great that a few moments' easy stroking with the handy tools leaves not a trace of dust, dirt, or lint. No extra help is really needed because the ARCO WAND, itself, does the hard work.

The ARCO WAND is a permanent improvement and attraction for Residences, Apartments, Hotels, Clubs, Schools, Theatres, Churches, and any Public or Private Buildings. Also made mounted on truck for factories, and large business-buildings. May be purchased on easy payments, if desired, from dealers everywhere.

Send at once for catalog. The ARCO WAND, which gives full descriptions, and illustrates many of its labor-and money-saving uses.

AMERICAN RADIATOR COMPANY

Department C-55
816-822 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Makers of the world-famous IDEAL Boilers and AMERICAN Radiators

The Arco Wand Machine is placed in the basement or side room. A suction pipe runs to openings on each floor.

PARK HILL ON THE HUDSON, Yonkers, N. Y.

A most attractive property for sale. Two hundred feet frontage by one hundred and nineteen feet depth. Stone wall, beautiful trees and lawn, and delightful view of Hudson River and the Palisades. Charming twelve-room house, modern improvements, good repair. For terms and further information, address 867, Outlook.

McCutcheon's Fashionable Sweaters

Reg. Trade-Mark

IN spite of the increasing difficulty in obtaining really good Sweaters we have succeeded in keeping our stocks complete and attractive. Our customers will find a pleasing variety of smart models and fashionable fabrics and colors.

The model illustrated, of Camel's Hair, is most attractive for country, sea-shore, and mountain wear. A regulation-size scarf of Camel's Hair, in the natural color, can be furnished to match this Sweater.

Camel's Hair Sweater - $22.50
Scarf to Match - 5.75

Our Mail Order Department will gladly furnish full descriptions and particulars of any of the above merchandise and fill orders to your complete satisfaction

James McCutcheon & Company
Fifth Avenue, 34th and 33d Sts., N. Y.

If you are a teacher

you will find it worth your while to read the advertisement on the inside of the front cover
—and to act upon it.

BY THE WAY

That tobacco was looked upon almost as a necessity even a hundred and fifty years ago appears in a reprint, edited by Don C. Seitz, of "The Tryal of William Penn and William Mead for Causing a Tumult." The jury in that famous case refused to be bullied by the Court as to what verdict they should render. Thereupon the Recorder stormed at them, "You shall be lock'd up, without Meat, Drink, Fire, and Tobacco; you shall not think thus to abuse the Court; we will have a Verdict, by the help of God, or you shall starve for it."

Years ago newspaper humorists used to scoff at the number of aged Negroes who claimed to have been body-servants of George Washington; later almost every society woman who died "had danced with Lafayette when she was a girl." But the despatches tell a true story of a woman who saw Lafayette in Baltimore in 1824, who saw the famous Sixth Massachusetts Regiment when it fought its way through Baltimore in 1861, and who the other day saw the Baltimore Trench Mortar Battery march through the city on its return from Europe. This was Mrs. Clara M. B. Brown, widow of Chief-Judge George W. Brown. She was one hundred and two years old when she died on July 21, and retained her faculties almost to the end.

Not long ago we were told that the cables were "jammed" with important news. Lately a "special cable despatch" from London to a New York newspaper declared that the British censor had barred "American cussing" in films. Careful study of the despatch reveals that the "cussing" referred to was in remarks made by film actors when trying to be natural, and discovered only by deaf-mutes who read the actors' lips on the screen! Odder still is the allegation that the terrible discovery was made in a film version of "Pilgrim's Progress."

Another "special cable despatch" to another New York paper tells that on July 15 (St. Swithin's Day) "a waterspout which burst about Tobermory, in Argyllshire, spread a shower of herring over the town and part of the town of Hull. They fell in heaps on the pavements and roofs. Gulls were quickly gobbling them up, and later these were assisted by hens, ducks, and cats."

There has been a great deal of talk about "St. Swithin" because of the long spell of rainy weather in July. It turns out that Swithin never was a saint, although he was a bishop. Every newspaper every year reminds people that July 15 is St. Swithin's Day and that if it rains that day it will rain for forty days. If nine days of consecutive rain astonishes people as much as the late rainy spell has done, how greatly would they be excited if we should actually have forty consecutive days of rain? As a matter of cold scientific fact, the Weather Bureau expert in New York says that the longest spell of continuous rainy days known in that district was in 1907, namely, eleven days. The same expert doubts if there ever were forty consecutive days of rain anywhere except in the tropics and except, of course, the "rainy season" mentioned in Genesis.

In connection with Swithin it may interest those who have not looked him up in the encyclopædia to see the origin of the legend: He was Bishop of Winchester about 855 A.D. Before he died, he begged to be buried in the open churchyard and not in the church. So he was. But after a hundred years the monks thought to honor him and the church by reburying him in the chancel. They appointed July 15 for the removal, but on that day it began to rain heavily and continued steadily for forty days and nights. The monks took the hint and let Swithin stay where he was.

By the Way (Continued)

Now that the war is over, we have time to discuss a few things less exciting. Such a question is raised by a pamphlet just received entitled "Why the Garden of Eden Was a Jungle." A glance at the argument shows us that the writer, Mr. John Serrigan, of Rochester, New York, holds that, "among the many erroneous assumptions that afflict the world, there is none more misleading and disastrous than the one which would have us believe the Garden of Eden was some beautiful vegetable paradise, when any old jungle could have served the purpose." Moreover, some old jungle must have served the purpose, because otherwise Adam and Eve would have had no chance to develop their abilities. The author is evidently very much in earnest, as he offers on the title page "Ten Cents for the Evidence [that is, the price of the pamphlet]. Ten Dollars if You Can Refute It. Reason to Decide."

A "good mixer" is thus defined in "Judge": "He can tell more funny stories, borrow more money, pay less of it back, get more signers to petitions, be elected to more lodge offices, and do less honest work than any other three men in town."

"The trouble with the Irish question," says a newspaper writer, "is that too many of the Irish people want what too many of the Irish people don't want."

It has been said that peoples may be known by their proverbs. An interesting collection of Filipino proverbs has lately been published by Dean Jorge Bocobo, of the University of the Philippines. He says that the old men among the Filipinos know hundreds of such proverbs and legends, many of them absorbed from the West and others giving an insight into the psychology of the race. Here are three or four from his collection: "A fish is caught by the mouth" (Caution); "Break your head, but not your word" (Honor); "If you sleep, brother, the crocodile will eat you up" (Industry); "'Tis easy to be born, 'tis hard to be a man" (Character); "A liar loves to take an oath" (Truthfulness); "Do not be too near your superiors, lest they trample on your dignity" (Pride).

"We now hear," remarks "Punch," "that the question regarding the possession of Kladizatiffagtaliofatoffka, in Poland, which has caused so much of the delay at the Peace Conference, has been satisfactorily settled. The four Big Powers are to have a couple of syllables each and the remaining three will be raffled for."

Who invented ice-cream soda? In an editorial in the New York "Sun" we read that it was invented fifty years ago by Joseph R. Royer, who died the other day in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, at the age of eighty-five. It is the tradition, we believe, that he brought about the union of frozen cream—yes, it was made of cream in the '60s—and carbonated water for the pleasure of a child who liked both soda-water and ice-cream so well that she could not decide which she would have first."

My 10 years with a Corn

By a woman who typifies millions

How Blue-jay Acts

A is a thin, soft protecting ring which stops the pain by relieving the pressure.

B is the B&B wax, centered on the corn to gently undermine it.

C is rubber adhesive. It wraps around the toe and makes the plaster snug and comfortable.

I had, like most women, two or three pet corns, which remained with me year after year.

I suppose that one was ten years old. It had spoiled thousands of hours for me.

Of course I pared and padded them, but the corns remained.

Then Somebody Told Me

Then somebody told me of Blue-jay. I promised to get it, and did.

I applied it to my oldest corn, and it never pained again. In two days I removed it, and the whole corn disappeared.

It was amazing—two days of utter comfort, then the corn was gone.

That day I joined the millions who keep free from corns in this way. If a corn appears, I apply a Blue-jay promptly, and it goes.

I've forgotten what corn aches were.

I have told these facts so often that not a woman I know has corns. Now I gladly write them for this wider publication.

Certainly corns are unnecessary. Paring and padding are needless. Harsh, mussy treatments are folly.

When a corn can be ended by applying a Blue-jay, surely everyone should end them. And anyone who will can prove the facts tonight.

B&B Blue-jay

The Scientific Corn Ender

Stops Pain Instantly—Ends Corns Completely

25 Cents—At Druggists

Bauer & Black Makers of Sterile Surgical Dressings and Allied Products

Chicago New York Toronto

Important to Subscribers

When you notify The Outlook of a change in your address, both the old and the new address should be given. Kindly write, if possible, two weeks before the change is to take effect.

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequaled for Service & Neighborhood Clubs

Send 35c today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"
THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 154 Fifth Ave., New York

PISO'S

for Coughs & Colds

Soothes & Heals

After shaving apply Hinds Cream to overcome the smarting and refine the complexion. This comforting, cooling, snow-white cream protects the skin from Sunburn, Windburn and the effect of soap or hard water as well as daily shaving. The new non-leakable cap makes the bottle fine for vacationists and travelers.

SAMPLES: Be sure to enclose stamps with your request. Hinds Honey and Almond Cream 2c. Both Cold and Disappearing Cream 4c. Talcum 2c. Trial cake Soap 8c. Sample Face Powder 2c; trial size 15c. Attractive Week-end Box 50c.

Hinds Cream Toilet Necessities are selling everywhere, or will be mailed, postpaid in U. S. A., from Laboratory

A. S. HINDS, 257 West St., Portland, Maine

THE OUTLOOK CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING SECTION

Advertising Rates: Hotels and Resorts, Apartments, Tours and Travel, Real Estate, Live Stock and Poultry, fifty cents per agate line, four columns to the page. Not less than four lines accepted. In calculating space required for an advertisement, count an average of six words to the line unless display type is desired.

"Want" advertisements, under the various headings, "Board and Rooms," "Help Wanted," etc., ten cents for each word or initial. Including the address, for each insertion. The first word of each "Want" advertisement is set in capital letters without additional charge. Other words may be set in capitals, if desired, at double rates. If answers are to be addressed in care of The Outlook, twenty-five cents is charged for the box number named in the advertisement. Replies will be forwarded by us to the advertiser and bill for postage rendered. Special headings appropriate to the department may be arranged for on application.

Orders and copy for Classified Advertisements must be received with remittance ten days before the date on which it is intended the advertisement shall first appear.

Address: ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT, THE OUTLOOK
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

Tours and Travel

CHRYSANTHEMUM SEASON

in the Far East

Join the AMERICAN EXPRESS tour under personal escort leaving San Francisco October 17 for a wonderful visit to Japan and China at the best season of the year.

ROUND-THE-WORLD extension of same tour. Write for itinerary.

AMERICAN EXPRESS

Travel Department

65 Broadway, New York
23 West Monroe St., Chicago
Market and 2d Sts., San Francisco

Summer in the National Parks, California, Canadian Rockies

Motoring, camping, tramping, horseback riding, resting. Booklet. THE TEMPLE TOURS, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

Apartments

WANTED—THREE APARTMENTS

unfurnished, in same building in New York City. No. 1. Containing living-room or studio, dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms, bathroom and bath's room. No. 2. Containing living-room or studio, bedrooms and bath. No. 3. Containing living-room or studio, bedrooms and bath. Location preferably out of the usual beaten paths, something not usually rented if possible, and preferably in a private house altered for such purpose. Nothing south of Greenwich Village nor north of 72d Street will be considered. Occupancy: October 1, 1924. Address: CHARLES H. DAVIS, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

Hotels and Resorts

MASSACHUSETTS

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little house by the sea. PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

Rock Ridge Hall, Weylesley Hills, Mass. Fine location. Large, breezy, screened piazza. Running water in bedrooms. Private baths. Eggs, berries, cream, chicken. Rates moderate.

NEW YORK CITY

The Clendening

200 W. 103d St., New York

Short Block from Broadway Subway Station. A Hotel of Quality and Refinement.

Single room, use of bath.....$2 Day
Parlor, Bedroom, Bath, for two.....$3-$4
Parlor, two Bedrooms and Bath.....$5-$6
These rooms at attractive summer rates, with Breakfast included.

Phone Academy 3510.

Write for Booklet C and Map of N. Y. City.

Hotel Le Marquis

31st Street & Fifth Avenue
New York

Combines every convenience and home comfort, and commends itself to people of refinement wishing to live on American Plan and be within easy reach of social and dramatic centers.

Room and bath $4.50 per day with meals, or $2.50 per day without meals.
Illustrated Booklet, gladly sent upon request.
JOHN P. TOLSON.

Hotels and Resorts

NEW YORK CITY

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

MAINE

Robinhood Inn and Cottages Bailey Island, Me., opened June 15. Bathing, fishing, sailing. For circular, Miss MASSEY.

MEXICO

Metropolitan Hotel The Best Hotel in the City. In front of the Beautiful Cathedral and Flower Market.

MEXICO CITY, MEXICO
All modern conveniences.

NEW YORK

Hotel Champlain
Bluff Point-on-Lake Champlain, N.Y.

HIGHEST point on lake—briarwood every room a front room—800 acres—tennis—18-hole golf course—concrete garage—boating, bathing, fishing, motor highways in all directions. Excellent cuisine, American plan. Management Mr. J. P. Greaves, of Florida East Coast Hotels. Booklet on request.

Open June 25th

New York Booking Office,
242 Fifth Avenue

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of wild-est Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, saddle horses. Tramps to surrounding mountain peaks. Lake George and Lake Champlain. Dancing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $16 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

Health Resorts

Sanford Hall, est. 1841

Private Hospital

For Mental and Nervous Diseases

Comfortable, homelike surroundings; modern methods of treatment; competent nurses. 15 acres of lawn, park, flower and vegetable gardens. Food the best. Write for booklet.

Sanford Hall Flushing New York

LINDEN

The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Daylakes, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LIPPINCOTT WALTER, M.D. (late of The Walter Sanitarium)

Country Board

COUNTRY BOARD During September and October Colonial home on hilltop. Delightful view of country and Lake Ontario. Electric lights, bathroom, excellent table. On State road, three miles from Oswego. Miss ALICE E. FERRY, Fruit Valley R. F. D., Oswego, N. Y.

COUNTRY BOARD New Jersey. Nurse's private home accommodates a few convalescents and elderly people requiring care. 65 Halsted St., East Orange, N. J.

Real Estate

CONNECTICUT

For Sale or Rent Charming house in ideal Colonial home on hilltop. Delightful view of country and Lake Ontario. Electric lights, bathroom, excellent table. On State road, three miles from Oswego. Miss ALICE E. FERRY, Fruit Valley R. F. D., Oswego, N. Y.

MASSACHUSETTS

A New England Homestead IN A COLLEGE TOWN

For Rent, Furnished or Unfurnished Built by a college professor 55 years ago. 10 rooms, 2 bathrooms, barn available as garage; 1/2 acres of well-kept grounds, old trees, wooded ravine, and running brook. Within five minutes' walk of the College Chapel or the village post office. 667, Outlook.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

FOR SALE

Site and Buildings of Successful Camp Beautiful, safe, secluded. On well-known New Hampshire lake. Price moderate. Address Camp, P. O. Box 1,062, Philadelphia, Pa.

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential section, suburbs of New York City. Half hour Grand Central; also near subway. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 50 x 100. Garages. Price $3,500. Full particulars from owner, 9,515, Outlook.

NEW YORK

Shelter Island Heights, L. I. FOR SALE—10-Room House

Two bathrooms. All modern improvements. Well furnished throughout. In perfect order. Large porches. R. FECHTER.

Money-making farms. 17 States. $10 to $100 acre. Stock, tools, crops often included to settle quickly. Write for big illustrated catalogue. A. B. Frost Farm Agency, 2028 B. M., Sun Bldg., New York.

VERMONT

FOR SALE—Maple Park Farm. Unequaled for situation in Vermont. 160 acres fertile land. Meadow, pasture, bearing and young orchard. House a fine old colonial inn, on high elevation commanding wonderful view of mountains, field and forest. Modern plumbing; supplied with pure spring water. On five road from White River Junction to Woodstock, Vt. 3 miles from former, 9 miles from latter town. Price $6,000. William Bradley, Administrator, Hartford, Vt.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

WANTED—450 Outlook readers to represent this publication this summer—and all through the year, if you like. You can easily earn $10 a week and more, simply by using an hour or two a day of your spare time. If you want extra spending money—and everybody does—write us for details of the Outlook's co-operative profit plan. Simply address Representatives' Division, Desk K, The Outlook, 381 Fourth Ave., New York City.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

CLERK wanted, September 1, in Protestant orphanage near New York. Reflected, intelligent, pleasant woman between 25 and 45, to attend to mail, parcels, phone, children's visitors, typing menus, various lists, etc. Permanent resident position, delightful location, refined, homelike atmosphere. 7,193, Outlook.

WANTED—Young, educated, unmarried woman, not nurse or matron, to help entertain and do shopping for women patients at small private hospital for mild mental and nervous affections. Wages $40 monthly and maintenance. State age, education, and give references. Address: George H. Torney, 300 South Street, Brookline, Mass.

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CM27 Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

WANTED—Bright, active, well educated young woman, preferably college woman, to act as private secretary. Need not have much business experience, but able to take dictation rapidly, though not necessarily rapid typewriter. In answering give full information as to business experience and where educated. 7,203, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

DIETITIANS, cafeteria managers, governesses, matrons, housekeepers. Miss Richards, Box 3, East Side Station, Providence, R. I.

HELP WANTED

Companions and Domestic Helpers

ATTRACTIVE and pleasant home offered in return for companionship, reading aloud, etc. Piano, flowers, books. One of the best sections within 30 miles of New York. 7,183, Outlook.

WANTED—Capable, strong woman of refinement as assistant housekeeper, able to superintend the serving of meals. Write: Homecroft Inn, Scarsdale, N. Y. Telephone 690 Scarsdale.

YOUNG woman of refinement wanted in the capacity of mother's helper, care of two little girls two and four years of age, at the seashore. Previous experience not necessary. Must be fond of children. Write Mrs. A. W. Moffatt, Bay Shore, Long Island, for appointment in New York. Good salary; references required. 7,203, Outlook.

WANTED, September 1, housekeeper to take entire care of house except dining-room and kitchen in small, exclusive inn near New York. State references and experience. 7,214, Outlook.

WANTED—Superior for small girls. Beautiful endowed home in Virginia. Must be good disciplinarian. Protestant, cultured. Prefer good housekeeper fond of children to trained institutional worker. 7,215, Outlook.

WORK—White woman, Protestant, refined, to take charge of kitchen in modern girls' home in Virginia. One big girl to help. Greatest consideration, good room. Spacious home for woman alone. 7,215, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

WANTED, August 24, governess for child four years old, American, Protestant. One who can speak French preferred. Permanent position if satisfactory. 7,179, Outlook.

WANTED by September 15 tutor for three boys, ages 6, 9, and 13. Winter months spent in California. Must be experienced, unmarried, fond of athletics, and of Protestant faith, and having first-class recommendations. H. H. Tinker, Canton, Ohio.

WANTED—COMPETENT governess for three children, ages 6, 7, 10 years. DESIRE an experienced teacher who will give thorough physical training. MUST live in CUBA during winter. PREFER CATHOLIC woman from 25 to 35 years. EXCELLENT home and salary. BEST references given and required. ADDRESS 7,184, Outlook.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Business Situations

EDUCATED gentleman, 24 years old, desires position. 1 or 2 years. Would travel. Can typewrite, stenography or tutor young children. Experience. Best references from large school. 7,206, Outlook.

STENOGRAPHER-SECRETARY (Scottish) desires position, preferably with literary man, where refinement and intelligent, conscientious work will be appreciated. References. $25 weekly. 7,217, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

LADY desires to place her excellent English nurse with family going to England or France in early fall. Will take charge of children or invalid in return for passage. Absolutely reliable. Write Mrs. Theodore Lilley, Toland, Mass.

MANAGING housekeeper for widower. Educated; careful accounting. Connections with help and children. Salary not under $50. 7,198, Outlook.

COMPANION, preferably traveling. References. 7,204, Outlook.

GENTLEMAN desires position as companion, housekeeper, or chaplain. Best New York social and business references. 7,207, Outlook.

EDUCATED young woman as companion-secretary. Business experience. 7,201, Outlook.

WIDOW desires supervising elderly gentleman's home. South winters. References. 7,200, Outlook.

MOTHER'S helper for little children. Girl college education, kindergarten experience, accustomed to care of children. Could take entire charge. 7,210, Outlook.

CULTURED young woman desires position as governess or companion to children in New York City. References. 7,208, Outlook.

POSITION as companion with young or middle-aged lady. Travel. Available September 15. 7,193, Outlook.

TRAVELING companion. Refined, college-bred American woman, having lived in China, will chaperon young ladies to California, Honolulu, and the Orient. Experienced traveler. Excellent references. 7,211, Outlook.

COMPANION-secretary. Refined, college-bred woman wishes position. No encumbrances. Will travel. 7,212, Outlook.

WANTED—Superior home for elderly gentleman. Will travel. No encumbrances. Excellent references. 7,213, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

TEACHER of mathematics and French wishes position. 7,183, Outlook.

EXPERIENCED French teacher wishes school or home position. Best credentials. 7,197, Outlook.

WELLESLEY graduate, having taught French, English, mathematics, history, desires position near Philadelphia. 7,214, Outlook.

MISCELLANEOUS

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Frances Parker Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

SUB-NORMAL children can be placed ideally with well-trained, experienced women. 7,177, Outlook.

LUCKY STRIKE

It's this way. In Lucky Strike—the real Burley cigarette—you enjoy the toasted flavor.

It's toasted. This special and unusual flavor is not to be had in any other cigarette.

So you see, with Lucky Strike (as with all our brands) we give you a good, sensible reason for buying it. We tell you what's especially good about Lucky Strike—what's different. It's toasted.

You'll notice in all our advertising that you are given straight man-to-man talk—reasons why. This is unusual—and is for your benefit as well as ours.

© Guaranteed by
The American Tobacco Co.
 INCORPORATED

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MASSACHUSETTS

WALNUT HILL SCHOOL

23 Highland St., Natick, Mass. A College Preparatory School for Girls. 17 miles from Boston. Miss Conant, Miss Bigelow, Principals.

SHORT-STORY WRITING
A course of forty lessons in the history, form, structure, and writing of the short-story taught by Dr. J. Berg Knapp, for years Editor of Lippincott's 150-page catalogue free. Please address THE MORE CORRESPONDENTS SCHOOL, Springfield, Mass.

MICHIGAN

BATTLE CREEK NORMAL SCHOOL

OF PHYSICAL EDUCATION. Normal Course—September 18. Three years. Broad, powerful training for a dignified profession of wholesome and happy service. Unrivalled facilities and equipment. C. Ward Crumpton, M.D., Dean, Box 28, Battle Creek, Mich.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

AUTUMN SCHOOL OF ARTS AND CRAFTS

September 1 to November 1, 1919

Including courses in Drawing, Painting, Outdoor Sketching, Modeling, Theory of Color, Theory of Design, Leather Work, Gesso, Block Printing, Metal Work and Jewelry, Weaving, Basketry, Embroidery and Book Work.

For Descriptive Booklet, address MANCHESTER INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES, MANCHESTER, NEW HAMPSHIRE

NEW YORK CITY

The Clark School for Concentration

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS

Prepares for any college. By an intensive system of individual instruction, enables a bright pupil to complete a course in much less than the usual time, and trains pupils who have been backward elsewhere to cultivate alert, retentive minds and qualify in all subjects.

Write for records made by pupils at this school and for full descriptive catalog.

Fall Term Commences Monday, September 22d

Boys' School, 72d St. & West End Ave.

Girls' School, 301 West 72d St.

New York City

A School Where Records Are Made

NEW YORK

GLEN FALLS ACADEMY

Chester Street, Glens Falls, N. Y.

Day school for Boys and Girls in the Lake George country, located in Glens Falls, N. Y., the beautiful and beautiful city of the upper Hudson among the foothills of the Adirondacks. Established eighty years. Prepares for all colleges. Nine in Faculty. Vocational guidance emphasized. Boarding homes in connection with academy. Most desirable place for families to locate to educate children. Address J. THOMAS SMITH, Headmaster, A.B. Harvard, Graduate School, Columbia.

PENNSYLVANIA

SCHOOL OF HORTICULTURE FOR WOMEN

Ambler, Pennsylvania

18 Miles from Philadelphia

SUMMER COURSE—Vegetable gardening, floriculture, fruit, canning and preserving. August 4th to 30th.

Vegetable and flower gardens, greenhouses, orchards, ornamental trees and shrubs, demonstration kitchen, apiary, poultry plant, live stock. Lectures and outdoor practice. Two year diploma course beginning Jan., 1920.

SPECIAL FALL COURSE

ELIZABETH LEIGHTON LEE, Director

AUBREY HALL

Backward and mentally defective children taught individually by experienced teachers under the supervision of an eminent nerve specialist. Torresdale, Philadelphia, Pa.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

St. John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses

YONKERS, NEW YORK

Registered in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a general training to refined, educated women. Requirements one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the Directress of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

School Information FREE

Catalogs of all Boarding Schools (or camps) in U. S. Expert advice free. Want for girls or boys? Maintained for all schools.

AMERICAN SCHOOLS' ASSOCIATION

1012 Times Building, New York, or 1515 Masonic Temple, Chicago

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122 August 13, 1919 No. 15

THE OUTLOOK IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. H. T. FULFORD, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. BOTT, TREASURER. HERBERT H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAVERS D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER

The League of Nations.....	561
Secretary Lane's Opinion of the League.....	561
The Pronouncement of the Railway Brotherhoods.....	561
President Wilson and the Railway Problem.....	562
The Plumb Plan.....	562
Two Objections to the Plumb Plan.....	562
Cartoons of the Week.....	563
Making Over the Army.....	564
Saving Babies by Motor Truck.....	564
The First to Ratify.....	564
Kultur Again.....	565
Babies and Boredom.....	565
Race Riots in Chicago.....	566
Special Correspondence from Chicago by Charles W. Holman.....
Making Over Our Army.....	567
By Harold T. Pulsifer.....
Will Hays and the Human Spirit in Political Leadership.....	569
By Frederick M. Davenport.....
The New Nation of Asia: Siberia's Aspirations for Independence—Kolchak and the Omsk Government—The People and Possibilities of the New Nation.....	571
By Charles W. Holman.....
The Reunion of Rumanians.....	574
An Authorized Interview with M. Bratiano, Rumanian Premier and First Delegate to the Peace Conference, and M. Valda, Transylvanian Minister in the Rumanian Government and One of the Delegates to the Peace Conference, by Gregory Mason, Staff Correspondent of The Outlook.....
Current Events Illustrated.....	575
A Mother and Her Brood.....	578
By Helen Johnson Keyes.....
The Book Table: Devoted to Books and Their Makers.....	580
Weekly Outline Study of Current History.....	582
By J. Madison Gathany, A.M.....
Financial Department.....	584
By the Way.....	586

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents. For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage. Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.50.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY

381 Fourth Avenue

New York City

Shur-on Spectacles and Spectacles

Shur-on spectacles made with rocking pads are especially adapted for children. Comfortable on nose and ears. Frames are lighter, look better, and prevent lenses from breaking or chipping. In consulting your oculist, optometrist or optician specify "Z" style Shelltex Shur-on.

Look for Shur-on in the bridge

Quality Beyond Question
E. Kirstein Sons Co.
Est. 1864 ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Get your glasses where you can get Shur-ons.

TEACHERS' AGENCIES

The Pratt Teachers Agency

70 Fifth Avenue, New York
Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools. Advises parents about schools. Wm. O. Pratt, Mgr.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

INDIANA

ELMHURST for GIRLS

Eleventh year. Incorporated. A non-sectarian college preparatory school, on a large country estate, 800 to 1,000 feet above sea level. Excellent water supply. Building brick and cement. New hot water heating plant. Electricity. Modern plumbing. Facilities for all outdoor sports, including saddle horses. Pupils limited to twenty-four, so that much individual attention can be given and a fine home life developed. Tuition $1,100. Address ELMHURST, R. F. D. No. 5, Connersville, Indiana.

MASSACHUSETTS

THE WINSOR TRAINING SCHOOL FOR HOME and SCHOOL SERVICE

Open to graduates of secondary schools. For circular apply to MISS C. M. POWELL, Secretary, 1 Autumn Street, Boston, Mass.

DEAN ACADEMY, Franklin, Mass.

53d Year

Young men and young women find here a homelike atmosphere, thorough and efficient training in every department of a broad culture, a loyal and helpful school spirit. Liberal endowment permits liberal terms, $350-$450 per year. Special Course in Domestic Science.

For catalogue and information address
ARTHUR W. PEIRCE, Litt. D., Principal

Crane's Linen Lawn

[ THE CORRECT WRITING PAPER ]

Something of the flavor of the days of courtly manners clings to the writing paper that served the fastidious folk of those leisurely times.

Crane's Linen Lawn is still chosen by thoughtful persons who insist that their stationery be not only beautiful, but unquestionably fashionable in its style.

All good stationery departments can show you the five new, smart envelope shapes—Whitley, Premier, Intervale, Geraldine and Copley—any one of which you may select with confidence.

Usable samples sent on request for twenty-five cents

EATON, CRANE & PIKE COMPANY

New York

Pittsfield, Mass.

The most terrific varnish test in history!

700 miles an hour for 26 hours—and Valspar won

DURING the trans-Atlantic flight of the NC-4 the strain on her huge Valsparred propellers was terrific.

The big blades, whizzing at 1800 revolutions a minute, attained at their tips the frightful speed of 700 miles per hour—a speed at which the drops of moisture striking their Valsparred surface had the impact of buckshot.

This amazing propeller speed was maintained throughout the entire 26 hours of trans-Atlantic flight—all the way from Newfoundland to Portugal—through blinding fog and mist.

Never yet has any varnish been called on to undergo such a terrific test. Had even a very little water penetrated the varnish, the tips of the blades would have begun to "fray." Then the laminated strips would have swelled and separated and the blades of the propellers would literally have flown to pieces, landing the NC-4 on the ocean, helpless.

But Valspar protected these laminated propeller blades perfectly, as it did all other varnished parts of the NC-4.

Valspar's toughness, elasticity and waterproofness made good for the U. S. Navy in this severe trial. It is the one varnish that can be absolutely depended upon under all conditions. And Valspar will make good for you whenever you have anything around the house to varnish, either indoors or out.

VALENTINE & COMPANY

440 Fourth Avenue, New York

Largest Manufacturers of High-grade Varnishes in the World

ESTABLISHED 1832

New York Chicago
Boston

VALENTINE'S
VARNISHES
(Trade Mark)

Toronto London
Amsterdam

W. P. Fuller & Co., San Francisco and Principal Pacific Coast Cities

Copyright, 1919, Valentine & Company

The Outlook

AUGUST 13, 1919

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

AS this issue of The Outlook goes to press, acute interest in the Senate in debating the League of Nations has been switched to surprise and consternation at the official notification of the organized employees of railways that they are for Federal ownership—a pronouncement upon which we comment in following paragraphs.

Nevertheless the Peace Treaty and the Covenant of the League of Nations still constitute a burning question. A few weeks ago there was a not unimportant group of both political leaders and citizens who felt that the plan for a League of Nations should be wholly rejected. That view has now, we think, been very generally abandoned, and the question has resolved itself into this: Shall the Treaty be ratified as it stands or shall it be accompanied by a statement from the Senate of reservations or interpretations? Moreover, the sentiment in the Senate seems to be growing against reservations which would act as amendments. The view of ex-Justice Hughes that amendments, or new matter added to the Covenant of the League of Nations, would require its resubmission to the contracting parties, has made a distinct impression. Our own view of the situation may be expressed in this way:

If we were members of the Senate, we should not vote for any amendments which we thought would be likely to imperil the Treaty; we should vote for any interpretative reservations which we thought would not imperil the Treaty and which would probably help to secure votes for it when it came up for final action; and when the Treaty came up for final action we would vote for it with whatever reservations had been carried, or would also vote for it without reservations if none had been adopted. In other words, we think that the adoption of the Treaty and the League is so important and that the refusal of the Senate to adopt them would be so disadvantageous and perhaps disastrous that we should be determined in our voting by this one consideration: What vote will be most likely in the end to secure the adoption of the Treaty and the League?

SECRETARY LANE'S OPINION OF THE LEAGUE

Another interesting contribution to the general discussion has been made by Mr. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, in a speech which he delivered on July 30 to a mass-meeting of Government employees in Washington. Mr. Lane is an accomplished lawyer, and, while he is a member of the Administration, his speech is refreshing because of its freedom from prejudice, personalities, or partisanship. For example, he says:

There is much bitterness of feeling over the proposed League. Some would have the Treaty rejected because of its presence therein. Others would have the Treaty and the League separated. Now I believe that every one would have preferred that the League of Nations should have been born in a different way and at a different time. But was that possible? And were not the nations committed to it at this time?

Secretary Lane takes the position which John Jay took with regard to the American Constitution. The Covenant is not a perfect document, but it is the product of a great crisis. It has been written after careful and, on the whole, unselfish deliberation. It is the first step forward that can be taken at this time towards the employment of judicial procedure instead of war in the settlement of international disputes. Can we afford not to avail ourselves of this opportunity? Can we run the risk of hoping for a better document if we decline to take this one? Secretary Lane's answer to these questions, like John Jay's to similar questions regarding the Constitution, is, No. Secretary Lane believes that the Covenant of the League does not impair the essential sovereignty of the United States, does not affect adversely the Monroe Doctrine, and does not invade the Constitutional right of Congress "to alone declare war." He rightly, we think, says that the utility of the League depends almost wholly upon its operation after ratification. His summary of its potential character deserves to be quoted:

"Perhaps it may fairly be said that with less power the League would be a scrap of paper, a generous gesture toward peace; while with more power the League would open itself to the charge that it was a super nation, an international state, and, so far as America is concerned, would be of doubtful constitutionality. As it is, the League may be described as a watchful eye, a warning voice, and a gloved hand. It is a bit of rather simple machinery by which the opinion of the world can be brought to bear upon the governments of the world. It will live if it is useful, otherwise it will die. It can be made useful if it does those things which appeal to the people as conservative, sensible, and wholly devoid of partisanship as between nations. It cannot be useful if it does not strictly construe its own powers when in doubt as against itself and in favor of the nations which comprise it. It is to be an agent and not a master, an agent of the nations. Its ultimate fortune rests in the confidence which the peoples show in each other. It will fail if it cannot stimulate this. For the nations can destroy it by mutual distrust. On the other hand, they can make it greatly serve mankind by gaining and developing the sentiment that we, the united democracies of the world, are bent upon preserving peace by persevering regard for each other's national rights."

THE PRONOUNCEMENT OF THE RAILWAY BROTHERHOODS

Far and away the most important event of the past ten days has been the statement of the organized employees of the steam railways of the country calling for Government ownership under a plan by which the railway workers shall have both a voice in the management of the roads and a share in the profits. This statement, signed by Warren S. Stone, Grand Chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; W. G. Lee, President Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; Timothy Shea, Acting Chief Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen; L. E. Sheppard, President Order of Railway Conductors; and B. M. Jewell, Acting President Railway Employees' Department, American Federation of Labor, is so pregnant with possible results for the economic and social life of the country that we print it in full, as follows:

Labor faces a persistently serious situation due to the cost of living and the impossibility of wages keeping pace with the depreciation of money. No fundamental changes are being advanced to save workers from continual defeat in the economic struggle of life. The railroad employees are in no mood to brook the return of the lines to their former control, since all the plans suggested for this settlement of the problems leave labor essentially where it has stood and where it is determined not to stand.

We realize that in the strife for wage increases we cannot win any permanent victory. It is not money but value which counts. The vicious circle is infinite; increased wages are overcapitalized, for inflated profits and the cost of goods mount faster than the wage level. A few grow wealthy and the multitude is impoverished.

Any basic change must begin with the railroads. We believe the interests of labor and the public to be identical in the railroad question. The properties have been operated for the profit of the few, not for the service of the many. Not only have we suffered from inadequate wages, but the public has paid an extortionate tax for transportation, a tax based on inflated values and collected from every person buying the necessities of life.

Our proposal is to operate the railroads democratically, applying the principles to industry for which in international affairs the Nation has participated in a world war. President Wilson declared in his Message of May 20, 1919, for the "genuine democratization of industry, based upon a full recognition of the right of those who work, in whatever rank, to participate in some organic way in every decision which directly affects their welfare in the part they are to play in industry." He spoke plainly in behalf of a "genuine co-operation and partnership based upon real community of interest and participation in control."

It has been argued that labor is merely asking the public to let the workers become the railroad profiteers in place of Wall Street. This argument cannot survive a scrutiny of our proposal.

We do ask for a share of the surplus at the end of each year, after operating costs are met and fixed charges are paid; but we also provide an automatic reduction in rates when this surplus comes to a given level. To restore the surplus the employees of the railroads must increase the efficiency of their management and they must invite new business. What we ask is to share the savings from economics we ourselves introduce and to share the surplus from new business our efficiency makes possible. We should not profit from the railroads as financiers have done; we should participate in the increased earnings from our increased production. We could not earn dividends unless industry as a whole were stimulated by improved transportation service.

In our bill the rights of the public are protected. The rate-fixing power, which is the final check upon railroad management, remains with the Inter-State Commerce Commission. If the new corporation should attempt to pay itself excessive returns, and produce a deficit, the lease is forfeitable.

As to the danger of collusion between the directors of labor and the directors of management to vote to absorb the surplus by raising wages and thus destroy the incentive of dividends, the bill makes a sound provision. We believe that the dividend system is essential if service is to be the motive and not profits. We arrange to give to management twice the rate of dividend the classified employees receive. So management's dividend is always double what its increase of wages would be, and management would never vote to use the surplus for a wage increase at the sacrifice of half of its own gains. To obtain a wage increase the classified employees would have to win the vote of the public directors.

We assure the public immediate savings. The cost of capital would be reduced from the present six to seven per cent paid to Wall Street to four per cent paid upon Government securities. The savings assured under a unified system are enormous. The savings through efficiency rendered possible only by democratic operation are even greater, for the increased production resulting from harmonious relations between employees and their managers is incalculable. We believe our plan will reduce transportation charges in surprising measure, and that it is the first and the most important step in any constructive effort to lower the cost of living.

PRESIDENT WILSON AND THE RAILWAY PROBLEM

The day before the Brotherhood had issued the foregoing statement President Wilson gave his approval in a letter to the Chairman of the House Committee on Inter-State and Foreign Commerce to a plan proposed by Mr. Hines, Director-General of the Railroads, for a settlement of the railway problem. In brief, Mr. Hines's proposal is that a Federal commission be created to investigate and decide upon all questions regarding the wages of railway employees, and that the decisions of such a Federal commission should be mandatory. In a supplementary statement, issued a day or two after their original announcement, the Railway Brotherhoods implied, although they did not explicitly state, that the proposal of Director-General Hines and President Wilson is unsatisfactory to them. They say that increasing wages is only a temporary, and therefore an unsatisfactory, method of dealing with the problem, and they insist that the only way in which the rights of the owners and the employees of the railways, together with those of the general public who use the railways, can be protected is by the method outlined in their statement, already quoted.

THE PLUMB PLAN

This statement, the dignity and temperate language of which has made an impression all over the country, is based on what is known as the Plumb Plan. Mr. Glenn E. Plumb, of Chicago, is counsel for the Railroad Brotherhoods. He outlined his plan in a remarkable and effective speech at the Reconstruction Convention, held in Atlantic City in the early part of last June.

Briefly summarized, the plan is as follows:

The Government shall buy all existing railways with bonds bearing a fixed interest; it shall create a corporation to be controlled by a Board of Directors, "one-third of this Board to be named by the President of the United States with the approval of the Senate, one-third to be elected by the employees in Class A [executives and managers], and one-third to be elected by employees in Class B [wage-earning employees who carry into execution the direction of the executive employees]; the Government shall lease to this corporation all of the railways which it has bought; the profits, if any, shall be equally divided between the Government and the operating corporation—that is to say, the men who manage and do the work of the railways; the public is to get its share of profits by a reduction of rates "whenever in one year the amount of any profits received by the Government shall equal or exceed five per cent of the gross operating revenues;" extensions of the railway system shall be paid for by assessment against the property benefited; a sinking fund shall be provided to redeem the bonds which the Government has issued to purchase the railways.

Mr. Plumb believes that a provision in his plan which will enable Class A, or the managers, to receive extra profits only by maintaining the wages of Class B at a reasonable level will prevent collusion between the two classes to take all the earnings in the form of wages, thus depriving the consumer of the benefit of reduced rates and perhaps even producing a deficit. The advantages of this plan are stated by Mr. Plumb in the following language:

Under this plan we provide a sure method for the ultimate reduction of transportation charges to actual cost. Under this plan every increase in surplus earnings tends to a reduction in rates. Every expenditure out of earnings for improvements increases the actual investment and earning power without any increase in fixed charges. Every improvement made upon the properties and paid for by local taxation brings about the same result. Every application of surplus earnings and sinking fund accumulations secures a reduction of outstanding capital and a diminution of fixed charges, again securing a further reduction in rates. We insure the public against constantly increasing rates and the wage-earner against the ever-present threat of a reduction in wages. We guarantee to the holder of the securities the protection of the integrity of his investment and the receipt of adequate returns. We give to the community, to the wage-earner, and to the management an equal voice of authority in the direction of the industry. These benefits no other plans can promise. No plan presented by the present owners attempts to procure these results.

TWO OBJECTIONS TO THE PLUMB PLAN

Whatever social and economic advantages there may be in this plan, there is one fundamental defect. It is based upon the assumption that under Government ownership and workers' management there will always be profits and never a deficit. If this were true, the plan would

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

Darling in the New York Tribune

Copyright, 1919, New York Tribune, Inc.

A SUBJECT FOR IMMEDIATE CONSIDERATION

Chapin in the St. Louis Republic

THE OPEN DOOR

Pease in the Newark Evening News

"DRIVE ON!"

Knott in the Dallas News

HIS FORMER MASTER'S VOICE

Satterfield, Newspaper Enterprise Association

OUR DAILY BREAD

From Blighty (London)

"How is your cold, Donald?" "Oh, very obstinate."
"And how's the wife?" "About the same."

be alluring. The present owners would rather have a four per cent Government bond than a five or six per cent private bond often threatened with the danger of defaulted interest, and the public would be glad to be assured of the novel experience of having their rates reduced whenever they were prosperous enough to do a large business with the railways. But human history shows that "the best-laid schemes o' mice and men gang aft agley." With the best intentions in the world, the workers' corporation might be confronted with some catastrophe, such as forest fires, the failure of a wheat crop, floods, unprovided for in their budget of fixed wages and they might in some lean year face a deficit. Who is to pay this deficit? That is the question. In a private business when a corporation faces a deficit the stockholders have to put their hands into their pockets and pay it if the corporation is to go on. Will Classes A and B of the new managing owners consent to a reduction of wages to meet the deficit? There is no mention of such a contingency in Mr. Plumb's plan. A plan which gives the managers and workers of a corporation one-half the profits, but makes the outside consumer or taxpayer pay all the deficits, is clearly subject to the criticism of being inequitable. It is only fair to say that some remedy for this apparent injustice might possibly be worked out.

Another defect in the plan is that it gives the workers absolute control of the railways. They are to elect two-thirds of the directors. Now the public is as opposed to absolutism on the part of the wage-worker as on the part of the capitalist. The American people will not consent to any plan which takes from them the ultimate power over the railways.

But it will not do to treat the Brotherhoods' plan in an antagonistic spirit. It is a serious proposal; it deals with a problem so complicated and so vital that no preponderating body of men have as yet united upon a solution, and it deserves respectful study.

MAKING OVER THE ARMY

At the end of the world war the century-old problem of properly organizing our National means of defense is still with us. Shall we depend on the old system which thrust the burden which belonged to the many upon the shoulders of the few, waiting until war is at our gate before we begin to prepare? Do we wish to run the risk of that system again, when perhaps we may not be fortunate enough to find allies to defend us until we are ready to defend ourselves?

Shall we try something new? If so, what? There are many plans in the air, and The Outlook hopes to keep its readers informed concerning these plans as they develop. One such plan is outlined in this week's issue of The Outlook. At the instance of the Military Training Camps Association, a bill covering another solution has been introduced in the Senate by Senator Wadsworth, of New York, and in the House by Congressman Julius Kahn, of California. The War Department has also prepared and presented to Congress a detailed plan for a new military establishment. The details of these two very important plans will be given in later issues of The Outlook.

In celebration of the introduction of the bill prepared by the Military Training Camps Association (the association which is both father and child of the Plattsburg idea), that organization recently entertained in Washington the Congressional sponsors of its bill. Senator Chamberlain, whose service to the cause of military preparedness can hardly be overestimated, and many distinguished officers of the Army, including Lieutenant-General Bullard, were also present. Almost all the members of the Military Training Camps Association at the dinner were either in uniform or had recently been discharged from the Army, for practically all the able-bodied members of the Military Training Camps Association were in the Service in some capacity during the war. The record of this Association, both in the number of the members which it gave to the Service and in the aid which it gave to the Government in the selection of candidates for the various officers' training camps, is one which forms one of the brightest chapters in the history of our preparation for the war.

In discussing the problem of military preparedness at the Association's dinner, both Senator Wadsworth and Congressman Kahn pointed out the immensity of the task which now confronts the country in the formation of an after-the-war military policy for our democracy. Congressman Kahn rightly said that the problem could not be solved without the complete, active, and unselfish cooperation of all the agencies concerned, including the various branches of the United States Regular Army, Reserve officers, and members of the National Guard, Congressmen and Senators, and associations both of veterans and civilians.

The Outlook believes that this solution must be found in some plan which involves not only the principle of universal military training, but also in a plan which will unify both in form and ideals the various and sometimes antagonistic elements in our present machinery of defense.

SAVING BABIES BY MOTOR TRUCK

Announcement has been made by the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor that the first automobile Child Welfare Special ever to be operated by the Government is now making its maiden trip in the State of Illinois. It is a large gray auto truck, with a body especially constructed to house the traveling equipment used by the Bureau specialist in examining and rating the babies of rural parents.

The "Special" was purchased for the purposes of demonstrating how advice on child care and professional examination of the babies of a community could be carried to the front door of the rural mother. During the war it was found that the rural child had more chances of death and poorer health than the city-bred child because the mother of the latter could attend health centers and get scientific information about how to keep her baby well. As the rural mothers are usually completely out of touch with such health centers, the Government has decided to make an experiment in the automobile clinic. It is especially hoped by the Children's Bureau that the automobile clinic will show its usefulness for those regions where the trained nurse and the resident physician do not exist.

Dr. Ruth McGuire, of the Children's Bureau, is in charge of the Special, with a trained nurse and a masculine driver as her staff. A "log" is to be kept of the clinic's expenses, its reception, and approximate amount of rural childhood which it can touch in its journeyings.

THE FIRST TO RATIFY

On July 31 King George's assent was given to the German Peace Treaty and to the treaty which guarantees the protection of France by Great Britain and the United States against an unprovoked attack by Germany. They thus became law throughout the British Empire.

On July 21 the House of Commons voted to approve these treaties, as did the House of Lords on the following day. But this was not necessary. As in Japan, so in Great Britain, a treaty may be proclaimed by the Crown without the approval of either house of Parliament. France and Italy require the approval of both houses; the United States requires the approval of the Senate only.

The act of the British Parliament is historic in British annals. The two houses, it is true, did vote on the Prize Court Bill to give effect to the Declaration of London concerning the rules of sea warfare. It passed the Commons, although it was rejected by the Lords. But that was not a treaty, but an act of legislation.

Mr. Lloyd George, the British Prime Minister, is a thoroughgoing democrat. He has always striven to strengthen the power of Parliament. Voluntarily he has created a new democratic precedent in England's unwritten Constitution, and has, through his triumph in Parliament, put his country "on the map" as the first of any to ratify the most epoch-making treaties of our time.

The submission of the Treaty for ratification to the British Parliament increases, we think, the danger of radical modifications by the American Senate. For if the Senate should add to or subtract from the Treaty by amendments, would not the British Parliament insist, as a result of the new power conferred upon it, that it should have the right of considering and approving or rejecting those amendments?

KULTUR AGAIN

WHEN several hundred men and women cheered the statement, made in the hall of the Deutsche Liederkranz in New York City a few weeks ago, that "the German spirit is not dead and never will die," and when the same speaker who made this statement further said that all men and women of German descent must do all in their power to bring "the German spirit, Kultur, and education to the American people and to the people of the whole world," America received notice that the war is not yet won. Nominally held to promote plans for helping starving people in Germany, this meeting was in fact a means for disseminating ideas against which this country has fought. It was one of many signs that what we have known as German propaganda is still a menace in America.

It seems easy for Americans to forget. Sometimes good nature is a vice, and good nature is an American characteristic. It was good nature that made our people slow to believe the reports of what the Germans were doing in Belgium in 1914. It was good nature that made our people dismiss as incredible the threats of the Germans to murder civilians and neutrals at sea. It was good nature that inclined our people to ignore as a fantastic dream the outspoken ambitions of the Germans to secure at the cost of their neighbors world trade and world domination. It is good nature now that tempts our people to forget these things, to treat the beaten foe as if he were nothing but a beaten foe, to take what is called a sportsmanlike attitude, to go more than half way—to be ready to go all the way—in getting back to the old relation of friendliness with the German and to let the German resume his old ways if he wants to.

The vice in all this is the vice of carelessness about truth and principle. If German Kultur was an evil thing last year when we were at war, it has not become a good thing now just because we have stopped fighting. If hyphenism was bad then, it is bad to-day.

America was not furious with things German because she was at war with Germany; she went to war with Germany because she had reason to be furious with things German. The German ideal set forth by Germany's leaders, defended by Germany's apologists, and acquiesced in by the German people, was the ideal of a state above all law, both international law and moral law. According to this ideal, murder, rape, torture, violation of the pledged word, treachery, disregard of the rights of men and women and children—in fact, anything to which Germans might resort to further the interests of their "old Fatherland"—was justified. According to this ideal, men who were citizens of the United States but who had German blood in their veins were justified in using their privileges as American citizens for Germany's profit. As long as any vestige of this ideal remains in America the victory which America sought in this war will not be complete.

German Kultur did not become extinct when Wilhelm went to Amerongen. The evil thing we call double allegiance or hyphenism did not cease to be evil with the signing of the armistice.

BABIES AND BOREDOM

THE signal failure of Adam and Eve to live up to the advantages of their maturity is a fact that should have been remembered by Mr. Samuel Butler before he wrote two books with the clear purpose of proving to Providence that he, Samuel Butler, would have been a better man if he could have been born grown up.

Samuel Butler's contention that the ignominy of an enforced childhood gives a bitter bias to a nascent soul otherwise sweet and upspringing is, however, not the worst charge to be made against the conventional processes of propagation; the real difficulty with having parents is that it is so hard to attain genial intercourse with any person whose baby you have been. Both parties to the transaction may do their valiant best to ignore the compulsory nature of their compact, but the resultant gaucherie often persists through life. That under the circumstances there should ever be any genuine comradeship should surprise us more than that the tendency, as shown by our own observation and by the past history of parenthood, is undoubtedly in the direction of shyness rather than of spontaneity.

As one studies the tendencies of parentage, both present and past, one observes that always opposing the comradeship possibility has been the ownership theory. Babies are born so small and helpless that it is natural for us to believe we own them, and perhaps we do, but the contention here made is that owning a child, and likewise owning a parent, is no way at all to enjoy him. A chattel cannot, in the nature of things, be companionable. Against the specious reasonableness of the ownership theory should be remembered the plain fact that human character is so skittish and incalculable that utter irresponsibility toward one's offspring seems sometimes to bring as good results as the most conscientious proprietorship.

Historical precedent, it must be admitted, pronounces in favor of the possessive attitude so emphatically that in the instances of Jephthah, Abraham, and Agamemnon the pity of the public has actually been solicited for the father rather than for the victim. The sentiment "it hurts me more than it hurts you" is of ancient origin. It is noteworthy that the mothers were never party to these famous sacrifices. Abraham had to slip away from Sarah, and Agamemnon had his own little after score to settle with Clytemnestra. The ownership theory has eaten so deep into the general conscience that parents of the past have been sanctioned in exercising authority even from the grave. Not to mention the whimsical will of Portia's papa, Hamlet and Orestes furnish conspicuous examples of paternal autocracy—pleasant, personable youngsters both, whose lives were ruined by the demands of dead fathers.

The real trouble with the ownership theory is that any ownership prevents intimacy. The business of being born entails so much after awkwardness that saddling the parent-child relationship with property rights in addition is more than companionship can survive. So long as birth continues to be the sole price of admission to this universe, not all the panaceas for moderating the penalties of propagation are so promising as simple forgetting. What vistas of joyous intercourse are instantly opened by the mere suggestion of ceasing to reform our parents and ceasing to bring up our children! Any other suggestions for ameliorating the parental relation are fallacious because, little as they are aware of it, both parents and children are infected by the traditional property principle. Nothing on earth is so burdened with obligation as the owning of anything, and yet solving parental troubles by eugenics implies a sense of responsibility that blackens the future with joylessness. Eugenics makes such a bugbear of a baby that it is impossible ever afterward to be friends with a person who once loomed so portentous in prospect. The roseate slogan "fewer and better babies" is fallacious; the fact is, the fewer babies people have, the more they worry about them. Perhaps our grandparents, who had no slogan, but whose theory and practice were more and merrier babies, got better results. The theory of fewer and better babies runs the risk of perpetuating the worst evils of ownership, for the fewer children you have, the more you will dominate them, thus making them boresome replicas of yourself; but if you have a dozen the chances are that some of them, at least, will have opportunity to do their own growing and develop into men and women whom any parent might find entertaining.

As the chief peril of democracy is mediocrity, so the chief peril of parenthood is boredom, and the most promising protection against both evils is letting a child be himself. It is strange that while there is nothing people dread so much as ennui, there is nothing they set about accomplishing so industriously. The best method by which parents may enjoy their children or children enjoy their parents is a genial and irresponsible letting alone.

After all, why should friendship have been so difficult to secure between parents and children? Perhaps because so few people have the bravery needed for comradeship. There is nothing that takes so much sheer intrepidity as letting people alone. Since every mother's son of us has had to suffer from all the awkwardness entailed by once having had to enter life more pitifully helpless than a blind kitten, the battle to attain individuality after such initial ignominy should enlist the utmost assistance of grown-ups rather than their too often active opposition. One agrees here with the contention of Mr. Samuel Butler, earlier mentioned; one dissents from him, however, in that he argues parental indifference for the sake of the child, whereas it is the parent who is benefited, being liberated from all the shackles of ownership and of ennui.

Of course there are children so obdurately dull that not all the letting alone in the world can make them amusing, but still parents who courageously refrain from bringing up their children may reasonably expect to produce blessings rather than bores.

RACE RIOTS IN CHICAGO

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE FROM CHICAGO BY CHARLES W. HOLMAN

In last week's Outlook a special correspondent described the race riots of Washington, and here another correspondent describes the race riots of Chicago.

After reading the record of these two riots, particularly of the bloody affair in Chicago, it will be a bold Northerner who ventures to assume a "holier than thou" attitude towards the South.

The lessons to be drawn from these tragedies are easier to state than to apply. These lessons may be put in a few words.

One: It is the duty of the Government—city, State, and National—to prevent private war and punish the ringleaders of such riots as took place in Washington and Chicago without regard to race.

Two: We need a clearer understanding of the fundamental rights of citizenship. Chief among these is the right of the Negro equally with the white man to have his person, property, and family protected from every form of lawless violence. It must be clearly understood that this fundamental right of citizenship does not include a right to demand social fellowship. The right of choosing our own associates and of refusing companionship to those with whom we do not choose to foregather is as fundamentally a part of our democracy as the guarantee of personal protection.—THE EDITORS.

CHICAGO has just finished her first week of rioting between whites and Negroes. Already thirty-three people have lost their lives and more than three hundred have been injured. The death toll was slightly greater among the blacks, on Tuesday there being fifteen of them dead as against eleven whites. During this wild week mobs of whites pursued and beat and killed Negroes. Other mobs of Negroes pursued and beat and killed whites. From the upper windows of tenements, when darkness came, snipers picked off pedestrians or fired into squads of police and soldiers sent to bring order to the Black Belt. Armed bands in motor trucks dashed wildly up and down the streets, firing into houses. It required the combined efforts of three thousand regular policemen and six thousand State militia to bring the people back to the verge of common sense and establish a condition even remotely resembling order.

Even then, if rain had not come, it is doubtful if the armed forces could have stemmed the emotional tide that was inflaming Chicago's citizens. The week ended with a wholesale attempt to fire the city, more than one hundred dwellings being burned and three thousand people rendered homeless.

Complications, such as refusal of the icemen's union and the milk-drivers' union to deliver their commodities into the Black Belt and fear of delivery-men moving groceries that they would be assaulted and robbed, quickly reduced the Negro population to the verge of starvation and produced a ghastly condition in respect to infant feeding.

It became necessary to establish a dead line around the Black Belt, where 125,000 Negroes live, and prohibit movements in and out of either race, except under guard. Even then patrolling was unable to prevent mob action from breaking out, and at times the Loop, Chicago's main business district, was the scene of actions that disgraced the community. A mob of five hundred white men stormed the Palmer House, the oldest first-class hotel in the city, where Negroes have been employed for generations; Negroes going about their work were beaten and killed, and it finally became necessary for the owners of buildings either to discontinue elevator service or arrange for the quartering of their attendants under guard in the Loop.

The trouble broke out, as all such troubles do, with an incident of minor importance. It began at the Twenty-sixth Street bathing beach which until two years ago was patronized almost entirely by white people. With the advent of a great Negro population, brought in by the packers and other large producers, the Negro, in seeking recreation, began to flock to some of the South Side swimming places. At this particular beach there is a rope which extends into the water for some distance, and by common consent the whites bathed on one side of the rope while the Negroes bathed on the other. Yet it was only an agreement made effective by the fact that it might become unhealthy for a Negro to wander across the line.

On Sunday afternoon, July 27, a Negro boy swam beyond the line and climbed upon a raft from which the whites were accustomed to dive. A white man threw a stone which knocked the Negro off the raft, and he drowned. It is said that a policeman in the neighborhood of the scene failed to do his duty and make an immediate arrest of the white man. The occurrence made a profound impression upon the blacks, who went away to their own neighborhoods and a few hours later began retaliating by attacking individual whites. The situation quickly took on the aspect of armed mobs fighting each other in the open streets, and soon got beyond police control.

On Monday rioting reached its height, and before noon twenty-four known dead had been taken to the morgue. On Tuesday a mob of four thousand Negroes at Fifty-first and Federal Streets attacked small groups or individuals until dispersed. That same day the bodies of four Negroes were taken from "Bubbly Creek," the refuse canal of the stockyards, made famous by Upton Sinclair in his novel "The Jungle."

In their rioting neither whites nor blacks discriminated between women and men or youth and age. To each any person of the opposite color was hateful and must die.

The confusion of the city as a whole was heightened by a strike of surface and elevated street car employees which paralyzed traffic, not a single car being in operation from midnight Sunday until the early hours of the following Saturday. During this time the people adopted any method of conveyance possible, and many of them got into trouble by being forced to walk through the districts where rioting was in progress.

The trouble in Chicago in no way resembled outbreaks which have taken place in other cities, such as those in Washington and St. Louis. The Chicago situation arose primarily out of the housing situation and racial antipathy. There was no question of the Negroes taking white men's jobs, as the Negroes were brought up to Chicago to fill positions in which there was a great scarcity of available labor. The packers were primarily responsible for importing them, and it became necessary for the Negroes to live within walking or short traveling distance of their work. Accordingly, they filled up the South Side between Forty-third Street and Seventeenth Street, taking over almost entirely the section formerly occupied by Chicago's notorious "red light" district. The high wages which they received produced an immediate reaction upon them and made them ambitious to improve their standards of living. Accordingly, they began to spread out into the more select residential districts and produced consternation among the white people.

Troubled relations were first noticed two years ago, when the Negroes began to compose an important part of the street car and elevated railway traffic. It was noticed that they strung themselves through the trains or cars in such a way that it appeared to the white people as if they did it on purpose to force the whites to sit down beside them. This was the cause of much resentment, and it became apparent that trouble was not far distant. It is also said that many apartments were rented to Negroes by whites for "spite reasons."

It has been remarked time and again that certain classes of white people have not hesitated to grant the Negroes absolute social equality. In the Negro section white girls walked with Negro men and white men paraded the streets with Negro women. They even intermarried. There were a few notorious dance-halls operated by Negroes to which white men and women came and where mixed dancing was the rule. Also, for the first time in the Negroes' lives, they were catered to in a political way, and they became a powerful element in municipal politics. They elected to the City Council two of their own race.

This treatment gave the Negro population of Chicago an extraordinary opinion of its own importance and led it to claim more than the Northern people were willing to give.

Since the rioting, Negroes have been fleeing the city. Many have bought tickets for their old homes in the South; others have gone to Wisconsin and near-by cities to wait until the trouble blows over. Real estate dealers and rental agents have also reported that hundreds of cancellations by Negroes in select residential districts have been made, and that the blacks are recongregating within the Black Belt. Refusal of packing-house white operatives to work with the colored people has brought about a serious labor situation which Governor Frank O. Lowden and the packers have been trying to solve. Curtailment of packing-house operations, as the result of quarantining of the Negroes in their homes, has had an important bearing on the local market and made it necessary to restrict receipts of live stock at the yards.

Meantime a committee of forty-eight civic organizations, headed by Dr. Graham Taylor, has asked Governor Lowden to appoint a committee to make a comprehensive survey of the situation with a view to proposing a constructive plan for whites and blacks to dwell together in amity.

The problem is far from solved in Chicago, as the question of Negro re-employment is before the people of the city, and the matter of adjusting the dwelling areas and recreational space has not yet been met. A strong faction of whites are now clamoring for the institution of "Jim Crow" cars on the South Side elevated trains and reserved spaces for colored people on the surface lines.

It is a problem which must be solved, and in education lies the remedy. There must come tolerance and recognition on the part of both races that the Negro is entitled to all political and economic rights, but that social recognition is a personal matter.

MAKING OVER OUR ARMY

BY HAROLD T. PULSIFER

TWO things the United States should have learned from the great war:

1. The need of unifying our military service.

2. The need of basing that unification upon the broad foundation of universal military training.

We fought the Revolution largely with raw militia backed by a comparatively few long-term "Continental" and assisted by professional troops from France. We fought the War of 1812 with raw militia, regulars, and volunteers, and the military history of much of that war is not pleasant reading. We fought the Mexican War with regulars and a goodly number of volunteers, handicapped, however, by a characteristically American short-term enlistment law which cost the Nation, according to Upton, some six thousand lives. We fought the war between the States with regulars and a vast army of volunteers and drafted men who learned the business of soldiering at untold cost upon the bloody field of battle. We fought the Spanish War with regulars and volunteers hastily raised and badly cared for. We fought the last round of the great war with regulars, a Federalized National Guard, and a multitude of selected men. These men (to our good fortune, but not our credit) received their training in modern warfare at the expense of thousands of lives and billions of treasure to those of our allies who had been holding the German horde since 1914. To those who are familiar with American military history little more than the names of our wars is needed to call to mind a long and painful story of unpreparedness, mistaken policy, and inefficient management.

May there never be another war, but if there is, may we be prepared to enter it with an American Army—an Army which knows no wide distinctions between militiamen and volunteers and professional soldiers, and which is adequately prepared in advance to perform the tasks with which it is confronted. If we ever enter any war with such an Army, it will be for the first time in our history as a Nation. It is the belief of many that the establishment of such an Army will usher in the longest period of righteous peace which the United States has yet enjoyed. As General Wood has so frequently pointed out, the captain of a ship when he puts to sea does not prepare his lifeboats to overcome the power of any particular storm. But if he is a wise captain he does prepare his lifeboats against all storms, which his experience as a seaman has taught him to expect as a contingent possibility of ocean travel.

Of what elements, then, should this unified and National Army be created? At the least it should contain the following:

1. A professional staff trained by practical experience in the handling of large bodies of troops and the technical problems of modern war.

2. A mobile force, constantly under arms, sufficient for police work within the United States, the garrisoning of our dependencies and such mandatories as may be assigned to the United States by the League of Nations, the protection of our harbor fortifications, and the formation of a nucleus of highly trained soldiers for the more technical branches of the service.

3. A large and highly organized First Reserve force of trained officers and men, capable of rapid mobilization in time of emergency.

4. A Second Reserve, organized in territorial units, of privates, non-commissioned officers, and officers, to be used as an immediate support of the First Reserve and as replacement troops in time of war.

"Well," asks the reader, "didn't we have most of this equipment before the present war? We had a professional staff, a mobile Army, the organized National Guard—with only the Second Reserve lacking to complete the picture."

Part of which is true and part of which is very far from the truth. We did not have a unified Army in any sense of the word. Our professional staff and our mobile army existed apart from the life of the Nation. Our National Guard was at its basis a State volunteer organization. The organized Second Reserve was, indeed, non-existent. Military service and the average citizen were strangers of the deepest dye.

"Well," asks the reader again (it is astonishing what convenient questions readers can be made to ask if properly egged on to their duty by a not too bashful author), "how are you going to create professional officers who are not part of an officer class, a professional army which is also a citizen army, and establish an organized reserve out of the remnants of the old National Guard and our untrained citizenry?"

The first step in such a process is the adoption of universal military training as a basis for the development of all the rest of our military establishment. Permit no soldier to enter the mobile army, the Reserve, or to secure any kind of a commission in any branch of the military service, who has not passed through the mill of universal military training. Once having passed through that mill, let every position in the military service be open to the qualified applicant. Working up from such a basis, the Army would be unified, made a part of the vital everyday life of the Nation, and both narrow, unprogressive military cliques and equally disastrous civilian indifference to the welfare of the service and its responsibilities would vanish like dew before a July sun.

This is not a "Be it enacted by the Congress of the United States" kind of article, all ready to turn over to the Legislature for embodiment in the law of the land, but perhaps the broad outline of the plan proposed can be given here with sufficient clearness. Like the soldiers in the proposed Army, let us start at the bottom and work our way up.

We will require, first, that every able-bodied male shall some time between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one receive six months' military training. Within the above age limits permit every potential soldier to choose whether he will serve his time in two camps of three months each in consecutive years or in two consecutive camps in one year. Upon receiving an honorable discharge after six months' service, turn over to this partially trained soldier his uniform and personal equipment and enroll him in the Second Reserve as a private, subject for ten years to an annual medical examination and an annual inspection of his equipment. At the time of his annual inspection he should be paid a sum which would probably not exceed five dollars. During his six months' active service he should of course receive the pay of a private in the Army of the United States. Let us see what further opportunities for service and development might exist for our citizen soldier under such a plan as is here proposed.

With an honorable discharge and a furlough to the Reserve in his pocket, three paths would be open to the more ambitious citizen and to the man desirous of further military duty.

The paths immediately open for the six months' soldier can be briefly enumerated as follows:

1. Enlistment at any time as a private in the mobile army for a term of not less than one year, promotion therein to the grade of sergeant to be made in accordance with ordinary military procedure.

2. Enlistment at any time as a private in the First Reserve for a term of not less than three years, promotion therein to the grade of sergeant to be made in accordance with ordinary military procedure. To stimulate enlistment every soldier in the First Reserve might be given an initial bonus, probably not exceeding one hundred dollars, together with full pay for the actual time spent at drill and during an annual training period of at least two weeks. The First Reserve would correspond in function with the National Guard as it existed before the war. In organization and responsibility, however, it would be entirely Federalized.

3. Further service in the National training camps would be accessible to any six months' soldier upon certain conditions. Upon the recommendation of his company commander, any man would be permitted to serve through one additional training-camp period of three months as an acting corporal, with the full pay of that grade. Upon the satisfactory completion of a total of nine months' training the graduated corporal would be again permitted, upon the recommendation of his company commander, to serve for an additional three months as an acting sergeant. At the end of nine and twelve months, respectively, the soldier would enter the Second Reserve as a corporal or a sergeant, receiving a proportionately larger bonus at the time of the annual inspection.

We have provided so far for the enlisted and non-commissioned personnel of an active mobile army and of a First and Second Reserve. But an officerless army is no army at all. A way must be found for the development of officers for all three branches of the citizen army which at the same time will be efficient and democratic as well as still further serving to unify the structure of the new Army. In the plan as already outlined provision is made for the selection of non-commissioned officers. The logical conclusion of such a plan is the selection of the commissioned personnel, both for the active and the Reserve army, from the non-commissioned personnel.

Let sergeants, who have, of course, already served as corporals and privates, be recommended by their company commanders for the privilege of attending training schools of various kinds for terms of not less than six months. Entrance even to West Point would be made conditional upon the candidate having won a sergeant's stripes in some branch of the service. Let commissions as lieutenants be granted only to soldiers who have fulfilled the requirements of these schools. And just as these schools would be open alike to sergeants of the active army or the First and Second Reserves, the graduates of these schools would in turn be eligible to receive commissions in any branch of the service. The officers of the Reserve and the active army would by this means discover a common basis of experience which would weld the entire Army into a unified instrument for warfare and protection. Moreover, officers developed by such a process would possess an appreciation of the mental attitude of the enlisted man which they could not otherwise gain, nor would there be any cleavage in ideas or ideals between the officers of the active army, as chosen under this system, and the great civilian population of the country. It is probable that some modification of the general rule might be advisable in the case of medical officers and reserve engineers; but aside from these two classes, the plan seems to the writer both feasible and just.

One thing remains which is necessary to the absolute unification of the system proposed. Measures should be taken to facilitate the transfer of both officers and men from the active to the Reserve armies and vice versa. An officer resigning from the active army should automatically become an officer of the Second Reserve, or should be enabled to continue his military duties by part-time service with the First Reserve. Enlisted men should be enabled to pass from the Second Reserve to the First Reserve or to the active army with a minimum of red tape.

In the system as suggested it is supposed that beyond the grade of second lieutenant, promotions would be made on the basis of seniority, plus drastic tests for efficiency. The officers of the new Army (both active and Reserve) should be given every opportunity to attend schools constantly throughout their military career as well as to command bodies of troops commensurate, at the very least, with the commission held. Brigadiers who have never commanded more than a depleted regiment must be unknown in our new Army, and captains and colonels must have more than infrequent opportunity to try themselves out in command of units larger than are usually assigned to their respective ranks. The creation of a Nation-wide training-camp system would certainly give to officers of the active army and also of the Reserve opportunities for self-training and development which have never existed in time of peace within the United States. The testimony of officers who developed the early Plattsburg training camps as to the professional benefit to themselves of the training work to which they were assigned is an earnest of what might be expected from the adoption of a system of universal training.

This present article makes no claim to be an exhaustive and detailed plan for an American military establishment, nor does it make any great claim for originality. It is a plea for the recognition of a general principle, and not a brief for the adoption of any particular plan. Nothing has been attempted but the presentation in the simplest possible form of one possible method for the development of our military man power in accordance with a system in which shall be incorporated the best elements of our present organization, certain features of the Swiss and other systems; and some of the lessons of experience for which our Nation has paid in full upon a thousand bloody battlefields of the past.

WILL HAYS AND THE HUMAN SPIRIT IN POLITICAL LEADERSHIP

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

In 1915 Senator Davenport, during a trip across the continent, wrote for The Outlook an article entitled "The Light Breaking Over Standpat Indiana." Mr. Davenport had come upon the plans, full of inspiring promise, which were then in process of being worked out for the political reconstruction of Indiana. The human personality at the center of the plans was one Will H. Hays, the present highly efficient Republican National Chairman. In 1916 Mr. Hays fulfilled his plans for Indiana in a campaign which amounted to a political revolution in the State. In 1917 he was made Republican National Chairman as the result of extraordinary merit.—THE EDITORS.

WILL HAYS is one of the men you simply cannot write about unsympathetically, and I do not know that I can write about him impartially. He is such a lovable personality. Every one who comes in contact with him seems to be his friend. If this is so, it is largely because he has led both politically and humanly an unusually unselfish life. Certainly no one in the political history of his own State has ever been able to bring to his aid more supporters and whole-hearted lieutenants than this slight-statured genuine gentleman from Indiana. Unselfishness and a disposition generously to proffer credit where credit to others is due are largely responsible for the political success which has made him famous.

But his cordial nature does not prevent him from being canny and practical. He has come up through the school of experience. Law and politics have from the beginning been with him indefatigably intermingled. He was admitted to the bar on the day he was twenty-one years of age, having practiced previously with the consent of the Court. He was elected Republican precinct committeeman before he was twenty-one, and from 1904 to 1908 was chairman of the Republican committee of his county and a member of the Indiana Republican Advisory Committee.

During the campaign of 1908 he was chairman of the Speakers' Bureau of the State Committee. This was the Taft campaign, and Hays corralled so efficiently all of the party's leading orators for "time" in Indiana during the closing month that when October came the National leaders found, to their consternation, that Indiana had effected a corner on all Republican oratorical talent of National caliber. The result was that men of great political prominence were under the necessity of making pilgrimages to Indianapolis to plead with young Hays to let go some of his corralled orators in the interest of the salvation of the elect in other commonwealths.

Early in 1914 he was chosen Chairman of the Republican State Central Committee of Indiana, at a time when the fortunes of his party were at an exceedingly low ebb. In 1912 the Republicans had finished a very poor third in the commonwealth of Indiana. In 1914 Hays pulled them through almost to victory. In 1916 he was re-elected State Chairman, and conducted the most brilliant campaign in the country. Indiana at that time was Democratic from top to bottom; the local government, the State Capitol, both houses of Congress, were manned by Democrats under the notorious Taggart régime. And Taggart himself was United States Senator. The Republicans failed in the Nation, but there was never any doubt about Indiana. The organized prearrangement of Republican victory there produced a result as certain as the precession of the equinoxes. The political situation in Indiana was exactly reversed by the election. Everything became Republican from top to bottom—State ticket, United States Senators, nine out of thirteen Congressmen, all of whom had been Democratic.

In June, 1896, young Hays was a mere lad. As a reward for excellent preliminary academic studies which he had just completed, Hays's father took him to the Republican National Convention at St. Louis to see McKinley nominated for the Presidency. The boy in short trousers manifested marked interest in the proceedings of the Convention. A friend of Hays told me the other day that not long ago, when cleaning out an old desk in the law office of himself and his now lamented father, at the home in Sullivan, Indiana, Hays found an envelope filled with clippings from St. Louis papers describing the incidents of the McKinley Convention. Across the envelope in his father's handwriting was this inscription: "To Master Willie Hays, with the hope that he will always take a citizen's interest in politics." Twenty-two years after the inscription was written, in the same hotel in St. Louis where he and his father had watched the maneuvers surrounding the proceedings of the McKinley Convention, Will Hays, by unanimous vote of the Republican National Committee, was selected as the undisputed National organizer and mentor and guide of his party.

He is generally regarded as the best practical leader of organization that the Republican party has ever had. I do not think any party ever had a better one in this country. Or ever needed one more. When the ruling Republican dynasty in 1910 and 1912 trampled under foot the sensible idealists, the men with feet on the ground but faces to the future, the Republican party lost the human touch. This blind dynasty could see in the mighty Dolliver only a cantankerous "insurgent," in Roosevelt only a lover of self and power. And the masses of Americans, especially of young Americans, who had truer vision and knew better, would have none of such leadership.

The Old Guard of Republicanism entirely failed to understand and conciliate the younger generation of America, especially failed to understand and conciliate the young and daring spirit of the West.

Even the North American Indians had junior councils of young men, whose new and ingenious ideas were eagerly listened to and deliberated upon by the councils of the old men of the tribes. But the Old Guard in the 1910-12 days checked even this sound aboriginal instinct, and affronted again and again the younger generation of Republicanism and the great younger section of America bounded by the Pacific and the Mississippi.

Hays is bringing Republicanism slowly back into touch with common men. He is even mellowing measurably many Old Guardsmen. He has such extraordinary tact that he can do it without using a club. But the task of unifying and revivifying Republicanism has been no easy one. And it remains to be seen if the crest of difficulty is yet passed.

WILL H. HAYS

Chairman of the Republican National Committee

But the delicate touch of Hays's master hand has been felt in many a complicated State tangle—in California, in Michigan, in Wisconsin, and in many another. Always quiet, never offending, never dominating, but always winning.

And in Washington what a depressing maze to travel through! But Gillett is Speaker, and that is something. And the Republicans will ratify, most of them with and perhaps some of them without reservation! But there will be no hopeless recalcitrancy, no abysmal asininity! No doubt Hays deserves some credit for that. And Root some also.

Hays's success in welding the broken fragments of his party into unity and fighting strength has been remarkable, and the secret of it is that neither faction has doubted his utter sincerity. To the liberals Hays seems a liberal. The best the Old Guard had to offer after the revolution of 1912 was "a light in the window for thee, brother," a pat on the shoulder, and kind words pending the election returns; at least no harsh words. But the Old Guardsmen never understood what 1912 was all about, anyway. Hays understands. And so he keeps still about it, except to say: "Assimilation, and not elimination, is the policy of the Republican party, and there are no yesterdays in Republican politics. We have work to do for the good of the country, and it takes us all to do it. And I insist that all who are engaged in this work are entitled to the same consideration—the man who has not always voted with us and the man who has always voted with us because he may not have had any reason for doing otherwise."

To the conservative Hays seems a conservative. And I think he has both qualities—liberal and conservative—living and working in him side by side. He is eager to step forward, but not too fast. A favorite quotation of his is a statement which former President Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, once made in a lawsuit that was being tried in Hays's home town of Sullivan: "The length of the step is not so important as the direction in which it is taken." But when you put him to the test, in the inner chamber with party associates, in determining plans or expressions of party policy, Hays's only question is, "Is it right?" If after full discussion the answer is, "Yes," then momentary expediency never troubles Hays. He has never hesitated to take advanced ground if the position squared with what was determined to be right. He has been outspoken in word and indefatigable in deed for the effective prosecution of the war. And now that the war is over he is as eager for his party not only to look forward, but to step forward. He is no reactionary. He does not intend to wait for the torch of the Bolshevik to illumine darkly for him the pathway of human progress. He is sound about the safeguarding of production and the wise protection of property right and of men of initiative and management in America; but he has declared also for broader social legislation, for the welfare of labor and the representation of labor in the councils of the Nation.

All men seem to look alike to Hays. From the beginning of his career he has been able to approach greatness with the same ease with which he is able to approach the less highly circumstanced. In a conversation with a friend of the Republican National Chairman, Hays's father once said that he himself had been handicapped in his career by an abashment that at times was embarrassing. "I early determined, if possible," said the elder Mr. Hays, "so to train my boys that they would not be handicapped in this respect, as I have been." Hays's friends are of the opinion that his father, in his case at least, succeeded admirably. And without sacrificing genuine modesty either.

Hays is a graduate of Wabash College, a Mason, a Knight of Pythias, an Elk, and a Presbyterian. He is still under forty, with a working quality and an enthusiasm that are contagious and boundless, although where physically these qualities have such deep rootage no man knoweth. In his native State they say that it is not recorded that he has made a speech since entering public life without using somewhere in his discourse these words: "Things do not happen, they are brought about." He first attracted attention in Indiana when he acquired the reputation of being the only man in the State who could dictate to two stenographers and talk over two telephones at the same time. His achievements to date indicate that he holds the belief that nothing is impossible; that energy, enthusiasm, intelligence, and resourcefulness are capable of moving mountains.

He has the unique and enviable and difficult distinction of being able to be at once thoroughly loyal both to a political party and to his country. He is another illustration of the profound truth that human nature is the core of politics; that true courtesy and a practical sense of right are political assets of great importance; and, above all, that even in politics it is gentleness which maketh great.

THE NEW NATION OF ASIA<sup>1</sup>

SIBERIA'S ASPIRATIONS FOR INDEPENDENCE—KOLCHAK AND THE OMSK GOVERNMENT—THE PEOPLE AND POSSIBILITIES OF THE NEW NATION

BY CHARLES W. HOLMAN

WHY SIBERIA WAS AN EASY VICTIM TO THE BOLSHEVIKI

THERE may be some who cannot understand how, when the majority of Russian people in Siberia did not desire Bolshevism, it was possible for the Red Guard to take the country without any notable resistance. They will also marvel that the Lenine forces were also swept back with almost as much ease, while the body of the people did not participate in the struggle one way or another. It is just as inexplicable to understand why large numbers of our people took no fighting interest in our Revolutionary War against England and at all times a certain group traded both with the enemy and the American forces. When we ask why it is that the Russians in Siberia did not to a man rise up and form a voluntary army, we must remember that when the colonies had nearly three million population the largest army General Washington was ever able to muster was less than twenty thousand men.

The Siberian position is perhaps easier to explain. The country was sparsely settled, and fully eighty per cent of its settlers consisted of an unlettered farming population. There were large numbers of poorly paid, unskilled workmen in towns and cities, and thousands of homeless soldiers doing nothing at all. German, Austrian, and Magyar war prisoners were numerous, poorly guarded, mixing with the people, imbibing and imbuing radical doctrines, ready to join any insurrectionary movement that would tear down their ancient enemy Russia.

With the principal towns and cities along the railway, we can see how easy it was for the Red Guard to bring in arms, machine guns, and munitions and take possession of them, thus dominating the country.

A large percentage of the working classes in the cities rallied to the cause of the extremists and a certain percentage of political and criminal prisoners formed nuclei within the country. We also know that many Russian Jews, long persecuted by the Russian upper classes, joined in the movement either from personal motives of revenge or in pursuit of fanatical theories for reconstructing Russia in harmony with Semitic dreams. Among them were a number of returned Jews who had lived in America and become impregnated with I. W. W. philosophy. Then, lastly, we must admit into the explanation the peculiar Russian temperament—a temperament partly racial, partly the result of environmental conditions.

Nine-tenths of the Russian people were just up from virtual slavery; they had been freed in the same year that the Negroes of America were liberated. But liberation did not mean that they received new characters, or that the upper classes changed their attitude toward them, or that democracy would spring forth full-fledged among them. It did mean that they were no longer attached to the soil to be sold as chattels with it; but they were still attached to the soil by virtue of their occupation. They still received directions from overhead, and they still had the police among them to suppress free speech, to prevent their forming popular organizations, and to keep them intellectually submerged. The Russians in Siberia reflected some of this, naturally; for peoples do not change all their attitudes when they emigrate. But they possessed it in lesser degree than their brethren of European Russia.

Repression from above had its effect on the Russian character. We must also consider the climatic effects of too much darkness for wholesome thinking, too much cold for fresh-air types of living, too little recreation for the body, too much of house living, conversation, solitude, and brooding, and too little opportunity for action. The environment produced in the "intelligentsia" an intensely subjective type of mind capable of high imaginative flights but with a paralyzed will. In the lower classes it produced merely indifference and much drinking of vodka.

Then the Revolution of 1917 threw the Czar's dominions into a popular Government. We all know what happened in Russia; but few know what happened in Siberia. The same wind that blew the Imperial Government away swept over Siberia to produce principally uneasiness and fear. With but few exceptions, every Russian in the Asiatic domain was glad—glad beyond expression; and everybody, finding himself now free to talk, did nothing else but that for a while. Nobody knew what to do, and very few people did anything. The peasants and the workmen for a time interpreted this freedom as an invitation not to work.

All recognized the right of the Kerensky Government to rule; for somebody had to rule, according to the way the Russian had been brought up to view life. Then matters adjusted themselves somewhat, and Siberia went forward in a most promising way, taking advantage of certain opportunities, like that given in the Kerensky co-operative law, to strengthen local institutions. Then the turn of time threw the Provisional Government into the discard and raised Lenine and Trotsky on high.

The first reaction of the common people in Siberia, as nearly as I could get it, was to regard Lenine and Trotsky as twin Moses who could strike the rock of society and produce drink, or wave their staffs and manna would grow. Of course such things don't happen; but tall promises had been extended, and there were many who believed in the promises with all their hearts.

Ardent ones joined the Bolsheviki, indifferent ones went out and tilled their fields, and the comfortable ones barred their doors and buried their valuables. Only a few bucked up to resist; they were principally officers who had served their country against the Germans and felt that their lives were worth giving in an effort to save their country from the acts of ignorance.

The Bolsheviki pressed in and took Siberia in a very short time. While in power the heralded acts of violence and the usual acts of pathetic ignorance took place. How much can be attributed to the Bolsheviki and how much to the hoodlums who joined them will probably never be known. This much is certain, that, before they undertook to operate the machinery of wealth production they had seized, the Bolshevik leaders considered it necessary as the first step in their programme to "divide up" all the wealth in sight and live upon it as long as the dividing was good. They looted the state treasury, conscripted deposits, requisitioned stocks from merchants, demanded provisions of peasants, and placed their own leaders in all the salaried offices of the Government.

As one reviews the drama enacted in Siberia, it becomes apparent that the Revolution did not affect that country as it did Russia, for the institutions subject to change were not at all similar. The acts described were about the worst, aside from certain acts of extreme personal violence and the depredations of footpads, due to the letting loose of criminals from jails and the release of restraint surrounding a certain type that always hovers on the borderland of criminality.

They turned over to the workers the few productive industrial plants, but could not turn over to the peasants the land, because the peasants already had their land for life, and in Siberia the peasants consider that lifetime occupancy without having to pay for it is much better than ownership. Bolshevism over there meant simply this: that the Red Guard took possession of the offices and the good things of life; terrorized the other classes into submission; kept them in submission by refusing the right of franchise; and repeated their acts until commercial ruin fell upon the country and the wheels of industry stopped.

<sup>1</sup>See Mr. Holman's first article on Siberia in The Outlook for August 6.—THE EDITORS.

During this epoch the Bolsheviks in Siberia did not pay much attention to the rights of the Bolsheviks in Russia. They did not hesitate to rob the railways of shipments bound for Moscow. They refused to let persons passing out of Siberia, where there was a surplus of food, carry enough food with them to sustain them on their journeys into Russia. They armed the war prisoners who would join their colors, employed Chinese mercenaries to keep their forces strong, and were making themselves thoroughly obnoxious when the Czechoslovak army and the assisting White Guard Russian forces swept down from Vladivostok, fell upon them, and cleared them out of the cities and towns. In every city there were additions to the White Guards, and great rejoicing that the liberators brought with them the news that the people could once more form and conduct their own local governments.

READJUSTMENT FOLLOWING BOLSHEVISM

In most of the recaptured cities the Czechs left small garrisons to serve as a moral stimulus to the people. But the people themselves needed very little stimulus to get busy and try to readjust themselves and their institutions to a new period of living in which good government and work were to be their ideals. How small a force to maintain order was needed may be seen in the case of Krasnoyarsk, which I visited in October and November of 1918. This city of about sixty-three thousand inhabitants is located in what was thought to be a danger spot of Bolshevism. Yet a garrison of twelve Czechoslovaks, approximately fifty English soldiers, and a Russian garrison of less than three hundred Cossacks were sufficient to maintain order. The city was going full blast as to motion pictures, although almost every store was shut because there was nothing to sell. The stores that opened closed early, and about the only business being done was by little sausage shops, drug stores, and the municipal and co-operative stores. Tailors, however, were more than three weeks behind in their orders—remaking old clothes in most cases.

The municipal government had undertaken to bring in foodstuffs and was experiencing great difficulty on account of the irregular deliveries of the railway and the handicaps brought about by the currency situation. The ruble had declined to one-fifth its former purchasing power and nobody knew whether the old money would ever be worth anything, because about seventy billion rubles of Siberian paper money had been put into circulation in European Russia. Prices of commodities had risen to painful heights,<sup>1</sup> and such commodities as could be had were few indeed. I paid $1.70 per pound for sugar and $2 per pound for tea in that city. Bread grains had risen from 12 cents per pood (36 pounds) to 97.5 cents plus freight and other charges at wholesale. Rubber overshoes sold for $12 per pair new and $3.50 per pair second hand. Sleigh and carriage drivers asked from 50 cents to $1.50 for short-distance drives, but in Omsk they were asking as high as $2 to take one a two-mile drive, while meals in hotels averaged from $2 to $3 if one felt satisfactorily fed. Such prices represented an unprecedented advance in the cost of living in a country where food had always been cheap.

The peasants had long since gotten over their love of "dividing up" on the Bolshevik plan, or on any plan, for that matter, and were refusing to sell freely of their stocks which were in abundance in that particular province. They preferred to make a moonshine type of vodka which would bring to them six or seven times the price that their wheat or rye would net when sold for foodstuffs. They had, it was said, more paper money than they knew what to do with, and would no longer part with grain unless they were assured at least a part payment in kind. The peasants desired more agricultural implements, stoves, wagons, harness, machinery of many types, woolen materials, shot and powder for hunting. None of these things could the people in Krasnoyarsk give to them for local supplies. So the municipality was forced to send into Altai Province, where peasants were more willing to sell from their larger stores.

Such troubles the Russians met with a stoicism and a certain degree of optimism. In the same way they viewed their dilapidated railway, their wrecked bank accounts, and many another predicament of which the stranger would not hear. They set about rebuilding with strong hearts that won the sympathy and admiration of those who were sent among them to study or to help in their work of reconstruction.

HOW KOLCHAK BECAME DICTATOR

Matters made progress during the summer and fall. Meantime various factions were claiming leadership and governmental authority. For a time there was much confusion of authority and jealousy of cliques. The country was too big and too unacquainted with itself to hold a popular election; the situation was too critical to trust to a ballot when eighty per cent of the people could not have read and would not have known how to mark one. But it was not too big for them to select delegates to represent them. And then there was a certain tacit acceptance of various persons known to be public-spirited and men of capacity—just as in America certain public men have always been molders of public opinion even to the time of their death. So, with a speed that was notable and a reversal of policies that was humorous, just as the early efforts of the factions in the State of Oklahoma had in them elements of humor, governments arose and governments fell; leaders arose and leaders were rejected.

Finally the situation sifted down to two rival factions in the west. One faction, calling itself the All Siberian Government, consisted of a committee of five. Annexed to that committee was a more or less representative parliamentary body called the Siberian Duma. This Duma, or Parliament, met at Tomsk and passed many resolutions, and its members drew some salary. Also in Omsk there was a group calling themselves the All Russian Government. The latter group did some fine-fingered work and succeeded in getting the All Siberian Government to cede over its rights and powers. It also persuaded the Duma to go out of existence. It then called Admiral Kolchak to the job of "Governor-in-Chief of Russia and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy."

KOLCHAK'S INTERESTING CAREER

At this moment Admiral Aleksel Vasilietch Kolchak is the central figure around whom the Siberians build their hopes of establishing a stable government. He is forty-seven years of age, a man of great personal magnetism, a brilliant talker, and a convincing orator. After the Russo-Japanese War Kolchak, with the rank of a captain, built himself into a prominent position in the public eye by work accomplished at the headquarters of the Naval Ministry. His bravery and excellent use of his head in outwitting the Germans both in Baltic and Black Sea operations earned for him a name in naval history. He has traveled extensively and knows the United States and its institutions very well. He is said to be a great admirer of American methods; certainly his policy in connection with the railway has shown him to be a man capable of utilizing many agencies to achieve the re-establishment of a government in Russian territory.

KOLCHAK'S GOVERNMENTAL POLICY

As will be seen by the title conferred upon its chief, the Kolchak Government of Omsk has been aspiring to solve the entire Russian problem. Perhaps it will be able to do so, but it seems hardly probable that the Admiral can gather, from among fifteen million people who are reluctant to respond to military service but welcome all manner of peaceful trade development, an army of sufficient magnitude to wipe out Bolshevism in Russia, where there are one hundred and sixty million people under the shadow of Lenine.

It does seem reasonable that the Admiral may succeed in taking and holding all of the mineral territory in the Ural Mountains, and thus insure to the Siberian side the immense platinum and gold and precious stone wealth that those mountains contain. It does also seem probable that the Kolchak Government, by continuing its present policy of encouraging trade development and farm production, not touching the personal liberty question very strongly, will grow in strength, win the confidence of the <sup>1</sup> Prices in general rose 700 to 1,000 per cent on the par value of the ruble; but the ruble fell to one-fifth its pre-war value. Metallic money had long since disappeared from circulation.

Allies, and succeed eventually in putting Siberia, at least temporarily, into the family of autonomous nations.

One of Kolchak's first acts was to abolish food regulations and Government monopolies of food. He has also authorized the re-establishment of the vodka industry by the Government as a means of reducing the waste now general in country districts from illicit distilling, and because it is thought that the sale of good vodka at reasonable prices to the people will cause them to buy it instead of buying from the peasants. This will automatically do away with illicit distilling except for home use.

The policy of the Kolchak Government is to encourage the re-establishment of all forms of private trade and to aid the development of the nation's resources. Its success in doing some of these things, particularly in securing aid from the French and English in military preparations and from the Americans in guard duty and railway operation, has promoted a general confidence in that Government.

Up to the present Kolchak's policy in regard to personal liberty has been lenient, except as to armed disturbers of the peace and a few deportations of political rivals, such as Akseptiev and his three confrères in the All Siberian Government, who were arrested four days after the group appointed the Admiral Dictator.

The body of the Russians in Siberia are beginning to experience the fruits of a few months' peace and a fairly strong, liberal Government. They do not want to go back to the way of managing things under Bolshevism; neither do they care for a resumption of monarchical power. Kolchak will succeed in knitting together his countrymen in Asia if he remembers and caters to the psychology of the situation.

AMERICAN OPERATION OF SIBERIAN RAILWAYS

Kolchak's Minister of Transportation, Mr. Ostrouff, has served his country well in putting through Russian consent and approval for Allied operation of the railway. By the terms of the agreement, Minister Ostrouff heads the commission which decides general policy matters; but the active management of the road has been given to John F. Stevens, a celebrated American railway engineer, who headed the American Railway Mission to Russia two years ago, and has remained in Manchuria and eastern Siberia since then as the director of a corps of American railway experts instructing the Russians of the Chinese Eastern Railroad.

Assisting Mr. Stevens is Colonel George H. Emerson, who until he went to the Orient was the active manager of the Great Northern Railway system. These experts will serve as the nucleus of a great organization that will be necessary in putting the Trans-Siberian line on a sound footing. They face no easy task; the rolling stock is in bad condition, more than fifty per cent of the engines are disabled, and the roadbed needs considerable work done. Discipline also will vex them; for the spirit of the men has been killed somewhat by the inability of the Siberian Government to meet the payroll and the general disorder that has prevailed.

The present arrangement will give precedence, of course, to the movement of military supplies needed by the Omsk Government, but transportation facilities will improve very rapidly, and all look forward to a freer movement into the country of requirements and greater movement outward of raw materials. Mr. Stevens's first act preliminary to taking over the road was to send a train-load of needed foodstuffs into eastern Siberia for free distribution to the needy loyal workers on the line.

OUR BIG BROTHER POLICY IN SIBERIA

In other ways America has put into operation the Big Brother policy of friendly assistance. We have set up in Vladivostok a Siberian branch of the War Trade Board. This Board was badly needed, both as a relief agency and as a stabilizer of trade between America and the Russians in Siberia. It has been gathering considerable information about the reliability of Siberian trading concerns, and it acts as a friendly agent between American and Russian trading interests. Lately deals in commodities involving over $20,000,000 have been consummated with Siberian co-operative societies and sanctioned by our Government officials.

The Red Cross has done a splendid work in connection with relief, and has extended its functions to include providing municipal governments with needed hospital supplies and medicines. Its head in Siberia, Dr. R. B. Jeusles, of Tokyo, is now in this country asking for greatly enlarged appropriations to expand the work being done in territory recaptured from the Bolsheviks. Agents of the Y. M. C. A. have carried out plans for relieving refugees, distributing money and goods among them. The Committee on Public Information has had representatives who distributed telegraphic news of the outside world to the Siberian papers and supplied lecturers and literature in Russian on American institutions.

Our consular officials, especially stationed or assigned to traveling positions there, have been in close touch with the local and general officials and many times have been approached for advice; their policy has always been one of refraining from interfering with internal matters, but of giving information whenever requested.

The United States Army is guarding the railway line to preserve the only avenue of relief. Our troops in Siberia are carrying out a policy of non-interference with internal questions; but their presence serves to give the Russians a feeling of confidence in the stability of civil life and encourages them to go about building up a law-abiding commonwealth in the new country. In time all Allied assistance can be abandoned; but until then occupation is desired by the thinking Russians.

BUILDING FOR A GREATER FUTURE

During the war Siberian methods of doing business changed radically with the growth of municipal supply stores and the rapid development of the co-operative movement, whose stores sprang up as the stores of private merchants went out of business. Each city now operates several food stores, and almost every village has its co-operative society. The co-operatives have availed themselves of an opportunity and spread with great rapidity, forming into provincial federations which deal through central national organizations. In Siberia there are three great strings of co-operatives, each having a distinct field, but all overlapping somewhat with the others. The Union of Siberian Co-operative Unions is typically a consumers' organization. It has headquarters in Novonikolaievsk and claims to be the central purchasing agency for 2,381,000 members and about 1,100,000 additional patrons. This organization is modeled after the co-operative societies of England, and the Novonikolaievsk office is worked on a plan very similar to that by which the Co-operative Wholesale Society of Great Britain is conducted. It now buys in wholesale quantities for its membership and acts as national sales agent for the sale of certain products.

Likewise the Association on Shares of the Siberian Co-operative Credit Societies, which also has headquarters in Novonikolaievsk, has built up a tremendous business in purchasing agricultural requirements for its membership and in furnishing short-time credit. The third member of the string is the Union of Siberian Creamery Artels, mentioned last week; the artels embrace a half million farm families.

To combat the growth of the co-operatives, a number of trade associations have formed, and in some cases merchants plan to establish their own co-operative wholesales in order to get the benefit of large purchasing power.

Both private and co-operative organizations have got in touch with the American War Trade Board at Vladivostok and will welcome the establishment of business relations with American concerns.

There is something inspiring in the spectacle of a people joining hands to lift themselves from ruin and desolation into a newer, finer civilization. The fight to come back and come up brings out the essential qualities of manhood and womanhood in a people. It was so in the rebuilding of a new South from the ruins of the old South; it will be so in France and Belgium and in far-away Siberia, where the white torch of civilization is burning bright.

Now their cities show ruin and stagnation and the people wear threadbare garments. But their hearts are strong and their hopes high. They know that relief is soon to come. What does it matter to them if bread is high and sugar scarce and tea hard to secure? Their forebears faced hardships and they also have known what it was to suffer worse things. Every day brings them news on the brighter side, and their needs will soon be met.

So they are preparing for the battle with the future.

THE REUNION OF RUMANIANS

AN AUTHORIZED INTERVIEW WITH M. BRATIANO, RUMANIAN PREMIER AND FIRST DELEGATE TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE, AND M. VAÏDA, TRANSYLVANIAN MINISTER IN THE RUMANIAN GOVERNMENT AND ONE OF THE DELEGATES TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE, BY GREGORY MASON, STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

ALTHOUGH Germany was a much more formidable foe than Austria-Hungary, the task of making peace with the latter country is in some ways more difficult than arranging a settlement with Germany. The disruption of the vast Austro-Hungarian Empire has meant the appearance of a number of heretofore inconspicuous national groups clamoring for independence or other privileges before the Peace Conference. Of all the Allied nations, none perhaps is more affected by this centrifugal movement from old Austria-Hungary than Rumania. Rumania comes before the Peace Conference not only on behalf of the inhabitants of Rumania, but also in the interests of the populations of Moldavia, ravished by Austria one hundred and fifty years ago, and renamed Bukowina; of the region along the Danube west of Rumania and north of Serbia, called the Banat; and of Transylvania and of the regions of Maramouresh and of Crishana. The Rumanian delegates are also speaking for Bessarabia, taken from Rumania by Russia in 1878.

Of all these newly found children Rumania is perhaps most interested in the Transylvanians, by virtue of her close racial and historical connection with them. It was not surprising, therefore, when I went the other day to the headquarters of the Rumanian Peace Delegation at 77 Avenue des Champs Élysées, Paris, to find the Minister from Transylvania, M. Vaïda, by the side of the Chief of the Rumanian Mission and Premier of Rumania, M. Bratiano, who had given me an appointment for an interview. Madame Bratiano was there, and also M. Nicolas Misu, Rumanian Minister to London and at present a member of the Rumanian Peace Delegation. M. Bratiano is a big dark man with the polished air of a man whose life has been spent in diplomatic circles. Both Madame Bratiano and M. Vaïda are above medium size. Neither of them are notably large, however, and M. Misu is a bit smaller than M. Vaïda. Yet the whole four exhaled an atmosphere of bigness. Bigness and self-reliance. Polished bigness and polished self-reliance. They had in a noteworthy degree the healthy, vigorous alertness commonly found in people who have lived much out of doors, combined with the restraint and polish which come from long familiarity with the salons of society. "If these are typical Rumanians, I want to go to Rumania," I said to myself.

"I want you to talk with M. Vaïda," said M. Bratiano, when we had all sat down. "He speaks for Transylvania. You know we feel about our union with Transylvania in the way you Americans must have felt when Texas joined your Union after her war with Mexico."

"We Transylvanians," M. Vaïda began, "are a very old people. Our racial stock is identical with that of the Rumanians. In the fifteen hundred Hungarian administrative divisions of Transylvania, properly so called, and in the seven Hungarian comitats, which are properly included with it, there are altogether, even by the Hungarian statistics, 2,505,958 Rumanians, or 54 per cent of the whole, and 1,092,719 Magyars, or 23½ per cent of the whole. But there is no doubt that these statistics underestimate the relative strength of the Rumanian element. The right figures are: for Rumanians, 2,990,000, or 62½ per cent, and for the Hungarians 700,000, or 15 per cent, if we do not count the Szeklers, who are of Magyar origin and who live in the southeast angle of Transylvania. They number about 450,000, but are completely surrounded by Rumanians, on whom the Szeklers are completely dependent.

"So the dominating element in Transylvania has remained genuinely Rumanian in spite of all invasions of Magyars, Germans, and minor tribes. These Rumanian Transylvanians have never abandoned the struggle for national liberty. At the beginning of the recent war many thousands of them refused to fight under the Austro-Hungarian flag and fled to Rumania, where they formed Transylvanian regiments in the Rumanian army. As soon as the Austro-Hungarian Government collapsed deputations of Rumanians from all the comitats of Transylvania and the Banat, a gathering altogether of more than a hundred thousand persons, came together in a National Assembly on the first day of last December and demanded the union of all the Rumanians of Transylvania and other parts of Hungary with Rumania.

"I have come to Paris to plead for these people, these countrymen of mine, before the leaders of the great Allied Powers. What we want is local autonomy and union with Rumania."

When M. Vaïda had ceased speaking, M. Bratiano said:

"I hope you appreciate the significance of what my colleague has just said about the Banat. Rumanians were the first settlers in that country, where they have lived for many centuries. They are there to-day to the number of 600,000. The Germans there, who are mere colonists who arrived in the eighteenth century or later, number only 400,000, and there are about 300,000 Serbs who emigrated there in the fifteenth and eighteenth centuries. It has been suggested that the Banat could be divided so as to unite the eastern part with Rumania and to give the western part to Serbia. But this could not be done. The Banat is not a mere geographical expression. It cannot be cut up like a beefsteak. The mountainous eastern part, which the Serbians are willing to let us have, and the flat western part, which they claim for themselves, are dependent on each other. The plain feeds the mountaineers and gives them a refuge in winter. On the other hand, the mountains supply the people of the plains with timber and minerals. By rivers and canals through the plain go the products of the eastern mountains to the Theiss and the Danube. The division of the Banat would leave the Rumanians with the upper part of the rivers only, while depriving them of free access to the Danube and the Theiss.

"But, above all, it is unwise to cut up the Banat because of the way in which the different racial elements are closely mixed. To divide the Banat would only be to make new irredentisms. The natural line of frontier is the Danube. If you would ignore the mark which nature has drawn, would you not be opening the way for an unending controversy over boundaries?

"Serbia and Rumania are old friends. There is no reason for one of them to fear the other, particularly now that we are all living in the common League of Nations. But, at any rate—if Serbia should still dread Rumanian proximity by our occupation of the Banat—let it be remembered that in our Treaty of 1916

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

International Film Service

"LAND ARMY" GIRLS HELPING THE FARMER

These girls belong to a section of the New York State Woman's Land Army which has its headquarters at Marlborough-on-the-Hudson, the center of an important small fruit district. Here they are seen gathering currants

(C) Western Newspaper Union

A THRILLING LEAP

At the New York Police Games the other day Lieutenant H. W. Sheridan leaped with his parachute from the tip of a moving airplane 2,000 feet up in the air. To make the feat more sensational, Sheridan was handcuffed

Central News Photo Service

THE SULTAN PLAYS

The present Sultan of Turkey disowns the atrocious acts of his predecessor. He makes a daily visit to a mosque, and is seen leaving the mosque after prayer.

Gilliams Service

A GIRL TOWN CRIER

In some villages and rural towns in England the bellman is still in existence. In Thetford the bellman in war time was a bellwoman, and proclaimed news or town orders as shown above

Digitized by Google

(C) International Film Service

THE BASTILLE DAY PARADE IN PARIS

Last week the great parade of July 14 in Paris was described by a staff correspondent. This picture shows the leaders of the parade after they had passed the Arc de Triomphe. It will be noticed that Marshal Joffre and Marshal Foch are riding almost side by side with the latter just a trifle behind his senior Marshal, as described by our correspondent in last week's Outlook

International Film Service

AIRPLANE WRECKAGE

One of the results of the recent sudden gale and thunder-storms on July 28 about New York was the wrecking of several large airplanes at Mineola, on Long Island, as shown above. One of them was the bombing plane that was about to attempt a one-stop flight from New York to San Francisco with France, Great Britain, Italy, and Russia we pledged our word to leave opposite the Serbian capital of Belgrade a zone unfortified and ungarrisoned.

"As for the other items in our programme of redemption," said the Premier of the Rumanians, "Bukowina is a piece of old Moldavia stolen by Austria in 1775, when you Americans were too busy with your own affairs to protest against this piece of international brigandage." (M. Bratiano chuckled.) "Moldavia and Bukowina have never stopped clamoring for their reunion. A National Assembly attended by delegates of all the elements in the population of Bukowina except the Ruthenians on November 28 last demanded that Bukowina and all its historic boundaries be joined to Rumania. Even the bitterest critic of Rumania," M. Bratiano continued, "could not criticise her for wanting to get back Bessarabia. Bessarabia was stolen from us by old imperialistic Russia as a stepping-stone toward Constantinople. Now that Russia has given up her imperialism, there is not even a selfish reason why any one should object to the natural reunion of Rumania and Bessarabia. Seventy-two per cent of the population of that province is Rumanian. And the reunion which we hope will soon be an accomplished fact was advocated by the National Council of Bessarabia on April 9, 1918, by a vote of eighty-six to three."

At this point I asked M. Bratiano a question which I like to ask every statesman I meet nowadays—that is, a question in regard to his opinion of Bolshevism and its progress both within his country and without it.

"Ha, ha!" said M. Bratiano, with a smile. "We are as familiar with Bolshevism as a Norwegian is familiar with the sea. Rumania is a peninsula of law and order jutting into a sea of Bolshevism. Only a fool would affect unconcern in regard to the career of these social extremists. How many governments can you point out in Europe which have been in power as long as the government of Lenine and Trotsky? But we who are so close to Bolshevism are perhaps not so much afraid of it as you who are farther away. We see the joints in its armor. The greatest weapon to use against it is food. You Americans can do perhaps more than any other country in saving Europe from Bolshevism. Just flood the Black Sea and Baltic and far eastern coasts of Russia with food and you will see Bolshevism recede like fire before water. That would be a noble task for the United States, and I am sure they could perform it."

When I asked M. Bratiano for his opinion on the controversy between the Italians and the Yugoslavs in regard to the possession of Fiume and Dalmatia, at first he would say only:

"They are both allies of ours, and we hope they will quickly come to an amicable settlement."

But when I alluded to President Wilson's statement in regard to Fiume, that it "must serve as the outlet and inlet of the commerce, not of Italy, but of the lands to the north and northeast of that port—Hungary, Bohemia, Rumania, and the states of the new Yugoslavic group"—the Rumanian Premier said:

"I was surprised at that reference of President Wilson to Rumania. We would use Fiume very little. The Black Sea and the Danube are the outlet and inlet for nearly all of our commerce."

In regard to the proposal for a union of the Balkan States M. Bratiano seems less enthusiastic than the great sponsor of that idea, M. Venizelos, Premier of Greece. It is a matter of comparative emphasis with M. Bratiano. "A Balkan union," said he, "would be an excellent thing if it were a real union, a close alliance to guard justice on the Balkan Peninsula and protect common interests against outside invasion. But a union on paper is of no value. And if the League of Nations becomes a vital, working organization, as we all hope it will, the need for a Balkan union will be much less than it otherwise would be. The world is growing smaller every day. A movement which recognizes the close interdependence of all nations in this day and aims at ameliorating and smoothing out those relations should be supported in preference to a movement which concerns itself primarily with the local interests of a small group of nations. However, there is no reason why the latter cannot flourish within the former and perhaps be of assistance to it. And so I believe both in the Balkan union and in the League of Nations.

"If there had been a well-organized Balkan union, Austria would never have dared attack Serbia. If the Balkan States hang together, neither the Germans nor the Russians will ever dare attack them again."

"Even if Germany becomes strong again, then, you think she will not renew the Drang nach Osten through the Balkans?"

"I think not. It seems very likely that Germany will soon be strong again, but I do not think she will try to expand to the southeast. Of course the Hungarians may show themselves ready to be her tools again if they think they can regain any of their lost plunder by so doing, and we must keep our eye on those fellows. But Germany's expansion, I believe, will follow the line of least resistance. She will find too solid a barrier in the tier of reconstructed states to the southeast—Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Yugoslavia, and Greece. And, although Bulgaria may always be ready to stick a knife into our backs for a price, Bulgaria alone is not much. Turkey will never again be strong enough to be of any use to Germany."

"In which direction do you think Germany will try to expand, then, your Excellency?"

"I believe she will follow the line of least resistance," repeated the Rumanian Premier, "and that she will move due east through Poland and Russia. About all that the rest of us can do is to help Russia in every way possible to be independent of Germany. Perhaps you Americans can do more than any of us in this way."

M. Bratiano's opinion that Germany is still dangerous is the opinion of every other Balkan statesman that I have met. They all express the hope that in withdrawing her army America will not withdraw her watchful attention from Europe nor her willingness to help put down Germany or any other bully who may run amuck again.

Paris, France.

A MOTHER AND HER BROOD

BY HELEN JOHNSON KEYES

FIVE hours before the next train! The news fell upon me in a tiny country depot in the State of Utah. I was unfed, unwashed, and very hot. My expectation had been to have only ten minutes in this miserable shanty, and then in a couple of hours to arrive at hot water, food, and a soft bed.

I waited alone for half an hour. Nothing stirred except the telegraph keys, which chattered garrulously, although the station-master had abandoned his post and wandered off into the misty spaces of the hot noon hour. Presently the slow tread of a horse sounded along the road. I went out on the platform, and saw approaching a wagon containing crates of poultry and eggs. It was driven by a woman, and as she came near I saw that she was pretty, with the pale-blue eyes of a thinker and crinkling brown hair. We looked at each other questioningly.

"The train is five hours late," I ventured. "I wonder if you know of any one who would let me rest in her home and give me a glass of milk? I am absurdly tired and hungry."

"Will you come home with me?" she responded, briskly. "I am going back just as soon as I have unloaded these crates."

A few minutes later I climbed up beside her on the board which was her seat.

"You must have a chicken farm?" I queried.

"I have more than a hundred birds."

she replied, "and am doing fairly well with them. It was the best way to take care of my four children after my husband died two years ago. Mr. Marvin was a telegraph operator and the station-master here."

"How did you happen to take up poultry?" I asked, interested because I have sometimes thought of trying to raise squabs myself.

"It was the home demonstration agent," she answered. "Here we are."

We dismounted in front of a very poor, unpainted house. The room we entered served as kitchen, dining-room, and living-room. Out of it opened a bedchamber, and that was all the house there was.

"I have only goat's milk," she apologized, "but I can make you some coffee and an omelet."

"That would be good," I acceded with the eagerness of real hunger.

She set to work silently. The two younger children, girls three and four years old, tumbled in at the door during these preparations, and were at once assigned tasks, such as drawing water and fetching dishes.

"You are a scientific cook," I said, as I watched my hostess.

"The home demonstration agent has taught me a few things. My oldest girl, ten years old, cooks better than I do. She made fifty dollars this year from canning. You see, we have a Farm Bureau in the county and an agent who works with us. We've had two projects this year—meal-planning and canning."

"I am very much interested in that kind of work," I confessed, "because I am connected with the Department of Agriculture in Washington, and know a great deal about the office there which has it in charge."

She turned from the stove, and her lovely eyes looked at me almost reverently. "It's a pleasure to know you," she said. Then, after a pause, she placed a fluffy omelet on the deal table in front of me, and continued, a little bashfully: "I hope you will tell me about the office. Women who belong to it sometimes come out into this State, but I have never seen any of them."

"There is a great deal I might tell you," I responded, "and it would all be worth while and about fine women. But what the Washington office wants to know about is you and your neighbors, and how much help you have received from the agents. I wish you would tell me about your poultry and how the agent helped you to get started."

"I will tell you," she said, "just as I always think of it myself." After placing bread and coffee beside me, she sent the children out to feed the chickens and then sat down and began her story.

"I always remember first coming home after the funeral. I had been sort of confused for the two days since he died. Neighbors had been staying with me, but they went back to their own homes. It seemed so queer to feel life beginning to get back to what it always had been. I recollect even being surprised that my shoes which had trod the earth near the grave pinched me just exactly as they had done a month before at Lucy's party; and it didn't seem nice that the children should beg for their suppers. I fell to asking myself which was queerer, that everything was about the same as it had been, or that my big, jolly, noisy husband had just gone out like a candle flame or a bubble. I'm not talking about religion, but just about this life. Well, I kept wondering and wondering about life and death as I took off my widow's clothes and put the children's play frocks on them again. I recall that I felt sort of proud as I buttoned up those play frocks, thinking that I was now the only protector of my babies. Then as I gathered up some greasewood from my yard and put it in my stove and went out to draw water I began counting up what I had. I was just so silly that it seemed to me I had a good deal. This house was mine, with half an acre of greasewood for fuel. Then there was the goat which the home demonstration agent had coaxed us to buy, so as to have milk for the children. Besides, I had a purse with some savings in it—ten dollars and twenty-one cents. That was all, but there were no debts, for a fraternal organization took charge of the funeral and there was a policy to meet the cost of the sickness.

"Of course I did wonder, as we all ate supper, where food was to come from after ten dollars and twenty-one cents had bought all it would. But I felt that the home demonstration agent, Miss Wyngate, would help me find work. After the children were tucked in bed that evening a wind storm came up. It frightened me, and I lost all my courage. Ten dollars and twenty-one cents would not last us more than two weeks. What then? Miss Wyngate had taught us a lot of thrift—how to make dresses from the tops of stockings and from feed sacks, and how to choose foods that contain the most nourishment. But, after all, thrift won't support you. Money has got to be earned to be thrifty with. How was I to earn it—enough for five people?"

"I didn't sleep much that night, and the storm was awful. It seemed as if the house would blow down. The next morning I felt all sore and bruised and queer in my head from worry. Nothing seemed real and yet everything seemed terrible. About ten o'clock there was a rap on the door. When I saw Miss Wyngate's face, smiling, I just felt as if I was in the real world again. It was like waking up from a nightmare. She took both my hands and said: 'What a fine thing it is to be busy, isn't it, Mrs. Marvin? I'm sure it helps you to have the children always wanting something! Maybe I oughtn't to suggest anything more for you to do, but I was wondering if you'd care to go round to the culling demonstration this afternoon?'"

"I guess not," I said, not seeing the thought in her mind at all. "I haven't got any money to feed chickens with."

"Chickens are a pretty good investment,' she went on. 'There are many women making a profit of more than three hundred dollars a year with seventy or eighty birds. There is no excuse for failing with them in this part of the world, for the poultry specialist from the college is here, getting rid of the tubercular birds and culling the flocks. She can tell from examining a live hen whether she will lay enough eggs to earn her keep. Those which will not can be sold for eating. About twenty-eight per cent of the hens in most yards she finds to be non-productive. Besides culling she gives advice about feeding, so that eggs are laid the year round. She has shown the women, too, the value of producing infertile eggs for laying down in water-glass and using when the prices of fresh eggs are so high that it is worth while to sell every one that is laid. The profits from poultry have increased about seventy per cent in the counties where she has worked.'

"I hadn't listened very attentively at first, but little by little what she said got me. 'The Farm Bureau has been talking some about poultry projects, I know,' said I. 'I'd like right well to try my hand at it, but I haven't money enough to start in.' I told her just what I had."

"I think we can borrow,' she said, 'allowing you to pay back very slowly. Think it over, and I'll stop for you about three o'clock this afternoon, and if you do feel like going to the poultry culling we'll drive over together.'

"Of course I went, and it just made me feel as I'd got to raise poultry. Well, in a few days Miss Wyngate came in again, and what do you think she had in the back of her little car? Fifty Rhode Island Reds and one rooster as handsome as ever I did see. These birds had been given me by women all through the county who knew my story. As if that wasn't enough, Miss Wyngate said her sister wanted a layette, and would I make it? Would I! That gave me enough money to build a poultry house, and a neighbor put up a brooder for me like one he had invented for himself."

Mrs. Marvin turned her back upon me and frankly wiped her eyes while I frankly wiped mine. Just then the oldest child and her brother came in—fine, happy-looking children. Mrs. Marvin put her arms around them both. "We're laying up money every month to send them to the Agricultural College," she said. "Myrtle is going to be a home demonstration agent and Billy a scientific farmer." They nodded their small heads solemnly.

At that moment I understood more clearly than I ever had before the stuff out of which the new life of our countryside is forming. In the university without walls or class-rooms which the extension movement is building on our farms such fervid apostles of education are developed and trained. Boy and girl, man and woman, old man and old woman, are all matriculated. Each is a pupil and each is a teacher. Thus education becomes as large as work, and work as large and various as life.

THE BOOK TABLE: DEVOTED TO BOOKS AND THEIR MAKERS

THE REVIEWER COMMENTS ON HIS TRADE

THE book review table in an editorial office is a genuinely democratic institution. To find a place thereon a book needs only to be born. Like the fathers of the Republic, editors hold it to be a self-evident proposition that all books are created with a free and equal opportunity to pursue the happiness or unhappiness of being reviewed. But, like the previously mentioned fathers of the Republic, editors are also silent as to the fate that lies in store for their victims after the fact of their free and equal creation has been benevolently acknowledged.

It is indeed a strange medley that greets an editor's roving eye as it rambles along the table top dedicated to new books. Purples and greens, pale lavenders and scarlets, somber browns and demure and pious grays, tall books and fat, thin books and short—a true catalogue of their colors and outward shapes would closely resemble the catalogue of rodents in "The Pied Piper of Hamelin." And the confusion worse confounded of colors and shapes is as nothing to the confusion that lies within these various and variegated covers. Philosophy, history, poetry, science, fiction, and humor, or what authors and publishers have conspired to classify as such, jostle each other, like ill-mannered vendors in a public market, crying aloud for instant review. Like the porter in "Macbeth," the reviewer can say: "Here's a knocking indeed!" and if a reviewer "were porter of hell gate, he should have old turning the key."

A reviewer's table is, for certain books (as some one has said of Mayor Hylan's tenancy of the New York City Hall), only a brief stopping-place on the road between obscurity and oblivion. For others, more fortunate, it serves as a platform from which they may receive at least a momentary introduction to the not over-receptive world of letters. For still others, and these are all too few, it may perchance prove the open door to public recognition and a long life of prosperity and honor.

It is the task of the reviewer to sort and classify and describe the suppliants for his attention, to speed good books on their way with a blessing, catch bad books by the coat tails and pull them out of the light that beats upon the printed page, to administer paternal admonitions to volumes that are trying to pass for what they are not and never can be, and to fan judiciously the spark of life in those books that show signs of present vitality or the promise of future achievement.

Over the well-worn path that leads across the reviewer's table top passes continually the present generation of that eternal throng of books to the making of which there is no end. As a symbol of the reviewer's task and of the ever-present and overcrowded reality which daily confronts his eyes, "The Book Table" has been chosen as the heading under which comments upon books and their makers will be grouped hereafter in the pages of The Outlook.

THE NEW BOOKS

EDUCATIONAL

Carnegie Pensions. By J. McKeen Cattell. The Science Press, New York.

The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching was established in 1905 by the gift of ten million dollars as a fund for pensions to college professors retiring at a certain age or term of service. Subsequent gifts of the founder have increased it to $125,000,000. Its management has not only been sharply criticised by its intended beneficiaries, but has been under fire by Congress and in the press as a centralized autocracy for the control of teachers. An overwhelming majority of the critics quoted by the author oppose its plans. In this volume Professor Cattell supports his arraignment of the Carnegie Foundation by extracts from letters of two hundred and fourteen college and university professors, a "history of ten years of the Carnegie Foundation" by Professor Jastrow, of the University of Wisconsin, and the reports of the Committee of the American Association of University Professors. On the other hand, he blends with his criticisms constructive suggestions for a more excellent way. The case is thus put before the court of intelligent public opinion.

FICTION

Born Fool (The). By John Walter Byrd. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

There is good fiction material in this story, but it has been used without much care in planning or proportion. The young man whose life story is told is a born naturalist and an engineer by education. Incidentally, there are some striking pen pictures of the hard, grinding life in a desolate English mining and milling country.

Great Modern English Stories (The). Compiled and Edited by Edward J. O'Brien. Boni & Liveright, New York.

Biographical sketches and bibliographies add to the interest of this collection. Many comparatively recent short stories, such as those by Walpole, Beresford, and Burke, balance the "classics" of Stevenson, Hardy, and Kipling. All the tales belong to the last forty years, and the average quality is excellent. "The Ghost Ship," by Richard Middleton, is delightful.

HISTORY, POLITICAL ECONOMY, AND POLITICS

British Empire and a League of Peace (The). Together with an Analysis of Federal Government: Its Function and Its Method. By George Burton Adams, Litt.D. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Fifty Years of Europe. 1870-1919. By Charles Downer Hazen. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

From Isolation to Leadership. By John Holladay Latané, Ph.D., LL.D. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City.

In this volume the rise and developments of the Monroe Doctrine find clear and concise chronicle. Professor Latané contrasts the operations of the Doctrine with the European plans of power, on the one hand, and, on the other, traces what he calls its "imperialistic tendencies" as evident, he alleges, in the Canal Zone and in the West Indies, for instance. Coming to the "late" war, the author refers to the Lusitania horror and to the President's "determination to stand by Russia." As to the first, Dr. Latané thinks that "some action would probably have been taken by the State Department regarding the dismissal of the German Ambassador had not the incident been overshadowed by . . . the actual destruction of the Lusitania." As if this were any excuse for delay! With regard to the second, he would have us believe that "the President's determination to stand by Russia has put a stop to the suggestions by those who . . . were willing to accept an inconclusive peace based on the sacrifice of Russian territory and independence."

From Czar to Bolshevik. By E. P. Stebbing. Illustrated. The John Lane Company, New York.

This is an interesting and valuable review of the events in Russia which ended with the fall of the Provisional Government in November, 1917, and the seizure of the power by the Bolsheviks. Mr. Stebbing does not spare the Allies in his conclusions. He says that "for reasons which to many, at least, appear inexplicable," Russia's allies "remained aloof from the new and struggling republic. . . . Why was the eastern front sacrificed when at least an attempt might have been made to save it?—an attempt which some qualified to speak think would have been certain to have met with success." To-day, even more than before, concludes the author, "the object before us is to save the Russian Empire from the German. If we fail in this, the war will have to be fought out again in the future."

Isabel of Castile and the Making of the Spanish Nation, 1451-1504. By Irene L. Plunket. Illustrated. (Heroes of the Nations.) G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

The transition of Spain from mediævalism to modernism, from a position of inferiority to one of primacy in the councils of Europe, under the guidance of Isabel, is succinctly described in this book. The picture it presents seems one of Spain itself rather than of a "Heroine of the Nations;" but the author doubtless had in mind a Spanish proverb, "He who says Spain has said everything," and put the emphasis on the sub-title of the work rather than on the personality of the Queen.

Labor and Reconstruction in Europe. By Elisha M. Friedman. E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

The problems of reconstruction after the war are lucidly set forth in this book. It is a book of information, not of propaganda, and will be helpful to all earnest students of labor questions.

President's Control of Foreign Relations (The). By Edward S. Corwin, Ph.D. The Princeton University Press, Princeton, N. J.

The two main principles which continually recur in these pages are, first, that a transaction of business with foreign nations is an executive function, and, second, that Congress is not to be prejudiced in exercising its powers by what the Executive has done in exercising his. The net result, however, of a century and a quarter of contest for power between the executive and the legislative branches remains, in the author's opinion, "decisively and conspicuously in favor of the President." To him there has been accorded an unlimited discretion in the recognition of new governments and states, an undefined authority in sending special agents abroad (often of dubious diplomatic status) to negotiate treaties or for other purposes; a similarly undefined power to enter into contracts with their governments without the Senate's participation; the practically exclusive expression in the negotiation of treaties and exclusive initiative in the official formulation of the Nation's foreign policy. Then there are certain war-making powers which the President has gradually taken to himself. As a partial offset there are certain practices and principles safeguarding the discretion of Congress, such as its establishment of its practically exclusive right to abrogate treaties. In its historical and analytical study of all these powers the volume is certainly timely.

Proposed Roads to Freedom: Socialism, Anarchism, and Syndicalism. By Bertrand Russell, F.R.S. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

Bertrand Russell is a scholar infected with a passion for moral reform. The two temperaments it is difficult, if not impossible, to combine. The scholar's dominating passion is curiosity—he wants to know facts. The moral reformer's dominating passion is ambition—he wants to cure evils. Facts which illustrate the evils he wishes to cure or which furnish arguments for the remedy he proposes interest him; facts which mitigate the evils he wishes to cure or which tend to show that his proposed reform is impracticable he is apt either to deny or to disregard. He is rarely judicial, generally an advocate, often a partisan. Bertrand Russell's critical accounts of Socialism, Anarchism, and Syndicalism are well worth careful reading. He knows his subject and sees with clear vision the defects in these "Proposed Roads to Freedom." But his own proposed road to freedom, given in his last chapter, "The World as It Could be Made," while containing valuable suggestions—seed thoughts, we may call them—as a comprehensive social system strikes us as neither an ideal if it were practicable, nor practicable if it were an ideal. As a critical scholar he can be read with profit; as a constructive reformer he must be read with great caution.

Resurrected Nations (The). By Isaac Don Levine. The Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.

A large part of Europe and a portion of Asia may now be described as a melting-pot out of which are to come new nations in the near future as a result of the great war. This book describes in a sympathetic spirit the peoples of eighteen of these embryo nations and tells something of their history. It will prove enlightening to such readers—and who is not among them?—as are puzzled at times by the racial complexities of the peoples liberated by the great conflict.

Riddle of Nearer Asia (The). By Basil Mathews. Preface by Viscount Bryce. Illustrated. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Traditions of British Statesmanship. Some Comments on Passing Events. By the Hon. Arthur D. Elliot. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

Altruism: Its Nature and Varieties. The Ely Lectures for 1917-18. By George Herbert Palmer. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York City.

Professor Palmer, in all his writings, which are too few, deals not with abstract theories but with the real problems of life. He is always vital and always practical, by which we mean, not that he deals only with practices, but that he deals with intellectual problems as they affect practices, and so concern men and women. And he is always both clear and cogent, so that if you do not always agree with him you always find it necessary, in order to maintain your self-respect, to find some reason which you can give to yourself for your disagreement. We recommend this little volume as provocative to clear thinking and to all thoughtful persons who are interested in the problems of the moral life.

Cyclopedia of Twentieth Century Illustrations (A). New Pictures of Truth from Current Events and Recent Inventions and Discoveries, for the use of Preachers, Sunday-School Teachers and Christian Workers. By Amos R. Wells. The Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

Mind and Conduct. Morse Lectures Delivered at the Union Theological Seminary in 1919. By Henry Rutgers Marshall, L.H.D., D.S. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

IN A HALL BEDROOM

(From "Candles That Burn")

BY ALINE KILMER

"In the long border on the right
I shall plant larkspur first," she thinks.

"Peonies and chrysanthemums
And then sweet-scented maiden pinks.

"The border on the left shall hold Nothing but masses of white phlox.
Forget-me-nots shall edge this one,
The one across be edged with box.

"The sun-dial in the center stands.
There morning-glories bright shall twine.

And in the strip at either end
Shall grow great clumps of columbine.

"There is no garden in the world
So beautiful as mine," she dreams.
Rising, she walks the little space
To where her narrow window gleams.

She gazes through the dingy pane
To where the street is noisy still,
And tends with pitiable care
A tulip on the window-sill.

POETRY

Candles That Burn. By Aline Kilmer. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Mrs. Kilmer's verses are vivid, poignant, and effective. Most of her poems are filled with the shadows of tragedy, but none of them lacks that dignity which inevitably springs from the high courage of a consecrated spirit. The simplicity, directness, and power of Mrs. Kilmer's verse are well illustrated in the selection from "Candles That Burn" which appears on this page.

Harvest Home (The). Collected Poems of James B. Kenyon. James T. White & Co., New York.

New Morning (The). Poems. By Alfred Noyes. The Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.

WAR BOOKS

Adventures in Propaganda. By Heber Blankenhorn. Illustrated. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

All the World. By Charles M. Sheldon. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Hatchet (The) of the United States Ship "George Washington." Compiled by Captain Edwin T. Pollock, U. S. Navy, and Lieut. (J. G.) Paul F. Bloomhardt, Chaplain Corps, U. S. Navy. Illustrated. The Navy Relief Society, Washington.

There is a surprising amount of interesting matter connected with the war-time voyages of the George Washington apart from its recent fame as the "President's ship." "The Hatchet" (cleverly named) was printed as a daily on board ship in the war zone and beyond, under the editorship of Captain Edwin T. Pollock and Chaplain Bloomhardt. Seven thousand copies were printed in all, we are told. As now presented in book form, it is admirably illustrated, contains, among other things, an interesting chart of the courses taken by the George Washington in its voyages from December, 1917, to December, 1918, includes a readable account of the incidents of the President's first voyage in the ship, and abounds in clever bits of fun, queer and notable incidents, and sound and patriotic editorials.

Collapse and Reconstruction. European Conditions and American Principles. By Sir Thomas Barclay. Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

Fighting the Flying Circus. By Captain Edward V. Rickenbacker. Maps and Foreword by Laurence La Tourette Driggs. The Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.

Night Bombing With the Bedouins. By One of the Squadron, Robert H. Keese, Lieut. Illustrated. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

Our Common Conscience. By Sir George Adam Smith, Kt., D.D., LL.D., Litt.D. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Invited by the National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War conjointly working with the Department of Public Information, the distinguished author of this volume toured our country last spring and summer. The title of this collection of his addresses felicitously incarnates the fundamental truth which pervades their message to America as associated with Great Britain and France in a common cause. For no formal compact, however sworn to, is so compelling, so deathless, as a common conscience.

Dr. Smith spoke from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Lakes to the Gulf in nearly forty centers, before thrice as many assemblies of various sorts and sizes; one of his audiences was mainly composed of United States soldiers. Twice before has he been invited hither to lecture—at Johns Hopkins in 1893 and at Yale in 1896. Through the glowing Epilogue to these addresses not only will his countrymen more fully understand and esteem us, but many of us may gain a larger knowledge of ourselves as a people. The volume is dedicated to his sons, "who fell fighting for the Cause," the one in France, the other in East Africa.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Adventures of Twinkly Eyes (The): The Little Black Bear. By Allen Chaffee. Illustrated. The Milton Bradley Company, Springfield.

Cornelia: The Story of a Benevolent Despot. By Lucy Fitch Perkins. Illustrated. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

Dave Porter's War Honors; or, At the Front with the Fighting Engineers. By Edward Stratemeyer. Illustrated. (Dave Porter Series.) The Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company, Boston.

Dormitory Days. By Arthur Stanwood Pier. Illustrated. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

Good Old Stories for Boys and Girls. Selected by Elva S. Smith. Illustrated. The Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company, Boston.

Good Sports. By Olive Higgins Prouty. The Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.

Hidden Treasure. The Story of a Chore Boy Who Made the Old Farm Pay. By John Thomas Simpson. Illustrated. The J. B. Lipincott Company, Philadelphia.

Lad: A Dog. By Albert Payson Terhune. E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HEAD OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY AND AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP IN
THE SCARBOROUGH SCHOOL, SCARBOROUGH-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK

Based on The Outlook of August 6, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Proposed Alliance with France.

Reference: Page 525.

Questions:

1. Make a report on the following questions relative to treaties: How are treaties negotiated? How do they become law? Can Congress repeal a treaty? Suppose the terms of a treaty and a law of Congress should conflict, which would be considered law? What is the status of a treaty that is contrary to the Constitution? Can public money be appropriated by a treaty? Should the House of Representatives have any voice in treaty-making? Reasons. 2. Make as many comparisons as you can between international conditions and political ideals at the time of the American alliance with France in 1778 and at the present time. Compare also the provisions and purposes of that alliance with the provisions and purposes of the proposed alliance with France. What conclusions do you find yourself drawing? 3. What possible reasons can you think of for withholding assent from the French treaty? 4. The Outlook upholds President Wilson in signing the treaty with France. Give as many reasons as you can for agreeing with The Outlook. 5. Criticise the following statements: "Nobody much wants the alliance." "This alliance violates the Covenant [League of Nations] in a most fundamental way." "The object of this treaty is to create a clique within a clique." "The purpose of this treaty is not to protect France against a German invasion." 6. For outside material on this topic consult "American Government," by F. A. Magruder (Allyn & Bacon)—a most excellent text-book—and "The French War and the Revolution," by W. M. Sloane (Scribners).

B. Topic: Mr. Taft, Mr. Hughes, and the League of Nations; The Guide of the Nations; What the Pacific Northwest Thinks About the League and the Treaty.

Reference: Pages 530-532; 537-539.

Questions:

1. Explain carefully the public stand taken by Mr. Taft and Mr. Hughes as to the League of Nations and reservations. 2. Discuss the importance of their stand. 3. Do you think the safety of the American people at the present time rests as truly in the Republican party as it did when the Republican party was formed? Think carefully and hard. 4. What does Dr. Abbott think of the League of Nations?

Upon what does his faith in the League rest? Tell what you think of his ideas and beliefs. 5. Discuss whether Dr. Abbott shows good judgment when he says that he is willing to accept any reservations which competent authority assures him will not imperil the acceptance of the League of Nations by other nations. 6. Does it seem to you that history shows that a successful civilization depends upon the hearty co-operation of individuals and nations in furthering the common good? Illustrate freely from National and international experiences. 7. Dr. Abbott believes that God is the guide of the nations. Are you of his opinion? Give several reasons. 8. According to Professor Davenport, what does the Pacific Northwest think of the League and the Treaty? Explain at some length. 9. How do you like the reported opinion of the Pacific Northwest? Discuss. 10. America has a high international moral leadership. Explain how she achieved such leadership. Has this been true of her only since 1917? 11. Write out a number of lessons you think the articles for this topic teach.

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: Racial Tension and Race Riots.

Reference: Editorial, pages 532-534.

Questions:

1. Describe as carefully as you can the race riots in Washington and Chicago. Are they a National disgrace? Reasons. 2. Who and what are responsible for these riots? How far back is responsibility to be traced? 3. Since 1890 most of the Southern States have framed constitutions containing clauses which practically disfranchise the Negro. The Outlook reports other conditions of the Negro in the South. Has the Southern treatment of the Negro any relation to the race riots in the North? 4. Should the Supreme Court and the American Government take steps in solving the Negro problem? If so, what steps? Discuss at length.

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. Democracy is more preached than practiced. 2. America should enter into an unending offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain. 3. The United States has a race problem more serious than that of any other nation in the world.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for August 6, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Alliance, purport (525); shibboleth (537); assiduity, pusillanimous, miasma, canny (538); bravado (532); provost guard, aftermath (533).

Build
Now!
And build right

WHILE you are planning, insure your money's worth by specifying "Yale" Builders' Locks and Hardware throughout the house, on front, rear and inside doors, everywhere in and about the house where Builders' Hardware must go.

You get more than mere money's worth with "Yale."

You get protection positive, safeguarding your possessions and the lives of your family.

The finely conceived designs that are a delight to the eye—the perfect service—give you a sense of satisfaction that make you say to the visiting friend, "Our home is equipped with Yale Hardware."

See your architect and hardware dealer about Yale Builders' Locks and Hardware, early. They both know and appreciate Yale quality.

Every genuine "Yale" product bears the trademark "Yale." See it on Yale Builders' Hardware, Night Latches, Padlocks, Door Closers, Cabinet Locks, Bank Locks and Chain Blocks.

The Yale & Towne
Manufacturing Company

9 East 40th Street
New York City

Chicago Office:
77 East Lake Street

Canadian Yale & Towne Ltd.,
St. Catharines, Ontario

Barrett Specification Roofs

20 Years of Service Guaranteed—

IN the old days buying a roof very often proved to be something of a gamble.

Maybe you got just what you specified, and maybe not.

The cost per square foot was too often taken as the only standard of value—frequently to the owner's subsequent sorrow.

Today all this is changed.

It was the Barrett Specification which first made it possible for building owners everywhere to obtain, through their local contractors, a standardized roof, worked out by roofing engineers and based on scientific principles of modern roof construction.

Today we offer to guarantee Barrett Specification Roofs for a period of 20 years!

This guaranty is obtainable on any roof of 50 squares or more, in any town of 25,000 population or over, and in smaller places where our Inspection Service is available.

It is a Surety Bond, issued by the U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Company, of Baltimore.

To obtain this Surety Bond you have only to insert in your building Specifications the following:

"The roof shall be laid according to The Barrett Specification dated May 1, 1916, and the roofing contractor shall secure for me (or us) the 20-year Guaranty Bond therein mentioned."

The guaranty costs you nothing. We merely require that the roofing contractor be approved by us and that we be given an opportunity to inspect the construction.

We shall be glad to send you a copy of The Barrett Specification, with diagrams ready for insertion in your building plans.

The 20-Year Bond

We illustrate above the 20-year Surety Bond that will be given on all roofs of 50 squares or over in towns of 25,000 population or more and in other places where our Inspection Service is available.

New York
Boston
Cleveland
Birmingham
Seattle
Youngstown Nashville

Chicago
St. Louis
Cincinnati
Kansas City
Peoria
Toledo
Washington

Duluth
Richmond
Elizabeth

Milwaukee
Latrobe
New Orleans
Montreal
Halifax, N. S.

Dallas
Bangor
Bethlehem
Salt Lake City
Toronto

Atlanta
Columbus
Detroit
Johnstown
Winnipeg
Sydney, N. S.

Philadelphia
Pittsburgh
Minneapolis
Baltimore
Lebanon
Buffalo
Vancouver

THE BARRETT COMPANY, Limited:
St. John, N. B.

The Barrett Company

Laying a 20-Year Barrett Specification Roof on Building No. 20 of the National Cash Register Co., at Dayton, Ohio

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT

The Financial Department is prepared to furnish information regarding standard investment securities, but cannot undertake to advise the purchase of any specific security. It will give to inquirers facts of record or information resulting from expert investigation, and a nominal charge of one dollar per inquiry will be made for this special service. All letters of inquiry should be addressed to THE OUTLOOK FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York.

COMMENT ON CURRENT FINANCIAL TOPICS

ESTABLISHING A TRADE BALANCE

It has been estimated that over a period of possibly three years at least $3,000,000,000 will be required for European reconstruction, but this figure is not large in comparison to the $10,000,000,000 already lent by this Government to Europe or to the $25,000,000,000 raised by the Liberty Loan campaigns. However, these funds for reconstruction must be obtained from private capital, and various plans are under consideration for the financing of exports.

Europe needs our surplus products, particularly our basic materials, and we need their markets in order to keep production of labor at the maximum, and to accomplish this we must finance Europe by long-term credits, so that she may be able to meet the payments upon our exports to her with as little confusion and difficulty as possible. America must face this condition with equanimity, as happiness, prosperity, and industry are directly contingent upon the productive enterprise and financial capability of the people of Europe. In exporting our surplus commodities to Europe we are therefore performing both an economic and an altruistic service.

However, the enthusiasm over the export possibilities has been so great that the majority overlook the question of imports. At the same time that we are endeavoring to build up our export trade we must also encourage imports; for otherwise, how may we expect Europe to meet her obligations to us, already enormous, but probably steadily increasing over the next two or three years of reconstruction? In the end, Europe can pay her debt only in

IN the Middle Ages, cotton came by caravan from India to Cairo or to Constantinople, where it was traded for goods of Europe. Ships of Venice or of Genoa bore it West. During all the tedious journey and time-consuming bartering of the traders and money changers the capital represented was tied up—useless.

Modern Commercial Banking

THE commodities of modern commerce are carried, not over shifting trails and on crude, uncertain vessels, but over highways of steel and on great ships regularly plying the ocean lanes.

The complex organization which exists to bring the raw material to the manufacturer, and the finished product to the user, depends, for its proper functioning, upon the assistance supplied by modern commercial banking.

For example, at no time in the progress from seed to cloth does cotton represent idle capital. It is the basis of banking credit for grower, buyer, mill, or seller.

Modern commercial banking multiplies productive capacity through the proper provision of credit. Its wise use lies at the foundation of commercial and industrial prosperity. Every service of commercial banking is available through this Company.

Guaranty Trust Company of New York

New York	London	Liverpool	Paris	Brussels
Capital and Surplus	-	-	-	$50,000,000
Resources more than	-	-	-	$800,000,000

Financial Department (Continued)

commodities, and we must encourage their importation if a stable balance of trade is to be maintained and our export business is to become a permanent institution.

THE SIXTH LOAN

Probably the forerunner of another Government loan appeared a few days ago in a new series of Certificates of Indebtedness, dated August 1, bearing  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent interest and maturing January 2, 1920.

Secretary Glass has said that we should not witness another great loan floated by means of a popular campaign, such as we have experienced for five successive short periods. We may of course expect that this new loan will be offered to the public at an attractive yield and upon an easy-payment basis, although it is reasonable to believe that the banks will be called upon to subscribe for the largest part of it; but with the proper income return, the banks will stand ready to assume the obligation.

PRIVATE OWNERSHIP OF RAILWAYS

The Inter-State Commerce Committee of the Senate is reported to be working on the proposed legislation for the return of the railways to private ownership. It is anticipated that this event will take place, as promised, on January 1, 1920. A great deal may be accomplished in five months with the proper procedure and intelligence, and this five months' period is indeed a most perilous time for the carriers. Upon the nature of the legislation enacted depends the future of this country's transportation problems for many years to come.

The foregoing paragraph was written before the announcement of the Railway Unions which alters the whole complexion of the railway problem and makes it one of the most serious and acute that the country has to face.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE DIVIDEND

The physical condition of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company's property is reported to be in splendid shape, and with labor conditions improving and a probable continuation of present rates there is no reason to question the ability of the Company to pay uninterruptedly the present $2 quarterly dividend; and it is thought by many able financiers that a pessimistic apprehension in this regard is unwarranted.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC

The Southern Pacific Company shows in its balance-sheet as of December 31 last a book value of $317 a share—disregarding the value of its proven oil lands, which may be added to an amount possibly of an additional $30 or $35 per share.

A LOAN TO GERMANY

Germany is confronted by the task of paying for the importation of foodstuffs and raw materials, the immediate need for which is most imperative. As it is with the United States that Germany most desires trade relations, she is greatly handicapped by the embargo we have placed on such materials as she has available for export, such as potash and dyestuffs. Having practically nothing acceptable for payment except their much-depreciated bank notes, Berlin bankers have declared that their only hope of resuming trade with our country is to secure a loan against which they might draw in paying for imports. And it is in

DURING over thirty years of investment service we have developed unexcelled facilities for the prompt execution of orders and for the protection of the interests of our clients.

Our Statistical Department studies exhaustively the values underlying all types of securities. The advice which we offer to customers is based upon these careful investigations and upon our long experience and knowledge of general business conditions and the market factors affecting security values.

We are members of leading exchanges and maintain offices in six prominent cities. Our extensive wire system keeps us constantly in intimate touch with important security markets throughout the country.

Our August list of carefully selected investment offerings will be gladly furnished upon request.

HORNBLOWER & WEEKS

BOSTON	Investment Securities	NEW YORK
PORTLAND		CHICAGO
PROVIDENCE	Founded in 1883	DETROIT

Members of the New York, Boston and Chicago Stock Exchanges

this endeavor that Martin Nordegg, a German capitalist, is now working. Nordegg, who has been in the United States since 1915, is said to enjoy the confidence of our Government as well as that of Canada's. During the war his conduct was unimpeachable, which resulted in his not being subjected to internment.

Germany's interests in this instance are being represented by the Deutsche Bank of Berlin, for which institution Nordegg, although admitted not to be an official representative, has conducted business transactions in the past. The amount of the loan desired is $100,000,000 to $250,000,000. The transaction will take the form of advances by American banks, and no attempt will be made to sell the securities publicly. Further details of the negotiations have not been made public excepting for the fact that the banks to participate will not be German-American in character but out-and-out American institutions.

STANDARD OIL OF NEW JERSEY, PFD.

The issuance of $100,000,000 7 per cent cumulative preferred stock by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, underwritten by J. P. Morgan & Co., and offered to shareholders of record on August 15, is a most interesting piece of financing for any company which shows earnings before taxes, of a sum slightly larger than the new capital asked for, or net after taxes of approximately 60 per cent of this new capital. This is the first financial statement made public by this company since the dissolution suit, and is

If you are thinking about INVESTMENTS—

Our BOND DEPARTMENT may be of value to you through the INFORMATION ON INVESTMENTS that it can furnish.

Our AIM is to HELP INVESTORS by analyzing securities, thus enabling them to avoid making unwise investments.

Our POLICY is to offer to investors only SUCH SECURITIES as WE BUY for our own account.

Our PRESENT OFFERINGS, a description of which will be sent on request, include United States Government bonds, bonds of Foreign Governments, high grade municipal, railroad, public utility and industrial bonds, yielding from 4.40% to 6.50%.

If you are thinking about BANKING—

Our BANKING and FOREIGN DEPARTMENTS, with world-wide facilities established through the greatest banks in all countries, may be of value to you in many ways, for example:

- financing imports and exports
- handling commercial banking, domestic and foreign
- handling personal active or inactive deposits
- depositing funds for special purposes
- securing credit and trade information, foreign and domestic
- collecting foreign coupons
- transferring funds by telegraph and cable
- issuing travellers' credits in dollars and sterling
- issuing documentary credits payable in all parts of the world
- handling practically every kind of financial transaction

BANKERS TRUST COMPANY

Member Federal Reserve System

New York

Downtown Office:
16 Wall Street

Astor Trust Office:
5th Ave. at 42d St.

Financial Department (Continued)

a radical change of policy in increasing the capital instead of drawing upon current earnings for expansion requirements.

BY THE WAY

Apropos of a recent rumor that proved groundless, some one recalls that George Ade, the author of "Fables in Slang," once told of a young man who was kicked in the head by a mule "and thereafter believed everything he read in the Sunday newspapers."

London tenants have trouble as well as those in New York. "Did all considerate landlords die on August 4, 1914?" is asked by an advertiser in the London "Times," who appeals to "noble survivors (if any)" to let a medium-sized house on the outskirts of London. Another advertiser offers to let a furnished railway carriage in a Surrey garden.

A friend throws doubt on the authenticity of the legend of St. Swithin's Day as retold in The Outlook. The prime thing about any legend is not that it is true but that it is interesting. Nevertheless we admit that Chambers's "Book of Days" (which is the authority on "days," and especially on saints' days) solemnly pronounces the legend "specious" and darkly hints that it arose in a modern newspaper clipping. The elaborate article on St. Swithin in "Chambers's" is good reading. It holds that Swithin was buried under the eaves of the Cathedral because he wanted to destroy a prejudice or superstition against that kind of burial; that he was reburied long after in the Cathedral on July 15, but that, instead of raining on that day, the weather was lovely and the ceremony beautiful. Whence the legend, then? This authority believes that it was in existence long before St. Swithin's time, that it related to July 15, and that in some way it simply became transferred to Swithin's account.

This kind of transference of heathen superstitions to modern festivals is well known. The most famous instance is the merging of the old Roman Saturnalia with Christmas Day on December 25. Readers of Charles Reade's "The Cloister and the Hearth" will remember how a somewhat skeptical pope enlarges with much wit on many such instances in the calendar of saints.

We sometimes think that our British friends are a little slow, but when it comes to making a Prince of Wales a member of the bar, England certainly can move quickly. On July 2, at the Middle Temple, the present Prince of Wales was called to the bar, as the New York "Evening Post" expresses it, "after a legal training lasting approximately three minutes." Incidentally, Lord Coleridge, in his humorous welcome of the Prince to the bench and bar, noted that the Prince had declared that his father had no profession, that he had no occupation, and that he had never engaged in trade. We note also that the Prince was called to the "utter bar," which seems to be an ancient form for the "outer bar," made up of junior barristers.

A Birmingham correspondent of a London paper furnishes an illuminating instance of the working of the English after-the-war out-of-work pay system. A general fitter was offered by him a job at £4 10s. per week, which, with overtime, could be turned into £5 10s. For various "reasons" the man put off taking up the job, and inquiry

Good Bonds Daily Gaining New Friends

Each day sees a material number of new names added to our steadily lengthening list of customers.

Quite evidently Federal Bond & Mortgage Company issues of 6% First Mortgage Real Estate Serial Bonds are coming to be regarded by more and more people as the most desirable to be had.

The name itself—Federal Bond & Mortgage Company—is acquiring greater and greater significance in the minds of men and women with funds to invest.

They look for an issue offered by this Company to possess additional features of safety and it always does.

Let the next bonds you purchase be 6% First Mortgage Real Estate Serial Gold Bonds offered by the Federal Bond & Mortgage Company.

Mail your request today for "Questions and Answers on Bond Investment"

Federal Bond & Mortgage Co.

90 L. Griswold Street

Detroit (224)

6% YEAR IN AND YEAR OUT

When you invest your money in our First Farm Mortgages and Real Estate Gold Bonds, furnished in amounts to suit, you are assured of a steady income at 6%. Our loans are secured by rich agricultural lands worth several times amount of loan. Write for pamphlet "8" and offerings.

E. J. LANDER & CO., Grand Forks, N. D.
Est. 1883. Capital and Surplus $500,000.00

DANFORTH FARM MORTGAGES

represent the highest type of investments. They have stood the test of wars and business depression since 1858—69 years, and always worth 100%.

Interest paid promptly at maturity.
FARM MORTGAGE BONDS in $500 and $1,000 denominations

For further information regarding our Farm Loans and Bonds write for Booklet and Investors' List No. 22.

A-G-Danforth & Co
BANKERS Founded A.D. 1858
WASHINGTON ILLINOIS

The Passing of the Small Town Plant

How modern and efficient service is being brought to 70% of the country's population, how the growth of the Public Utility industry has surpassed the most favorable prophecies made ten years ago—these and many other interesting features are described in our free booklet, "The Passing of the Small Town Plant," by Martin J. Insull, Vice-President of the Middle West Utilities Co. A short request on your business letter-head will bring you a free copy of the booklet by return mail together with BOND TOPICS, listing selected securities to yield

5½ to 8%

Please specify combination O-325

A. H. Bickmore & Co.
111 BROADWAY, N.Y.

Don't Wear a Truss

Brooks' Appliance, the modern scientific invention, the wonderful new discovery that relieves rupture, will be sent on trial. No obnoxious springs or pads.

MR. G. E. BROOKS

Brooks' Rupture Appliance

Has automatic Air Cushions. Binds and draws the broken parts together as you would a broken limb. No salves. No lies. Durable, cheap. Sent on trial to prove it. Protected by U. S. patents. Catalog and measure blanks mailed free. Send name and address today. Brooks Appliance Co., 4719 State St., Marshall, Mich.

With Low Shoes

The appearance of your ankles is even more important than usual. To insure faultlessly smooth hose—

Boston Garter

Velvet Grip

GEORGE FROST CO., BOSTON, MAKERS OF Velvet Grip Hose Supporters
For Women, Misses and Children

By the Way (Continued)

revealed the interesting fact that he was drawing 29s. out-of-work pay; children's allowance, 9s.; a military pension of 15s.; a club out-of-work pay, 20s.; while his wife was earning 50s. per week and her board. In these circumstances, asks the correspondent, why should the man work?

Queer points come up under Industrial Compensation Laws. One of the oddest was the loss by accident of a sixth toe; the ordinary five toes are specified and damage value stated in the law, but no value is placed on a sixth toe. The Commissioner, like a new Solomon, decided that the loss of a sixth toe did injure the foot and awarded $20 compensation. The account ends: "Going out, Dieptro [the injured man] shook hands with the Commissioner, and then the latter learned that he has five fingers and a thumb on each hand, as well as six toes on each foot."

An East African paper describes a duel between a motor and a lioness. The affair, it says, happened at night near Nairobi. The chauffeur noted a commotion in the bush near the road, then the gleaming eyes of an enraged wild animal. He accelerated his speed at the instant the lioness leaped. She struck the hood and was thrown far in advance of the car, whose wheels then passed over her. The dead lioness was finally loaded into the car and taken back to the town in triumph.

The native West Indian is the greatest controversialist of the tropic world, according to George O. Miller, author of "Prowling About Panama." He illustrates: "A young West Indian woman on the train in Costa Rica left her seat to speak to a friend and another girl slipped in next to the window. When the visitor returned, claims, charges, and countercharges began as to the ownership of the seat. With indescribable scorn the usurper said, 'Do you want a seat in my lap?' which provoked, 'Ah, now I see how you was raised!' 'Indeed, and you have no manners at all.' Back and forth the duel rages until the first claimant finds another seat, saying, 'I certainly does respect myself too highly to sit by the likes of you.' All this with the wholly inimitable British-Jamaican accent."

Nobody
ever Changes from
RAMESES
CIGARETTES
Don't ask why—try a box

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequaled for Community Sing

Send 35c. today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"
THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

Earn While You Learn

Take a position with the Brooklyn Public Library and join its Library Training Course where students are paid $50 per month after one month's experience. No examination necessary. Other positions carrying higher salaries are also open. For further information apply to Brooklyn Public Library, 28 Brevoort Place, Brooklyn, N. Y.

For Sale

AT

Mountain Lakes

NEW JERSEY

45 minutes by the Lackawanna from Hoboken

House, 10 rooms, 3 bathrooms. First floor: entrance hall, steam-heated solarium, living-room, dining-room, butler's pantry, etc. Second floor: 4 large corner rooms, 2 bathrooms, inclosed sleeping-porch over solarium. Third floor: 4 rooms and bath. Electricity, steam heat. Two-car garage, living quarters above—100-gallon gasoline tank, buried. Plot, 150 ft. frontage on boulevard, about 170 ft. frontage on lake; 440 ft. from boulevard to lake. Ground gradually sloping toward lake. 800 ft. elevation. Excellent boating, bathing, and fishing. Location unusually attractive—an ideal all-year-round home. Price $20,000; satisfactory terms can be arranged. Inspection by appointment. Address F. C. H., care of The Outlook.

Tours and Travel

CHRYSANTHEMUM SEASON

in the Far East

Join the AMERICAN EXPRESS tour under personal escort leaving San Francisco October 17 for a wonderful visit to Japan and China at the best season of the year.

ROUND-THE-WORLD extension of same tour. Write for itinerary.

AMERICAN EXPRESS

Travel Department

65 Broadway, New York
23 West Monroe St., Chicago
Market and 2d Sts., San Francisco

Hotels and Resorts

CONNECTICUT

THE WAYSIDE INN

New Milford, Litchfield Co., Conn. In the foothills of the Berkshires. Open all the year. An ideal place for your summer's rest. 2 hours from New York. Write for booklet. Mrs. J. E. Castle, Proprietor.

MAINE

SEBASCO ESTATES
A SUMMER RESORT

12 miles from Bath, Me. Located on eastern section Casco Bay, overlooking the ocean. 4 miles shore line. 300 acres consisting of farm, lakes, pine and spruce woods, hills. A hotel club with central dining hall, 20 bungalows. A select resort for nature-loving people. Accommodations available from August 15 to September 15. Our specialty is fresh caught sea food and garden vegetables. Weekly rates $15.50 to $22. All references. Address SEBASCO ESTATES CO., Sebascus, Maine.

MASSACHUSETTS

HOTEL PURITAN
Commonwealth Ave., Boston
THE DISTINCTIVE BOSTON HOUSE
Guests here call the Puritan one of the most homelike hotels in the world.
Your inquiries gladly answered and our booklet mailed.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little house by the sea. PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

Rock Ridge Hall, Wellesley Hills, Mass. Fine location. Large, breezy, screened piazza. Running water in bedrooms. Private baths. Eggs, berries, cream, chicken. Rates moderate.

NEW YORK CITY

Hotel Le Marquis

31st Street & Fifth Avenue
New York

Combines every convenience and home comfort, and commands itself to people of refinement wishing to live on American Plan and be within easy reach of social and dramatic centers.

Room and bath $4.50 per day with meals, or $2.50 per day without meals.
Illustrated Booklet gladly sent upon request.
JOHN P. TOLSON.

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

NEW YORK

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of wild-est Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, saddle horses. Tramps to surrounding mountain peaks, Lake George and Lake Champlain. Daying. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $16 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

PENNSYLVANIA

CASTLE INN

DELAWARE WATER GAP, PA.
Modern fireproof Hotel and Garage
Open until November
Also The Palmer, Lakewood, N. J.
Miss T. T. DOLBEY.

Health Resorts

Crest View Sanatorium
Greenwich, Ct. First-class in all respects, home comforts. H. M. HITCHCOCK, M.D.

Health Resorts

LINDEN

The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LATIMORE WALTER, M.D. (late of The Walter Sanatorium)

WANTED—TO CARE FOR IN SMALL NURSING HOME

convalescing and nervous cases. All conveniences, best of home cooking. Pleasantly situated on electric car line. For further information address Miss LOUELLA DAVIS, R. F. D. 2, Stone Hurst, Framingham, Mass.

"INTERPINES"

Beautiful, quiet, restful and homelike. Over 25 years of successful work. Thorough, reliable, dependable and ethical. Every comfort and convenience. Accommodations of superior quality. Disorder of the nervous system a specialty. Fred. W. Seward, Jr., M.D., Fred. W. Seward, Jr., M.D., Goshen, N. Y.

Apartments

WANTED—THREE APARTMENTS

unfurnished, in same building in New York City. No. 1. Containing living room or studio, dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms, bathroom and maid's room. No. 2. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. No. 3. Containing living-room or studio, bedroom and bath. Location preferably out of the usual beaten paths, something not usually rented if possible, and preferably in a private house altered for such purposes. Nothing south of Greenwich Village nor north of 72d Street will be considered. Occupancy October 1, 1918. Address CHARLES H. DAVIS, Bass River, Cape Cod, Mass.

Country Board

Overlooking Ocean

All winter proposition. Responsible retired professional gentleman, having large house within hour of New York City, desires few others of equal standing to join in co-operative plan in living simply and sanely and in accord with the reasonable features of the so-called health resorts of Europe and America. These really ill or believing they need medical attention need not respond. But any feeling that such conditions can without undue expense be avoided may find it advantageous to address 377, Outlook.

COUNTRY BOARD, New Jersey. Nurse's private home, excellent accommodations, few convalescents and elderly people requiring care. 65 Haisted St., East Orange, N. J.

Real Estate

CONNECTICUT

For Sale or Rent Charming house in ideal location near New England village. Three hours from New York. A. M. I., Mrs. J. S. CLARK, 1142 Madison Ave., New York.

MAINE

FOR SALE

ON PENOBSCOT BAY
OPPOSITE CASTINE

Fine old estate. About 300 acres, 1,000 cords wood, some timber, 1200 ft. shore frontage. 14-room house, 2 barns, orchard. Also adjoining farm 8 acres, 7-room cottage and barn. Good repair; now occupied. Sold as a going concern with stock and tools at $11,000. JONES SISTERS, West Brooksville, Maine.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

FOR SALE

Site and Buildings of Successful Camp Beautiful, safe, secluded. On well-known New Hampshire lake. Price moderate. Address Camp, P. O. Box 1,392, Philadelphia, Pa.

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential suburb of New York City. Half hour Grand Central; also near subway. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 50 x 100. Garages. Price $9,500. Full particulars from owner, 9,813, Outlook.

Real Estate

NEW YORK

Beautiful Farm Home
FOR SALE

24 acres, including 30 acres woodland, 6 miles from Hudson, N. Y. and N. Y. C. station, 1 1/2 miles from B. & A. station, 1 mile from Harlem station. Rural delivery and telephone. 12-room house with bath, hot-water heat, open fireplace, large Colonial hall, large veranda. Large lawn, beautiful shade trees. Fine view Catskill Mts. and Hudson Valley. Small cottage on place. 300 pear trees, 175 apple trees, fruit of all kinds. Large barn, poultry houses, carriage houses, garage, and windmill. Running water in all fields. Address WILHELM SMITH, Hudson, Columbia Co., N. Y. R. F. D. 1.

FOR SALE 14-room house at

Nyaek, N. Y.
Corner plot, 105x165. Gas, electricity, open plumbing, hot-water heat, garage, flowers, fruit, vegetables. $6,000. Inquire F. W. BABCOCK, 11 Broadway, New York.

SHELTER ISLAND
FOR SALE

Property on the main road, just beyond east of center, known as the Clyde house, with 15 1/2 acres, including two corner plots, tenant house, etc. Excellent opportunity for three building sites. Fine shade trees. For particulars address RALPH G. DUVAL, Shelter Island Heights, N. Y.

Shelter Island Heights, L. I.

FOR SALE—10-Room House

Two bathrooms. All modern improvements. Well furnished throughout. In perfect order. Large porches. R. FECHTER.

VERMONT

FOR SALE Camp and 31 acres of full-grown timber. Log cabin, six-foot fireplace, separate kitchen, quantities of blackberries. $1,500. Apply to owner at camp, Perkinsville, Vt., from August 4-25. FRANK R. BIGELOW.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

WANTED—450 Outlook readers to represent this publication this summer—and all through the year, if you like. You can easily earn $10 a week and more, simply by using an hour or two a day of your spare time. If you want extra spending money—and everybody does—write us for details of the Outlook's "part-time" plan. Simply address: Representatives, Division, Desk 2, The Outlook, 381 Fourth Ave., New York City.

WANTED—A party to buy a half interest in a blueberry tract in Washington County, Maine. $6,000 required. Good interest on investment. Best of references given and references required. Inquire of Hillard C. Schoppe, 41 Fifth St., Bangor, Maine.

FOR THE HOME

WILD blackberry jelly and other unusual delicacies. Alma Hibbard, Gansevoort, N. Y.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

CLERK wanted, September 1, in Protestant orphanage near New York. Refused, intelligent, pleasant woman between 25 and 45, to attend to mail, parcels, phone, children's visitors, typing menus, various lists, etc. Permanent resident position, delightful location, refined, homelike atmosphere. 7,193, Outlook.

WANTED—Young, educated, unmarried woman, not nurse or matron, to help entertain and do shopping for women patients at small private hospital for mild mental and nervous affections. Wages $40 monthly and maintenance. State age, education, and give references. Address George H. Torney, 300 South Street, Brookline, Mass.

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CM37 Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

WANTED—Bright, active, well educated young woman, preferably college woman, to act as private secretary. Need not have much business experience, but able to take dictation rapidly, though not necessarily rapid typewriter. In answering give full information as to business experience and where educated. 7,203, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

HOUSEMOTHER wanted in Episcopal boy's boarding school near New York. Duties include general oversight of minor ailments, outside trained nurse being engaged for special difficulties. Salary $700 and living. Applications should give full details. 7,223, Outlook.

WANTED—Mother's helper to care for two children, one and five years. Light housework, assist with two older children. Good wages. Mrs. R. H. Sloan, 101 Clinton Ave., New Brighton, S. I.

KITCHEN EXECUTIVE for family of 30 to 50. Unmarried Protestant woman with good head for detail and a worker. Permanent position; liberal compensation; good home. Dr. Baright, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

WANTED MOTHER'S HELPER or WORKING HOUSEKEEPER. No maids kept, but outside help is furnished. House has all modern conveniences. Reply to Mrs. Estabrook, Deerfield, Mass.

HELP WANTED

Companions and Domestic Helpers

DIETITIAN, cafeteria managers, governesses, matrons, housekeepers. Miss Richards, Box 5, East Side Station, Providence, R. I.

WANTED—Young woman (Protestant) attendant for little girls in boarding school. Sewing required. References. Address Box 315, Brattleboro, Vt.

WANTED—A reliable woman, good New England cook, for a family of four in a 10-ner cottage at Edgartown, Martha's Vineyard, Mass., for the remainder of the summer and to return to Cambridge, Mass., for the rest of the year. Please communicate with Mrs. C. W. C., Edgartown, Mass.

WANTED—Mother's assistants with children and household duties. Box 15, South Windsor, Conn.

WANTED—Couple, active, industrious, under 45 years, year round position, town 5 miles from New York. Wife cook and general houseworker, husband useful man in and about home. Best references required. Remuneration liberal for right persons. Replying, state nationality. 7,233, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

WANTED, August 24, governess for child four years old. American, Protestant. One who can speak French preferred. Permanent position if satisfactory. 7,179, Outlook.

WANTED by September 13 tutor for three boys, ages 6, 9, and 13. Winter months spent in California. Must be experienced, unmarried, fond of athletics, and of Protestant faith, and have first-class recommendations. H. H. Timken, Canton, Ohio.

WANTED—COMPETENT governess for three children, ages 6, 7, 10 years. DESIRE an experienced teacher who will give thorough physical training. MUST live in CUBA during winter. PREFER CATHOLIC woman from 25 to 35 years. EXCELLENT home and salary. BEST references given and required. ADDRESS 7,198, OUTLOOK.

SEWING teacher and supervisor. All day non-resident position New York City. 7,234, Outlook.

INQUIRIES already coming in for teachers in all subjects for 1919. International Manual and Educational Agency, Carnegie Hall N. Y.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Business Situations

CHAUFFEUR would like position with private family. Courteous and efficient. Seven years' experience with cars. References regarding character and ability. 7,240, Outlook.

LADY wishes position as manager of luncheon or apartment hotel. Would leave. 7,241, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

LADY desires to place her excellent English nurse with family going to England or France in early fall. Will take charge of children or invalid in return for passage. Absolutely reliable. Write Mrs. Theodore Lilley, Toland, Mass.

WIDOW desires supervising elderly gentleman's home. South winters. References. 7,200, Outlook.

REFINED and experienced widow desires position as matron in cottage at school or college. Best of references. 7,234, Outlook.

EXPERIENCED seamstress desires position in college. Darning and mending a specialty. Best of references. 7,233, Outlook.

EXPERIENCED traveler would chaperone young lady to China and India. Expenses paid and salary. References. 7,233, Outlook.

LADY desires position as mother's helper, companion, housekeeper, or any position of trust; fond of and accustomed to children. Experienced, capable and highly recommended. 7,247, Outlook.

HOUSEKEEPER-COMPANION. Position by lady of experience, capability, and refinement. 7,242, Outlook.

CULTURED woman, unencumbered, experienced foreign and home travel, desires position as companion, managing housekeeper, matron, or housemother. 7,244, Outlook.

MALE nurse desires chronic patient. References. 7,229, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

TEACHER of mathematics and French wishes position. 7,163, Outlook.

LADY in New York will tutor and also coach socially younger woman of good character and natural refinement. Confidential. 7,221, Outlook.

YOUNG woman, college graduate, as tutor or companion at seaside or mountains. Immediately. Highest references. 7,225, Outlook.

EXPERIENCED teacher with normal domestic science diploma and some college training is open to engagement for the coming year. Address R. F. W., 129 Riverdale Drive, Northampton, Mass.

MISCELLANEOUS

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Francis Parker Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

WANTED, for young woman slightly abnormal, home where no others are taken, with trained or experienced woman. Address, giving experience and terms, 7,239, Outlook.

SUITE of rooms, modern home, in exchange to Christian couple for care of 2 children while mother is at business during summer. References exchanged. 35 minutes to Grand Central. Box 438, Harrison, N. Y.

M. W. Wightman & Co. Shipyards established 1895. No charge; prompt delivery. 44 West 22d St., New York.

AN APPEAL FOR ARMENIA

I have just finished reading "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," and it has made such an impression upon me that I feel every American should do something to help definitely that long-suffering nation—Armenia.

Germany was responsible for Turkey's cruel endeavors to exterminate the Armenians. She alone could have prevented these crimes, which, Ambassador Morgenthau said, were crimes that cried to heaven.

The deportation of men, women, and children originated in Germany's brain, and is acknowledged as one of the most cruel inventions of this inhuman warfare. If Germany had won the war, a similar fate might have awaited our women and children.

As a thank-offering, can not the women of the United States send a petition to Washington asking that we, the United States, act as a mandatory Power for a term of years for Armenia, so that it will be impossible for Turkey to control that country again?

The few who have escaped massacre should surely have guarantees from the civilized nations of the world that they be allowed to form a nation, protected from future aggression and tyranny of Turkey.

It would involve great sacrifices on the part of the United States, but why should not we, the richest and most powerful Nation in the world, be willing to make this sacrifice? It is a wonderful opportunity for a great moral influence throughout the world.

H. A. P.

New Canaan, Conn.

FAIRNESS TO NIETZSCHE

I must take issue with the communication in The Outlook of July 30 in which the principles of Jesus are lauded as perfect and as being victorious in the great war, and those of Nietzsche are regarded as evil and as being overthrown. Nietzsche, I know, was entirely in error on some questions; but on many he was largely in the right, and along these lines he has greatly benefited humanity. He revolted from the meekness that submits to oppression and dishonor, the sympathy that maintains degenerates and parasites, and the unselfishness that suppresses individuality and efficiency. He extolled the courage that fights and endures, the health that lives and enjoys, and the genius that creates and achieves. That he went too far in his doctrines no fair-minded person denies. But what other great teacher did not go too far? Even Jesus was no exception.

I read Nietzsche's principal books before the war and noticed no Pan-German views and do not believe such views were in his mind. He appeared rather to champion the superman characteristics in humanity in general, regardless of nationalities.

Some of Jesus' principles have been strengthened by the Allied victory, but the same must be said of some of Nietzsche's. The doctrine of love emerges stronger than that of ruthlessness; but, on the other hand, the doctrine of power and courage appears more admirable than that of non-resistance and submission.

My conclusion, reached before the war, was that rationalist religion must take its stand between the two extremes of self-assertion and self-suppression, and I have seen no reason during the war or since for changing my attitude. Let us have fairness to Nietzsche no less than to other teachers.

CYRUS H. ESHLEMAN.

Ludington, Michigan, August 7, 1919.

Indigestion a handicap to business success

A FEELING of heaviness after eating with the attendant annoyances that come with slight attacks of indigestion will sooner or later depress the most hopeful and optimistic. No person in business can do his or her best under these conditions.

In the great majority of cases, this type of indigestion is much less severe than its character and effects seem to indicate. Indeed, if men and women will eat more regularly, and less hurriedly, use greater care in selecting their food—especially at midday—and make a practice of chewing a stick of my original pepsin gum for ten to twenty minutes after each meal, they will be surprised and gratified at the prompt relief from their indigestion. And don't forget, removing the handicap of indigestion means a substantial gain in mental and business efficiency.

NEW-SKIN

For Small Skin-Hurts

A convenient antiseptic first-aid preparation for emergency use. Always keep a bottle in the house.

"Never Neglect a Break in the Skin."

Be sure you get New-Skin, not an inferior substitute. Smile, but insist.

All Druggists—15 and 30 cents.

NEWSKIN CO.
NEW YORK

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequaled for Patriotic Gatherings

Send 35c today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"

THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

If you are a teacher

you will find it worth your while to read the advertisement on the inside of the front cover—and to act upon it.

PISO'S

for Coughs & Colds

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122    August 20, 1919    No. 16

THE OUTLOOK IS FURNISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. H. T. FULFILER, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. HOYT, TREASURER. ERNEST H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAVERS D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER

Labor Troubles .....	593
The B. R. T. Strike.....	593
The Shopmen's Strike.....	593
President Wilson and the Shopmen.....	593
The Thirteen Original Suffrage States....	594
The Archduke Joseph.....	594
Cartoons of the Week.....	595
Hungary and Rumania.....	596
Andrew Carnegie: The Wealth-Maker; the Wealth-Giver.....	596
J. Edward Addicks.....	597
The Family Budget and Women's Pay..	597
Strikes.....	597
The Race Problem and the School.....	599
Radicalism in the Making.....	599
Special Correspondence of The Outlook from Frederick M. Davenport
Shanting: Should the Peace Treaty Have Given Japan a Foothold There? A Discussion Pro and Con:
I—The Injustice to China.....	601
By Elizabeth Washburn Wright
II—The Case for Japan.....	602
By Everett P. Wheeler
What Does the Negro Want? The Answer of the Douglass Public School	604
By R. H. Leavell
From the Diary of a Traveling Salesman	606
By J. Annan
Current Events Illustrated.....	607
The Book Table: Devoted to Books and Their Makers.....	612
Weekly Outline Study of Current History	614
By J. Madison Gathory, A.M.
An Appeal for Armenia.....	589
Fairness to Nietzsche.....	589
An Appeal for Working Girls.....	614
The Philippines and the Filipinos.....	616
A Tribute from an English Scholar to American Students.....	617
By the Way.....	618

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents.
For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage.
Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.50.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY
381 Fourth Avenue    New York City

TEACHERS' AGENCIES

The Pratt Teachers Agency

70 Fifth Avenue, New York
Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools.
Advices parents about schools. Wm. O. Pratt, Mgr.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES MASSACHUSETTS

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Courses in Short-Story Writing, Verification, Journalism, Play Writing, Photoplay Writing, etc., taught personally by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein.

Dr. Esenwein for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, especially valuable for its full reports of the literary market. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

150-page illustrated catalogue free
Please address

The Home Correspondence School
Dept. 58, Springfield, Mass.

ESTABLISHED 1897    INCORPORATED 1904

NEW YORK

GLENS FALLS ACADEMY

Chester Street, Glens Falls, N. Y.

Day school for Boys and Girls in the Lake George country, located in Glens Falls, N. Y., the beautiful and beautiful city of the upper Hudson among the foothills of the Adirondacks. Established eighty years. Prepares for all colleges. Nine in Faculty. Vocational guidance emphasized. Boarding homes in connection with academy. Most desirable places for families to locate to educate children. Address J. THOMAS BRANA, Headmaster, A.B. Harvard, Graduate School, Columbia.

PENNSYLVANIA

AUBREY HALL

Backward and mentally defective children taught individually by experienced teachers under the supervision of an eminent nerve specialist. Torrens, Philadelphia, Pa.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

St. John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses

YONKERS, NEW YORK

Registered in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a general training to refined, educated women. Requirements one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the Directress of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

SEXOLOGY

by William H. Walling, A.M., M.D.

Imparts in one volume:

- Knowledge a Young Man Should Have.
- Knowledge a Young Husband Should Have.
- Knowledge a Father Should Have.
- Knowledge a Father Should Impart to His Son.
- Medical Knowledge a Husband Should Have.

Also includes other kindred subjects.
All in one volume. Illustrated. $2.99 postpaid.
Write for "Other People's Opinions" and Table of Contents.
Puritan Pub. Co., 1768 Perry Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

"The Most Beautiful Hymnal in the American Church"

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett, Editors

The Hymnal for the New Social Era

Adapted to all Evangelical Denominations

Prices $2 and $1.25 per hundred.

Returnable copy sent on request

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 202 E. 4th St., CHICAGO

Digitized by

Do you know that—a hot surface of this measured area wastes 127½ pounds of coal each year?

Few people realize that this condition exists if the temperature within a pipe, for example, is 230° Fahrenheit (the temperature of steam at 5 lbs. pressure) and the temperature of the air surrounding the pipe is 70° Fahrenheit—a very moderate condition.

If it is steam heat—

Size of steam pipe.
3" ....	$ .95
4" ....	1.40
6" ....	1.80
8" ....	2.20
10" ....	2.65

The waste in dollars per year per linear foot of pipe, coal at $10.00 per ton, 1 lb. steam pressure—temperature of air around pipe 70° Fahrenheit.

Read the remedy to the right.

If it is hot-air heat—

Size of hot-air pipe.
8" ....	$1.65
10" ....	1.85
12" ....	2.10
14" ....	2.45

The waste in dollars per year per linear foot of pipe, coal at $10.00 per ton. Air in pipe 150° Fahrenheit—air around pipe 70°.

Read the remedy to the right.

If it is hot-water heat—

Size of hot-water pipe.
3" ....	$ .67
4" ....	1.00
6" ....	1.25
8" ....	1.55
10" ....	1.85

The loss in dollars per year per linear foot of pipe, coal at $10.00 per ton. Water in pipe 180° Fahrenheit. Air around pipe 70° Fahrenheit.

Read the remedy to the right.

EVERY hot surface radiates heat. If this heat goes where it is not required, it is wasted and so is the coal that was burned to produce it. Opposite are some actual figures on such wastes—based on average conditions in American homes like yours.

The Remedy

Insulation correctly designed, manufactured and applied will reduce heat loss from hot surfaces as much as 90%. Efficient insulation must be made of material that does not conduct heat and that combines with this property the necessary strength and durability.

Johns-Manville Asbestocel Insulation has all these desirable characteristics. It is made for application to steam, hot-air and hot-water systems. Other Johns-Manville Materials: Sponge felt and 85% Magnesia for high pressure steam, Anti-Sweat and Zero for cold water, Combination Built-Up for Brine and Ammonia.

Inspect your heating plant for exposed hot surfaces on pipes, boilers and heaters, and for sections not properly insulated. Have your steamfitter apply Asbestocel to pipes, boilers or heaters, sealing all cracks and joints, finishing boiler and heater surfaces with Johns-Manville Insulating Cement. In this way you will save the added coal that must be burned when there is waste.

H. W. JOHNS-MANVILLE CO., New York City
10 Factories—Branches in 63 Large Cities

Unfortunately many materials used for "covering" pipes are not efficient heat insulations—not only because their constituent materials are inferior, but because their construction is incorrect or faulty.

To aid you in buying, Asbestocel is shown here in two forms:

In sectional form for fitting around steam and hot-water pipes.

In flexible roll form, for fitting around hot-air pipes, heaters, etc.

We recommend Asbestocel rather than air cell because of its construction, viz: the cells run around the pipe—not lengthwise, thus preventing circulation of air.

JOHNS-MANVILLE

Serves in Conservation

A Luxury Yesterday- A Necessity Today

The generation of people who locked up their silverware in cupboards and cabinets has given way to the generation which understands that silverware is made to use as well as to admire.

At your jeweler's you will find new proof of the adage that the luxuries of yesterday are the necessities of today.

In your home, and your friends' homes, are objects of silverware that fit into daily life and increase the comfort and pleasure of every member of the family.

Make additions to the silverware you already possess; buy more silverware for utility, as well as for ornament.

Buy it to use!

Gorham Sterling Silverware is sold by leading jewelers everywhere and bears this trade-mark:

THE GORHAM COMPANY

Silversmiths and Goldsmiths

New York

Works: Providence and New York

COPYRIGHT 1919

The Outlook

AUGUST 20, 1919

LABOR TROUBLES

LABOR unrest is a marked feature of post-war conditions.

As an instance of the fever spreading over the whole country, we have but to note that in New York City the workmen in at least a dozen industries are on strike and that in many other industries strikes are threatened.

The most picturesque of these movements in the metropolis is the Actors' Strike. The actors demand two things: (1) proper payment for overtime, and (2) recognition of the Actors' Equity Association. As to overtime, on holiday afternoons everywhere and on Sunday evenings in certain cities there are extra performances in addition to the normal number. For each such performance the striking actors demand payment proportionate to their normal weekly pay (this is surely modest as contrasted with the railway workers' slogan, "Time and a half for overtime"). As to recognition, the managers are also obdurate; they refuse to accept any system of arbitration. If they persist in this attitude, managers may possibly find their former employees competing with them, associations of actors running their own theaters. Meanwhile, though the movement has temporarily closed certain theaters, some popular actors and actresses have strengthened their hold upon the public by appearing in the streets in the new rôle of wage-earners on strike. The movement is not without its elements of humor.

THE B. R. T. STRIKE

Theater-going is generally a luxury. But transportation is a necessity. Hence a much more serious strike affecting New York City has been that on the Brooklyn Rapid Transit system. It brought to mind the Brooklyn street-car strike of 1895, which was characterized by a period of lawlessness, violence, and bloodshed worse than any the recent strike has seen and which was not terminated until some seven thousand militiamen were called out. However, in this year's strike the city authorities did not do their whole duty; indeed, it was claimed that the strike would have ended quickly if employees who wanted to do a day's work and were loyal to the company had been protected by the police in sufficient force. The strike was called to obtain seventy-five cents an hour for carmen and proportionate increases for those in other departments, the reinstatement of employees discharged for union activities, and especially the recognition of the Amalgamated Association, a general association of all the electric street-car employees in the country. The Brooklyn Rapid Transit system has been in the hands of a receiver, namely, ex-Secretary of War Garrison, who was appointed by United States Judge Julius Mayer. Mr. Garrison declined to recognize the Amalgamated Association or to confer with a committee representing it, on the ground that it did not represent a majority of the employees of the Brooklyn company. Judge Mayer upheld Mr. Garrison in this attitude. On the sensible theory that, whether we like it or not, we should confer with, although we may not knuckle down to, those with whom we disagree, Public Service Commissioner Lewis Nixon by the following plan brought the strike leaders to the point where they called off the strike:

1. A count of the B. R. T. employees, in the classification affected by the strike, to ascertain whether fifty per cent belong to the Amalgamated Association, the result to form the basis of future dealings between Receiver Garrison and the employees.
2. Receiver Garrison to receive a committee of employees.
3. In case of failure of the Receiver and the committee to reach an agreement, a Board of Arbitration to be called into being.
4. All parties to abide by the Board's decision.

THE SHOPMEN'S STRIKE

Owing to its immense New York City suburban traffic from points in Connecticut and Westchester County, New York, the shopmen's strike on the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railway system for a wage increase has severely affected the metropolis. The long-distance passenger service has also been crippled, for the company has been compelled to suspend about a hundred and fifty trains and to discontinue parlor-car and dining-car services. Of course, as a result, the Sound steamers have been crowded to their chair capacity. In addition to curtailing passenger service freight shipments have also been affected, and many New England towns are said to be facing a food shortage. The only goods accepted for shipment have been perishable foodstuffs, milk, and ice.

In the Middle West the shopmen's strike, involving several hundred thousand men in its ultimate analysis, is in process of settlement. In many shops and yards foremen, yardmasters, and officials have "turned to," manning switch engines and attending to repair work. It will mean an expenditure of over two hundred million dollars to grant the shopmen's demand. Then there are the trackmen's demands, though fortunately no strike at present accentuates those demands any more than the demands of engineers, firemen, conductors, brakemen, train crews, and clerks. The total sum involved in granting all these demands would exceed eight hundred million dollars.

PRESIDENT WILSON AND THE SHOPMEN

The reason why some shopmen have now returned to work is not difficult to discover. It is due to President Wilson. On August 17, in a letter from Mr. Wilson to Walker D. Hines, Director-General of Railroads, the President notes that the question of the wages of railway shopmen was submitted to the Wage Board last February, but was not reported upon until July 16, an unavoidable delay because the Board was continuously engaged in dealing with wage matters affecting classes of employees who had not previously received consideration. The Board having apprised the Director-General of its inability, at any rate for the time being, to agree upon a recommendation, the President authorized the Director-General to say to the shopmen that the question of wages would be taken up and considered in conference with the duly accredited representatives of those men, but—and this is a big but—any action which brings the authority of authorized representatives into question or discredits it must interfere with, if not prevent, action altogether. "The chief obstacle to a decision," justly declared Mr. Wilson, "has been created by the men themselves." He proceeded:

They have gone out on strike and repudiated the authority of their officers at the very moment when they were urging action. . . . Various strikes actually took place before there was opportunity to act in a satisfactory or conclusive way with respect to the wages. In the presence of these strikes . . . there can be no consideration of the matter in controversy. Until the employees return to work . . . the whole matter must be at a standstill. . . . This is a time when every employee of the railways should help to make the processes of transportation more easy and economical rather than less, and employees who are on strike are deliberately delaying a settlement of their

Yes, we could give a lawn mower or something or other with every subscription to The Outlook.
But we don't give a thing!
And yet we have 100,000 subscribers.
Must be some reason.

yes, you would have perhaps 200,000 subscribers and your advertising columns would treble were it not for the fact that we hyphens here pledged to remember your ~~written~~ Anti-German Campaign before we were at war with Germany and we are doing all we possibly can to touch you where it hurts most, namely at your pocket book.

Only the other day the writer's brother in law the advertising manager of a firm making national advertised goods was induced to keep their Adv. out of your publication and placed it in other magazines whose publishers had enough sense to keep quiet at that time.

There are 20 Million of us who have your number and we are aware of the fact that now is our turn to get even.

One of the 20,000,000

rotten

The Outlook has received an anonymous letter, posted in Chicago, of which the above is a photographic reproduction. It is a reply to an Outlook advertisement published in a Chicago paper and cut out and pasted at the head of the letter by its pro-German author. This communication is a pleasant example of that German Kultur upon which we commented editorially last week. Ordinarily anonymous letters deserve only to be thrown in the waste-basket. But we print this one because it is so typical of German methods and the German spirit during the Great War—a spirit which still seems to be unchastened in many quarters wage problems. . . . They should promptly return to work, and I hope you will urge upon their representatives the immediate necessity for their doing so.

Mr. Hines at once complied and urged equal compliance upon Mr. Jewell, Acting President of the Railway Employees Department of the American Federation of Labor. Accordingly, on August 7 Mr. Jewell sent a message to the officers and members of all shopcraft affiliated with the Railway Employees Department of the Federation of Labor in which he asked them to return to their work, as requested by Mr. Wilson, adding these wise words: "Failure of the membership to comply with these instructions will, in our judgment, impair the usefulness of our organizations as well as have a detrimental effect upon the entire labor movement."

THE THIRTEEN ORIGINAL SUFFRAGE STATES

With the ratification of the National Suffrage Amendment by the Legislatures of Arkansas and Montana, the suffragists' list of the "thirteen original States" was completed. To the mystic thirteen Nebraska has now been added for good measure.

The thirteen States on the roll are Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, New York, Kansas, Ohio, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Texas, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, and Montana. Wisconsin, Illinois, and Michigan contended for leading in ratification, all of them ratifying immediately upon the passage of the Amendment by Congress. Wisconsin achieved this position through the initiative of the suffragists of the State in sending the certified statement of Wisconsin's ratification to Washington by a special messenger. In this way Wisconsin's ratification reached the State Department at Washington before that of any other State, and the State was thereupon given an official notice that it led the forty-eight States in ratification. Illinois was in point of time the first to ratify, but owing to an error in the text of the Amendment as received from the State Department at Washington her ratification was held invalid and a second vote had to be taken by the Legislature on the corrected text.

Of the States which have ratified, only four—Illinois, Wisconsin, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania—did so at the regular session of the Legislature. Three States which have ratified—Michigan, Ohio, and Texas—did so at special sessions called for some other purpose than the consideration of suffrage. Five States—New York, Kansas, Iowa, Missouri, and Arkansas—ratified at sessions called especially for the suffrage ratification. One State, Montana, ratified at a special session called for the consideration of the Suffrage Amendment and the draft.

Since the Suffrage Amendment passed Congress there have been only six States whose Legislatures have met in regular session. All of these have acted on suffrage—favorably in the four cases already cited and unfavorably in the remaining two, Alabama and Georgia. Since the Amendment passed Congress there have been special sessions in nine States, some of which were called for suffrage and some for other purposes. Of these nine, all have acted favorably on the ratification.

While Democratic leaders have led the Republicans in the public profession of support of ratification, the only two States which have defeated ratification are solidly Democratic. Of the thirteen States which have ratified seven are preponderantly Republican, two are preponderantly Democratic, and four are divided between the two parties. As against the two solidly Democratic anti-suffrage States, Alabama and Georgia, which defeated ratification, the Republicans show two strongly Republican anti-suffrage States, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, which both ratified.

THE ARCHDUKE JOSEPH

If Italy ever becomes a Republic, King Victor Emmanuel's ambition is to be its first President. He likes to think of himself, not as King, but as the first citizen of the state.

In the same way, for many years the

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

Rehse in the New York World

KEEPING HIM AFTER SCHOOL

Greene in the New York Evening Telegram

BIRDS OF A FEATHER

Pease in the Newark Evening News

UNCLE SAM WILL FEEL SMALL IF HE HAS TO ASK THAT

Darling in the New York Tribune

Copyright, 1919, New York Tribune, Inc.

ONE AT A TIME, PLEASE, GENTLEMEN

Clubb in the Rochester Herald

AFTER WAR COMES PEACE

Thomas in the Detroit News

THEY NEVER COME BACK

people of Hungary have regarded the Archduke Joseph. He is quite the opposite of our idea of a Hapsburg. He is the one member of that family who has always been a Hungarian. He has spent his life in work among the poor and unfortunate and in strengthening the power of labor. He holds the titles of doctor of laws and doctor of technical sciences at the University of Budapest, and the title of doctor of medicine at the University of Kolozsvár. He is a Field Marshal in the army. In 1918 he headed a movement looking toward securing independence for Hungary from Austria, and on the collapse of the Dual Empire he and his son renounced all rights as members of the house of Hapsburg and took the oath to submit unconditionally to the orders of the Hungarian National Council.

At first the new Government was headed by Count Karolyi. Then, as in Russia, the Bolsheviks got control and maintained it until the present month. They were led by one Bela Kun. He promised land to the peasants, only to frustrate their hopes; he imposed a sort of State Socialism on the city workmen; he oppressed the propertied and the professional classes; he formed an army largely out of Marshal von Mackensen's left-over German troops, and proceeded to attack the Czechoslovaks and the Rumanians. Little by little the Hungarians made their two wants felt—(1) food; (2) a really representative government.

The Allied Supreme Council at Paris promised food and recognition if the Hungarians would oust Bela—indeed, they sent some food as an earnest of good faith. But all efforts to overcome the Bolsheviks were unavailing until the Rumanians marched into Hungary. Then Bela fled, taking an enormous sum of money with him.

HUNGARY AND RUMANIA

The Hungarians set up a Moderate Socialist Government, but it lasted only a few days; it was seen to be not strong enough, and was succeeded by the present Liberal Government with the Archduke Joseph as Chief of State. A constituent assembly is to be held to decide definitely Hungary's future. The elections to it are to be conducted on the system of universal suffrage; every man and woman over twenty-four years of age is to have a vote. The Supreme Council at Paris, it is understood, glad to see Hungary at last under a government willing to execute the terms of last November's armistice, is disposed to recognize the Archduke and to invite him to send delegates to Paris to conclude a treaty of similar nature to that now under way with Austria. It has been rumored that, because the new head of state at Budapest is a Hapsburger, Hungary will again become a monarchy, to be followed by Austria. Whether these countries have a republican or monarchical form of government is not in the Supreme Council's purview.

The Council, however, addressed a sharp protest to the Rumanians, who have now advanced to Budapest, inviting them to retire; otherwise the supply of food from the Entente would cease. It remains to be seen whether the Rumanians will pay any more attention to this than to the Council's previous order requesting them not to advance farther into Hungary than a certain distance from the capital. The only rejoinder has come from Nicholas Misu, the Rumanian delegate at Paris, who is reported as saying:

We feel that we have done the Peace Conference and the entire world a service by giving the Hungarians an opportunity to set up a representative government. Furthermore, we were forced to march against Budapest in self-defense. Hungary attacked us and the Bolsheviks threatened to overwhelm us from two sides.

It is true that Rumania has thus been doing the world's work. Yet it would not be human nature for her to refrain from indemnifying herself in Hungary for the live stock and locomotives captured by the Hungarians in Rumania, or not to regard her capture of Budapest as an offset for the Hungarian capture of Bucharest. But Rumania's greater rôle just now lies in acting as a balance for Hungary. The Rumanians are the real masters of the situation.

ANDREW CARNEGIE: THE WEALTH-MAKER

"What Mecca is to the Mohammedans, that is Dunfermline to me," Andrew Carnegie was wont to say. He was born in that Scottish town in 1835, two years before Queen Victoria came to the throne. In Dunfermline the famous Malcolm, the greater Robert Bruce, and other Scottish kings are buried. In such a place Andrew became full of enthusiasm for his country's history and its national heroes, such as Bruce, Wallace, and Burns. But there he also began to long for a wider democracy than any in Scotland. To that democracy, America, he was, of course, to take a Scotch thrift. Every morning his Dunfermline school was opened by religious exercises, when each boy had to repeat a proverb from the Bible. When it came to Andrew's turn, this eight-year-old proclaimed: "Take care of your pence, the pounds will take care of themselves."

Dunfermline's main industry was weaving. Andrew's father was a master weaver and an employer of apprentices. But when the steam loom was introduced with the factory system of labor, the hand loom had to go and the Carnegie family too. Some of their relations were already prospering at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and the family decided to follow their example. The Carnegies came to America on a sailing vessel—a seven weeks' voyage. Arriving at Pittsburgh, Mr. Carnegie obtained a position in a cotton factory, and the twelve-year-old Andrew began his business career then as a bobbin boy at $1.20 a week.

Andrew's next job was to fire the boiler and run the steam-engine of a small factory—a heavy task for a boy of thirteen.

At fourteen Andrew became a telegraph boy with a salary of three dollars a week. Then he was promoted to the position of operator. Fortunately, one of those who came to the office was the late Thomas A. Scott, then superintendent of the Pittsburgh Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad (a position Andrew Carnegie was later to occupy). When the Civil War broke out, Mr. Scott was made Assistant Secretary of War and gave young Carnegie an immensely extended field of service.

Mr. Carnegie's fortune may be said to be due first to his foresight in recognizing what the future would bring—first, that the day of wooden railway bridges was over; he started the Keystone Bridge Works for the manufacture of iron bridges. Later he realized that iron would be displaced by steel in many directions, especially in rails. He erected a plant for the Bessemer process of steel manufacture. Then he saw that he must acquire vast tracts of new land containing mineral resources, and went 900 miles for it. He bought steamers to carry the ore across the Great Lakes and built his own railway to carry it thence to Pittsburgh. He was now indeed the "steel master."

THE POWER THAT COMES FROM KNOWING MEN

But in attaining that position he relied upon two other factors besides his foresight. One was his genius for organization; the other, his knowledge of human nature. The first quality was evident in the concerns he formed, which eventually became the chief factor in the United States Steel Corporation; the second is evident in his own words:

I do not believe that any one man can make a success of a business nowadays. I am sure I never could have done so without my partners. I know that every one of them would have smiled at the idea of my being his superior, though the principal stockholder. The way they differed from me and beat me many a time was delightful to behold. I never enjoyed anything more than to get a sound thrashing in an argument at the hands of these young geniuses.

Such was the friendly, smiling, sprightly

Andrew Carnegiewe have known; of short white hair and beard; of shrewd, keen eyes; of alert bearing; of restless manner; of buoyant temperament, which, with his quick sense of humor, gave a youthful touch-and-go to his talk.

THE WEALTH-GIVER

"The day is not far distant," Mr. Carnegie once said, "when the man who dies leaving behind him millions of available wealth which was free for him to administer during life will pass away unwept, unhonored, and unsung." So he began to give away money. Before his death he gave away over $350,000,000, though his fortune at the time of his death was still huge.

His first benefactions took the form of Public Library Buildings. The thought of devoting his money to this purpose was suggested by his boyhood acquaintance with Colonel Anderson, of Pittsburgh, who had the praiseworthy habit of lending any of his four hundred books on Saturday afternoons. Young Andrew eagerly looked forward to these afternoons. He resolved then that if he ever became rich he would found free libraries. The results derived from the expenditure of the $70,000,000 he gave would doubtless have been greater had the donation been made more definitely in accord with the spirit of Colonel Anderson's practice.

Then came the famous "Foundations;" the Pittsburgh Carnegie Institute; the Carnegie Institution, with its seat at Washington; the Hero Fund; the Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching; the Endowment for International Peace; and, finally, the Carnegie Corporation of New York, which was to act as a trustee for all future gifts.

It is noteworthy that Mr. Carnegie never contributed to the support of a church; he did, however, establish the so-called Church Peace Union, and gave generously towards the purchase of church organs. He would say of them:

I am a devoted lover of music. I give organs to churches because I am willing to be responsible for everything the organs say, but I could not be responsible for all that is said from the pulpit.

No matter how much people may criticize Mr. Carnegie's personal idiosyncrasies or his political and social theories, one thing is certain—the world gained much because he lived in it as a maker and as a distributor of wealth.

J. EDWARD ADDICKS

There died in New York on August 7 in obscurity and poverty a man who fifteen years ago was a notorious National figure—J. Edward Addicks. Having made very large sums of money out of the manipulation of the stocks and property of gas companies in various parts of the country, he essayed to buy his way into the United States Senate through the State of Delaware. His attempt was as brazen and sordid a piece of political corruption as had ever been tried in this country. Indeed, it was so flagrant that The Outlook undertook to arouse a National protest against it. In 1903 The Outlook commissioned George Kennan, who had been the staff correspondent of The Outlook in many important undertakings, to go to Delaware, make a careful study of the situation, and a frank and fearless exposé of the Addicks case. This, with his characteristic and painstaking accuracy, Mr. Kennan did. He collected indisputable evidence and arranged and indexed it with the greatest care, so that if any member of the Addicks ring should sue The Outlook for libel we should have a clear-cut defense.

Mr. Kennan's story was told in three articles published in The Outlook in February, 1903. They not only aroused the attention of the country, but the vindictive ire of Addicks and his gang, so that Mr. Kennan was warned that he was in danger of personal violence if he even passed through Wilmington on the train in going from New York to Washington. Addicks did not succeed in buying a Senatorial seat, although he spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in his attempt, and we are proud to say that the investigations of Mr. Kennan and his articles in The Outlook were generally considered to be the most important factor in his defeat. In entering this fight against Addicks The Outlook said editorially:

We have done what we could by these articles to aid the small and heroic band who in Delaware are fighting a National battle against wholesale, flagrant, and scarcely concealed corruption. It is in vain for the politician or the editor to shrug his shoulders and say, It is incredible that the whole community should be bought. The answer is, The incredible is true.

As we look back to this degraded episode in American politics, it is a matter of satisfaction to know that, with the co-operation of The Outlook, George Kennan was able to deal the kind of a blow in defense of American political freedom that some years before he dealt, by his articles in the "Century Magazine," on the Siberian exile system, in behalf of Russian freedom.

THE FAMILY BUDGET AND WOMEN'S PAY

Organized-trade women at Washington have inaugurated a campaign for a new family budget to be considered by the Congressional Reclassification Commission now engaged in fixing the amount of compensation to be paid Government employees. The labor women seek to have the hitherto typical family budget of the husband, wife, and three children matched by the 1919 budget of the workingwoman, her adult dependents, and her children, that the woman in industry may be given the same minimum living-wage basis as the man engaged in gainful pursuits.

The women interested in the Reclassification Commission's operations are fearful that an effort will be made to allow men higher salaries, on the assumption that they have dependents to support. The Washington branch of the National Women's Trade Union League has made its first move to forestall this idea by holding meetings with the women of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where Uncle Sam's paper money is made. This place was chosen because here there are four thousand women employed, seventy per cent of whom have dependents ranging in number from one to seven persons, say the organized-trade women. These women have been urged by the organization to prepare data about their living costs for presentation to the Reclassification Commission to show that their expenses are as heavy as that of the average man.

One of the arguments to be used in the campaign to get a typical woman-in-industry budget recognized is that the woman's dependents are usually adult persons, and therefore more expensive than minor children. Parents, crippled brothers, or invalid sisters, declare the League, are common dependents upon the wages of the woman worker. They are also contending that the notion about women entering industry to earn "pin money" is done away with completely in these days, and they are making a strenuous effort to prove with statistics from many of the Government departments that this can be borne out by figures.

STRIKES

THE fact that the whole civilized world is now earnestly bent upon the construction of some plan to do away with political wars, while only a few far-seeing leaders appear deeply to realize that the English-speaking world is living in a continuous state of costly and dangerous labor warfare, is an illustration of the curious and inconsequential way in which the most intelligent people sometimes carry on the processes which they call thinking.

Since about the year 1800, when the factory system may be said to have begun in England, there has not been a single year in which men, women, and children have not been killed, thousands upon thousands of dollars' worth of property destroyed, and millions more lost in enforced idleness and the interruption of productive activities as a result of strikes and lockouts.

The Encyclopædia Britannica defines a strike as "a stoppage of work by common agreement on the part of a body of work people for the purpose of obtaining or resisting a change in the conditions of employment." If this definition actually described a strike, nobody could object. But we venture the assertion that there has never been a strike, at least in the factory system, which was not accompanied by violence on the part of the employees and a fighting spirit on the part of the employers. This is warfare pure and simple. Is it not time for men to get together and ask themselves, Must tribal warfare go on forever in industry?

A newspaper article must necessarily be too brief for even a superficial survey of the development of the factory system with its trade unions on the one hand and its great impersonal corporations on the other. We must therefore content ourselves with pointing out that the responsibility for the present widespread and continuous industrial warfare does not attach to either of the belligerents exclusively, and with stating some of the directions in which Americans may hope to seek for a remedy for a condition that is growing as intolerable in social life as Kaiserism finally proved to be in political relations.

The principal belligerents are the trade unions and the corporations. The latter were the first to be organized and originally exercised almost autocratic power, which caused the workmen to form the trade unions for self-protection and self-defense. In the year 1800 in Great Britain it was a criminal act for workmen even to meet in an attempt to improve their wages and conditions of labor. For more than fifty years the employing class in Great Britain were able through their legislative power to attach to the trade unions the taint, if not of criminality, at least of lawlessness. There is scarcely an employer of labor in the English-speaking world to-day who does not regard such an attitude as unreasonable and unjust. But the workmen felt this injustice long before the employer came to see it, and, burning under a sense of injustice, they indulged in all sorts of criminal acts of retaliation. The situation in England fifty years ago is dramatically described in one of the most exciting of Charles Reade's novels, "Put Yourself in His Place." Although that novel was published half a century ago, some of the scenes and the actual spirit which it portrays were repeated a week ago in the Brooklyn Rapid Transit strike, of which we give some account in another place in this issue. Unless we are to go on at the same slow rate of progress in the future that is recorded by the statistics and history of the last fifty years, both workmen and employers must get certain ideas more clearly defined in their own minds than seems to be the case at present. Among these ideas we should give a prominent place to the following:

Violence. Arson, murder, and wanton destruction of property are as much out of place in an industrial conflict as they were in Belgium during the world war. They must be suppressed with unswerving determination and unfaltering hand. The employing class, which formerly did use vicarious violence by hiring thugs and ruffians armed with rifles as strike-breakers, have been the first to give up their practice and now almost universally appeal to the recognized and lawful machinery for maintaining order and justice. The workmen must do the same. The first thing necessary is the suppression of violence.

Collective Bargaining. Under the present industrial system experience and history have conclusively shown that workmen cannot get their individual rights unless they take collective action in making their demands. Collective bargaining has therefore come into our industrial system by the natural process of evolution and must be accepted as a fact by employers. Indeed, most modern intelligent employers working upon a large scale prefer collective bargaining.

Trade Unions. It ought to be as plain as A B C that we cannot have collective bargaining without labor organizations. Labor organizations enable employers to deal with great bodies of men through representatives of the men's own choice. It is physically impossible for the president of a great railway to see every engineer on his road, but he can talk to each engineer through the representative that the engineers elect. This fact has been generally recognized by American employers, but there are still some who appear to make a distinction between labor organizations and trade unions. For example, Mr. Garrison, receiver of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company, says that he is perfectly willing to confer with the organization of his own employees, but is not willing to confer with the organization of the trade to which his employees belong. We think that his view is an archaic one and is not sustained by the history of organized industry. Capital is organized on the broadest possible foundation. We have Bankers' Associations, Manufacturers' Associations, Periodical Publishers' Associations, Bar Associations, Medical Associations, Associations of Railway Presidents, Associations of Life Insurance Presidents, etc. Is there any logical or social reason why we should not have an amalgamated association of trolley-car conductors and motormen?

Nor is this all. The principle of amalgamation has been recognized and has worked successfully in many trades. The compositors of The Outlook are members of the Typographical Union. They are associated with the compositors of newspapers and periodicals in all parts of the country for protection and improvement. When The Outlook has a conference with the representative of the Typographical Union, it confers with the representative of employees of other corporations and other firms, and it is only fair to say that the Typographical Union has greatly improved the conditions and personnel in the printing trade and that most employing printers would regret to see it disintegrated.

To prefer to fight and to refuse to confer, in an endeavor to maintain a distinction between local organizations of labor and a general trade union, is not only to be behind the times, but is attempting the impossible. The line between local and general unions is an imaginary one. To try to maintain its existence is about as sensible as it would be to attempt to prove the visibility of the equator.

High Cost of Living. One of the greatest factors in the high cost of living is to be found in the waste, idleness, and destruction of property resulting from labor strikes and lockouts and the ensuing general unrest in industry. While the attempt of the Government to regulate prices and prevent profiteering is laudable in spirit, what these methods can accomplish is a mere bagatelle. The Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. W. P. G. Harding, rightly says:

The remedy for the present situation is to work and to save; work regularly and efficiently, in order to produce and distribute the largest possible volume of commodities, and to exercise economies in order that money, goods, and services may be devoted primarily to the liquidation of debt and to the satisfaction of the demand for necessities, rather than to indulgence in extravagance for the gratification of a desire for luxuries.

The high cost of living to the wage-worker, the employer, and the public has been made definitely higher by the strikes in Brooklyn and among the railway shopmen throughout the country. If the human energy expended in these strikes could have been devoted with the same enthusiasm to the production and transportation of necessary commodities, the gain, if stated in figures, would be startling in its magnitude.

A Voice in the Management. Finally, the employers of the country must recognize and endeavor to meet what is really the fundamental demand of labor. The workman, it is true, wants as high a wage as he can possibly be paid. He wants that share in the profits which he thinks justly belongs to him. But that is not all. He wants to have some kind of a voice in determining the conditions under which he shall work. We believe that the American and Americanized workmen of this country are intelligent enough to be reasonable in their financial demands when they are told frankly and fully about the financial condition of the firm or corporation for which they work. But they will not be content with juggled or complicated reports. They want their own representatives on boards of management, and unless our entire industrial system is changed from top to bottom this demand will have to be recognized freely and cheerfully granted. How to do it is not so simple as to state it. Some way, however, must be worked out by which, first in our great public utilities and then perhaps in our private industries, the wage-worker may have something to say, through representatives in whom he has confidence, about the conditions and the product of his labor. Otherwise he is going to fight for all he can get, and perhaps even ultimately for all the present owners possess.

Just before the outbreak of the European war Sir Edward Grey, now Viscount Grey, telegraphed the Kaiser imploring him to sit down at the conference table and discuss the Serbian assassination, its consequences and penalties, in the hope that a general war might be averted. The Kaiser replied that it would be beneath the dignity of his ally Austria to do so, and chose war. The awful result of this decision the world now knows. In the present industrial crisis shall we pursue the conference and conciliatory method of Sir Edward Grey or the combative and haughty method of the Kaiser?

THE RACE PROBLEM AND THE SCHOOL

IN this week's issue The Outlook publishes an article by Mr. Leavell upon the Douglass High School, in Cincinnati. Mr. Leavell comes from the South. The Douglass High School is in a Northern State. His article, therefore, is National in outlook, just as the problem with which he deals—the problem of Negro education—is National. Until we stop considering that the Negro problem is a sectional problem and face the fact that it belongs almost as peculiarly to the North as to the South it will remain insoluble.

It is interesting and instructive to compare the conclusions reached by Mr. Leavell with those of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, one of the most active organizations in the country looking towards the improvement of conditions among our Negro citizens. In its last annual report the Association referred to says:

There are many branches that find they must be on the alert to prevent some form of segregation in the public schools. This reached even as far as north of Hartford, Connecticut, where the branch came into existence in a spirited and successful protest against the placing of colored children recently arrived from the South in classes by themselves. The same is true of Moline, Illinois. Ypsilanti, Michigan, wakes up to find that it has a separate school, forms a branch, and has an injunction issued to see that the school is closed.

Mr. Leavell believes that it has been demonstrated clearly that Negro children are happier and receive a better education when they are placed in schools devoted to their race. The N. A. A. C. P. regards this segregation as a violation of the fundamental rights of Negroes. The Outlook believes with Mr. Leavell that the real problem is not one of segregation but of the standard of education. Give the Negro child the privilege of attending such a school as the Douglass High School of Cincinnati, and the problem of segregation will solve itself. A separate school for Negroes offers an opportunity for self-development both for Negro teachers and Negro pupils which will be lost if friends of the Negro successfully insist upon the abolition of all educational segregation.

RADICALISM IN THE MAKING

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE OUTLOOK FROM FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

Senator Davenport, as our readers know, is both Professor of Government at Hamilton College and a member of the upper house of the New York Legislature. This article is the result of a recent trip through the Northwest.—THE EDITORS.

THE trial of Farmer Townley last month in Jackson, Minnesota, brings forcibly to the mind of the country the persistence of extreme political and social radicalism among the prosperous and property-owning farmers of the Northwest. What was three years ago believed to be a passing rural phenomenon is revealed as still vital and probably increasingly powerful. I am not one of those who believe that the recent small popular majorities in North Dakota for the dubious measure of State Socialism indicate the "slipping" from power of the leaders of agrarian radicalism in the Northwest. Certain of these measures, like the bill for a "kept" press through a chain of officially subsidized Government newspapers, were so vicious that the Non-Partisan League leaders themselves fairly split over them, and the wonder is that the majorities for these measures were as great as they were. The vote, to my mind, reveals little of the power of the still existing violent antagonism of the Northwest to the forces of trade and commerce which have long been regarded by the rural population as arrayed against them in the political and economic realm. Considering the Northwest as a whole—the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, Idaho, Montana, and Washington—I would say that the movement towards agrarian radicalism is still growing.

The Townley trial is a typical episode. Townley has a genius for the organization of the agricultural population against those whom the farmer of the Northwest believes to be his desperate and united foes in the railway, trading, and financial centers of that section of the country. Nobody doubts the sincerity of this farmer movement, whatever any one may think of the policies proposed or the inherent demagoguery of Townley himself. About the latter point there is a serious difference of opinion in the Northwest. Townley's recent trial on the charge of being a party to a conspiracy to make the draft difficult early in the war is more likely to make a martyr of him than to check any demagoguery or menace which there may be about him. At least I formed this judgment from a discussion of the case on the ground in Minnesota with those who are his enemies.

The apparently impartial men whom I met regard Townley as having been strongly in opposition to the war in the early stages, and even for a brief period after our entrance into it. They regard him as a man so embittered against capitalistic control of Government that his ideas were twisted about the cause of the great conflict. To him it was a rich man's war, subject to the rich man's manipulation, as North Dakota so long had been. This view was also the line of least resistance for his own movement through the undoubtedly strong pacifist sentiment of the Northwest at this early period. It made it easy going for his movement in the Scandinavian and German counties of North Dakota. But after the first loan, and after Townley had been invited to Washington and had been taken into conference with the Secretary of War and the President, he seems to have supported the country and the cause of the Allies. Certainly he supported the second loan, and thenceforward.

The effect of the conviction of Townley is already giving grave concern to those in the Northwest who believe in an orderly evolution out of our National troubles. The alleged atmosphere of prejudice in the county selected for the trial of the case; the earlier avowed hostility of the presiding judge to the leaders of the Non-Partisan farmers; the psychology of the jury, chosen from a venire of 144 men, who were previously picked from among the voters by the political county commissioners, every man on the panel being openly charged by the defense with an acknowledged bias against the farmers' movement; the accusation of conspiracy to obstruct the draft made, not by the United States Government, whose representatives had previously given the leaders a clean bill of health, but eight months after the armistice by the State of Minnesota, whose officers had recently fought a desperate political campaign with the Non-Partisan League; the refusal of the Court to admit much evidence of the support of the President and the war by the League as irrelevant to the particular case; the denying to Townley of his dramatic request to dismiss his lawyers and make his own plea to the jury—whatever may have been the right of it in any one of the particular items of this arraignment, taken together they have produced an unhappy and disquieting effect upon the mind of the Northwest. This is the martyrdom for which Townley was looking, say even his enemies in secret chagrin.

The impartial and conservative men with whom I talked were free to admit that the trial may turn out to be the latest chapter in the volume of vested stupidity. This modern flame of agrarian radicalism in North Dakota, which has now spread to a number of near-by States, has been fed from the beginning by the obtuseness of apprehension of men in the seats of the political and economic mighty. North Dakota was once controlled like a conquered province by the Northern Pacific Railroad. The State suffered long and severely at the hands of the railway, the grain, and the banking powers of the Northwest. The freight rates were unfair; there were evils in the marketing of grain, most of which are now corrected, but they long heightened the unrest. Interest rates were too high. These I remember to have heard described in the practical language of a Grand Forks banker: "The poor devil of a farmer used to come in to borrow $75 for his seed in the springtime, and he was asked in some places to sign a note for $90 and pay 15 per cent interest!" Suddenly the people of North Dakota woke up to the fact that their Legislature seemed in no way to represent their will. They would vote in referendums for projects which they wished to try, but the Legislature would not even pass an enabling act. Some hidden force of prevention was stronger than they were. If it was not raw bribery, it was astute lobbying; and when they saw it, then came the deluge. From that ancient extreme of protecting property by stupidity, the pendulum has swung to radicalism. And that is the story of North Dakota.

In my trip through the Northwest this summer I was impressed by nothing more than by the obvious undermining of the conservative and level-headed traits of the property-owning farmers by their mad indignation against those whom they regard as having long posed as the political and economic betters of that section of the country. And the farmers are now being joined by other radical elements. In the State of Washington the triple alliance of the Non-Partisan League of agriculturists, the strong I. W. W. sympathetic group of the cities, and the radical organized railway element together constitute a formidable opposition to the natural conservative liberalism of a democratic population. In the State of Minnesota the political situation, to my mind, is far worse. Minnesota has long been a great liberal-thinking State, with excellent influence upon surrounding commonwealths. It has been predominantly Republican in years gone by, indicating its trend towards progress by going strongly for Roosevelt in 1912. Hughes carried it by only 379 in 1916. The virus against Republican reaction had sunk deep into the population. Since 1916 matters have gone from bad to worse, from a Republican standpoint. In last year's gubernatorial election the Non-Partisan League candidate for Governor polled 150,000 votes, against the winning Republican candidate's 200,000. The Governor, Burnquist, proved himself during the war upstandingly American, but his administration has come into violent opposition with organized labor, from the ore mines in the north to the great cities in the south. It seems to be due to a complete misunderstanding and misapprehension of the drift of the genuine labor movement in the State. But the result of it is that the Minnesota State Federation met the other day at New Ulm and laid plans for the organization of a State-wide Labor party to join forces with the Non-Partisan League of farmers. And the platform is a radical programme of public ownership and operation of railways, steamships, banks, stockyards, packing plants, and grain elevators. Organized labor, which generally in the country is stemming the tide against radicalism, in Minnesota is leagued with it. At the by-election for Congressman on July 1 of this year in the city of St. Paul the Democratic candidate, who ran in the name of President Wilson and on a purely Wilson platform, received only 6,000 votes. The regular Republican candidate received 9,000, while the Independent Republican Labor candidate received 11,000 and won. The people of this district of St. Paul evidently had no wish to support the Democratic party under Wilsonian leadership, but they gave every evidence of a radical Republican majority. St. Paul and Minneapolis are two radical cities, Minneapolis having recently had a Socialist Mayor, who was defeated at the last election only by the combination of the Democrats and Republicans in that municipality.

Here again is political material for a triple alliance which demands the wisest opposition on the part of the forces of conservative liberalism. But the Republican leadership of Minnesota seems at present to be totally unequal to the task. The same obtuseness of apprehension which brought on the farmer revolution in North Dakota seems to hang like a smoke cloud over Republicanism in Minnesota. Instead of an open admission of the wrongs which have existed and now exist, instead of a wise constructive programme of advance, the great manufacturing and commercial groups of the State seem to be stupefying Republican leadership into a condition of reaction, using in the Legislature the same disingenuous methods as those which I described a few weeks ago for The Outlook with respect to the conditions of politics in the State of New York.

There is a widespread opinion that the conditions in the country call for the leadership in Washington of a party of conservative liberalism. Certainly the conditions in the Northwest call for such leadership. But certainly the Republicans will not be able to furnish it if the party continues to follow the path of stupidity which has bred so much of our National radicalism of recent years. I was impressed in the Northwest by the fact that great numbers of the people seemed not to be trustful of either of the great parties. There is radicalism enough in embryo in that section of the country to make or break either party at the next Presidential election. There is a great body of opinion there which can easily go either way, and as it goes so may go the Nation. All the more obtuse, then, seems to me the view which I find among some of the Republican politicians who think the great thoughts in the East, that everything is to fall into the Republican lap, anyway; that there is no use in trying to make the country pro-Republican, it is sufficient to let it run in its present anti-Democratic channel. Let us drift into power, say these Republican sages of the political Sanhedrin. Somebody ought to impress upon these gentlemen that as long as the West is what it is, as long as growing radical thought in the Nation exists as it does exist, obtuse Republican leadership has no cinch, and in the method of drift there is no certainty. One of the chief impressions I received from a recent trip across the continent is that radicalism is growing in the country by what it feeds on, namely, the stupidity of the mere property politicians; and that, to meet the rash political ventures which are being proposed, there is need of a party of constructive liberalism, of an open and sincere mind, to curb National evils and avoid the rashness of radicalism.

SHANTUNG

SHOULD THE PEACE TREATY HAVE GIVEN JAPAN A FOOTHOLD THERE?

A DISCUSSION PRO AND CON

BY EVERETT P. WHEELER AND ELIZABETH WASHBURN WRIGHT

One of the objections urged against the Peace Treaty is that it violates both the common laws of human equity and the principles upon which the League of Nations is supposed to be founded when it gives to Japan the large and valuable Chinese territory of Shantung. Nevertheless there are liberals who believe that the solution proposed by the Peace Treaty is the only workable and just one. These two views are presented in the following articles. Mrs. Wright, whose husband, the late Dr. Hamilton Wright, was the American Government's representative at the Anti-Opium International Conferences at Shanghai and The Hague, has had long experience in the Far East, having lived in China, Japan, and the Straits Settlements for several years. Mr. Wheeler is a well-known member of the New York bar, who has devoted special attention to questions of constitutional and international law. Associated during his entire active life with many political and social reforms, all his inclinations are towards the establishment of international relations upon a moral basis.—THE EDITORS.

I—THE INJUSTICE TO CHINA

BY ELIZABETH WASHBURN WRIGHT

THE story of Shantung is very simple. In 1897, Germany, having decided that she would colonially expand in the Far East, decided upon Shantung as the seat of her activities. This was because of its situation, its minerals and raw materials, its excellent harbors, its soil and climate and its industrious people. A scouting expedition was despatched along the Chinese coast to select a suitable harbor and naval base. The commission sent for this purpose had just recommended the Bay of Kiaochau when a quarrel took place in the interior of Shantung between some natives and two German missionaries. The latter were killed. Whose the fault was never was known, but the occurrence was opportune and gave the German Government the pretext it had long been looking for. Its warships at once landed troops on the coast of Kiaochau Bay and announced their occupation of the territory.

China was powerless to protest, and without more ado a treaty was drawn up by which China was to lease to Germany for ninety-nine years the harbor of Kiaochau and certain adjacent territories. There were other demands, all of which China was obliged to grant. The treaty signed, Germany forthwith prepared to intrench herself in this north-eastern and valuable corner of China. She succeeded admirably in her venture and built up a model city on the lines of a German municipality. Her powers of organization and efficiency were never better demonstrated than in this distant corner of Asia. As a matter of fact, this was to be the nucleus about which her far-reaching Asiatic ambitions were to center. Still further privileges and concessions were wrung from China, and private German corporations received valuable mining and railway concessions. The railway grants were of special significance, as these potential lines were practically to cut the north from the south, and so dominate the political situation. Incidentally, the Bay of Kiaochau, which is one of the chief outlets for the products of North China, affords also the shortest approach to Peking from the sea. In fact, it would have been difficult anywhere in China to have seized upon a more vital or strategic point—which in the hands of an enemy would prove of incalculable value.

China was unreconciled but powerless, and watched this rapid evolution of a German colony with a great deal of uneasiness. Still Germany was far distant. This fact China repeated to herself many times in her moments of apprehension and dissatisfaction. And the development of Shantung went on apace.

There are other facts about Shantung worth mentioning. Confucius, the great Chinese sage, was born in a little village in the heart of this province. The town of Chufu has been for generations the Mecca to which hundreds of thousands of Chinese pilgrims have journeyed yearly. It is the shrine of their faith, something to be set apart. The soil is sacred soil. The thoughts and inspiration which emanate from this spot are essentially intimate and Chinese—to be protected from the sacrilege of alien intrusion. The very heart of China beats here. It is dangerous always to tamper with the beliefs of a people, to intrude upon their holy places. And Shantung and its sacred shrine have been under the shadow of German domination. A very bad thing, tempered only by the consciousness that Germany herself lay thousands of miles distant.

No people in China are more intensely Chinese than the people of Shantung—perhaps because of their nearness to the front and beginning of things. In any event, there are no people in the whole country more proud or sensitive, more industrious and law-abiding, than these natives of Shantung. This province contributed to the war thousands of coolies, who took the long journey to France and whose business it was to sweep up and keep clean and do the heavy drudgery of the war. Shantung contributed her bit in no small degree.

Now these excellent people of China (38,000,000 of them, as many as the entire population of France) against their will and in great bitterness of spirit are to be handed over to the keeping of an alien people—to the Japanese—whom the Chinese, anyway, consider to be their enemy. The Powers in Paris, undoubtedly sincere and working for peace, have committed an extraordinary act in thus placing in the hands of the Power which China most fears the virtual key to her citadel. There have been many explanations and excuses and ambiguities expressed on the subject, but the facts make easy reading.

Two weeks after the outbreak of the war Japan demanded the immediate withdrawal of German men-of-war from Chinese and Japanese waters and the delivery at a certain date of the entire leased territory of Kiaochau to the Japanese authorities, with a view to the eventual restoration of the same to China. This was categorically stated. China intimated her desire to join with Japan in the expulsion of Germany from her territory, but was discouraged by Japan from doing so. In November, 1914, the British and Japanese troops together forced the Germans to surrender the city of Tsingtao.

After this accomplishment Japan sent for further reinforcements and prepared to establish herself in a state of quasi-occupation. China protested and begged that the troops be removed, as their task had already been accomplished. Letters passed between the Chinese and Japanese Foreign Offices, but Japan and her troops remained on Chinese soil.

In 1915 Japan suddenly presented to China a convention composed of twenty-one points by which China was to virtually yield her independence to Japan. China vehemently protested, but the world was at war and China in no position to fight Japan, and under duress yielded rights which she bitterly resented.

Upon America's declaration of war against Germany in 1917, China, wishing to identify herself more closely with the policies of the United States, likewise declared war, notifying Germany that the treaty and grants forced from her in 1898 were abrogated, and must therefore automatically revert to China. To this declaration the Powers made no objection.

Ten days after China had thrown in her lot with the Allies to fight Germany Japan and Great Britain came to a secret understanding by which Japan was guaranteed that her claims in Shantung were to be upheld at the conclu-of the war. Of this arrangement China of course knew nothing.

The war is over, and the Powers, sitting in conference, have agreed that this secret understanding is to be recognized and that Japan is to have as reward for her services the rights and privileges previously held by Germany in the province of Shantung. China declares emphatically that Japan has no right to these privileges, and further that the Powers have no authority to bestow them; that there was no question of any Power inheriting the grants forced from China by Germany, which Japan herself stated must eventually be returned to China. Also China insists that the railway concessions which the Powers would now transfer to Japan were not in the nature of Government transactions, but were entered into as individual enterprises—obligations which hitherto international law has invariably protected.

The Chinese authorities furthermore assert that Japan is not qualified to take into her keeping the destinies of millions of people who bitterly—and, they say, with reason—oppose her guardianship. They state that the province of Shantung with its enormous population is to be abandoned to a people who have sinister designs upon its welfare. They declare that during the period of the war Japanese traders, with or without the sanction of their Government, have flooded China with morphine to an enormous profit to themselves. This despite the fact that Japan was a signatory to the International Opium Convention drawn up at The Hague in 1912, by which the Powers of the world agreed to assist China in her fight against the opium curse and therefore to restrain the trade in drugs detrimental to the Chinese people.

Chinese statistics now go to prove that Tsingtao, the town which the Powers are unreservedly placing in the hands of the Japanese, is the place which has been chosen as the center of the trade. Through this gateway to northern China drugs are now pouring—seeping into the Yangtze Valley, and so into the very heart of China.

For a century and a half China has been handicapped and benumbed by this curse, and the wonder is that as a nation she still exists. Through the co-operation of the world and under the leadership of the United States a great campaign had been waged against opium and all but won. The third International Opium Conference, which met at The Hague in 1914, was about to put its seal upon the accomplished work when the intervention of the war brought it to a sudden halt. This, with the activities of the Japanese drug traders during the war, has further endangered and canceled the good already achieved.

The Chinese contend that by allowing Japan this foothold in China not only will the Powers establish a permanent seat of irritation to the Chinese Government, but will seriously menace the great international movement which was on the verge of its fulfillment. It is true that the opium question has been inserted into the text of the Peace Treaty for further consideration, but the Chinese claim that, if the obligation imposed by an International Convention was not sufficient to restrict the activities of the Japanese, the League of Nations, which is to take this question under its administration, is not likely to be more successful, particularly in view of the great temptation which this trade presents to the Japanese.

These, in brief, are some of the objections which China raises against the turning over of her people to the jurisdiction of Japan. It would seem that the Powers in conceding this point are not paving the way for peace, but rather for inevitable and almost immediate strife.

There seems, in fact, but little difference between the question of Shantung and that of Alsace-Lorraine, which rankled for sixty years in the hearts of the French and was one of the indirect causes leading to the recent calamity. Chinese sentiment and psychology are not diametrically different from those of France, and the world need only wait long enough to see history repeat itself. And this will be when China has armed herself and recovered by force that which was her own and which was arbitrarily taken from her. No injustice can permanently remain if society is to progress. If the elimination of a wrong cannot be achieved through the offices of reason and justice, then it will inevitably be achieved through force. This is a law which no league or measures of men can affect.

But the result of this decision in Paris will reach far into the future. The knowledge of this injustice will spread to the farthest limits of China and seep into the minds of hundreds of millions of men. A common thought, a common resentment, can make prodigious strides towards solidifying a people. These millions of simple, plodding natives, tilling their soil, eating rice, and loving peace, rather despised by the rest of the world, are going to react against a common wrong—three hundred millions of them. This is a thought to consider—the rousing into action of 300,000,000 of angry and resentful people.

The Shantung award hurts not only China but Japan—China very obviously and immediately. But its harm to Japan is infinitely more subtle and fundamental.

Japan is to-day at the turning of the ways and in sore need of wise and just direction. The foundations on which for thirty years she has laboriously built have suddenly given way. The whole theory of her modern development founded on the precepts of Germany has proved to be unsound. Therefore the Powers are doing her an ill turn when they urge her to pursue still further this sinister will-of-the-wisp and permit her to inaugurate the new and better era by an act not unworthy of Germany herself.

It must always be an extraordinary and regrettable fact that Japan, after centuries of striving for the high and beautiful, should upon contact with the West have abandoned her own traditions and aspirations for the ugliest and least convincing of all possessions—namely, blatant materialism. Japan has been great because of the tenor of her mind, because of her high conception of beauty and the strength and simplicity of her expression, because of her high patriotism and her grim adherence to principle. These are the attributes in which Japan excels, this is her contribution to the world, not her materialism and the ugly lessons the West has taught her.

If Japan has failed to see this lesson, and the subtle thought of German methods still persists, then come the danger and the menace to her national life—to all that has contributed to that life, to bushido, to Nogi, to men of like faith. To possess the world as Germany would have possessed it would mean the ultimate annihilation of her soul.

With her cleverness and industry, her initiative and power of assimilation, Japan need have no fear of honest competition. Her occupation of Shantung would be at best but a temporary thing, and at a price that she and the world could ill afford to pay. It is inconceivable that her friends should for a moment urge her to follow such a course, that the Powers in Paris should acquiesce in such a purpose. In it lies not only injustice to China, but unsound counsel to Japan and rank disloyalty to the millions of men who fought and gave their lives that such ideas and ideals should perish forever from off the earth.

Paris, June 21, 1919.

II—THE CASE FOR JAPAN

BY EVERETT P. WHEELER

ONE of the articles in the Treaty of Peace now before the Senate which has been most severely censured is Section 8, Part IV, entitled "Shantung." By this section Germany renounces in favor of Japan all her right, title, and privileges which she acquired under the treaty with China, March 6, 1898, in the province of Shantung, including railways, mines, and other appurtenances. The same treaty provides for the renunciation by Germany in favor of China of all other German rights and concessions of property in that country and for the return of the Boxer spoils. It cannot, therefore, be said that the interests of China have been neglected. But China desires also to obtain the entire investments that the Germans have made in the province of Shantung. The facts of the case have been ignored in much of the debate that has taken place. It is necessary to understand them in order to come to an intelligent conclusion on the subject.

China is a country of great size, extending over most of the southeastern third of Asia. It has a population that has never been counted and extensive and undeveloped mineral resources, especially iron and coal, both anthracite and bituminous. The coal, however, has not been mined. This is partly due to the want of capital, engineering skill, and enterprise, and partly due to a superstitious regard for the ghosts of ancestors, whom it is supposed would be disquieted by mining. The consequence is that fuel in China is scarce. The forests have long since disappeared, and the people are driven to utilize every scrap of refuse that can produce a little heat. Notwithstanding this utilization, the suffering every winter from cold and all the year from lack of fuel for cooking and manufacturing is great. A recent letter from Shanghai gives the price of coal there at thirty dollars per ton.

Another great deficiency in China is transportation. Few railways have been built. The first, which was built in 1876, between Shanghai and Wusung, was much used, but was bought and destroyed by the authorities because of local prejudice against it. Others have been built since, mostly by foreign capital and in pursuance of concessions granted by the Chinese Government. "The Shantung Railroad was built with German capital, is 256 miles long, and began operation in 1904." Shantung, be it noted, is one of the provinces that are rich in coal.

The rights granted by the Chinese Government in 1898 to Germany in this province were not rights of sovereignty. They were similar to those granted in the United States whenever a corporation is formed. They authorized the grantees to do what it was greatly for the interest of China should be done—that is to say, to build railways, establish terminals, create a port with docks and other terminal facilities, mine coal, bring it to tidewater, and sell it. We have no definite information as to the amount invested by the Germans in these enterprises, but it must of necessity be many millions.

When Japan declared war against Germany, these properties were in the peaceable possession of Germany. It was essential to the cause of the Allies that these harbors, mines, railways, and other property should be taken from the Germans. The Japanese sent an army and captured them. Not a tael of Chinese money, not a drop of Chinese blood, was expended in the conquest. China was not at war with Germany. The extraordinary statement made in the Senate that by international law all the rights of Germany ceased at the beginning of the war is entirely unwarranted. It was the right of a belligerent to seize them, and this was done, but after these rights had been conquered by Japan China had no right to revoke them, and never did.

What possible equity has China to deprive Japan of these fruits of the war, conquered by her own energy and courage, at the cost of Japanese lives and with the expenditure of Japanese money?

Is it in the interest of China that these concessions to Germany thus acquired by Japan and this property which is the result of intelligent expenditure of capital should be forfeited? To answer this question we must look a little into the history and conditions of China.

The great domain of China is divided into eighteen provinces. During the reign of the Manchu dynasty these provinces had a considerable measure of local independence. The extent of the country was such and the difficulty of transportation was so great that some local independence was essential. When the Manchu dynasty was dethroned and the Provisional Constitution was adopted, March 10, 1912, the power of the President of the new Republic was so limited by this instrument that the Government broke down. A new Provisional Constitution was adopted, May 1, 1914. This centralizes the powers of the General Government, which was undoubtedly wise. But, naturally, the governors of the provinces disliked any limitation of their powers. Some of these provinces are in revolt against the Central Government. In most of them the administration is corrupt and inefficient. It cannot be said that China has an orderly Government, or that investments in mines and railways are secure without other protection than that given by the Chinese police. Indeed, in all the foreign concessions, such as Shanghai, the police protection is given by foreign policemen. The tall Sikh in Shanghai is a familiar sight, and far more effective for the maintenance of order than any representative of the Chinese Government. The result of this is that which has always followed where government is inefficient, the means of transportation poor, and the natural resources not developed. The people suffer. The Chinese are industrious, thrifty, patient, and intelligent, but they live in a condition of poverty and cold that it is almost impossible for an American to conceive. I quote from the official report of the Secretary of the Maritime Commerce of China:

"To form an idea of what future prospects are, it is fair to make a comparison with India. The areas of the two empires are almost identical and their products very similar. But China has a larger, a more industrious and more intelligent population, while, on the whole, the country is probably more fertile and possesses greater mineral resources. In the former country trade is assisted by good roads, railways, and lightness or absence of taxation; in the latter, at present, it is hampered by directly opposite conditions. The result is that the exports from India are worth three times the exports from China. With equal opportunities, which the building of railways and opening of mines will bring about, the discrepancy should disappear."

It is therefore obvious that what China needs for the comfort and happiness of its people is intelligent investment of foreign capital, directed by competent engineers and managed for the benefit not only of the investors but of the Chinese themselves. It is no new thing for railways and other public enterprises to be constructed in one country by the capital of another. The railway from Montreal to Portland, for example, which is now part of the Grand Trunk, was originally constructed by foreign capital, mostly British. It was never thought any derogation to the sovereignty of the United States or of the State of Maine that this railway should be built in American territory. The Chinese themselves granted to the Russian Government the right to build a section of the Trans-Siberian Railway across Manchuria. This has been operated for years to the mutual benefit of China and Russia. China had little foreign commerce until the ports occupied by Europeans were established in accordance with treaties made between European governments and that of China. All this has been of great mutual benefit. The Chinese people as a whole have been gainers to an extent that it is difficult to estimate by the foreign settlements and investments that have been established, and by the administration of their customs service under the direction of English and Americans. The prejudice which the Chinese had against foreigners, and which led them for a long while to shut up their country, is being dispelled in those parts of China where foreigners have made investments.

The conclusion is that the objections which have been taken to the Shantung section of the Treaty of Peace have not arisen so much from love of China as from jealousy of Japan. Nothing seems too bad to say of Japan, and yet there is no country in Asia which deserves such admiration. During the short period of seventy years which has elapsed since Commodore Perry, with American ships, landed in Japan, and Townsend Harris negotiated the treaty of commerce between the two countries, July 29, 1858, the Japanese have maintained an efficient government which has secured protection for the persons and property of its citizens and has enabled the people to make great advances in manufactures, in commerce, in transportation, in education, and in the administration of justice.

We are just at the close of the most bloody and destructive war recorded in history. The real cause of that war was national prejudice and hatred, which had been fomented for years. The writer traveled in Germany in 1902. In every important city, except Hamburg, the press continuously attacked England. The mixture of suspicion and vituperation that pervaded the German press at that time continued down to the fatal month of August, 1914. In the light of the awful results of such persistent attacks, where peace "made war with words, edged more keen than ever were our foreign foemen's swords," the wickedness of the present attacks upon Japan becomes manifest. Who can maintain, when the facts already stated are considered, that the Japanese have not as much right to the railways and mines in Shantung, the right to make and operate which were granted to Germany by China, as America had to construct the Panama Railroad in 1850, and now has to operate the Panama Canal, the railway across the Isthmus used in connection with it, and the harbors at either end?

It may be said that the Chinese would prefer German to Japanese possession of the Shantung railways, harbors, and mines. Such a statement as this ignores the facts of history. When in 1900 the Boxer Rebellion cut off Peking from all communication with the outside world, and some of the foreign representatives there were murdered, foreign nations agreed to send troops to their relief. These were sent. The discipline of the Japanese troops was perfect; they treated civilians with absolute consideration. On the other hand, the Germans, wherever they had opportunity, showed the same brutality that they did in Belgium and northern France. They looted some valuable Chinese possessions, which under this Treaty they are required to restore. There can be no question that it is far more to the interest of the Chinese that the railways and mines in Shantung should be managed by Japanese than by Germans.

But it may be said, and has been said: How can we be sure that Japan will recognize the sovereignty of China in the Shantung Peninsula? To this we reply: What reason is there to doubt it? The Japanese have been faithful to their treaty obligations in the past, and Japan has become a member of the League of Nations. Membership in this League has been offered to China, who will undoubtedly in the end accept such membership. One object of the Covenant of this League is stated to be "a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealing of organized peoples with one another." "Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty" are declared to be among those which "are generally suitable for submission to arbitration." "The members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered." In our judgment, therefore, the attempt that China has been making to obtain possession of property of great value for which it pays no price, has expended no money, and, in a word, has done nothing to create, is not justified by the law of nations or by the fair dealing which should prevail between them, and constitutes no objection to the ratification of the Treaty now before the Senate.

It should never be forgotten that the present independence of China is due in a large measure to the success of the Japanese in their war with Russia. The condition before that war is justly described by Henry Adams:

"The vast force of inertia known as China was to be united with the huge bulk of Russia in a single mass, which no amount of new force could henceforward deflect."

When Chinese statesmen recall this deliverance, may we not hope that the present jealousy of Japan will disappear, and that both countries may become loyal members of the League?

July 23, 1919.

WHAT DOES THE NEGRO WANT? THE ANSWER OF THE DOUGLASS PUBLIC SCHOOL

BY R. H. LEAVELL

"WHAT all dis wah in Europe about?"

The youth who shot this abrupt question at me was a slender mulatto with the fires of race hate smoldering in his eyes. The time was a day four months after America had entered the world war. The place was a Negro churchyard in Mississippi where five hundred colored people had met at a picnic held by their Sunday school association.

Only a few hours before the lad's father had been telling me how his son hated the Southern white man. And as the boy fixed his hostile gaze upon me I realized that, although I was a stranger, he had classed me already as an enemy. And yet my errand was the not unfriendly one of trying to find out for the United States Department of Labor why so many Negroes were leaving my own native State for Northern industries.

How to answer this sullen boy so as to be honest with myself without intensifying his bitter feeling toward white Americans perplexed me for a moment. Then I fell back upon an undefined word of many syllables.

"The object of this war," said I, "is to make the world safe for democracy—in Europe."

Now I doubt whether the lad would have taken in the meaning of my somewhat oracular remark, despite his migration through eight grades of some sort of a public school, had not my guide, a Negro teacher of shrewd intelligence, promptly translated for him:

"That means we are fighting to get freedom for the people in Europe. You are willing to fight, aren't you, to help them get it?"

"Yaas," was the quick reply. "But while I'se fightin' I'd like to get a little mo' freedom fuh myself."

As he spoke a chuckling murmur of approval spread through the group of yellow and black and brown men that stood about us.

"A little more freedom for his own race here in America," said I to myself. "I wonder what he means by 'freedom'? What is it that the Negro really wants?" And for a dependable answer to these queries I have applied to many men in each race during the past two years.

Not long ago I put the question to a discerning man of affairs in one of the chief cities of the South. For more than a generation this man has stood in the front rank of those who are wrestling with the baffling problem of safeguarding the ideals of white civilization while at the same time insuring to the Negro "a man's chance" to become American.

"What does 'freedom' mean to the Negro?" this man of business repeated thoughtfully. "What does he want of the ruling race in this 'white man's country'?" Then, after a moment, he added: "From the standpoint of the white, there is another question which is still more vital, and that is, Can we, with justice to our own children, provide the Negro with adequate opportunity to achieve democracy? But the correct solution of this problem hinges on our learning the true answer to that first inquiry, What does the Negro really want?"

In the pause that followed my friend gazed at me in the eager, searching way that with him is the sure sign of the swift marshaling of ideas gathered from a broad experience. And then he sent me on a mission.

"Go to the Douglass Public School in Cincinnati. Perhaps that institution will throw some light on what the Negro asks of white America in the way of a fighting chance to win democracy."

And so a little later I found myself explaining the object of my visit to F. M. Russell, the Negro principal, under whom for nearly a decade the Douglass School has rendered its largest service to his people. A glance at the broad brow, the steady, direct eyes, and the smiling, friendly face told me at once that here was a man who could dream a dream and then could do his part with others in making it come true.

From the principal himself, from teachers associated with him, and from representative white citizens I gathered testimony, free of contradiction, as to the contributive work of the Douglass School. Here is the story:

Hardly more than a stone's throw from the home of the woman who wrote "Uncle Tom's Cabin" stands the handsome brick-and-cement structure which houses this modern school. Upon the brow of the same hill is Lane Seminary, around which there centered before the Civil War one of the main stations on the famous Underground Railroad from slavery to freedom. As time passed, many of those who had come found themselves abiding near the homes of the kindly and high-minded enthusiasts who had befriended them. The end of the war did not stop the growth of this black community; for from time to time others have come seeking to better their condition.

Now there is a truth, familiar to all when it is applied to fowls of the air, that is equally a truth when it is applied to human beings, although this fact is not so clearly appreciated by many. For of men as much as of winged creatures can it be said that "birds of a feather flock together." In obedience, therefore, to this law of life as well as to the law of the State as it then was, a separate public school was established in that neighborhood for the Negro children.

But as time passed the public mind became opposed to racial segregation in the schools as a matter of man-made law. The Legislature, accordingly, put an end to compulsory separation as long ago as 1888. And yet during the thirty-one years that have gone by since then the great majority of the Negroes in the Douglass district have continued to send their children to Douglass because they prefer this Negro school.

Their choice is clearly a free one; for within the same territory are three other public schools that are open to both white and black. And yet only a handful of colored boys and girls are to be found there consorting with the white race. The actual statistics are impressive. For, although the Douglass section contains 1,087 Negroes between the ages of six and twenty-one, the enrollment at Douglass numbers 936. About one hundred of these live in other parts of the city and go to the trouble of walking or of paying car-fare rather than attend mixed schools near their own homes.

How many go to the three mixed schools within easy reach of the Douglass neighborhood? The precise answer cannot be given, because the School Board does not tabulate enrollment by races, but only by schools. It is plain, however, that those attending these institutions from that territory are negligible in number. For if we subtract from the district's population of those between the ages of six and twenty-one all who go to Douglass, we have a remainder of some two hundred and fifty. Subtract again from this remainder that large proportion of boys and girls above compulsory school age who must work for their bread, and who because of this are not in school anywhere, and it becomes clear that only a few can be going to mixed schools. It is, indeed, the estimate of competent persons that not over five per cent of those actually in school attend with white children. But even if we play safe by doubling this estimate, we find that ninety per cent of the children in school are enrolled at Douglass. And this is the place where of their own free will none but Negroes attend.

Clearly, then, the colored community is overwhelmingly in favor of the separate school. It follows that Douglass in greater degree than other accessible institutions meets the real wants of the Negro. If, therefore, we learn just what Douglass offers to that community and just how Douglass makes the offer, we shall have some light at least on what a Negro group that is above the average in intelligence and in enterprise does want from white America.

"What struck you as the greatest service that Douglass renders the neighborhood?" The reply of a sympathetic white Southerner to this query was emphatic and instantaneous:

"The Rough House in the evenings for the boys."

In a large basement room, on a level with the ground outside, the Rough House holds its nightly session. Under the supervision of a teacher, the youngsters find vent here for their surplus energy and animal spirits. So many throng the place that it would be a puzzle how to find room for all to play at once. Fortunately, games like basket-ball and contests like boxing, if gone at with a vim, soon reduce the participants to a state of breathless willingness to retire to the rooters' bench. It is but natural, therefore, that the boys should find almost equal satisfaction in playing the game for all it is worth and in shouting for their side. The boys have, indeed, proved their interest in a very practical way, for with their own hands they have made and erected the basket-ball goals.

Now all of this promotes team-work, as well as friendly rivalry with the "good sports" on the opposing side, and a common fellowship with the other "husky," whether he be for or against a boy's own crowd. And so that overflow of vitality which, if undirected, might easily result in tough gangs is put in harness to achieve the democratic spirit.

Again, even "robustious" youth is sometimes glad of a quiet hour. One corner of the Rough House has therefore been set apart for less strenuous games, such as checkers and crokinole. Then, too, there is a community branch of the public library for those in quiet mood. This branch library is conspicuously and conveniently housed in another large basement room provided by the school. And the public library furnishes the books and the trained attendant. Here the girls as well as the boys are welcome, and the old as well as the young. The doors remain open after school hours, closing for the day at nine o'clock.

Douglass offers other opportunities for work and play in the early evenings. Thus there is a five months' night school in academic and industrial subjects, much frequented by migrants from the South. And all the year around there are "gym" classes for men and for women, as well as clubs of all sorts—clubs for house servants, for factory girls, for young men, for girls in high school, and for girls in the University. Then, too, the auditorium is thrown open for lectures, concerts, and the movies.

All of the activities that one may expect in a modern school are to be found at Douglass. Manual training and domestic science, an open-air room for the tuberculous and a class for defectives, school gardens and a supervised playground—all are here. There is also a lunch-room where nourishing and quickly assimilable foods may be had at recess periods. The policy of the School Board for its maintenance is worth noting. For the lunch-room begins the school year with a thirty-day credit at the wholesale houses. And after that it must maintain itself out of current income.

Of the activities named thus far, one is of especial value for the Negro race. The open-air room is what I mean. For the fact is notorious that consumption is the "black man's scourge." It is therefore particularly cheering to the believer in democracy to find that the School Board provides the same high quality of care and equipment for these imperiled Negro children that it does for whites in the same danger.

For a race that is struggling upward another standard provision is of peculiar importance. This is the separation of the defectives from the normal children. Not only are normal children who have had good school opportunities held back when defectives are in their classes, but children who have previously attended poor schools, as is the case with so many of the migrants from the South, have a still greater disadvantage when those of feeble mind are taught with them. By separating defective from normal minds, each can be taught the better.

Of late even the problem of the new-comer, backward because of poor schools, has become acute. For the final result of the great demand for labor in Northern industries which grew out of war conditions has been a heavy migration of Negro families from the South. Since the signing of the armistice this family movement has indeed slowed down, but it has not stopped.

The successful way in which the problem of these new children has been dealt with furnishes convincing proof of the wisdom of the Board in allowing to every school a wide liberty in working out the problems of its neighborhood. It is eloquent, too, of the efficiency with which principal and teachers meet the specific needs of their own people as those needs arise.

The root idea was the establishment of a separate room for the over-age children from the South. But it took an artist in humanity to prevent such segregation from becoming a badge of humiliation and discouragement.

"We'll call this room," the principal explained, "the Opportunity Class." Here the teacher devotes herself especially to coaching the individual pupils, although in certain specific subjects, such as manual training, the departmental instructors help too. So admirably do the students respond that in one case a child made four grades in a single year; and two grades a year is a common record. That the other children feel a sympathetic interest in these newcomers is indicated by the nickname they have for them—"the Sunny South Class."

"It occurred to me," added the principal, "that a Southern woman would be better able than a Northerner to understand these young Southerners. I therefore put in charge a capable woman from Montgomery, Alabama. Her grasp of the problem is revealed by the results achieved by the children."

The resourcefulness of the management both in meeting school needs and in utilizing available materials is further emphasized in the following instance: In conformity with the co-operative policy of the School Board and the Park Commission, the latter had condemned several dwelling-houses next to the school, in order to put in a modern playground. One of these houses was in fair condition; and upon Mr. Russell's requesting that it be preserved, the Commission promptly consented. Now the girls have the house for a practice home in domestic science, the neighborhood has it for a community center, and the children have its broad kitchen porch during summer playtime for an ice-cream parlor. Then, too, the manual training boys have combined practice work and community service by building from the ground up a handsome fireplace in the chief club-room.

Let me add in passing that the teachers at Douglass realize that if you increase a man's wants he will work harder so as to have the means for satisfying his new needs. I had commented upon the fine quality of furniture with which the practice house was equipped and had asked if stuff that cost that much might not result merely in the creation of an unattainable ideal.

"No," said my guide. "At present wages many, through saving, can buy furniture as good as this. And such ideals give an incentive to the wage-earner for steadier work."

The record as thus far presented gives ample proof both that a just School Board provides Negro children with opportunities equal to those of the white and that the leadership within the school is sane and resourceful. But, after all, these would come to nothing without a teaching staff of high quality. Several of the Douglass teachers are from reputable Negro institutions. And all comply with the requirement of the School Board that teachers shall do some studying each year in such an approved institution as the University of Cincinnati, itself a part of the school system.

But the remark of one teacher from New Orleans struck me most forcibly.

"My leaving the South," she said, "was simply a business necessity. I am studying for my A.B. degree, and I have decided that it is a needless expense to go from the far South to summer sessions at Ann Arbor and Chicago, when I can get my education at the municipal university here while earning a comfortable living as a teacher."

As a white Southerner I have found much food for thought in this statement, especially because eleven out of the twenty-eight teachers on the efficient staff at Douglass have been contributed by the South. And the South is none too rich in such treasure.

In all that I have written my aim has been to make clear what the Douglass School is doing and how it does it. To whom is honor due for this signal service to American democracy across the bounds of race?

The question is not easy to answer; for, as is characteristic of democracy, the leadership has been co-operative. But, wherever the idea had its birth, it is worth while to remember that back in 1910, when the Douglass School got its present splendid building, an Ohioan whose Virginia Quaker father had freed his own slaves years ago was superintendent of schools in Cincinnati; that he worked in harmony with the president of the municipal university, a Virginian who in former years wrought effectively in the eastern South for better schools for all the children of all the people; and that Booker Washington is said to have been consulted in the selection of the Tennessee Negro who has furnished the direct leadership. For the rest the school would amount to nothing but for the cordial and statesmanlike support it receives from the present School Board and their superintendent, and but for the backing of the local Negro community.

Do the people of Cincinnati indorse the policy of voluntary attendance by Negroes at schools maintained exclusively for Negroes?

Yes. For how else may we interpret the recent creation of the Stowe Public School, modeled after the Douglass, in the heart of a congested downtown center of Negro population? And how else may we interpret the action of the great majority of Negro parents there in sending their children to Stowe and to other exclusively Negro schools in that district? The proof of the pudding is in the eating.

My journey over, I sought out my friend in the South.

"What did you find that those Negroes want?" he queried.

"Only this," was my answer. "As good a chance for their boy and girl as you and I want for ours. But they feel that they get that chance most surely by staying in their own crowd. For us in the South this case is especially encouraging; because, in view of the selected character of the original group and their close relations with white abolitionists, we need not have been surprised had these Negroes desired mixed schools and social intermingling. On the contrary, this community, while reaching up toward white standards, prefers racial seclusion. These people revere their own racial personality. This fact could not be better set forth than by quoting from the four huge placards that confront the visitor in the main entrance to the Douglass School. For on the placards are these words:

"Self-Control: Self-Reliance: Self-Respect: and Race Pride!"

Does not this record provide just ground for a faith deep enough to cause white Americans to see to it that the children of the Negro have opportunities for self-development in separate schools that are equal in quality to the opportunities we demand for our own children? May not America find in such an enterprise the chance to teach the world the supreme truth that democracy means, not the wiping out of racial personality, but rather the cherishing of racial difference and the ennobling of diverse stocks for the enrichment of us all?

FROM THE DIARY OF A TRAVELING SALESMAN

BY J. ANNAN

Sunday Night.

I AM on the sleeper bound for Erie, having just left my wife at the Albany station. Singular that, no matter how often I start off for a trip on the road, there is a mist in her eyes which she tries to hide by smiling bravely. One would think that it were for six months or a year and to some distant land I was going instead of on a three weeks' trip to a near-by State. Nevertheless it does seem good to hear a better good-by than a masculine "So long! Hope your trip is successful." I envy the fellow who returns at night to his own fireside. Strange beds and hotel food wear on one after a while. Sometimes it seems as if all the chefs had learned the art of cooking in a school where they drowned the food in one kettle of a highly seasoned liquid which removed all individual flavor. A trout might be a bluefish (perhaps it is).

Although my berth has been made up, I am sitting in the smoking compartment, listening to the heavy rain and waiting for the rest to get settled for the night. Years of travel have made me selfish enough to prefer waking others up when I retire to being wakened myself. Besides, berths were never made for one of my

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

(C) Underwood & Underwood

A MAKESHIFT TROLLEY HELPING TO SOLVE THE TRANSPORTATION PROBLEM DURING A STRIKE

The strike of the employees of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company, as with similar strikes in Chicago and Boston, resulted in great inconvenience to the public. All kinds of vehicles were transformed into buses to carry passengers in the emergency; a motor truck used in Brooklyn in this way is shown above; hundreds of these trucks made the journey between industrial centers in New York and the remoter districts of Brooklyn

(C) Underwood & Underwood

RESCUING A NEGRO DURING THE RACE RIOTS IN CHICAGO

The Negro seen in the picture was, it is said, pursued by a mob and ran to the mounted policeman shown at the left, who kept the mob at bay until other officers arrived on the scene. This Negro was armed for defense; the policeman at his side is shown in the act of taking a weapon from his hip pocket

U. S. Official Photograph

GENERAL PERSHING DECORATING BISHOP BRENT IN FRANCE

Bishop Brent, of the American Episcopal Church, took a notable part in the war as senior chaplain with the A. E. F., and his work for the soldiers' welfare has been fittingly recognized by the military authorities, as shown in the above picture

(C) Underwood & Underwood

ANDREW CARNEGIE IN HIS LIBRARY AMONG HIS FAVORITE BOOKS

For an editorial estimate of Mr. Carnegie's character and career see page 596

(C) Underwood & Underwood

A CHAMPION WOMAN BRONCO BUSTER

Here is a typical scene at the recent "Cheyenne Frontier Days" Roundup at Cheyenne, Wyoming. The young woman, Miss Kitty Carnutt, shown in the photograph, took the second prize in the women's world championship bronco busting contest

(C) Underwood & Underwood

SENATOR HIRAM JOHNSON, OF CALIFORNIA

Senator Johnson is one of the foremost critics and Senator Hitchcock one of the most active defenders of the Administration's peace policy

(C) Claedinst, from Press Illustrating Service

SENATOR GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, OF NEBRASKA

(C) Ledger Photo Service

L. E. SHEPPARD, PRESIDENT OF THE ORDER OF RAILROAD CONDUCTORS

(C) Ledger Photo Service

WARREN S. STONE, GRAND CHIEF OF THE LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS

These prominent railway labor men are leading supporters of the Plumb plan for Government ownership of railways, reported in last week's Outlook length. Absolute sleep, the kind that "knits up the raveled sleeve of care," is impossible for me.

Monday Night—Meadville.

This hotel is a comfortable, old-fashioned building with high ceilings and exceedingly large rooms. Bath-rooms were invented evidently after the house was built, and so alternate bedrooms have been converted. It is rather unusual for one to have a hotel bath-room 20 x 20 x 20. It makes me feel as if I had a suite partitioned off in a warehouse.

Went to bed last night after leaving Utica. At Rochester some one scrambled noisily into the berth over mine, which was thoughtful of him. Then he began to snore—not quiet, respectable snores, but snorts and agonized wheezings and chokings. I lay awake an hour or more, wondering how he managed to come to after each choke. He did it just as if it were a regular thing. As there was no respite to be had apparently, I got up and washed and shaved just before we pulled into Buffalo, where I walked up and down the platform, drawing in great breaths of damp, smoke-laden air with the hope that it was fairly well filtered before it reached my lungs. At the worst, however, it could not equal the impure, stuffy air of the car I had just left. It was still raining, and the streets had that wretched look that city streets have in rainy weather.

Wednesday Night—Oil City.

For the first time I have been in the oil regions of Pennsylvania. The pungent odor of the crude oil penetrated the train while yet we were several miles away. Every one talks oil, although in small figures, for it does not flow as it did in the early days. It has to be pumped, and a half barrel is considered a very fair output per day for one well. As we came into the city I could see along the track the heavy, cumbersome walking-beams and the pipe-lines to iron reservoirs. Every available foot seemed to be bored or piped. Even the narrow margin between the railway and the river was disfigured with pumps and reservoirs and a network of pipes. I listened to two men on the train talking about drilling a well on a little farm. They expected to go down one thousand feet at a cost of a dollar a foot. They might get a half-barrel a day; they might get a quarter—the average amount; and they might have the unpleasant satisfaction of spending their money without striking any oil. About as risky a gamble as a horse-race, and more expensive.

Sunday Afternoon—Butler.

The hotel here is a very comfortable place to spend one's Sunday. A pleasant room overlooking a little square, a bath, and delightful meals are all one could wish for among strangers. This is the first commercial hotel in all my travels where they have guest books. At least they had them. The last three or four, of several years' standing, are on the table in the lobby. Some of the former guests' remarks were witty, some very matter-of-fact, and some coarse. Occasionally there are human animals that have not allowed their minds to ascend above the level of the mere brute.

Thursday Night—Harrisburg.

Here in the streets of Harrisburg one sees an occasional Mennonite or Dunkard in garb strange to New Yorkers, where short skirts, sporty stockings, and décolleté gowns have educated us out of the idea that anything more modest can maintain a dignified fashion of its own. I know nothing of the religion of these people, but it must be substantial and satisfying, for strong, healthy bodies and pure faces are the rule, with scarce an exception. Taine said that the English people fought for their religion, even died for it, but never lived it. Apparently these people do. It must be fearfully hard to live one's religion on week-days. I never tried it.

Yesterday I was in Gettysburg, a vast cemetery with a costly post office in the center. I was told by a native that it takes longer to get a letter now than before, the clerk has to walk such a distance to get it. It is decidedly out of keeping with either the appearance of the place or the necessities of it. But government by all the people, for all the people, means a large pork barrel.

In the hotel lobby, after dinner, a man passed me his card, which read, "Capt. —, Guide." He explained that he was not really a captain, but the boys called him that, so he let it go. People liked to hear him talk, he said, and always gave him cigars, for he could talk better while smoking. As I didn't want to hear him talk, I refrained from such extravagance, but it didn't seem to make any difference. At last I went to bed and shivered until morning, when I transacted my business as quickly as possible and returned to Harrisburg. To-morrow I make a quick run to Baltimore, then back to Reading and the hard-coal country; and then home, thank the Lord! I want home-cooked food, a home-made bed, an easy chair and slippers, my favorite pipe and a good book.

Friday Night—Baltimore.

Annapolis is a quaint old city. It has an atmosphere of absolute calm, a restful effect on frayed-out nerves that gets you. You feel as if you had been transported to the eighteenth century, and you almost expect to see Richard Carvel and Dorothy Manners sitting under a spreading tree by one of the old, old houses. Black mammies and little pickaninnies are more in evidence now, I imagine, than two centuries ago. One old crone, black as a thunder cloud and looking fully as threatening, tottered along ahead of me, muttering to herself and yet loud enough for all near by to hear. It was evident she had a strong aversion to "white trash."

Adjoining Annapolis, but separated by a stone wall and two centuries, is the Naval Academy. Beautiful and modern buildings around three sides of a quadrangle face the bay, which stretches like a burnished mirror to the horizon.

The band was just finishing the morning concert. While I lingered the middies marched to their classes with such clock-work precision that it stirred even my sluggish blood. I wish every young man in the country could have this training—not for preparedness primarily, although that is good; but for the snap, the vigor, the ability to govern and to obey, that it gives him.

Sunday.

A long, narrow valley, with coal mines and culm heaps on the hills five hundred yards apart or thereabouts and with washeries at the beginning and ending of the two miles of straggling buildings, is the setting of this nameless city. Occasionally one sees a fair building like a high school or a church or a bank, but nothing else. Of all the wealth taken from the earth there is little evidence. For entertainment there are the movies and a theater which, judging from a bill setting forth a coming attraction, does not always have first-class talent. And occasionally there is a gala night, when the male population, or a large part of it, pushes its way into a weather-beaten barn of a hall to see a prize fight. Last night upon the hotel piazza several stocky young men with cauliflower ears were earnestly discussing their chances. They were healthy brutes and by no means so foul-mouthed as their hangers-on and backers. Still they showed but little intelligence, and it was not hard to surmise that they would never get beyond the "preliminaries" stage in big affairs. The boxing game requires quick brains as well as quick muscles and strong bodies.

This afternoon I came back from a walk sooner than I expected, and found my door locked on the inside. Presently two waitresses opened it, and naïvely and unembarrassed explained that my room contained the only bath on the floor, they had been using it. Well, have the consolation of feeling that a clean girl will wait upon me at table even if I do pay for her baths.

I asked the clerk of the hotel last night what there was interesting to see around town, and after considerable thought said there was not a thing except a "square dance" at the park. I went to the square and watched the rising and risen generation dance. Some did remarkably well. After a while one of the young men, possibly the floor manager—came up and politely asked me if I were a stranger. Upon being told that I was, he said, "Why don't you dance?"

"Because I do not know any one," I replied.

"Oh, that don't make any difference. Just grab any one. It will be all right."

However, I didn't, but watched with interest the different types of young men—descendants of Slavs, Germans, Irish, Italians, and Swedes. Possibly there were other races represented. I could pick out these readily. Although they were a fresh, attractive-looking lot of young men and women—somewhat conventional in language and dress—but sound at the core.

Thursday night—Wilkes-Barre.

Hazleton is the highest point in Pennsylvania. It is a matter of great pride to the inhabitants. The cabman speaks of it; the hotel clerk mentions it; and every one with whom you do business boasts of it. Still, every town should have some one thing of which to be proud. And what, pray, is better than altitude? "I will look unto the hills from whence cometh my help." Only Hazleton, being on the highest plateau, has to look down, if indeed it looks anywhere.

What a busy little city Wilkes-Barre is! Its one square is the center of the retail business and the evening promenade. Round and round at night the younger generation walks, at first the girls in groups or by twos, and later each girl with the boy of her choice. Somewhere on the square mate calls to mate, and the girls have beaux to see them home—the same old game, thousands of years old, but ever new to the happy participants. Heigh-ho! I wish I were at home!

Dinner is over, and I am lucky enough to have some mail—one letter from my wife, cheery and bracing as October air, and one from Betty, a dear little girl of six who calls me Uncle Jim and tells me all her doings in her own delightful way, albeit it is as hard to decipher as a combination of the chirography of Napoleon Bonaparte and Horace Greeley.

Sunday—Scranton.

This is the queen city of the coal regions. It has handsome public buildings and beautiful homes, and is withal clean and progressive. Saturday night is always the great parade night for the workers. Money flows freely then. A certain percentage of the week's wage is spent in pleasure, harmless or otherwise. Knowing this, a certain class of vampires ogle the men as they pass, or, if a more exclusive type, permit men to ogle them. It is such times as these that are dangerous for the young man who has no ties to bind him; when the loneliness of having human beings everywhere about him and yet not one to speak to in anything but a business way is absolutely oppressive. The older men have letters to write and have seen that business and folly do not mix. That may be an unmoral view rather than a high standard of ethics, but it keeps traveling men as a class clean. Happier and less cynical is he who can keep before him the vision of the one who has faith in him as he has faith in her.

This evening I heard a fine sermon, and it was supplemented by most excellent music. The sermon was clear and logical and appealed to a man's best mental powers. There was nothing in it of the sensational or the appeal to sympathies. It was a lecture which showed research, broad knowledge of history, and, better, a clear insight into psychology. The man was a thinker not only, but had gone outside of cloister walls and had met with the doers of the world. It was a spur to sluggish minds and an incentive to right living. But a wanderer does not get this treat every Sunday.

Tuesday Night.

Lowering clouds and rain beating against the windows by my breakfast table this morning. Not a pleasant prospect for a day's work, but with a mental "Cheer up! The worst is yet to come," I attacked a hearty breakfast to put me in good physical shape. A full stomach can forgive any weather and almost any insult. I put on raincoat and rubbers, and with umbrella raised I started out to see the first of ten customers. Around the corner my umbrella was turned inside out, a wreck, and I faced the gusts of rain chastened in appearance but decidedly unchastened in spirit. I reached my first place, and with my best smile entered. Gloom sat enthroned here. The proprietor looked as if his family and friends had died, his money was lost, and a mortal sickness was upon him. I told a funny story. He eyed me with disfavor. I told another. He looked at the puddle of water which my raincoat was making on the floor. I tried a sad anecdote, which cheered him up a little, and at the end of an hour I sold him about a quarter of what I should.

The next call was no better. Everything was wrong. The times were bad, the present Administration rotten, the last one rotter, and the next one will probably be worse. I cheered him up with an expenditure of a lot of vitality and sold him a small bill of goods. The next man was busy, and I made an appointment to take him to lunch. Then I saw two others who did not buy anything, and came back for my luncheon appointment. Wet as I was, I enjoyed the meal. Over coffee my customer agreed to buy a larger line than I had expected, and, furthermore, he was good for it.

The afternoon was a different story. Not one of the remaining customers bought anything, and wet clothes and soggy shoes did not add to my cheerfulness. What little I may have had disappeared before my last call, I fear. This kind of weather makes me feel as if I was living in the trenches with water up to my knees, and without the consolation of shooting some enemy. I feel very much riddled myself, and, if it were not for the fact that I have given hostages to fortune, I would cease this peripatetic life, even if it does make one a sort of philosopher.

Friday.

Homeward bound! The hurrying throngs of New York are left behind, and we have rounded the curve at Spuyten Duyvil and straightened out for the long run to Albany. How quickly the electric locomotive picks up speed! Within a few train lengths we are rushing along at forty-five miles an hour, if the rail clicks tell a truthful story.

Through Yonkers with scarcely a slow-down, city on one side and busy yards, sugar mills, and factories on the other. With a rumble and roar we pass under the Bridge of Sighs that leads to Sing Sing prison. If I had the power, I should like to take out a few fellows, hit or miss, and dump in about a dozen I know for life, solitary confinement, and tar and feathers each day. One of them is a man who always promises to buy goods but never does. His final end should be in boiling oil—before it goes up in price.

We are slowing down for Harmon, where we change from electricity to steam. Here Croton Point stretches like a finger far out toward the other shore, which at this point seems five miles away. To the right, through a tangle of marsh grass, flows the Croton River—or what is left of it after supplying New Yorkers with baths and (in these days) drink. An unweaned youngster is yelling vociferously for his dinner. Ah, he is now getting it, thank Heaven, and he has made the rest of us as happy as himself.

At the Highlands I go to the observation platform to enjoy fully the most wonderful ten-mile stretch of railway in the East. Around jagged rocks, the buttresses of hills torn in some cataclysm of nature, a plunge into a tunnel and a burst into bright sunshine again, a twisting and a turning like some writhing serpent until the reverse curve at West Point, when we gradually quicken again to real speed. Forty miles, forty-five, fifty, sixty, and even sixty-five miles an hour between Beacon and Poughkeepsie. A wonderful gorge this—a slice cut out of the rock to let the waters through. Old Dame Nature never tries the same method twice. She varies in countless ways to build up or to tear down, and every way has its own fascination, its own beauty, its own grandeur.

The valley begins to open up, and as we pass Kingston we have a clear sweep of twelve miles to the Catskills, now bathed in the gold of the setting sun. Above us are clouds of purple and violet and orange; beside us is the silver river, now quiet as a mill-pond; and on the near-by hills the foliage, rich and heavy, adds just the needed somber to the riot of sunset colors. From the marshy river-bank a startled crane, with his head sunk back on his shoulders, wings his heavy flight toward the darkening east. In the distance sharp details of landscape become a blur in evening haze. From the mountains comes a chill, and the platform is soon deserted.

Happy faces are the rule in trains. I presume the feeling of "homeward bound" shines out, as it should. What a queer world this would be, indeed, if there were none to greet us! There looms the Capitol amid the city's lights. Now for a leisurely taking down of bag and coat. Not too fast, for that would show excitement unbecoming in one so staid. Every one is laughing and talking and crowding to the door as we slowly pull across the river. Down the platform and under tracks to the station. There she is with eyes softly aglow, a tender smile of welcome, and a shy—a very shy—kiss, with mantling cheek.

"Home, Thomas, and don't stop at every corner for passengers."

THE BOOK TABLE: DEVOTED TO BOOKS AND THEIR MAKERS

DEEPENING THE FOUNDATIONS OF POLITICAL SCIENCE. A BOOK AND A MAN<sup>1</sup>

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

THERE are two events of seemingly incidental importance in the mighty onrush of our times which have recently attracted my attention as an interested student of public affairs. One is the publication of a little book called "The Responsible State," by Professor Franklin H. Giddings, and the other is the completion by Professor Giddings, at the late Commencement, of twenty-five years of service in the Department of Political Science at Columbia University—an event which was celebrated by a dinner and a programme of appreciation on the part of the F. H. G. Club, composed of admiring and grateful former students from different parts of the country.

This distinguished teacher and thinker is best known as a sociologist. Sociology is even now supposed to be the mental pabulum of queer people. When Giddings began to expound it so powerfully twenty-five years ago, newspaper editors, Wall Street folks, and some others believed that there must be something essentially peculiar and unsound and unsafe about the man. For quite a period he was on the Index Expurgatorius of more than one metropolitan newspaper staff, by special order.

He is now regarded by most men of insight as one of the most cautious and profound philosophical thinkers of our day. There is much research yet to be wrought out before sociology is precisely delimited or mastered, but Giddings has given the study a statistical and scientific standing among educated men which can never be taken away. He has grounded his philosophy of progress, not only or chiefly in the great subconscious evolutionary forces of the world, but in a deep analysis of the psychology of mankind and the free forces of the human spirit.

This is what makes his thinking so valuable to political science. He has made sociology a natural introduction to politics by revealing the influences which shape political movements, which determine what they shall be and how they shall work out. He does not forget that we are ever in the presence of great evolutionary forces, but the core of his teaching is that the time has now come in human progress when the free mind of man may, to some extent, modify and direct the great evolutionary forces, and to a degree never before possible in the history of the world. His emphasis is always upon the value of trained human centers of deliberation to forestall political and social hysteria and disaster. He is a true democrat in that he has no faith in any democracy which is not guided and molded by a natural aristocracy of mind and character. Such a philosophy was never more needed than now, when a blind wave of anarchistic democracy is sweeping across the world.

His students for a long generation have been prepared to estimate the quality and the worth of the illegitimate democracy which comes out of Moscow. Ultra-radicalism, to minds at once conservative and shallow, appears to mean the attempt to establish certain objective qualities among men. That is not what it means to Giddings. With him the most radical and dangerous error in politics is the assumption that all men, having been endowed by a democratic state with equal power to vote, are therefore equally competent to hold office and to rule. His students for a long generation have understood that this unsound dogma lay at the heart of the shirt-sleeves democracy of Andrew Jackson; that it is the taint of the Industrial Workers of the World and of Bolsheviks everywhere; that it was the peril of the leadership of Schmitz in San Francisco, of Blease in South Carolina, of Ben Butler in Massachusetts, of Sulzer in New York, as it is of Lenine in Russia.

Giddings has long expounded and founded the ideas of an unintelligent, impetuous, and ultra-radical democracy. The vice of this sort of a democracy is that, whether it confesses to the indictment or not, it really believes as strongly in subjective equality as it does in objective equality. It denies that some are by nature of nobler mold and greater ability than others. It knows nothing of the laws of heredity. It attributes the variability in efficiency and behavior among men merely to differences in culture and to inequalities of opportunity. Quick to take advantage of the ruin and chaos which absolutism and divine right have brought upon the world, anarchistic democracy proclaims the revolution and the torch and an end of natural as well as privileged aristocracy.

Giddings's political philosophy is neither absolutism nor radicalism. It is democratic republicanism, which has so recently proved itself capable of saving and safeguarding the priceless values of civilization. Democratic republicanism distributes political power with approximate equality. It seeks to establish even-handed justice. It imposes public burdens chiefly upon those who have the ability to bear them. It provides educational opportunity for all. It strives to protect the health and strength of the population. It curbs and finally abolishes privilege. It goes far to achieve approximate equality of economic opportunity. But it does not accept the dogma that men are subjectively equal. It knows they are unequal, physiologically, mentally, and morally. As it grows wiser, it looks about for exceptional men to perform legislative, administrative, and judicial tasks. It ungrudgingly acknowledges their superiority and listens to their counsel. It puts and keeps them in positions of authority and power.

"The Responsible State" is the liberty-loving and resolute American professor's answer to the cringing and corrupting German professor's philosophy of the arbitrary and absolute state. The state is the finest creation of the human mind, but it is neither arbitrary nor absolute. It is finite, relative, responsible. It has its origins in the developments of human behavior, in a growing toleration, liberty, associated feeling, mutual helpfulness, on the part of the many, and in an awesome and more or less subconscious sense, on the part of the many, of the need of the far-seeing and superior few in positions of influence and authority. The responsible state is a living population engaged in political experimentation, safeguarding the commonwealth, protecting property right, enforcing contracts, fostering the enterprises of civilization, but also ameliorating the social and economic lot of man.

The responsible state is organized civilization. In organized civilization the survival of the fit does not mean the survival of the brutal, as the German grotesquely misapprehends. The fit are those who are adapted to the environment in which they live. If the environment is the jungle, then ferocity and cruelty are worth while. But if we mean civilized human society, which is a moral environment, then honor, intelligence, justice, good faith, are the fittest to survive.

For a quarter of a century at Columbia Giddings has maintained a seminar in the problems of progress. The personal relations established there with his students have been close and intimate, and he has grown a crop of able disciples. Out of his very first seminar group came men like Ripley, of Harvard; the Rosewaters, of the Omaha "Bee"; young Francis Walker, the economist; and Hamilton Holt, of the "Independent." And their kind has not failed in the succeeding years. Giddings has exploded intellectual dynamite in the consciousness of his pupils and quickened them into new and more powerful periods of growth. His whimsical and deliberate class-room method of shock and exaggeration has been delightful, but nobody was ever misled by it. It was too cool and calculated for that. The Anarchist, said he one day, is a man who wants law and government for nobody and nothing. The Socialist is a man who wants law and government for everybody and everything. And the individualist is a man who wants law and government for everybody but himself and his own affairs. Exaggerated, but striking and illuminating.

A man thinking—that is Giddings: and a prophet, not so much by instinct as by far-seeing insight into what must happen because human forces are what they are and human nature is what it is. Like Cramb, of the University of London, Giddings foresaw and expected the great war through which we have passed. When the Kaiser of Germany gave his parting brutal instructions to his soldiers who were going to China, Giddings wrote an editorial for one of the leading magazines to which he was accustomed to contribute, declaring that before that man died the world would have to reckon with him. It was thought to be unwise to commit the magazine to such views, and the editorial was returned.

Giddings is a genuinely American political philosopher. His doctrine of surplus might normally overflowing into right explains America. And it explains the abnormality and final impotence of German might. With Giddings only might makes right; not brute might, not Prussian might, but might overflowing into the rational channels of progress and service, into honor and mercy and fidelity and human comprehension and world brotherhood—this sort of might makes right, and nothing else can make it. And that is the real America, the America that is always fighting to put democracy into the saddle of government at home against all odds. It is the America of the Civil War, of the Spanish War. It is the America in China and in France.

<sup>1</sup>The Responsible State—A Re-examination of Fundamental Political Doctrines in the Light of the World War and the Menace of Anarchism. By Franklin H. Giddings, Professor of Sociology and the History of Civilization in Columbia University, and Sometime Professor of Political Science in Bryn Mawr College. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

But neither the book nor the man is blind to the administrative and superficial thoughtlessness of America.

"Of all the follies that the human mind can be guilty of," he holds, "the least excusable is to put trust in an inadequate army. Let us either accept the pacifist contention, lay down our arms, and trust in the sufficiency of sweetness and light to save us from the blood-lust of the supersavage, or, believing that the supersavage can be restrained only by the kind of might that he is capable of understanding, let us make it mighty enough to restrain him."

But, take her all in all, America has justified, with all her faults, the rigorous philosophy of this distinguished teacher and thinker. She has justified his theory of what we may expect in a crisis from the spontaneous power, the individual initiative, and the quick voluntary co-operation of free peoples. Over against the thirty-five hundred German professors and lecturers who servilely bowed the knee to the savior of Kultur, America is happy in a reasonable number of devoted and daring men in professorial chairs who have never bowed the knee to Baal; who dwell upon the mountain-tops of vision, but who know practically the psychology and the behavior of the people in the plain; who rebuke and spare not their countrymen in error, but interpret truly the inner spirit and the direction of movement of the American democracy.

THE NEW BOOKS

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Anatole France. By Lewis Piaget Shanks. The Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago.

Convention and Revolt in Poetry. By John Livingston Lowes. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

Faces in the Fire, and Other Fancies. By F. W. Boreham. The Abingdon Press, New York.

Fighting for a New World. By Charles William Dabney. The Abingdon Press, New York.

Higher Powers of Mind and Spirit (The). By Ralph Waldo Trine. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

Home and the World (The). By Sir Rabindranath Tagore. Translated. The Macmillan Company, New York.

Mushrooms on the Moor. By F. W. Boreham. The Abingdon Press, New York.

What is America? By Edward Alsworth Ross, Ph.D., LL.D. Illustrated. The Century Company, New York.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

Pilgrim in Palestine (A). By John Finley. Illustrated. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Book of the National Parks (The). By Robert Sterling Yard. Illustrated. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

This is the latest and most complete account of our National Parks. Mr. Yard is connected with the Department of the Interior; he is an enthusiast in out-of-door matters, and he knows his subject thoroughly. There is much in his book which has not appeared elsewhere, and it is written in a way which takes it entirely out of the class of manuals and guide-books and gives it literary effectiveness and entertaining quality.

Prowling About Panama. By George A. Miller. Illustrated. The Abingdon Press, New York.

BIOGRAPHY

Life of Theodore Roosevelt (The). By William Draper Lewis, Ph.D. Introduction by William Howard Taft. Illustrated. The John C. Winston Company, Philadelphia.

Story of General Pershing (The). By Everett T. Tomlinson. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Theodore Roosevelt: The Boy and the Man. By James Morgan. Illustrated. Second Edition. The Macmillan Company, New York.

THE A. E. F. TO T. R.

(From "Service and Sacrifice")

BY CORINNE ROOSEVELT ROBINSON

Gone is the joy,—gone is the thrill of returning,
We who had longed to share with you all our laurels,
To lay them at the feet of our great companion;—
Hushed is rejoicing!

Never again to see the light from your window
Shining across the land that you loved and inspired,—
"Put out the light," you said, and slept; but not dreaming
The darkness for others.

You, our leader, but more, our greatest companion—
Near enough for the spur of your voice and your hand grip,
Ever ready to share, but sharing, still leading Upward and onward.

Listen! This is our pledge, to fare and to follow,
Follow the trail you blazed, without shadow of turning,—
We, who have learned of you, shall not be found wanting
Here or hereafter!

POETRY

Service and Sacrifice. By Corinne Roosevelt Robinson. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Some of the best poetry that has come from Mrs. Robinson's gifted pen is to be found in this volume. Noteworthy above all others are the poems written in memory of her brother, Theodore Roosevelt. "Valiant for Truth," "The A. E. F. to T. R." (republished on this page), and "To My Brother" are poems not soon to be forgotten by those who share in the heritage of the one she truly calls "our greatest companion." It is to be regretted that the effect of the volume as a whole is marred by the inclusion of some rather mediocre versified characterizations which at best are only mildly amusing.

Sailor Town: Sea Songs and Ballads. By C. Fox Smith. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Small Craft: Sailor Ballads and Chantys. By C. Fox Smith. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Verses for Patriots: To Encourage Good Citizenship. Compiled by Jean Broadhurst,

A.M., Ph.D., and Clara Lawton Rhodes, A.M. Illustrated. The J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

War Verse. Edited by Frank Foxcroft. The Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York.

Wild Swans at Coole (The). By W. B. Yeats. The Macmillan Company, New York.

SCIENCE

Inventions of the Great War. By A. Russell Bond. Illustrated. The Century Company, New York.

Mason-Wasps (The). By J. Henri Fabre. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

This is the ninth volume of Fabre's "Souvenirs Entomologiques" to be issued in English, and the second volume devoted to wasps. Fabre puts the magic of his personality into this study so pervadingly that behind the scientific account of the insect we always see the charming portrait of the man. The book thus has a double interest.

Our First Airways: Their Organization, Equipment, and Finance. By Claude Grahame-White and Harry Harper. Illustrated. The John Lane Company, New York.

Realities of Modern Science (The). An Introduction for the General Reader. By John Mills. The Macmillan Company, New York.

FICTION

Far-Away Stories. By William J. Locke. The John Lane Company, New York.

Judging by this collection, Mr. Locke's short stories are as good in one way as his novels are in quite another. "The Scourge," for instance, is a notably powerful bit of fiction. Delightful is the little sketch "Shadow Friends," in which the author tells of the war work of some of the people in his novels—Doggie and Jeanne of "The Rough Road," Septimus, Paragot, Marcus Ordeyne, and others.

From Father to Son. By Mary S. Watts. The Macmillan Company, New York.

One may always depend on Mrs. Watts for sound character depiction. Here members of the family react differently to the discovery that the grandfather made a fortune in the Civil War by selling rubbish as drugs to the Government at an enormous profit. Is the money still "tainted"? is the question. In the main the many people of the family are agreeable and refined and their ways of living and thinking are pleasantly told. A good novel for quiet, leisurely, vacation reading.

You Never Saw Such a Girl. By George Weston. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

A simple, amusing tale of the romance and adventures encountered by the girl referred to in the title and an older woman on a vacation trip undertaken in a light motor delivery wagon. Light but jolly.

MISCELLANEOUS

Grizzly (The). By Enos A. Mills. Illustrated. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

"In the grizzly bear's territory I have camped alone and unarmed. I have trailed the grizzly without a gun. I have repeatedly been outwitted by him, but never has he attacked me. I consider him in most respects the greatest animal on the North American continent, if not in the world." Could any animal lover, after reading thus far in this book, fail to follow the pages to the end of the trail? The author writes in an informal, conversational style, and his book is full of entertaining anecdote and information.

Good Manners and Right Conduct. By Gertrude E. McVenn. 2 vols. D. C. Heath & Co., Boston.

Management and Men. A Record of New Steps in Industrial Relations. By Meyer Bloomfield. The Century Company, New York.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HEAD OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY AND AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP IN
THE SCARBOROUGH SCHOOL, SCARBOROUGH-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK

Based on The Outlook of August 13, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: The Pronouncement of the Railway Brotherhoods; President Wilson and the Railway Problems; The Plumb Plan; Objections to it.

Reference: Pages 561, 562, 564.

Questions:

1. Make an analysis of the pronouncement made by the representatives of the Railway Brotherhoods and the Plumb Plan, keeping in mind the following headings: (a) Causes leading them to make the statements; (b) Their proposal and the objections they think it meets; and (c) Alleged benefits and advantages. 2. Name and explain The Outlook's objections to the Plumb Plan. Discuss whether these objections are reasonable and sound. 3. Where would the money come from to finance the buying of the railways by the Government? Show why this is a very important question. Had you money to invest, would you buy Government bonds called for by the Plumb Plan? Reasons. 4. The Outlook believes that "it will not do to treat the Brotherhoods' plan in an antagonistic spirit." Why not? 5. Should the Plumb Plan be defeated? Will it be defeated by simply picking flaws in it? Do negative oppositions usually win? 6. The Plumb Plan is unopposed by any positive or constructive plan for the solution of our railway problem. For more than a year the American public has been waiting for the solution of this problem. Has there been time enough to think out this question? Who is to blame for not solving it? 7. Discuss whether there is lack of political leadership in both the Democratic and Republican parties. Be specific and support your opinion. If such leadership is wanting, what is your explanation? 8. If you don't like the Plumb Plan, present a better one. It is your duty to think constructively on this problem. Do you know why? 9. Tell, with reasons, what you think of each of the following criticisms of the Brotherhoods' proposal: (a) "It is radical;" (b) "It is an adventure into Soviet economics;" (c) "It is revolutionary;" (d) "It spells class dictatorship;" (e) "It offers the hope of a finer life for laboring people;" (f) "It would mean that hereafter there would be no more watered railway stocks." 10. Discuss at length whether those engaged in essential industries should "participate in some organic way in every decision which directly affects their welfare." 11. Do we have industrial democracy in the United States? Tell why or why not? 12. Is the American Government designed to respond quickly to public will? 13. Every one interested in the relation of industry to politics should read "The Politics of Industry," by Glenn Frank (Century); "Man to Man," by John Leitch (Forbes); "Instincts in Industry," by Ordway Tead (Houghton, Mifflin).

B. Topic: Race Riots in Chicago.

Reference: Pages 566, 567.

Questions:

1. Describe the race riots in Chicago. 2. What are the causes of these riots? Give other causes than those mentioned by Mr. Holman. 3. Name the results of these riots and discuss their significance. 4. Name and discuss the lessons to be drawn from such tragedies. 5. Can you propose "a constructive plan for whites and blacks to dwell together in amity"? Reasons. 6. Are American Negroes entitled to all the political and economic rights that other American citizens are entitled to? Do they enjoy such rights? Discuss. 7. State and explain your attitude about social recognition of the Negro. 8. Are all men created equal?

C. Topic: Will Hays.

Reference: Pages 569, 570.

Questions:

1. Describe the sort of man Will Hays is. 2. Senator Davenport speaks of a "genuine gentleman." What are the characteristics of such a man? 3. Professor Davenport refers to "the Old Guard of Republicanism" and "the ruling Republican dynasty in 1910 and 1912." Explain somewhat at length what he has reference to. 4. What is your opinion of the Republican party? Give reasons for it. 5. Mr. Hays is described as both a liberal and a conservative. Is this possible? 6. Explain how a person can be at the same time loyal both to a political party and to his country. 7. What lessons do you see in this article for Americans?

II—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. The Railway Brotherhoods have performed a great National service by bringing the high cost of living question to a crisis. 2. The interests of labor and the public in the railway question are identical. 3. Industry should be made a training school for self-government. 4. Government is a necessary evil.

III—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for August 13, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Corral, equinoxes, mentor (569); recalcitrancy, asininity (570).

DURAND STEEL RACKS

THE customer of today is critical of service.
He wants what he wants when he wants it.

One way to give it to him is to have a well arranged stock room. Durand Steel Racks—clean, space-saving, instantly adjustable—will help put the kind of "snap" into your deliveries that is appreciated.

Write for catalogue of steel racks, bins and counters, or of steel lockers for factories, clubs, etc.

DURAND STEEL LOCKER CO.

1573 Ft. Dearborn Bk. Bldg. Chicago    973 Vanderbilt Bldg. New York

AN APPEAL FOR WORKING- GIRLS

The Working-Girls' Vacation Society, having exhausted its available funds, asks its friends and the generous public for money to give a two weeks' vacation to many girls who are patiently waiting.

The list is a long one. If these girls can have the rest and change they need, they will be able to do more efficient work through the coming winter.

Who will help the Society to send these tired, hard-working girls to the country?

Forty dollars will pay board, traveling expenses, and medical care for a month at Santa Clara for girls who have a tendency to tubercular disease. Ten dollars will pay for a vacation of two weeks, also traveling expenses.

Contributions large and small may be sent to the office of the Society, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, and will be gratefully acknowledged.

Digitized by Google

WINTON SIX

Desire Something Better?

BE glad if you have this desire, for it promotes invention and human progress, and produces the good things of life that make your world more glorious—like this magnificent new Winton Six.

Seeing this car, you will know that yesterday's cars are surpassed, that here are new thrills, new enjoyments, new happiness awaiting you. Beauty that captivates, power and speed that laugh at miles and hardest hills, comfort and style beyond previous "bests," a mechanism that harmonizes with your needs and stays in tune—all these are yours in this newest Winton Six, the surprise car of 1919. May we send you literature?

THE WINTON COMPANY
102 BEREA ROAD, CLEVELAND, O., U. S. A.

"We are advertised by our loving friends"

Solo. of C. Becker,
Ashland, Ohio.

Prepare baby's food
according to the
Mellin's Food
Method of Milk Modification

Bernard R. McLaughlin,
Albany, N.Y.

*Have you overlooked
the advertisement
on the inside of the front cover?*

THE PHILIPPINES AND THE FILIPINOS

Permit me to express my surprise that a paper usually accurate and well informed should speak of Filipinos as a race, which The Outlook did in "Current Events Illustrated" of April 9. The Philippines are inhabited by a composite people almost as numerous and diverse in elements as are England and the United States.

The terraced mountain-sides which you picture show the relationship of certain mountain people of the Philippines to people of southern China, in Szechwan Province, to use the International Dictionary's spelling. The Philippine terraces are very like those to the westward on the Asiatic mainland, while the terraces on the islands to the north and to the south have less resemblance according to their remoteness from here, suggesting that there was an early direct immigration from the mainland, and that from here the migration continued in both directions through the Asiatic archipelago of which these islands are the middle. Then from the north there early came dwarf white people, the hairy Ainu of Japan, and from the south the stunted, kinky-haired, chocolate-complexioned people whom the Spaniards mistakenly called "Little Negroes," for probably the earliest African strain here came through the Spaniards.

Then centuries before the time of Christ the persecuted of India found refuge here, or rather the bolder spirits, for the less adventurous stopped in Java and Sumatra, and their countrymen kept coming for more than a thousand years. Refugees, too, came from China, and they kept coming even after the Spaniards had perpetrated several wholesale massacres, which speaks well for their courage. Japanese of the better class in large numbers exiled themselves here because they were Christians, and their descendants are still recognizable. Arabs likewise came not a few, as missionaries for Mohammedanism, and earlier commerce had brought Persian traders to make long stays in Philippine ports.

Spain exiled here from the homeland her liberal agitators, and sent here the discontented Mexicans, besides the Mexican and Spanish soldiers who came to garrison these islands.

Piracy, a respectable employment centuries ago, in which the Filipinos excelled, brought hosts of captives of those sailing along the Asiatic coast; and afterwards commerce, when Manila was the great port of the Orient, contributed to the melting-pot which has made a strong people who have in common boldness and an adventurous spirit.

Twenty years before the Spaniards came to Manila that capital had repulsed a Japanese invasion. The so-called Spanish conquest was really a conversion, Filipinos themselves doing all the fighting for the Spaniards. During Spain's third of a thousand years of alleged rule there were hundreds of insurrections, the people taking arms to redress grievances and laying them down on promise of reform, for they seem to have been as trusting as Samson was. Still, independence from the first was the object of some, and never did Spain really rule as much as a third of the territory. Hill people and Moros also joined with their Christian countrymen in these

Mens wear at McCutcheon's

Men's Sweaters

Suitable Jackets for golf and motoring in brushed wool. With or without collar. Handsome heather colorings; popular shades. Prices $10.50, 12.00 and 15.00.

Mohair Jackets, high-grade garments of particular merit, $19.50.

Fancy Striped Alpaca Jackets—ideal for sport wear, $18.00. Sweater Vests, brushed wool in heather shades, $10.50.

MAIL ORDER SERVICE: Any of the merchandise described above may be ordered with complete satisfaction through our Mail Order Service.

James McCutcheon & Co.
Fifth Avenue, New York

*There are 3 ways of getting
The Outlook*

One is to drop over every Wednesday evening to the home of some friend who subscribes for it.

One is to buy it at the newsdealer's
every week for 10 cents a copy.

The other is to send $4 for a year's subscription to

The Outlook Company
381 Fourth Avenue, New York

Digitized by Google

The Philippines and the Filipinos (Continued)

efforts, so that all the inhabitants of the archipelago are bound by the tie of a common history and aspiration.

They are really a creditable aggregation, these insular Americans, and worth studying. It is a pity that even their professed friends know little about them and ascribe all their virtues to progress during twenty years under the American flag. Great strides have been made, but because the country was awaiting such an opportunity and has made the most of it. Their great grievance has been that we have withheld from them the American system of government, in which they were anxious to have us as instructors, and instead have experimented at their expense with a colonial system about which they knew more than we did.

There may be foreign menaces to prevent independence, but one wonders why, without delay, they may not have their own governor-general after two decades under the American flag, when only five years gives rights of American citizenship to residents of foreign settlements in the larger American cities, whom we now know have shown much less eagerness to fit themselves.

AUSTIN CRAIG.

University of the Philippines, Manila.

A TRIBUTE FROM AN ENGLISH SCHOLAR TO AMERICAN STUDENTS

You may like to put in The Outlook a copy of this letter I have written to these parting American soldier-students at Cambridge. They've been perfectly splendid, and we all love them. A. E. SHIPLEY, Vice-Chancellor.

Christ's College Lodge, Cambridge.
June 23, 1919.

Christ's College Lodge, Cambridge.
June 12, 1919.

Dear Sir—I had hoped to say a personal word of good-by to the American soldier-students on the 11th, when the American Ambassador intended to be here. He was, however, detained in Paris, and the opportunity did not occur. May I, however, write you a word of thanks and of farewell? I am thankful to the American students for coming and living a few months amongst us. I want every American soldier-student to feel he has a second home in England; that he has a share in an ancient College in one of the oldest of the British Universities; and I want him to keep in touch with it.

If the United States and Great Britain can keep together in peace as they have done in war, nothing else matters.

Oh ye who in eternal youth
Speak with a living and creative blood
This universal English, and do stand
Its breathing book; live worthy of that grand

Heroic utterance—parted, yet a whole,
Far, yet unsever'd,—children brave and free

Of the great Mother-tongue, and ye shall be Lords of an empire wide as Shakespeare's soul,

Sublime as Milton's immemorial theme,
And rich as Chaucer's speech, and fair as Spenser's dream.

Yours very cordially,
A. E. SHIPLEY,
Vice-Chancellor.

Study His Daily Food Need

The average man needs about 3000 calories of food per day. Most of that need is for energy food. But he also needs some  $3\frac{1}{2}$  ounces of protein, to build up and repair.

Figuring these elements only, here is what they cost at this writing in some necessary foods:

Cost of Protein Per Pound		Cost of Energy Per 1000 Calories
In Quaker Oats . . .	63c	In Quaker Oats . . .	5c
In White Bread . . .	$1.30	In Round Steak . . .	41c
In Potatoes . . .	1.48	In Veal Cutlets . . .	57c
In Beef about . . .	2.00	In Fish about . . .	60c
In Ham . . .	3.63	In Canned Peas . . .	54c

Ten Times the Cost

Meat and fish foods, per 1000 calories, average ten times Quaker Oats' cost.

So do some vegetables. Squash, for instance, at this writing costs 15 times as much.

As energy food the oat has an age-old fame.

In protein—the costliest food element—it is richer than any other grain. It stands about equal with beefsteak.

In needed minerals—iron, lime, calcium, etc.—the oat is uniquely rich.

As an all-'round food, well-balanced, the oat is the greatest that grows. As a food for growing children it holds the zenith place.

Other foods are needed. Children must have milk and eggs. Vegetables are necessary.

But start the day with Quaker Oats. Make it your breakfast. It costs but one-half cent per dish.

This will supply supreme nutrition, and the saving will average up the costlier foods at dinner.

Quaker Oats

Extra-Flavory Flakes

Packed in Sealed Round Packages with Removable Cover

"Say it with Flowers"

For the Friend Who Is Ill. Send a message of cheer with flowers. Your thoughtfulness will hasten recovery. Remember that your local florist within a few hours can deliver fresh flowers in any city or town in the United States or Canada through the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Service.

For Sale
AT Mountain Lakes
NEW JERSEY

45 minutes by the Lackawanna from Hoboken

House, 10 rooms, 3 bathrooms. First floor: entrance hall, steam-heated solarium, living-room, dining-room, butler's pantry, etc. Second floor: 4 large corner rooms, 2 bathrooms, inclosed sleeping-porch over solarium. Third floor: 4 rooms and bath. Electricity, steam heat. Two-car garage, living quarters above—100-gallon gasoline tank, buried. Plot, 150 ft. frontage on boulevard, about 170 ft. frontage on lake; 440 ft. from boulevard to lake. Ground gradually sloping toward lake. 800 ft. elevation. Excellent boating, bathing, and fishing. Location unusually attractive—an ideal all-year-round home. Price $20,000; satisfactory terms can be arranged. Inspection by appointment. Address F. C. H., care of The Outlook.

PARK HILL ON THE HUDSON, Yonkers, N. Y.

A most attractive property for sale. Two hundred feet frontage by one hundred and nineteen feet depth. Stone wall, beautiful trees and lawn, and delightful view of Hudson River and the Palisades. Charming twelve-room house, modern improvements, good repair. For terms and further information, address 867, Outlook.

BY THE WAY

A recently published historical sketch of Copp's Hill Burying Ground in Boston quotes many quaint and amusing epitaphs inscribed on the gravestones of that noted cemetery. Here is one:

"Stop here my friends & cast an eye,
As you are now, so once was I;
As I am now, so you must be,
Prepare for death and follow me."

A young wag is said to have added in chalk:

"To follow you I'm not content Unless I know which way you went."

This epitaph has an Elizabethan quality:

"Beneath this stone doth lye
as much Virtue, as could dye,
Which when alive did vigor give,
to as much Beauty as could live."

The shortest epitaph is probably the following:

"In life respected
In death lamented."

An inscription of pathetic interest is that on the gravestone of Henry D. Emerson, aged 4:

"Like a bright flower he was cut down."

This boy was a contemporary of that other "wondrous child," Waldo Emerson, whose brief life and untimely death are celebrated in the "Threnody" of Ralph Waldo Emerson, his father.

Australia led the world during the war in the pay she gave to her soldiers. They received $43.50 a month. New Zealand came next, her men receiving $36.60 a month. Canada followed with $33 a month. The United States gave her soldiers $30 a month. British Tommies got $11.40, French poilus $1.50, Austrian privates 98 cents, Japanese privates 78 cents, while Italian privates were at the bottom of the list with 58 cents a month. German privates received $3 a month.

A medical journal prints this "awful knock" from a pupil nurse's examination paper on sanitation and hygiene:

Question: Name some of the advantages of hospital clinics.

Answer: Clinics in large hospitals enable poor people to get free medical attention and many infectious diseases.

A clever retort, by which a Washington newspaper man turned the tables on the Senators, is quoted in the New York "Evening Sun." The "Sun's" correspondent was coming down a stairway at the Capitol marked "For Senators only" when he was seen by a crowd of seminary girls sightseeing in the Capitol. "I guess that must be one of the Senators," said one of the girls in a loud whisper. "They don't look much, do they?" The correspondent overheard the remark and neatly countered by approaching the girls and saying, good-humoredly: "No, young ladies, I am not a Senator, but if you think I don't look much, you ought to see some of the real Senators."

"Talk about high prices!" said the storekeeper in a small town in Maine. "For years I sold porterhouse steak over that counter at two pounds for a quarter. Now I have to ask fifty-five cents a pound for it. We were the first firm in our town to get one of those automatic price-registering scales—before the war. We had it register from one cent to eighteen cents a pound. My partner said, when we got it, 'We'll have little use for the highest figure there.' That was when cheese was twelve cents a pound, sugar four, and crackers eight. Now we have little use for those scales at all—everything is above eighteen cents."

By the Way (Continued)

A jovial Roman Catholic priest recently told this story in a company gathered around the camp-fire: Aaron Isaac's store was in a Catholic neighborhood and wasn't doing well. Isaac concluded that his creed was the trouble and went to the priest. The priest admitted him to the Church and christened him MacIsaac. A short time afterward MacIsaac invited the priest to dine with him. A fine roast duck graced the board. The priest raised his hands in horror. "Why, MacIsaac," he said, "this is Friday, and a good Catholic eats only fish on Friday." "Oh, father, forgive me, I forgot," said MacIsaac. "What can I do—we'll have no dinner!" The priest thought a moment. "Mac," he said, "we won't sacrifice our dinner. Duck! duck!" he exclaimed, extending his hands, "I christen thee haddock!"

In an article on "Some Experiences in Neurologic Therapeutics" Dr. C. K. Mills, of the University of Pennsylvania, tells of various obsessions, including some in which, he asserts, patients and physicians attribute mental maladies to the teeth. He says: "One of my medical friends had a rather interesting experience in connection with this subject. An old gentleman had suffered with pain in the region of the sacroiliac synchondrosis. A consultation came about with a physician and a roentgen-ray specialist, and one of the consultants without any examination of the mouth or jaws expressed the opinion that a probable source of the trouble would be found in abscesses at the root of the patient's teeth. My friend, after allowing him to go on with his dissertation a short time, said casually, 'It may be, but I must remark that our patient hasn't had a tooth in his head for five years.'"

At a recent meeting of British journalists the chairman told the following story: "I met a newspaper man to-day who came to Fleet Street twenty years ago with exactly 25s. in his pocket. He is now worth £40,000. He owes that entirely to his own ability and energy, combined with good health and a high code of ethics—and to the fact that an uncle recently died and left him £39,995."

The lawyer was cross-examining a witness to a robbery. "When did the robbery take place?" he asked. "I think—" began the witness. "We don't care what you think, sir. We want to know what you know." "Then if you don't want to know what I think, I may as well leave the stand. I can't talk without thinking. I'm not a lawyer."

Is there anything that the enterprising trader is unwilling to invest in with a chance of possible profit? One might think that gas masks, of all things, would be unsalable in these days. Yet a New York newspaper contains this item among things offered for sale:

200 gas masks, rejected by U. S. inspectors. Another queer advertisement in the same paper announces:

Invisible face rouge, stands sea bathing, 50c. A British provincial paper carries this advertisement, which indicates much faith in human nature:

Will man who got paid twice for Two Polly Heifers at Thomastown Fair on 3d June communicate at once with C., — — —.

To Those Who Want Cleaner Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

You Must Remove the Film

Your teeth are not rightly cleaned if they discolor or decay, if tartar forms or pyorrhea starts.

You may brush them twice daily, but the great tooth wrecker—a slimy film—is not being ended by it.

The cause of most tooth troubles is an ever-present film. You feel it with your tongue. That is what discolors—not your teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So it is that film, not merely food debris, which the tooth brush must combat.

The tooth brush alone is inadequate. The film is clinging. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays. The old methods of teeth cleaning fail to dissolve it.

Dental science, after many years of searching, has found a way to combat it. Able authorities have proved this fact by convincing clinical tests. Leading dentists everywhere accept it.

This way is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we gladly supply a 10-Day Tube for anyone to test.

A Ten-Day Revelation

We ask you to try it, to watch its effects, then look at your teeth in ten days. It will change all your ideas on teeth cleaning.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

This way is made possible by a new discovery. A harmless method has been found to activate the pepsin. Five governments have already granted patents. The old activating agent was an acid, harmful to the teeth. And Pepsodent must be activated.

We urge you to prove Pepsodent as dentists prove it—by actual application. See the results, read the reasons for them, and decide for yourself about it.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Use like any tooth paste. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Do this for your sake and your children's sake. Learn the better way to clean teeth. The results will show you very quickly that this way is right. Cut out the coupon now.

Pepsodent
PAT. OFF.
REG. U.S.

The New-Day Dentifrice

A scientific tooth paste based on activated pepsin. An efficient film combatant, now endorsed by dentists everywhere and sold by druggists in large tubes.

(185)

Ten-Day Tube Free

THE PEPSODENT CO.,
Dept. 549, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Mail Ten-Day Tube of Pepsodent to

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

Tours and Travel

CHRYSANTHEMUM SEASON

in the Far East

Join the AMERICAN EXPRESS tour under personal escort leaving San Francisco October 17 for a wonderful visit to Japan and China at the best season of the year.

ROUND-THE-WORLD extension of same tour. Write for itinerary.

AMERICAN EXPRESS

Travel Department

65 Broadway, New York
23 West Monroe St., Chicago
Market and 2d Sts., San Francisco

Hotels and Resorts

MAINE

YORK CAMPS LOON LAKE, MAINE

In famous Rangeley region in heart of mountains facing lake. Private log cabins with open fires and baths. Central dining-room. Golf within easy reach; garage, fishing, bathing, fishing, mountain climbing. Farm one mile from camp furnishes fresh vegetables, eggs, poultry, certified milk. Booklet. J. LEWIS YORK, Prop.

MASSACHUSETTS

Brooks Mansion

89 Mt. Vernon Street
Boston, Mass.

American plan. Select family hotel; quiet, residential section; excellent table; elevator; near theaters and shopping district; homelike. Tourists accommodated—$3.50 per day and up. Suites—Two rooms and bath; single and double rooms.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little house by the sea
PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

Rock Ridge Hall, Wellesley Hills, Mass. Fine location. Large, breezy, screened piazza. Running water in bedrooms. Private baths. Eggs, berries, cream, chicken. Rates moderate.

MEXICO

Metropolitan Hotel

The Best Hotel in the City. In front of the Beautiful Cathedral and Flower Market.
MEXICO CITY, MEXICO
All modern conveniences.

NEW YORK CITY

Hotel Le Marquis

31st Street & Fifth Avenue
New York

Combines every convenience and home comfort, and commands itself to people of refinement wishing to live on American Plan and be within easy reach of social and dramatic centers.

Room and bath $4.50 per day with meals, or $2.50 per day without meals.

Illustrated Booklet gladly sent upon request.

JOHN F. TOLSON

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square
adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

Hotels and Resorts

NEW YORK

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of wild-Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, saddle horses. Trails to surrounding mountain peaks, Lake George and Lake Champlain. Dancing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $16 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Cleunau, N. Y.

ADIRONDACKS INTERBROOK LODGE and COTTAGES

Keene Valley, N. Y.
On direct trail to Mt. Marcy, very heart of Mts. Illustrated booklet giving description of Keene Valley and the Lodge sent on request. $15 and $18 a week. A. E. LUCK.

Health Resorts

Sanford Hall, est. 1841

Private Hospital

For Mental and Nervous Diseases

Comfortable, homelike surroundings; modern methods of treatment; competent nurses. 15 acres of lawn, park, flower and vegetable gardens. Food the best. Write for booklet.

Sanford Hall Flushing New York

LINDEN The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Doylestown, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LINDEN, M.D., (late of The Walter Sanatorium)

Country Board

Overlooking Ocean

All winter proposition. Responsible retired professional gentleman, having large home within hour of New York City, desires few others of equal standing to join in co-operative plan in living simply and sanely and in accord with the reasonable features only of the noted health resorts of Europe and America. Those really ill or believing they need medical attention need not respond. But any feeling that such conditions can without undue expense easily be avoided may find it advantageous to address 877, Outlook.

COUNTRY BOARD During September and October
Colonial home on hilltop. Delightful view of country and Lake Ontario. Electric lights, bathroom, excellent table. On State road, three miles from Oswego. Miss ALICE E. FERRY, Fruit Valley N. R. D., Oswego, N. Y.

Real Estate

CONNECTICUT

For Sale or Rent Charming house in ideal New England village.
Three hours from New York. A. M. I., Mrs. J. B. CLARK, 1142 Madison Ave., New York.

309-Acre Holstein Stock Farm

$12,000. $5,000 cash

25 head of Holstein cattle, several registered; one pair good horses, 50 tons of hay now in the barn, 18 acres of crops, all kinds of farming tools and machinery. Farm of 309 acres, half cultivating, apple orchard, good pasture, 10-room house, large barns, also 1,000 feet elevation; good view; 4 miles from station. Will produce $6,000 worth of milk a year. A farm you may be proud to own. Write for photos. J. CASIDY, Woodbury, Conn.

MASSACHUSETTS

For Sale College boarding house in Northampton, Mass., near Smith College campus, doing an excellent business. For further particulars write OWEN, 901, Outlook.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

FOR SALE

Site and Buildings of Successful Camp Beautiful, safe, secluded. On well-known New Hampshire lake. Price moderate. Address Camp, P. O. Box 1,927, Philadelphia, Pa.

Real Estate

NEW YORK CITY

ATTRACTIVE STUCCO

TWO FAMILY, Fourteen Room Dwelling. Nice residential section, suburbs of New York City. Half hour Grand Central; also near subway. Hot water heat, gas, etc. Plot 50 x 100. Garages. Price $9,500. Full particulars from owner, 9,515, Outlook.

NEW YORK

Beautiful Farm Home FOR SALE

234 acres, including 30 acres woodland, 6 miles from Hudson, N. Y. and N. Y. C. station, 1 1/2 miles from B. & A. station, 3 miles from Harlem station. Rural delivery and telephone. 12-room house with bath, hot-water heat, open fireplace, large Colonial hall, large veranda. Large lawn, beautiful shade trees. Fine view Catskill Mts. and Hudson Valley. Small cottage on place. 300 pear trees, 175 apple trees, fruit of all kinds. Large barn, poultry house, carriage house, garage, and windmill. Running water in all fields. Address WILBER SMITH Hudson, Columbia Co., N. Y., R. F. D. 1.

FOR SALE 14-room house at Nyack, N. Y.
Corner plot, 105x165. Gas, electricity, open plumbing, hot-water heat, garage, flowers, fruit, vegetables. $6,000. Inquire P. W. BABCOCK, 11 Broadway, New York.

Shelter Island Heights, L. I.

FOR SALE—10-Room House

Two bathrooms. All modern improvements. Well furnished throughout. In perfect order. Large porches. R. FECHTER.

BOARD AND ROOMS

REFINED lady, away frequent week ends, desires, September 8, pleasant outside (non-court) furnished room, with congenial cultured people; no other rooms. Immediate vicinity of 158th St. and Broadway, N. Y. C. Permanent. $5. 7,232, Outlook.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

WANTED—450 Outlook readers to represent this publication this summer—and all through the year, if you like. You can easily earn $10 a week and more, simply by using an hour or two a day of your spare time. If you want extra spending money—and everybody does—write us for details of the Outlook's co-operative profit plan. Simply address Representatives' Division, Desk 14, The Outlook, 361 Fourth Ave., New York City.

WANTED—A party to buy a half interest in a blueberry tract in Washington County, Maine. $6,000 required. Good interest on investment. Best of references given and references required. Inquire of Hillard C. Schoppe, 41 Fifth St., Bangor, Maine.

FOR THE HOME

WILD blackberry jelly and other unusual delicacies. Alma Hibbard, Gansevoort, N. Y.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

WANTED—Young, educated, unmarried woman, not nurse or matron, to help entertain and do shopping for women patients at small private hospital for mild mental and nervous affections. Wages $40 monthly and maintenance. State age, education, and give references. Address George H. Torney, 300 South Street, Brooklyn, Mass.

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CM27 Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

WANTED—Superintendent for twenty-bed sanatorium caring for incipient tuberculosis patients. Give hospital training, references, and salary willing to start on in first letter. 7,267, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

HOUSEMOTHER wanted in Episcopal boys' boarding school near New York. Duties include general oversight of minor ailments, outside trained nurse being engaged for special difficulties. Salary $700 and living. Applications should give full details. 7,225, Outlook.

WANTED MOTHER'S HELPER or WORKING HOUSEKEEPER. No maids kept, but outside help is furnished. House has all modern conveniences. Reply to Mrs. Estabrook, Deerfield, Mass.

WANTED—Young woman (Protestant) as attendant for little girls in boarding school. Sewing required. References. Address Box 305, Brattleboro, Vt.

WANTED—Mother's helper or governess, family of three children, seven to ten years, suburbs of New York City. Young woman with experience preferred. 7,249, Outlook.

WANTED, September 1, woman of intelligence and refinement to help in housework and be one of family living in Maplewood, N. J. Some knowledge of cooking. No heavy work. Salary adequate. Send reply to Mrs. O. G. Cocks, South Fairlee, Vermont.

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

HELP WANTED

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED, August 24, governess for child four years old. American, Protestant. One who can speak French preferred. Permanent position if satisfactory. 7,179, Outlook.

WANTED, by September 15, tutor for three boys, ages 8, 9, and 12. Winter months spent in California. Must be experienced, unmarriageable, of abject, and of Protestant faith, and have first-class recommendations. H. H. Timken, Canton, Ohio.

MONTESSORI or kindergarten-trained governess or experienced child's nurse for care of one child three years of age. Philadelphia suburb. Apply to Mrs. J. S. Reed, 270 Greenwood Ave., Jenkintown, Pa.

TEACHERS. Departmental arithmetic, also second grade. Colored day school, South; faculty white. Address Miss Beard, 916 Ontario St., Oak Park, Ill.

GOVERNESSES wanted, September 15, for physical care and entertainment pupils mentally backward out of school hours. No teaching nor household duties (eleven teachers, five governesses employed, twenty-four pupils received). Four hours free middle of day, all day monthly. Young, educated American, Protestant. Thirty-five monthly, including board, laundry, room alone. References, experience, age, church affiliation, personal interview. Seguin School, Orange, N. J.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Professional Situations

OSTEOPATHIC physician, lady, will nurse invalid. Will travel. Dr. Ellen Brooks, Madison, New Jersey. Box 233.

WANTED—Position as ASSISTANT MATRON and LECTURER in training school for nurses by graduate nurse holding R.N. in New York State. Had two years' overseas work with Canadian Army Medical Corps. Will travel. Highest credentials. 7,264, Outlook.

Business Situations

CHAUFFEUR would like position with private family. Courteous and efficient. Seven years' experience with cars. References regarding character and ability. 7,240, Outlook.

OWNERSHIP MANAGEMENT. Having closed own business, now filling prominent position temporarily near New York. Lady executive is prepared to give efficient service from standpoint ownership management. Only high class student's educational interests need reply. 7,235, Outlook.

SECRETARIAL position requiring responsibility initiative by college graduate. 7,254, Outlook.

LADY wishes position as manager of inn or apartment hotel. Would leave. 7,241, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

MATRON—housekeeper open for position in large school or institution. Practical and thoroughly experienced in all departments. Excellent references. 7,241, Outlook.

YOUNG woman with hospital experience would like nursing by September 1. 7,232, Outlook.

EDUCATED young woman, social secretary, traveling, general companion, experienced automobilist, desires position, refined surroundings. References. Interview. Secretary, 187 Beaumont St., Manhattan Beach, N. Y.

WANTED—Position in children's home by ex-army nurse experienced in care and training of children and institutional management. 7,248, Outlook.

POSITION wanted in institution as house-mother. 7,247, Outlook.

SECRETARY-GOVERNESS, COMPANION. Young lady of culture, experienced secretary, unusual ability with children, good traveler, desires residential position. Best references exchanged. 7,253, Outlook.

POSITION wanted in California, in or near a city. Experienced supervising housekeeper. Select sanatorium, private family, small hotel or apartment house. First-class recommendations for attention to details and character. 7,238, Outlook.

SOCIAL secretary and companion. University graduate, woman of culture and refinement. Will travel. 7,238, Outlook.

REFINED, capable middle-aged woman would like position as companion or housekeeper for one or two adults. Would travel or go South. References exchanged. 7,233, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

LADY in New York will tutor and also coach socially younger woman of good character and natural refinement. Confidential. 7,221, Outlook.

FRENCH woman, Ph.D., long experience in best colleges of U. S. and France, would assume whole responsibility of children's education and home. Adequate salary expected. 7,208, Outlook.

VASSAR graduate, Latin specialist, boarding school or tutor all subjects in private family. Will travel. 7,271, Outlook.

KINDERGARTNER wishes position in private school. Experience. References. 7,263, Outlook.

MISCELLANEOUS

WANTED—Young women to take nine months' course in nursing. Francis Parker Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

MISS Guthman, New York shopper, will send anything on approval. Services free. References required. 309 West 28th St.

PAIGE

The Most Beautiful Car in America

A GREATLY enlarged Paige plant is now ready for operation. The buildings have been erected, machinery installed and, within a very short time, we shall take up the most ambitious production schedule ever planned by this company.

Our new plant covers fifteen acres of floor space and includes practically every labor-saving device known to large scale manufacturing. It is, beyond doubt, one of the most completely equipped factories in the nation—a home that is truly worthy of "The Most Beautiful Car in America."

With such ample facilities at our command, we shall, for the first time, be in position to supply the vastly increased demand for our products. And, as in the past, all of our buildings, all of our brains and all of our brawn will be dedicated to one task—the production of strictly high-grade motor vehicles that will outlive any guarantee that we might write for them.

THE PAIGE-DETROIT MOTOR CAR CO., DETROIT, MICH.

THE OUTLOOK SCHOOL AND CAMP DIRECTORY

Many of the best private schools, colleges, correspondence schools, and camps are advertised in these columns. Each one issues descriptive literature which will be sent to Outlook readers upon application

TEACHERS' AGENCIES

The Pratt Teachers Agency

70 Fifth Avenue, New York
Recommends teachers to colleges, public and private schools.
Advices parents about schools. Wm. O. Pratt, Mgr.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

CALIFORNIA

The Randolph School

BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA

Fall Term opens September 1st
Intermediate and College Preparatory Departments.
FLORA A. RANDOLPH, Principal
2962 Derby Street

CONNECTICUT

The Curtis School for Young Boys
Has grown forty-four years and is still under the active direction of its founder.

FREDERICK B. CURTIS, Principal.
GERALD B. CURTIS, Assistant Principal.
BROOKFIELD CENTER, CONNECTICUT.

WYKEHAM RISE

A Country School for Girls

FANNY E. DAVIES, LL.A., Principal,
Washington, Conn.

Boston representative,
MADEL E. BOWMAN, A.B., Vice-Principal, Cohasset, Mass.

ILLINOIS

Northwestern University

LAW SCHOOL

FOUNDED 1859

JOHN H. WIGMORE, Dean

ANNOUNCES

Increase in Requirements for Admission and Graduation

Admission: After September 1st, 1919, applicants for admission to the first year class will be required to submit proof of the satisfactory completion of three years of college study.

College credit for army and navy service given by the college from which the student comes will be accepted.

Graduation: Students entering the Law School with a bachelor's degree representing a four-year course in an approved college, may complete the course in three years. For all others, four years of resident study is required.

Fall Term Begins September 29th

Descriptive Circular Mailed on Request

Secretary of the Law School

305 Northwestern University Building

Cor. Lake and Dearborn Sts., Chicago, Ill.

ILLINOIS

HOME STUDY

Courses in more than 40 subjects are given by correspondence.

The University of Chicago
(Div. X) Chicago, Ill.

MASSACHUSETTS

ABBOT ACADEMY

A School for Girls. ANDOVER, MASS. Founded 1828.
23 miles from Boston. General course with Household Science. College Preparation. Outdoor sports.
Address: MISS BERTHA BAILEY, Principal.

THE WINSOR TRAINING SCHOOL

FOR HOME and SCHOOL SERVICE
Open to graduates of secondary schools. For circular apply to MISS C. M. POWELL, Secretary, 1 Autumn Street, Boston, Mass.

DEAN ACADEMY, Franklin, Mass.

53d Year
Young men and young women find here a homelike atmosphere, thorough and efficient training in every department of a broad culture, a loyal and helpful school spirit. Liberal endowment permits liberal terms, $350-$450 per year. Special Courses in Domestic Science.

For catalogue and information address
ARTHUR W. PERCE, Litt. D., Principal

WALNUT HILL SCHOOL

23 Highland St., Natick, Mass. A College Preparatory School for Girls. 17 miles from Boston.
Miss Conant, Miss Bigelow, Principals.

MISS CAPEN'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

For many years known as "The Burnham School."
43rd year opens September, 1919.
Correspondence should be addressed to
Miss B. T. CAPEN, Principal, NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

The Burnham School FOR GIRLS

NORTHAMPTON, MASSACHUSETTS
Founded by Mary A. Burnham in 1877
Opposite Smith College Campus
MISS HELEN E. THOMPSON, Headmistress

Wheaton College for Women

Only small separate college for women in Massachusetts.
4-year course. A. B. degree. Faculty of men and women.
20 buildings. 100 acres. Endowment. Catalog.
Rev. SAMUEL V. COLE, D.D., LL.D., President.
Massachusetts, Norton (30 miles from Boston).

SHORT-STORY WRITING

A course of forty lessons in the history, form, structure, and writing of the short-story taught by Dr. J. H. Rensselaer, for years Editor of Lippincott's.
150-page catalogue free. Please address
THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL,
350 Madison St., Dept. 60, Springfield, Mass.

THE MISSES ALLEN SCHOOL

Life in the open. Athletics. Household Arts. College and general courses.
Each girl's personality observed and developed. Write for booklet.
WEST NEWTON, MASS.

MICHIGAN

BATTLE CREEK NORMAL SCHOOL

OF PHYSICAL EDUCATION. Normal Course—September 10. Three years. Broad, powerful training for a dignified profession of wholesome and happy service. Unrivalled facilities and equipment.
C. Ward Crampton, M.D., Dean, Box 38, Battle Creek, Mich.

NEW JERSEY

KENT PLACE

Summit, N. J. 20 miles from N. Y.
A Country School for Girls. College Preparatory and Academic Courses.
Mrs. SARAH WOODMAN PAUL, Principal.
Miss ANNA S. WOODMAN

NEW YORK

NEW YORK MILITARY ACADEMY

Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

THE STORY of this famous school is told in the illustrated catalogue, which will be sent upon application to the Principal.

Largest Military School in the East

CAVALRY, INFANTRY, CADET BAND
(SPECIAL RATES TO MUSICIANS)

THE STONE SCHOOL

Cornwall-on-Hudson, Box 16, New York
FIFTY-THIRD YEAR

A School in the Heart of the Open Country. For Boys from 9 to 19
Location: 50 miles from New York, 5 miles from West Point, on a spur of Storm King Mountain, 900 feet above sea level. Healthful, invigorating, unusually adapted to a sane and simple out-of-door life.
Work: Preparation for College or Business Life; recent graduates in 12 leading colleges. Each boy studied physically and mentally to increase individual efficiency. Small Classes: A teacher for every 6 boys.
Athletics: Two fields with excellent facilities for all sports, under supervision; hiking, woods life, swimming pool.

You are invited to come and see for yourself. Catalog sent on application
ALVAN E. DUERR, Headmaster

GLENS FALLS ACADEMY

Chester Street, Glens Falls, N. Y.

Day school for Boys and Girls in the Lake George country, located in Glens Falls, N. Y., the beautiful and healthful city of the upper Hudson among the foothills of the Adirondacks. Established eighty years. Prepares for all colleges. Nine in Faculty. Vocational guidance emphasized. Boarding homes in connection with academy. Most desirable place for families to locate to educate children. Address J. THACHER BARNES, Headmaster, A.B. Harvard, Graduate School, Columbia.

PUTNAM HALL
Vassar Preparatory School. Special 3-year course for High School graduates. Music, Art and Domestic Science. Tennis, horseback riding. Military drill under a captain detailed from the Army. Sleeping porches. Separate house for younger children. Address Ellen C. Bartlett, A.B., Prin., Box 808, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

AUTUMN SCHOOL OF ARTS AND CRAFTS

September 1 to November 1, 1919
Including courses in Drawing, Painting, Outdoor Sketching, Modeling, Theory of Color, Theory of Design, Leather Work, Gesso, Block Printing, Metal Work and Jewelry, Weaving, Basketry, Embroidery and Bead Work.
For Descriptive Booklet, address
MANCHESTER INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES
MANCHESTER, NEW HAMPSHIRE

NEW YORK CITY

The Clark School for Concentration

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS
BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS

Prepares for any college. By an intensive system of individual instruction, enables a bright pupil to complete a course in much less than the usual time, and trains pupils who have been backward elsewhere to cultivate alert, retentive minds and qualify in all subjects.
Write for records made by pupils at this school and for full descriptive catalog.

Fall Term Commences Monday, September 22nd

Boys' School, 72d St. & West End Ave.

Girls' School, 301 West 72d St.

New York City

A School Where Records Are Made

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES NEW YORK CITY

Ethical Culture School

Normal Training Dept. Prepares young women with high school education for interesting and constructive occupations. Training is given in the Pedagogy of the Kindergarten, New Technique of Elementary School Instruction, Community Center Work and Mental and Physical Care of Children.

Many requests for trained teachers.

School opens September 15th, 1919.

For Illustrated Catalogue address

33 Central Park West, New York City

OHIO

Glendale College for Women (suburban to Cincinnati) Semester begins Sept. 17, 1919. Unusual advantages offered High School graduates in secretarial, History of Art, domestic courses. Preparation for all colleges. Music, Extension, Household Science. Beautiful location. Accessibility to the city utilized for liberal culture.

Oxford College for Women

Founded 1890. Standard college course with B. A. Degree. Academic courses with B. M. Degree. Normal courses in Household Economics, Public School Music and Art. Rates $375. For "Seven Points." Address Oxford College, Box 62, Oxford, Ohio.

PENNSYLVANIA

SCHOOL OF HORTICULTURE FOR WOMEN

Ambler, Pennsylvania

18 Miles from Philadelphia

ALL COURSE—Vegetable gardening, floriculture, fruit, canning and preserving, poultry, etc. September 16th to November 22d.

Vegetable and flower gardens, greenhouses, orchards, ornamental trees and shrubs, demonstration kitchen, dairy, poultry plant, live stock. Lectures and outdoor activities.

10 YEAR DIPLOMA COURSE BEGINS JANUARY, 1920

Elizabeth Leighton Lee, Director

Bryn Mawr Baldwin School

Country School for Girls. Bryn Mawr, Penna. Preparation for Bryn Mawr, Mount Holyoke, Smith,assar and Wellesley colleges. Also strong general course. Within 26 years 272 students have graduated from Bryn Mawr College. Fireproof stone building. Abundant outdoor life and athletics.

ABETH FORREST JOHNSON, A.B., HEAD of the SCHOOL

OGONTZ SCHOOL

Founded 1890

A country school for girls in the Rydal Hills. 25 minutes from Philadelphia, on the New York line of the Philadelphia and Reading. Catalog describing and illustrating new buildings sent on request.

MISS ABBY A. SUTHERLAND, Principal
Ogontz School, Penna.

AUBREY HALL

ward and mentally defective children taught individually by experienced teachers under the supervision of an expert nerve specialist. Torrens, Philadelphia, Pa.

VERMONT

BISHOP HOPKINS HALL

Rev. A. C. A. HALL, President and Chaplain. Owned school for girls overlooking Lake Champlain. Well equipped buildings. All outdoor sports. College prep and general courses. Write for booklet. Miss Helen Ogden, Principal. Box C, Burlington, Vermont.

YONKERS SCHOOLS FOR NURSES

John's Riverside Hospital Training School for Nurses

YONKERS, NEW YORK

located in New York State, offers a 3 years' course—a training to refined, educated women. Requires one year high school or its equivalent. Apply to the School of Nurses, Yonkers, New York.

The Outlook

Copyright, 1919, by The Outlook Company

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Vol. 122 August 27, 1919 No. 17

THE OUTLOOK IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT, PRESIDENT. M. T. FULMER, VICE-PRESIDENT. FRANK C. HOTT, TREASURER. HERBERT H. ABBOTT, SECRETARY. TRAVERS D. CARMAN, ADVERTISING MANAGER

The White House Conference.....	625
The Mexican Situation.....	625
A Sixteen-Year Old Opinion—and Still Good.....	625
Lord Grey as Ambassador.....	625
Cardinal Mercier and the Pope.....	626
Benedict XV's Testimony.....	626
A German Fairy Tale.....	626
Cartoons of the Week.....	627
The Medicinal "Tanks".....	628
Team-Play.....	628
The Actors' Strike.....	628
The Interborough Strike.....	629
A Painter; A Composer; A Scientist.....	629
The League of Nations Discussion.....	629
What is Best for Russia?.....	631
A Significant Prophecy.....	631
Making Over the Army: The Proposal of the Military Training Camps Association; The Plan of the War Department.....	632
Kentucky Mountain Rhymes: Under the Sycamore Tree; The Gourd Horn; Up Carr Creek.....	633
By Ann Cobb
Special Correspondence from Foreign Lands:
I—The Red Cross Rebuilding the Balkans.....	634
By Gregory Mason, Staff Correspondent of The Outlook
II—The American Forces in Germany.....	635
Staff Correspondence by Elbert F. Baldwin
III—England at Peace.....	636
Special Correspondence from the University of Oxford by Beverley Nichols
Spruce Up! What a Soldier Did for His Home Town.....	638
By Elizabeth Renshaw
Current Events Illustrated.....	639
The Book Table: Devoted to Books and Their Makers.....	644
Weekly Outline Study of Current History.....	646
By J. Madison Gathany, A.M.
"Mare Nostrum".....	648
The League of Nations and the Senate.....	649
Financial Department.....	650
By the Way.....	654

BY SUBSCRIPTION $4.00 A YEAR. Single copies 10 cents.
For Canadian subscriptions, $1.00 additional for postage.
Foreign subscriptions to countries in the Postal Union, $5.50.

Address all communications to

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY

381 Fourth Avenue

New York City

SONGS OF LIBERTY

Unequaled for Social Center Work

Send 35¢ today for a postpaid "HOME COPY"
THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., 156 Fifth Ave., New York

Important to Subscribers

When you notify The Outlook of a change in your address, both the old and the new address should be given. Kindly write, if possible, two weeks before the change is to take effect.

Why doesn't Your Boy Like His School

THE average boy hates school. He sees no reason for it. He seldom goes beyond second year in high school. Fathers, mothers: what wouldn't you give to show your boys in a boy-natural way just how much school really means to them! The publishers of The American Boy assigned William Heyliger, a favorite writer with their 500,000 boy readers, to do just this. After a year spent with practical educators everywhere he has written "High Benton", about a boy who first hated school and why he came to like it. This great story starts in the September issue of

THE AMERICAN BOY

"The Biggest, Brightest, Best Magazine for Boys in All the World."

It's an entirely different school story, a fascinating, absorbing story that your boy will read eagerly. He'll live it himself. It puts school in a new light. Gives him his bearings on what school really is for him. You owe it to your boy's future to put this story in his hands. School opens in September. "High Benton" starts with the September American Boy. Buy it at your news-stand, 20¢, or subscribe, $2 a year.

The Sprague Publishing Co.,
Dept. 3, Detroit, Mich.

Index and Title-page for Volume 122 (May 7-August 27, 1919) of The Outlook, printed separately for binding, will be furnished gratis, on application, to any reader who desires them for this purpose

Let the boy bathe himself

IT'S surprising how much more willingly a youngster takes his bath when you give him a cake of Ivory Soap and let him go ahead by himself.

Perhaps it's because Ivory floats, and he enjoys chasing the soap round the tub. Perhaps it's because Ivory makes such a thick, bubbling—yet easy-rinsing—lather that it never leaves any "high water" marks for mother to scold about. Perhaps it's because Ivory is so mild that it never smarts nor irritates his skin, no matter how hard he rubs.

Add to these qualities the fact that Ivory is white, as a skin soap should be. Also that it is as refined and dainty a soap as any one could want—unscented, but faintly fragrant with the pleasing natural odor of its high-grade ingredients. Ivory certainly offers everything to make everybody's bath a pleasure.

IVORY SOAP.  . 99 <sup>44</sup>/<sub>100</sub> % PURE
IT FLOATS

Factories at Ivorydale, O.; Port Ivory, N. Y.; Kansas City, Kans.; Hamilton, Canada

The Outlook

AUGUST 27, 1919

THE WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE

AS this issue of The Outlook is going to press there is published in the daily papers of August 20 a stenographic and verbatim report of the conference at the White House on August 19 between the President and the Senatorial Committee on Foreign Relations. At this conference the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations were discussed with the most complete and illuminating frankness. We have space here only to say that this unprecedented and deeply interesting episode in American statesmanship is a practical illustration, it seems to us, of the greatest advantage that will be afforded at first by a League of Nations—namely, the League will give an opportunity for similar open, public, round-table conferences on questions of deep moment in international statesmanship. The record of the conference should be made a public document easily accessible to every citizen. It is not only of historic importance in American political procedure, but will clarify the ideas of both critics and supporters of the League proposal.

THE MEXICAN SITUATION

Those who were in touch with the Mexican situation during the time of our active war with Germany realized fully that the Mexican problem was merely forgotten, but not gone. They realized also that as soon as the conflict in France ceased to draw the entire interest of the United States the disorderly state beyond our southern border would drift back into the headlines of the front pages.

These expectations are now being fulfilled, for the State Department has made public a recent interchange of notes with the Mexican Government in regard to the murder of an American citizen in the early part of July. In forwarding the protest of the State Department to the Mexican Government our Chargé d'Affaires in Mexico City said:

I am also instructed to state that should the lives of American citizens continue to remain unsafe and these murders continue by reason of the unwillingness or inability of the Mexican Government to afford adequate protection, my Government may be forced to adopt a radical change in its policy with regard to Mexico.

Exactly what this threat portends it is not easy to say, for our policy towards Mexico has headed in so many directions that it is not easy to determine in what direction a radical change in this policy would lead us.

In reply to this note the Mexican Government protested its willingness to protect American citizens, but urged the desirability of citizens of the United States "concentrating in the populous centers where complete guarantees may be offered them."

The friction between the United States and Mexico was increased by a serious incident which took place in the middle of August. Two American military aviators patrolling the border lost their way and were forced to land on Mexican soil. They were seized and held for a ransom of $15,000 by Mexican bandits. This ransom our Government authorized its agents to pay in order that the lives of the two officers might be saved. At the same time the State Department called upon the Mexican Government "for immediate adequate action."

The ransom money was carried to the bandits by Captain Matlack, who went without a guard of any kind to the rescue of the two aviators. He paid half the sum demanded, and then succeeded in escaping with the two aviators unscathed.

The money for the ransom was collected from private citizens, who are to be reimbursed by the Government. The incident supplies its own commentary.

A SIXTEEN-YEAR OLD OPINION—AND STILL GOOD

Readers of The Outlook are already aware of its opinion of the morality and the expediency of the plan to pay hush money to Colombia for the wrong which we did not do to that state when we bought the right to construct a canal across the Isthmus from the Republic of Panama.

In connection with the proposed treaty with Colombia now before the Senate, it is interesting to find republished in the pages of "World's Work" a letter written by Colonel Philippe Bunau-Varilla to John Hay, then Secretary of State, on November 18, 1903. The letter, in part, follows:

Dear Mr. Secretary:

Will you allow me to condense the somewhat loosely expressed ideas I submitted to you yesterday on the question of reserving for Colombia against a quit-claim a part of the $10,000,000 which are to be paid to the Republic of Panama by the United States?

This, in my opinion, would create two independent impressions.

First: Impression on the world in general.

Any man who pays something that he does not owe is immediately thought to be paying under the pressure of blackmail.

Any man who pays under the pressure of blackmail is immediately thought to be paying on account of a concealed crime.

This would be the immediate opinion of the world if the United States is beheld to be declaring at the same time that she had no hand in the Isthmian Revolution and is therefore under no liability to Colombia for damages, and simultaneously to be paying a heavy sum to get rid of the claim of Colombia.

The only possible interpretation would be: a public confession of breach of international faith.

L'enfer est pavé de bonnes intentions; he who imagined good-heartedly this fine solution is a master in paving the lower regions.

Second: Impression on Spanish-Americans.

To the demonstration which would result thus from such an action, namely, the admission of the United States to having played a Machiavellian trick upon Colombia, would be added in Spanish-American hearts the incurable and bitter resentment of the insulting offer of a little money compensation for a patriotic wrong. . . .

No! Really I cannot imagine any move more dangerous and more impolitic than such a one.

Pallas Athené would be replaced by a female broker of suspicious dealings. . . .

Most respectfully yours,
(Signed) P. BUNAU-VARILLA.

It will be noted that the blackmailers of 1903 were asking for only a part of the ten millions paid to the Republic of Panama for the entire right to build a canal across the Isthmus. But we are now asked to give twenty-five millions to Colombia. Evidently the cost of salvaging the feelings wounded by imaginary wrongs has gone up, like every other element in the cost of living, in the last sixteen years.

Of course there are those who will discount Colonel Philippe Bunau-Varilla's testimony as that of an interested party. It will be remembered that he was the agent through whom Panama negotiated with the United States for the sale of the Canal Zone. But there are times when even an ex-parte witness hits the nail on the head.

LORD GREY AS AMBASSADOR

Viscount Grey, for eleven years Foreign Minister of Great Britain, has been appointed British Ambassador to the United States.

Always a Liberal of lofty idealism in home affairs (from 1885 to 1916 he was member of Parliament for Berwick-on-Tweed), he has carried a democratic imperialism into the realm of foreign affairs. He is a natural "internationalist." He is no insular, parochial Englishman. It is easy for him to think in terms of nations. Hence he has tried to make England see her duty to live up to the traditions of empire. More than this, years ago he recognized the necessity for united international action by all the civilized Powers in order to preserve the world's poise. In 1912 and 1913 during the Balkan Wars he gave welcome proof of this quality, and to him more than to any one else was due the conclusion of the conflict through the conferences and Treaty of London. In 1914 his quality met a more sudden, a severer test. He foresaw the world war which might follow the Austro-Serb crisis. He took immediate action, rallying to his standard France, Italy, and Russia. He urged plan after plan upon Austria and Germany—only to have them all fail against an implacable Teutonic will to rule or ruin. The diplomatic history of our time contains no finer episode than the effort of the then Sir Edward Grey to stem the Teutonic tide. Had he been permitted to play his trump card—England's entry into war—he might have won.

When, finally, the Germans actually entered Belgium, the British, confronted by the fact of an international crime, were thoroughly awakened to their duty.

The war came, and now we are discussing the terms of peace concluding it. Among them, said Lord Grey a year ago, "the establishment and maintenance of a League of Nations is more important and essential than any of the actual terms of peace; . . . it will transcend them all."

Such is the statesman who will represent Great Britain at Washington. His freedom from insular prejudices, his belief in a League of Nations, and his record of achievement mark him as pre-eminently the man to come to us if we are to have the benefit of probably the happiest choice that could be made.

CARDINAL MERCIER AND THE POPE

The New York "Evening Post" publishes a document of great historical value. It is the text of the pastoral letter addressed by Cardinal Mercier to the clergy and laity of Belgium. Its subject is Benedict XV, the Supreme Pontiff.

Cardinal Mercier refers to his pastoral letter of March, 1916, and says:

The abnormal conditions from which we were then suffering prevented us from speaking at that time with full liberty, and we spoke to you enigmatically. I was forbidden to put before you openly certain facts which at that moment would have comforted you. . . .

At the end of the year 1915 the German press . . . set to work to draw a contrast between the acts of the Belgian episcopacy and those of the Sovereign Pontiff. They tried to give color to the idea that the Holy See disavowed my conduct. We did not believe this statement, . . . but our enemies . . . accused us with such warmth of mixing in politics and praised the neutrality of the Sovereign Pontiff in such a way that your affection for us was not without a certain apprehension; and the filial confidence in our Holy Father was lowered with many in proportion as fears for our person became more lively.

In January, 1916, . . . the Pope called me to an extraordinary meeting of the Congregation of Seminaries and Universities. . . . The occupier (of our country) caused a report to be circulated to the effect that I had been called to Rome to hear a censure inflicted upon me by my spiritual superior. . . . At the end of a religious ceremony at which I presided . . . an officer had awkwardly allowed the remark to 'escape him that I had just passed the threshold of my Cathedral for the last time.

The Cardinal warned the Vatican of the perilous conditions under which he was permitted to leave Belgium. As a result the Vatican obtained German assurances that his return would not be opposed. When, despite this, the Germans tried to bar his return, the Vatican declared that if the Cardinal's liberty were curtailed it would at once publish the correspondence relative to his journey. The Vatican won.

In place of the blame which the Germans asserted awaited Cardinal Mercier in Rome we have this account from him of the Pope:

As soon as I arrived he received me with open arms, gave me audiences on several occasions, allowed me to think aloud before him, and received from my hands several dossiers regarding the invasion of our land, the crimes committed by the invader, and the resistance which we offered.

BENEDICT XV'S TESTIMONY

When Cardinal Mercier finally took leave, the Pope wrote these words below a picture, a souvenir of this Roman visit:

To our venerable Brother Cardinal Mercier we grant with all our heart the Apostolic blessing, assuring him that we are always with him and that we share his sorrows and anxieties, since his cause is also our cause.

This approval continued. Says Cardinal Mercier of the Pope:

Every time that the rights of our people were abrogated your bishops became your defenders; and every time we made it a matter of duty to send to the head of our hierarchy the first copy of our protests. Our chief never censured or found fault with our writings or our conduct. And besides the pastorals and documents to which publicity was given I wrote to his Holiness several confidential letters to keep him in touch with the chief proceedings in my administration. Never, either directly or indirectly, has the Pope demanded a change of attitude.

The Cardinal then shows how impossible it was for the Pope to pronounce a final judgment during the war. There was no procedure, the Cardinal claims, by which such a judgment could have been arrived at with due respect for judicial form; besides, the belligerents did not ask Benedict XV to be arbiter from common accord. This is the least convincing part of the pastoral.

Cardinal Mercier's pastoral ends with the reply which the Pope has just sent to the address of the Belgian bishops. The reply runs as follows:

It is with the greatest pleasure that we have read the address which you, dearest son, and you, venerable brethren, have been good enough to send us the very day when, for the first time, you have been able to meet again after more than four years' sad separation. . . .

You bring to mind also our solemn protests against the injustices and violations of right committed in regard to Belgium as well as our efforts to lessen so much suffering. . . . While we occupied ourselves with all our power to bring some alleviation to the suffering of so many of our sons in misfortune, we never ceased to work in order to restore complete political, military, and economic independence to your dear nation and likewise to demand reparation for the damage she had suffered.

The publication of this pastoral may, we believe, win back for the Pope some of the personal popularity which he lost during the war because of his supposedly insufficient support of the great Belgian Cardinal.

A GERMAN FAIRY TALE

In the days before 1914 a pleasant legend existed throughout the United States to the effect that Germany was the most orderly country in the world. It was this legend which made many Americans incredulous when the first reports of German atrocities and German infamy broke in upon our National consciousness.

For those who still find in the pre-war legend grounds for expecting an immediate moral regeneration of Germany a few figures recently compiled by the Rev. Acton Griscom and published in the New York "Globe" may supply some food for thought. These figures were taken, not from ordinary year books, but from statistics published by the German Imperial Government previous to the war. From these figures Mr. Griscom has prepared comparative tables showing the proportionate relation between convictions for certain crimes in Germany and in the United States.

We have not space to publish these tables in full, but from them we have extracted certain figures which are of particular interest.

In the years under examination and taking into consideration the population of the two countries, for every man convicted in the United States for fraud

CARTOONS OF THE WEEK

From Vikingen, Christiania (Norway)

PLUCKING THE BIRD

What is the use of plucking? In a few years the eagle will have as many feathers as ever!

A PRO-GERMAN PROPHECY

From Esquella, Barcelona (Spain)

THE PEACE TREATY

"Sign? Then they still reckon our signature stands for something?"

A SPANISH VIEW OF GERMAN "HONOR"

From Esquella, Barcelona (Spain)

Peace: "Well, Mr. Germanophile, so you lost?"

Germanophile: "Not at all. During the war I made propaganda for the Germans and now I shall do business with them."

THE SPANISH PRO-GERMAN

From Die Muskete (Vienna)

GHOSTS

It took force to make him into a soldier. It will take greater force to make him into a civilian again.

THE HERITAGE OF MILITARISM

four were convicted in Germany. The same relationship exists in regard to larceny. There were forty convictions for embezzlement in Germany for every one in the United States.

In Berlin in 1912 the percentage of illegitimate births was 23.10; in New York City in the same year it was 1.49. Berlin's ordinary suicide rate was more than twice as large as that of New York, and her suicide rate for juveniles under nineteen was more than five times as large. Other figures are equally striking. The different methods existing in the United States and Germany for recording homicides make a comparison of the figures on this one point difficult. But the proportion of convictions for other crimes in Germany and the United States are in the relation given below, the comparison being always to the disadvantage of Germany:

Assault . . . . .	8.7 to 1
Rape . . . . .	6 to 1
White slavery . . . . .	18.6 to 1
Arson . . . . .	5.8 to 1

It would seem that the pre-war legend in regard to German orderliness might well be classed as a grim, fairy tale of an unattractive brand.

THE MEDICINAL "TANKS"

Some time ago a writer in the well-known Paris paper "Le Matin" inquired of his readers, "Do you know the medicinal tank?" He thus proceeded to explain it:

It is an invention of the Rockefeller Foundation. This tank rolls over the roads of France bearing signboards. . . . Behold this tank entering a city or a village. It does not come unannounced. . . . A delegate arrives. He pays visits to all the newspapers, and to municipal, military, prefectural, and religious authorities. The Mayor offers a free hall to the impresario—I mean, the delegate. After the hall has been obtained the delegate covers the city with posters. . . . This is their harangue:

"No one, O Frenchmen, has excelled you in the scientific study of tuberculosis. But it is not enough that your scientists combat this disease; each one of you must take part in the battle, must benefit from the knowledge acquired, and perform in his turn the office of educator. . . . Why do you give your patronage to charlatans? Because they advertise. We have taken advertising away from them and use it in the interests of science. You think of tuberculosis only after you have it. We are going to make you think of it all the time, so that you may protect yourself against its invasion. . . . This way, this way, follow the crowd. . . . We put medicine within the reach of little children. This way, this way! Tell us what you prefer—moving pictures or the hospital. Our show saves you from the hospital. We are advertising public health."

In the just published preliminary report of the Rockefeller Foundation we find that during 1918 three traveling exhibits of this kind and groups of lecturers visited ten departments in France and in 141 towns gave 875 lectures with demonstrations and exhibits; that over 2,100,000 pieces of printed matter concerning tuberculosis—posters, pamphlets, post-cards, etc.—were distributed; and that a series of twenty-four articles on tuberculosis were published in thirty-three important provincial newspapers.

It may seem presumptuous for Americans thus to be crusading against tuberculosis in the land of Louis Pasteur, for in France there are examples of almost every kind of effective agency in combating consumption. For example, the Bligny Sanatorium, thirty miles south of Paris, is surpassed by only one or two American institutions of this sort. The only justification for sending an American Commission in the summer of 1917 to France was the fact that, exhausted by three years of fierce warfare, she could spare neither further personnel nor further resources in the fight against the white plague.

TEAM-PLAY

France has little to learn concerning the organization and administration of tuberculosis dispensaries and the control of tuberculosis sanatoria. But in the organization of local committees, in relief measures, in the issuance of literature, in the setting aside of hospital beds, in the provision for tuberculous soldiers, etc., she has something to learn, because these agencies have been isolated, almost unrelated. In France, as the Rockefeller report reminds us, ideas do not spread rapidly by imitation, as they do here. The Commission saw that its contribution should be a demonstration of organized team-play.

The American Commission chose for its intensive organization one of the districts of Paris and one of the departments of France. In the Paris district they established several dispensaries, from which groups of nurses and visiteuses d'hygiène also visited patients in their homes. Meanwhile the Red Cross provided extra hospital wards, opened sanatoria and preventoria in the suburbs, and supplied food and clothing to needy sufferers from tuberculosis. In the country the Commission established twenty-three dispensaries, a sanatorium, and a day camp, and in the chief towns of the department the French set aside hospital beds for the Commission's use. Here again the Red Cross assumed increasing responsibility for relief work, provisions, extra food, etc. The result shows that all these elements, relatively ineffective when isolated, can be combined into a mutually reinforcing co-operation.

A particular work of the Foundation has been to train and furnish personnel. In Paris it provided for special lectures, clinics, hospital and sanatorium courses, and field work in visiting patients in their homes. It engaged both French and American physicians as instructors. It offered scholarships of thirty dollars a month to French nurses; forty-five were in the service at the end of the year and fifty-six others were in training.

This campaign of extension has now gone through twenty-seven of the departments of France.

Almost all of the expense is being borne by the French themselves. We may think sometimes that our generosity is pauperizing our allies. It is cheering to find that in cases like this our effort has ministered to French self-respect.

THE ACTORS' STRIKE

One of the most interesting symptoms of the apparently world-wide struggle now going on in an acute form between the wage-worker and the employer is the Actors' Strike, reported in these pages last week. It began in New York City and has now spread to other parts of the country. The strike is fundamentally for the purpose of introducing the principle of collective bargaining into the dramatic profession. The actors and actresses almost universally want collective bargaining. The employing managers universally do not.

John Drew comes from a family long honored on the American stage and is himself an actor of distinction, quite independent of dictation on the part of anybody. He is one of the influential supporters of the strike. We telegraphed him at his summer home on Long Island just before this issue went to press, asking him for a statement concerning the causes of the fight between the actors and managers.

We sent a similar telegram to George M. Cohan, known throughout the United States and much of Europe as the composer of "Over There!" Mr. Cohan is a theater-owner, play producer, and one of the most determined of the managers. According to news reports he asserts that he prefers financial ruin to any yielding to the actors' demands—an assertion frequently made by employers in strike controversies, although we have never known it to be fully carried out. Mr. Cohan has not answered our telegraphic request. Mr. Drew telegraphs to us as follows:

As Dr. Frank Crane says in an article in the Evening "Globe," Thursday, August 14, there is but one issue joined at present between the managers and actors—the recognition of the Actors' Equity Association by the Producing Managers' Association. All other differences seem capable of adjustment. I can offer nothing more illuminating nor exgetic than Dr. Crane's remarks. I thank you for the compliment conveyed in your request for a statement from me.

JOHN DREW.

Dr. Crane, a clergyman by training, is now a journalist with a very wide moral and social influence. In the article to which Mr. Drew refers Dr. Crane states
the case, as follows:

It will be seen that there is but one issue joined. The Actors' Equity Association demands to be recognized as the representative of the actor, so that in case of a dispute the matter can be settled between the two associations. The Producing Managers' Association state that they cannot deal with or recognize the Actors' Equity Association. The producing managers do not reply to the other demands made in the Actors' Equity statement. Here, at least, is a distinct issue. . . .

There are three ways in which the actors' strike could be settled.

One way is for one side to entirely defeat the other.

Another way is to go on fighting until everybody is worn out and many people ruined.

The third way is to get together and compromise.

Manifestly, getting together is the only sensible solution.

But getting together means a recognition of the Actors' Union. We rather thank that will be the outcome. For the managers must, like other employers, finally submit to the inevitable and accept collective bargaining and the collective protest against individual injustices as necessary factors in modern industry.

The actors in this conflict have two advantages—that of public sympathy and that of being able to carry on their profession in tents, halls, improvised buildings, or even in the open fields. A theater, on the other hand, however splendid, is of no value to an owner-manager unless he can get actors to play in it.

THE INTERBOROUGH STRIKE

The principle of collective bargaining has had another victory in the outcome of the Interborough strike. The Interborough Rapid Transit Company is the corporation that runs the elevated railway and most of the subways in New York City. Its employees are organized into an individual union. With a suddenness that took the public by complete surprise, the men struck on Sunday morning of last week, and not a train was run on the elevated roads or the subways until midnight of Monday, a period of about forty-four hours. The public was subjected to great discomfort and inconvenience, and women especially had great difficulty in reaching their homes. The men struck for an increase of fifty per cent in their wages and for certain other demands.
They went back to their work as suddenly as they left it, because the Company agreed to twenty-five per cent increase and to arbitration of the other demands. There was no violence of any kind. In this respect the strike is a gain over any previous transit strike in the city of New York.

There is something mysterious about the whole proceeding. The Mayor accuses the managers of the transit corporation of collusion in the strike in order to force the public to support the operators' demands for higher fare. The opponents of the Mayor, however, accuse him of conniving at the strike in order to help Tammany Hall in its demand for municipal ownership. In the meantime the public is asking why it should be subjected to forty-four hours of annoyance, discomfort, danger, and serious financial loss while employers and employees suspend work for the purpose of discussing whether they can arbitrate their differences.

A PAINTER; A COMPOSER;
A SCIENTIST

On the same day there died an American, an Italian, and a German of international fame.

The American was Ralph Albert Blakelock, seventy-two years old, one of this country's most notable artists, but one whom early poverty had driven crazy.
Fortunately, he lived long enough to regain sanity. But what must have been the force of irony as he saw the prices now being paid for his pictures? One such price, years ago, would have saved him from poverty and a clouded mind.
As a boy he began to paint without guidance or instruction or money, using cigar-box lids at first. When later he struck his pace, artists saw, even if the public did not, that here was a man who dared to break away from sober fact and commonplace objectivity, who dared to illuminate his landscapes with his own spirit. In the dramatic contrasts between his heavy coloring and lighter tracery we find the emotional expression of an essentially poetical painter.

Like Blakelock, so Ruggiero Leoncavallo, who died at the age of sixtyone, was for years hard pressed to keep from starvation. He, however, escaped from it and delighted the world by producing "I Pagliacci," one of the most popular operas of our time. He wrote, indeed, the music for "I Medici" and other operas, but none obtained the vogue of "Pagliacci," in which in libretto and score alike he gave full play to his instinct for theatrical effect. While Leoncavallo was an expert at orchestration, he was not a musician of the first order;
he lacked the higher inspiration.

The German in question was Ernst

Haeckel, eighty-five years old. For very many years he was Professor of Zoölogy in the University of Jena. There he kept the torch of Darwin and Huxley burning, but became very much more radical than they. To the world Haeckel is best known by his book "The Riddle of the Universe." It has been translated into twenty languages. It seems strange that it should come out of the University of Jena, once the stronghold of such idealists as Schiller and Hegel. But, no matter what one's views may be, the book has extraordinary interest. Haeckel wrote many other scientific works, but in none of them did he so successfully pack the fruits of his lifelong research in a form to appeal to the general reader.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS DISCUSSION

ON Tuesday, August 12, Senator Lodge, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the leader of the Republican majority in the Senate, and recognized representative of the opponents of the present form of the Covenant of the League of Nations, made a carefully prepared speech on the floor of the Senate in which he pointed out what he believes to be the dangers to this country of adopting that Covenant. It may be assumed, we think, that Senator Lodge will vote for the ratification of the Treaty, including the League plan, provided that reservations like those which he proposes are adopted. But it is apparent that he accepts the possibility of reservations only as a compromise, and that if it did not involve the possible failure of the Peace Treaty, he would prefer to reject completely the League of Nations.
For he says:

No doubt many excellent and patriotic people see a coming fulfillment of noble ideals in the words "League for Peace."
We all respect and share these aspirations and desires, but some of us see no hope but rather defeat for them in this murky Covenant.

Mr. Lodge's fundamental objection to the League is that it involves a hard and fast alliance with European nations and that in that respect it is an analogy to the Holy Alliance of the early part of the last century, which was "so hostile and dangerous to human freedom." Mr.
Lodge quoted Article VI of the Treaty of Vienna of March 25, 1815, the treaty upon which the Holy Alliance was based:

To facilitate and to secure the execution of the present Treaty and to consolidate the connections which at the present moment so closely unite the four sovereigns for the happiness of the world, the high contracting parties have agreed to renew their meeting at fixed periods, either under the immediate auspices of the sovereigns themselves or by their respective ministers, for the purpose of consulting upon their common interests and for the consideration of the measures which at each of those periods shall be considered the most salutary for the repose and prosperity of nations and for the maintenance of the peace of Europe.

"Nothing could be more ingenuous or more praiseworthy than the purposes" expressed in this article, says Mr. Lodge. But he adds the indisputable fact that the agreement of these high contracting parties "was destined to grow into what has been known, and we might add cursed, throughout history as the Holy Alliance." The implication is that the League of Nations as now proposed might grow into a similar curse to mankind. However, Mr. Lodge believes that this danger might possibly be averted by five reservations:

1. That no decision or action of the League of Nations can take away the Constitutional right of Congress to decide when and where American soldiers shall fight. This reservation refers to Article X of the League Covenant, which provides that all members of the League shall unite to defend a fellow-member against a war of aggression.

2. Article XI of the League Covenant says: "Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the League or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole League." Mr. Lodge would state in a reservation that the United States cannot take any military action under this article without the consent of Congress.

3. The right to interpret and act upon the Monroe Doctrine must clearly be reserved to the United States.

4. A reservation must state that the United States does not consider that the League of Nations has any authority whatever regarding immigration or tariffs so far as they affect the United States.

5. Article I of the League Covenant says that "any member of the League may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the League, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under the Covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal." Mr. Lodge would state in a reservation that the United States must be the sole judge as to whether, if it should desire to withdraw, its international obligations have been fulfilled.

Mr. Lodge concluded his eloquent address by an appeal for vigorous nationalism, saying:

You may call me selfish, if you will, conservative or reactionary, or use any other harsh adjective you see fit to apply, but an American I was born, an American I have remained all my life. I can never be anything else but an American, and I must think of the United States first, and when I think of the United States first in an arrangement like this I am thinking of what is best for the world, for if the United States fails the best hopes of mankind fail with it. I have never had but one allegiance—I cannot divide it now. I have loved but one flag, and I cannot share that devotion and give affection to the mongrel banner invented for a league. Internationalism, illustrated by the Bolshevik and by the men to whom all countries are alike provided they can make money out of them, is to me repulsive. National I must remain, and in that way I, like all other Americans, can render the amplest service to the world.

Mr. Lodge's comparison of the proposed League of Nations to the Holy Alliance may be dismissed with very little comment. The Holy Alliance was formed for the express purpose of strengthening and perpetuating the powers of despotic monarchs. The Covenant of the League of Nations is drawn for the express purpose of developing and safeguarding popular rights and popular justice. In the opening of his speech Mr. Lodge intimates that the League of Nations may become a militaristic autocracy. At its close he intimates that it may become an instrument of repulsive and Bolshevik internationalism. These two views are inconsistent. It might conceivably become one or the other, but it certainly cannot become both. This double objection is a little like that which was made at the time of the introduction of railways into England by George Stephenson. The same critics said that steam trains would go so furiously fast that they would endanger the lives of everybody on board, and that they would go so hopelessly slow that they would not get their passengers to their destination.

To Mr. Lodge's proposed reservations we can see no serious objections, for, we think, they are either directly or indirectly included in the provisions of the League itself, with the possible exception of the fifth reservation, in which Mr. Lodge would provide that the United States is to be the sole judge as to whether it has fulfilled its League obligations. We believe, and have previously said, that if the League proves to be so unsuccessful that the United States desires to retire it will be the sole judge whatever the rest of the world may say. If Mr. Lodge believes that the five reservations which he proposes can change "this murky Covenant" into an instrument of light which he is willing to indorse and support, we are very glad, and trust that the Senate may come to a speedy decision to follow his suggestions.

We take the occasion again to state our own position:

For many years we have hoped that the nations of the world in the evolutionary processes of civilization would, as far as possible, attempt to substitute judicial procedure for war in the settlement of international disputes. The Hague Conventions and the establishment of the Hague Tribunal were a step in this direction, but the step failed because the people at large were not at that time interested in the problem. Owing to the European war the present is the first epoch in world history when the masses of the people have had their real interest in such an undertaking aroused. For this reason we desire to see immediate action. If those who favor the enforcement of international law through judicial procedure do not take advantage of the present public interest, it may be years, even generations, before there will be again the opportunity for concerted action which obtained at the Paris Conference.

We consider Article XIV of the Covenant to be the kernel of the whole plan and that every other article is incidental to it. Article XIV provides for the establishment of an international court. The decrees of a court are not worth anything on paper unless they are backed by the moral and physical force of the people who have erected the court. We regard the other twenty-five articles of the Covenant simply as provisions giving power to Article XIV, the judicial article. If Article XIV is carried successfully, the rest of the Covenant will be a success. If Article XIV in practice proves to be a failure, the whole Covenant will fail. The dangers which Mr. Lodge foresees in the Covenant will fade away if Article XIV is effectively carried out. If Article XIV is not effectively carried out, the League will disintegrate and the dangers which Mr. Lodge anticipates. Whether an international court can be established can be learned only by trying the experiment. We are for trying it.

We are nationalists and are as opposed as Mr. Lodge to promiscuous internationalism, just as we are opposed to an attempt to substitute associations of nations for Brook Farm or the Shaker settlements for communities of separate families. A community can be useful and successful unless the families which compose it are each of them vigorous, intelligent, and true to the instinct of self-preservation. If the families in a community are weak and vapid, the community will be weak and vapid. In a community of nations each nation should seek and maintain the highest development in order that it may contribute its strength and quality to the community. For these reasons we believe that the most vigorous support of nationalism is consistent and harmonious with belief in an association of nations and international law.

WHAT IS BEST FOR RUSSIA?

THE puzzling problem of the relations and policy of the Allies toward Russia does not clear up at all rapidly. Nothing definite has resulted from the announcement some weeks ago that the Omsk All-Russian Government would receive moral and material support, if not formal recognition. Recent reports state that the Omsk Government and its military leader, Kolchak, are to be financed by a large credit arranged in the countries which fought against Germany, and that the financial interests of the United States would share in this to the extent of $25,000,000. It is known that General Denikine, who is acting in unison with Kolchak, has been aided by foreign stores and munitions. It may be that this explains why Denikine's campaign has been marked by advances while Kolchak has either stood still or drawn back. Newspaper reports of August 19 indicate that Kolchak is now in very serious straits.

But as to any large, settled policy there is no unity of action or feeling among the Allies and America. Probably at the bottom of the situation is disagreement as to the best outcome for Russia. All agree that the Bolsheviki must fall or be destroyed. But what kind of Russia would result—a vast, centralized nation, federation of countries, or a group of dependent nations? The statesmen of Europe differ as to which result would leave Russia least exposed to German attempts to get influence and power in the Russia of the future. France, it is understood, thinks that a centralized nation (preferably a social democracy) would be best. It therefore is for a strong policy to uphold the strongest anti-Bolshevik government in Russia; and it is the Omsk Government. Great Britain is in doubt; how much so is shown in the fact that lately the London "Express" declared, "We have no business in Russia. The people there must seek out their own salvation;" while the London "Times" says that an active campaign must be carried on by England in Russia, and that, for instance, to withdraw British soldiers from Archangel will forever destroy the chances of sympathetic co-operation in politics or in commerce or in the fellowship of ideals between England and Russia."

And how about an American policy in Russia? Is there such a policy? We have several thousand soldiers in Siberia; and in reply to urgent requests from Congress for information, President Wilson has stated that they were sent to the Czechoslovak forces and "to aid any efforts of the Russians at self-defense." and that they are now kept there to protect the Americans working under Mr. John F. Stevens to rebuild Russian railways, and generally to help trade and reconstruction conditions in Siberia. This is all very well; but in his long statement the President shows no sign of holding or expounding any views as to a policy for America as regards Russia.

Have we a Russian policy? If so, what is it?

A SIGNIFICANT PROPHECY

IN 1905 Professor Nathaniel Schmidt, of Cornell University, wrote in a suggestive volume entitled "The Prophet of Nazareth" the following prophetic paragraph:

It is only a matter of time when the kings and emperors of Europe and Asia shall have lost such autocratic powers as still remain to them, and shall have been obliged to surrender their dynastic claims. Far more serious is the question how long the oligarchies of wealth that form the real power behind all governments and exercise a lordship kings might envy shall be able to maintain themselves. But vastly more important than the elimination of irresponsible authority in any form is the temper of the developing democracies. Ill fares society when ruled by mobs. The power wielded by masses of men egged on to deeds of violence and injustice by hatred, selfishness, and thirst for vengeance is never so terrible as when it is used in the name of the whole people. Then the reaction inevitably comes. The horrors of the Napoleonic wars follow the horrors of the French Revolution. A people can successfully manage its own affairs only in proportion as its citizens are enlightened and unselfish, capable of service and eager to render it, regardful of the rights of others and anxious to help the largest number, content with giving directions as to the general policy and willing to leave the details to specially trained and responsible servants, courageous in their protests against wrong and peaceful in their methods of righting it.

The prophecy of Professor Schmidt is already fulfilled—the kings and emperors of Europe and Asia have lost their autocratic power. The warning he uttered is uttered in threatening tones in every land; the autocracy of the mob is proved to be as fatal to the community as the autocracy of kings. And the condition necessary to secure universal welfare and universal peace is pointed out by current events in language more eloquent and not less clear than that of Professor Schmidt: A people eager to render service and regardful of each other's rights and interests.

To secure a just peace this, and more than this, is necessary; the various classes, races, and creeds must understand each other, respect each other's opinions as well as each other's rights, and must be more desirous to persuade than to dictate.

Our political and educational institutions tend to promote mutual understanding. Rich and poor, scholarly and unscholarly, native American and foreign born, meet at the same polls, participate in the same public meetings, and read the same newspaper, or can do so if they will, and their children attend the same schools. The demand that schools teach the English language is founded on the instinctive desire for a mutual understanding.

But there is no such tendency in our industrial institutions. There is nothing in their organization and little in their administration to promote in the owners and their co-workers any mutual understanding of each other's opinions or any real regard for each other's interests. Even in our home industries the maid rarely comprehends the mind of the mistress, and as rarely does the mistress comprehend the mind of the maid. The grievance of the workingman is not merely that his wages are too small or his hours too long. Shorten the hours and increase the wages, and the grievance remains. He has a share in the government of the state; he has a share in the government of the school; but he has no share in the government of the mine and the factory, and he thinks himself entitled to it.

The rule of the majority does not make a democracy. A mob may be as autocratic as a man. Democracy is the rule of the people, a rule in which all have some part and in which not only are the rights of the minority scrupulously regarded but the opinions of the minority are carefully considered. The rule of the oligarchies of wealth is drawing toward its close. But to substitute for it the rule of the worker will not bring either individual liberty or industrial peace. Turn industry upside down, make the proletariat the rulers and the bourgeoisie the ruled, and the government would still be a class government and would be no more just, and probably less intelligent, than before. What the world needs and will secure, whatever the cost, is government not by a class but by as well as for the people, and this in industry and education as well as in the state.

Force may be required at any time and in any community to preserve order, but force alone will never secure either peace or justice. The police can solve neither the race problem nor the industrial problem, nor can an international army solve the international problem. The League of Nations will be a success, whatever defects there may be in the machinery, provided the French, the Italians, the English, the Americans, and the Japanese understand each other, regard each other's interests, and respect each other's opinions. It will be a disastrous failure, however ingenious, however well guarded the Covenant, if the peoples are narrow in their understanding and selfish in their national desires and trust to the Secretariat and the Council to keep the peace.

Here is a work for the minister, the teacher, and the editor: to interpret the capitalist to the workingman and the workingman to the capitalist, the Negro to the white man and the white man to the Negro, the civilized peoples of the world to America and the Americans to the world peoples. To do this the interpreter, be he preacher, teacher, or editor, must be catholic in spirit and non-partisan in purpose, ready to protest against wrong whoever inflicts it, and more eager to interpret and define the rights of man than either the rights of labor or the rights of capital.

MAKING OVER THE ARMY

THE PROPOSAL OF THE MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS ASSOCIATION—THE PLAN OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT

TWO important plans for the development of the military forces of the United States are now before Congress. The first voices the studied conclusions of the Military Training Camps Association, and the second is a tentative draft of a bill put forward by the War Department itself. It is important that all those who are interested in the establishment of a sound military policy for the United States should study closely these two contrasting proposals.

THE PLAN OF THE M. T. C. A.

The Military Training Camps Association, as readers of The Outlook know, is that organization which was both father and child of the "Plattsburg Idea." It is no surprise, then, to find that the M. T. C. A. has built its plan for an American military establishment upon universal training as a fundamental basis.

The M. T. C. A. proposes that six months' military or naval training should be given to all the male youth of the country at the age of eighteen or nineteen years. It proposes, furthermore, that young men who are non-English-speaking or illiterate, and therefore unable either to profit fully by military training or to perform the duties of American citizenship, should be given three months' extra training in educational camps preceding the camps devoted to the training of the great body of the Nation's youth.

After passing out of the six months' training camps it is proposed that the graduates be organized territorially (along the lines of the Swiss system) into a Reserve of the United States Army, in which they would remain for a period of about ten years. During the first five years of this service in the Reserve soldiers would be subject to several periods of training, lasting not more than three weeks in any one year, or a total of nine weeks in the five years. Annual reports, annual submission to examination, and, if necessary, medical treatment, would be required during the entire ten years of service in the Reserve. It is proposed, further, that until the full development of this plan has been reached the Reserve be officered by the veteran officers and non-commissioned officers who served in the war.

It is recognized that such a Reserve as it is proposed to establish would require a large body of technically trained officers and men. All officers, non-commissioned officers, and enlisted specialists are to be chosen from the ranks after additional and progressive training to qualify them for the successive steps of promotion.

The plan of the M. T. C. A. leaves the Regular Army at its present authorized permanent peace strength—some 217,000 men and 12,000 officers. Provision is made for a larger temporary professional force if it shall be found necessary. The importance of the Regular Army being composed of a relatively large percentage of technically trained specialists of both officers and enlisted men is emphasized.

As to the National Guard, it is proposed that it be restored to its function as understood before the enactment of the National Defense Act, and that the National Guard should henceforth be relied upon only to "execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, or repel invasion," as provided in the Constitution of the United States. In order to enable the Guard to function under this proposal, it is suggested that men be permitted to enlist for a term of three years in the Guard (after having had six months' training) in lieu of further service in the Reserve.

It appears that the plan proposed by the Military Training Camps Association is, in general, sound in principle and intelligently developed as to detail. It looks forward to something more than mere military training for all the male youth of the country and it recognizes the fact that the citizens of the United States must no longer depend upon a Regular Army for the chief element of their military defense.

THE PLAN OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT

The plan which the War Department has submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate is, as Secretary Baker states, subject to further revision by the War Department itself. It has not been submitted to General Pershing, and the opinion of General Pershing and his associates abroad, as Secretary Baker says, "would be necessary before a final draft could be said to represent the full opinion of the Army." In his letter of transmission to Congress Secretary Baker summarized the bill in the following words:

The bill as inclosed provides a peacetime establishment of 510,000 men and in effect makes permanent the organization which has developed in the War Department, except that it abolishes the Chemical Warfare Service and the Inspector-General's Department. . . .

The bill as drawn makes the Selective Service Act as amended a part of our permanent legislation. The importance of a recognition of this system as a means of getting men in time of war is obvious. Our experience has demonstrated the efficiency of the act under which we operated in the present war, and if it is made a part of our permanent legislation its readiness in time of emergency will increase its effectiveness.

The bill recognizes the principle of promotion by selection as essential to efficiency in the Army. The present situation is that non-commissioned officers are made and promoted by selection, as are also officers above the grade of colonel. The test of war showed that promotion by seniority was inapplicable, and it had to be abandoned. So far as I know, not a single voice was raised during this recent emergency in favor of any other plan than the rigid and unsparing application of the tests of merit and fitness for promotion. . . .

The bill as drawn provides for a system of universal training for a very brief period applicable to all male citizens of the United States in their twentieth year, with suitable provisions for exemptions and deferments. It does not, however, provide for any reserve obligation, since that is unnecessary with a system of universal service in time of emergency. The period suggested for training is brief, but not too brief, it is believed, to secure a careful stock-taking of the health and physical condition of the young manhood of the Nation and the institution of such remedial measures as may be practicable, nor too brief to initiate the habits of orderliness, co-ordination, and self-care which proved so valuable in the recent training of men preparing for active military service. Nor is this period believed to be too brief to entail great advantage to the country should any future emergency require it to call for service.

The bill provides for the Reserve Officers' Corps and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and under it it is proposed to give the Army the best academic education and the most thorough vocational training we can provide. The country has never faced so great an opportunity to attach to its service men trained in the school of experience. We now have many trained officers, not merely those who have been brought in through Regular Army channels but the splendid body of officers from the National Guard and from the officers' training camps and schools who have learned under actual war conditions the business of the soldier. There are available to us great groups of men qualified to exercise command and perform the staff duties which are of permanent importance and most difficult to organize.

It will be observed that the bill suggests no change in existing law with regard to the organization of the National Guard and its relation to the Regular Army. It is assumed that the National Defense Act Federalizing the Guard will be retained in force, and that if any readjustment of its relation to the Regular Army is desired it will be suggested in the hearings.

It appears, then, that the War Department expects to place its main reliance in the future, as in the past, upon a Regular Army. A Regular Army of half a million men is very much larger than the United States needs in times of peace, and likewise wholly inadequate in time of war. Furthermore, there exists very grave doubt whether it is even possible to raise by voluntary enlistment a regular establishment of this size. Previous to the war the United States found it difficult to keep its small Regular Army of that period enlisted to its full authorized strength.

It is obvious that the War Department bill provides no proper citizen training. Three months' training is enough to irritate those who do not believe in military training, but not enough to make the training they are forced to undergo of any permanent value. Three months is inadequate, both from the social and the military view-point.

A third defect in the bill prepared by the War Department is to be found in its failure to organize territorially the men to be trained under its provisions. Moreover, the bill provides no adequate machinery for training Reserve officers and non-commissioned officers. Reserve officers cannot be trained theoretically; they must be trained with troops. The training of Reserve officers should go hand in hand with the universal training of the private soldier. The responsibility for this training should not be left entirely in the hands of the Regular Army, for under such a system there is little chance to build up a well-trained commissioned and non-commissioned Reserve.

KENTUCKY MOUNTAIN RHYMES

BY ANN COBB

OF THE SETTLEMENT SCHOOL, HINDMAN, KNOTT COUNTY, KENTUCKY

UNDER THE SYCAMORE TREE

Under the pided sycamore tree,
While the sun-ball's drapping slow,
I sit, with my turkey-feather fan
A-waving to and fro,
And my reecollection wandering back
To the days of long ago.

Days like the little sycamore balls
That all of a favorance be,
Weaving and baking, turn about,
Jest as hit suited me—
(Maid and mother and granny too
I've fared amazing free);

Days like the gnurly sycamore trunk,
Weather-bitten and torn—
The day when they battled at Middle Forks
And slaughtered my eldest born,
And yesternoon, when the word from France
Gave us a man to mourn.

Days that are evil and days that are good
The Lord God doth decree,
But the thought of the days that will foller on
Is what makes cheer for me,
The thought of the hosts of my blood that shall sit
Under the sycamore tree.

THE GOURD HORN

Nowadays folks can't blow that horn,
Blow and they puff, puff and they blow,
And swar the dad-busted thing won't go.
Gee-oh, I've blowed hit sence I was born.

When I was a chunk of a lad with a hoe,
Working the crap and shirking the crap,
The sun-ball a-seorching me ready to drap,
Gee-oh, I longed for that horn to blow!

Little ole Maw could make hit sing,
Sing of the corn pone and vinegar pie,
And the bed where a pompered boy could lie.
Gee-oh, hit's long-ago days that cling!

UP CARR CREEK

The ways of the world are a-coming—up Cyarr!
Biled shirts and neckties,
Powder-pots and veils,
Pizen fotched-on liquor,
Doctor-pills, and ails—
Hit's a sight, all the brash that's a-coming—up Cyarr!

The ways of the mountains are passing—up Cyarr!
Moonshine stills and manhood,
Gear to weave and spin,
Good old Reg'lar Baptists
Preaching hell for sin.
Far'well to the old ways a-passing—up Cyarr!

The ways of the world will be holding—up Cyarr!
Sorry ways, the old ways,
They've a call to go.
Only, when you're grave-bound,
Changing's allus slow.
Old folks will bide by the old ways—up Cyarr.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE FROM FOREIGN LANDS

THE BALKANS—GERMANY—ENGLAND

I—THE RED CROSS REBUILDING THE BALKANS

BY GREGORY MASON

STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

IN Serbia thousands of people are wearing as their principal garment, for both day and night, pajamas supplied by the American Red Cross. If it were not for the American Red Cross, some of them would have nothing to wear and nothing to eat.

In parts of the Balkans there is probably more destitution than anywhere else in Europe, not excepting Poland. Most of Europe has had four years of war. The Balkans have had seven. Populations have decreased, houses, crops, and machines have been wantonly destroyed or left to rot.

After these seven years of destruction the people are beginning to try to rebuild. They are beginning feebly, but they are beginning. For one who is tired of war it is a pleasure to watch this attempt to rebuild. And to an American it is a pleasure to see how much his country is doing to help that reconstruction.

Americans in Europe nowadays are getting letters from friends at home saying, "Why don't you come home? The war is over." But the war is not over; the most important work is yet to be done. What would you think of a victorious army which left the field of battle after the enemy had all surrendered without picking up and caring for its wounded? The Allies have beaten the German army, but if that was all they were fighting to do their victory would be inconsequential. It remains to rebuild Europe and to make it better than it ever was before.

No part of Europe needs rebuilding so much as the Balkans. It was the conflict between Slav and Teuton in this region which was the primary cause of this war. There can never be a stable peace in Europe while the Balkans remain turbulent, as they have been during the past century. So it is to the interest not only of Europeans, but it is to the interest as well of all Americans who want to avoid the necessity of another Château Thierry that the Balkans be stabilized.

The foregoing is by way of calling attention to the fact that America is doing more than helping to feed the Balkans. She is putting new heart into them and new backbone. It happens to be mainly the Red Cross through which this is being done, but it is no less America in a national sense which will get, and will deserve to get, the credit. Millions of American people support the Red Cross, most of them poor people.

Every general knows that when you destroy the morale of the civilians behind an army, you have beaten the army. The morale of all the Balkan peoples is very low. Before the Balkans can be rebuilt on a sounder political and social basis the morale of their inhabitants must be restored. The first thing to do is to see that these people get food and clothing. To this end the American Red Cross created and sent out its Balkan Commission. The head of this Commission, with the title of Commissioner to the Balkan States, is Lieutenant-Colonel Henry W. Anderson, who commanded the Commission which the Red Cross sent to Rumania a year ago. So difficult and varied is the work before the Balkan Commission that it has been subdivided geographically into five parts. There has been a Commission in Rumania under the direction of Lieutenant-Colonel H. Gideon Wells, a Commission to Greece under Lieutenant-Colonel Edward Capps, and one to Serbia under Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas W. Farnam. The unit to Montenegro has been commanded by Major E. G. Dexter, while Major Robert Dennison has been at the head of the unit to Albania. But all these groups are integral parts of the Balkan Commission and are under the supreme control of Colonel Anderson. (By the way, there is no duplication of effort between the Red Cross and the Hoover Food Administration. Mr. Hoover's men are sending only flour, bread, and fats into the Balkans, and wherever the Red Cross meets them it makes its efforts supplementary to theirs.)

With most normal lines of communication broken down it is hard to get accurate information about conditions in the states between Austria and Turkey. The Red Cross relies mainly on the reports of its own investigators whom it sends ahead into the fields it selects. Montenegro has been enjoying a free-for-all fight, and this civil war must end before real reconstruction can be begun. Rumania is in a very bad condition. She has lost ten per cent of her population by the war. Caught between Bulgaria and Austria-Hungary, Rumania is in danger of being inundated from each side by Bolshevism as it was invaded before by hostile soldiers. It is of the greatest importance to the Allies that Rumania be kept free from this tide of Bolshevism.

But when one speaks of the Balkans probably most Americans think first of Serbia. And probably Serbia has suffered more by the war than any of her neighbors. The war has decreased the population of Serbia by one-fifth—that is, by one million people—but, considering the rate at which the population of Serbia was formerly increasing, it is a conservative estimate that Serbia now has 1,340,000 people less than she would have had if there had not been the war.

The epidemic of typhus carried away 150,000 Serbians, and Spanish influenza accounted for 60,000. Typhoid, tuberculosis, pneumonia, scarlet fever, diphtheria, dysentery, and other diseases have cut deep into the population since it was demoralized by war. Doctors and nurses are probably the first need of Serbia.

Not only has Serbia lost people, she has been robbed of them. The Austro-Germans and the Bulgarians deported Serbians in great numbers, as Belgians were deported into Germany. The official estimate is that eighty thousand Serbs were carried into Bulgaria and about one hundred and sixty thousand into Austria and Germany.

On the whole, Serbia is not starving, and yet there is not a little starvation in Serbia; and the fact that an American can go to a restaurant in Belgrade and get a good meal is no proof of the contrary. There is starvation in Serbia both because of the high prices of food and because of the difficulty of distributing it.

Children are suffering especially. A member of the Red Cross told me the following pathetic incident: He was stopped in a Serbian town by a man who was leading his little daughter by the hand. The man asked the American where he could get food for the child and for himself, and while the American was telling him the child fainted and within a few minutes was dead. That was plain starvation.

In the main, Greece has suffered less than Serbia, but in parts of Macedonia there is as much destitution as in the worst parts of Serbia and Montenegro. The Greek Government estimates that more than forty thousand persons died by starvation in Grecian Macedonia during the Bulgarian occupation. In that area there has been a good deal of devastation, although it was caused less by military operations than by wanton vandalism when the enemy retreated. Many houses were destroyed by the enemy in order that he might use their timbers for fuel. The Greeks who have suffered most are the more than one hundred thousand who were forcibly deported to Bulgaria. Many of these people are still in a deplorable condition.

So much for a brief picture of conditions of human suffering in the Balkans. Now for a description of the manner in which the Red Cross has applied itself to alleviate this suffering. It has been a cardinal principle with the Balkan Commission of the Red Cross to remember that in this crisis its work is essentially of an emergency nature. At the same time it has aimed at something more than temporary relief, for it has aimed to help these people help themselves, so that they will never find themselves in their present predicament again. Another fundamental principle of the Red Cross is to keep entirely out of Balkan politics.

Within these general principles there are no limitations to what the American Red Cross has been doing for the people of the Balkans. It has been feeding them, clothing them, giving them seed, and in some places actually planting their crop for them. It has sent a Greek physician and several assistants throughout the Greek islands to teach the poor people there a few elementary principles of child welfare. At Athens it has put into operation an artificial-limb factory, and it is training Greeks for this work so that eventually the factory will be entirely Greek in ownership, management, and operation. That is characteristic of the purpose and scope of the Red Cross in the Balkans. The Balkan Commission is now finishing up its work, and it hopes it has done more than carried the Balkan people through one of the hardest winters in their history; it hopes it has helped them to be able hereafter to feed, clothe, and care for themselves in sanitation, in agriculture, and in industry.

At the present time there are Red Cross supplies in almost every Balkan port of any importance. Ships are carrying bread and cloth up the Danube into Rumania. Trains and automobiles and mules are carrying flour and ovens, linen and sewing-machines, into Serbia. The first Red Cross train to supply Belgrade left Trieste on January 23 and arrived at Semlin, across the river from Belgrade, on January 27. There were thirty-one cars in the train and they were guarded by Serbian soldiers under the direction of the Red Cross. An inventory of the cargo reads like a list of the household effects of the Swiss Family Robinson.

From each main center in the Balkans the Red Cross has established distributing stations. Bucharest has been the main center for Rumania, Belgrade for northern Serbia, Salonika for southern Serbia, Cattaro for Montenegro, and Athens for Greece. Wherever the Balkan Commission has gone it has tried to make its work supplementary to what the local governments were doing, and it has sought the assistance of local people of all classes. It has also been very careful to send in supplies suited to the peculiar needs of each particular locality. In Albania, for example, the peasants do not wear the conventional civilized shoe. Accordingly, instead of sending such shoes into Albania the Red Cross sent in great quantities of leather and thread and called a convention of the Albanian shoemakers.

Although the Red Cross is avoiding being in any way entangled in Balkan politics, the greatest effect of its work is political in the deeper sense of that word—that is, it is social. The Red Cross is the first institution which ever gave the Balkans something for nothing. For the first time in their lives the Balkan people are in contact with an unselfish effort. That effort is American. To the Balkan people, as Major William B. Thompson, Chief of the Division of Civil Relief, says, “unconsciously the Red Cross represents the great Republic across the Atlantic.” In the minds of these people, therefore, the Red Cross stands for an idea which is opposed to the mediæval and autocratic theories of government which have long flourished among them. On the other hand, unconsciously the Red Cross is a force against Bolshevism. When I spoke to him of this, Colonel Anderson, the head of the Balkan Commission, said:

“Yes, if every one had enough to eat there would be no Bolshevism. In sending food and clothing through the Red Cross to the Balkans the American people are helping real democracy in those countries. They are also building a great reservoir of gratitude. Unselfishness breeds unselfishness. These people have never been able to trust any one. Whenever an outside country has concerned itself with Balkan affairs, it has been for selfish purposes. Russians have gone into Rumania ten times, and each time have wanted to annex Rumanian territory. It is hard for these people to believe that in coming to them the American Red Cross has no ulterior purpose.

“We are trying to make them understand. We are trying to give them a new idea, a conception of something more than self-interest. If they get that, the Balkans may cease to be the danger-point in Europe.

“If Europe is left shattered, has the war been worth while? The most important part of the war is the reconstruction which must come now after the actual fighting is finished. It is our interest in that which has brought my colleagues and myself—the men and women of the American Red Cross—to the Balkans. We would not have come just to feed people, commendable as that purpose alone would be. We came because we want to see the world left better as a result of the war. Nowhere in Europe is there more need for social reconstruction than in the Balkans, and nowhere in the world will such solid reconstruction do more to make it possible for the world to live permanently at peace with itself. We came to the Balkans to do more than distribute flour and flannel. To the best of our ability, whatever it may be, we want to help these people help themselves. We want to help them lay the foundations for a better civilization.”

The Red Cross is supported by the voluntary contributions of forty million Americans. Could any man or woman ask that a small part of his contribution be devoted to a better cause than helping to “lay the foundations for a better civilization” among a group of little nations whose jealousies and conflicting ambitions have long been a menace to the peace of the world?

Constantinople, July 12, 1919.

II—THE AMERICAN FORCES IN GERMANY

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE BY ELBERT F. BALDWIN

THE Rhinelanders seem to have been quite satisfied with the American temporary occupation of the Coblenz area.

In the first place, they have thought that we, in particular, would not stay long.

Second, they like us, anyway, better than they do the British to the north or the French to the south, and a fundamental reason for this is that our dough-boys have been friendlier with their children than is the Tommy or the poilu. Everywhere you will see our boys throwing ball with an admiring crowd of Kinder watching.

Third, we have brought more money into the area than have the British or the French into theirs.

Fourth, we have actually looked out for their labor conditions. Last January, so Colonel Williams told me, there were over four thousand Germans out of work in the area. By April 1 more than fifty thousand Boche soldiers returned to the area, and an official statement for April 7 showed but 485 unemployed. We have thus been helping Germany to pay her indemnity.

Lastly, the Rhinelanders wish that we might stay till the crack o' doom, if only we would continue to protect them from the Bolshevik. Rhinelanders need to go no farther than right around the corner in Frankfort to see what Bolshevism means.

So much for the German attitude. As to the American forces in Germany (there are still thousands of men there and must be), our boys feel that they have been detained too long. One of them showed me this doggerel:

“Darling, I am coming back—
Silver threads among the black.

Now that peace in Europe nears,
I'll be home in seven years.
I'll drop in on you some night
With my whiskers long and white.
Yes, the war is over, dear,
And we're going home, I hear,
Home again—with you once more—
Say, by 1924.”

Three things have made the men chafe at their detention.

The first was because they—veterans, those who had seen the longest and severest fighting—were kept in Germany, while many youths with but a few months' service, and that not in the front, had been sent back home and hailed as heroes—and veterans! It was not fair, the real veterans protested.

Again, despite daily drills, our boys were getting soft. “War kept us hard as nails," one of them said to me. "Why, just a little hike would knock out some of us now."

But chiefly the men chafed at a detention which did not permit them to associate more naturally with the people. They specially liked the Fräuleins.

Certainly, the Rhinelander seems a different being from the hard, metallic, more brutal Junker Boche.

The Rhinelander appeals, in the first place, by not apparently asking such high prices as the French did for the supplies our men buy. I talked with many officers and doughboys about this, and in every case they called the French "frogs" and "skinflints." The Frenchman has to charge every one dear. France is practically bankrupt. She awaits with vital solicitude the initial payment of German indemnity.

If the Rhinelander's first appeal was to the doughboy's pocketbook, his second appeal was, curious as it may appear, because of the greater cleanliness of his beds and houses and towns over those of the French. And why not? Why should there not be superior cleanliness in a country which has not been made filthy by four and a half years of war? The doughboy, suffering from much mud and many "cooties," appreciated this.

The Rhinelander's third and subtlest appeal lay in many little attentions in the houses where our men were billeted. They found their shoes shined, their clothes brushed, their linen washed, without charge. Then there is the access to hard cash. The other day a lad who came on a three-day leave to Paris said: "What do you think, Mister? Why, when Dutchy where I'm billeted heard I was going to Paris on leave, what'd he do, by gad, but whip out a twenty-mark shine, and says he to me, says he, 'Bitty'—that means 'Please take it.' He didn't mean to lend it. He just ger it. Catch any frog doin' that!" "But don't they lend you money, too?" I inquired.

He replied, "Of course. Every feller's borrowed off 'm."

How much of all this is propaganda, how much is genuine goodness?

The Y helped to reconcile the men to their detention. Yet one would bear time and time again, "The Y's no good. Give me 'Sally'" (the Salvation Army as contrasted with the Y. M. C. A.). These critics remembered "Sally's" doughnuts in the trenches and her pluck in getting them there. For the moment they forgot the immensely greater Y work behind the trenches and what it meant too in making the holding of the trench possible, what it had done in building up our men's morale and fighting fiber, because this was done when our men were off duty.

When the officers and men had much more time on their hands, they needed the Y work more than ever to keep them from demoralization—the Y huts and canteens, their temporary homes, and, more, the writing material with which to send letters to their permanent homes; they needed the games to while away the hours, the phonographs and movies and music-hall shows, the boxing bouts, and, above all, the dances, the hot chocolate and cakes.

Some wanted everything else free. One afternoon at Neuenahr I was watching the Y dances and chocolate drinking at the charming casino of that typically German watering-place. In rejoinder to my comment that "The men are having a corking time," one of those in charge remarked: "Yes, they are; but, strange as you may think it, they are the very men who will be cussing the Y when they get back home. They want everything for nothing."

I noted the prevalence and effect of the Y smile. The men got lonely. Along came a Y girl and smiled. The men smiled back. The girl said, "Hello!" In the occupied area Americans did not wait for an introduction to each other. The men said, "Hello!" Then there was an exchange of talk. The men were lonely no longer, and, as they were chivalrous too, the Y girl went her way unembarrassed.

Why, some one had thought of them! So I was not surprised to hear a by no means pious-looking person say: "B'goash, when I get home I'm goin' to join the Y. It's the concern to help the other fellow."

And some men actually "got religion." To the question of Dr. Macdonald, the Y's physician, to a group of men, "What's the greatest thing you have got out of the war?" one of them replied, quite simply: "God." And, what is more, there was no snickering by the other men.

The scores of regular religious services and Bible classes in the area were well attended, and every Sunday night in the Coblenz Festhalle, though a Y movie show and a Y boxing bout were going on at the same time, two thousand American men listened to the eloquence of Maitland Alexander, of Pittsburgh, the religious director of the area. The men had a perfect right to leave if they liked. But none left. "After the service was over, the boys would keep me answering questions all night," Dr. Alexander said to me. He was the right man in the right place.

All this was probably not without some slight effect on the Rhinelanders too. True, the Y work is for our own people. But it was right there before German eyes. Thousands of Boche soldiers had returned home. Did they have Y huts and canteens behind their trenches? Did they have the benefit of what our Y men and women were doing for our boys behind our trenches? And how about the extent of the Y work in a place like Coblenz? It swamped all the hotels, many apartment-houses, and the great Festhalle, to boot. To the Rhinelander this was an almost miraculous material scope. Yet it may not have been so impressive as in its moral and spiritual appeal—the awakening of the sluggish German to a new vision of unselfish living!

The war has made us believe that force is the only language a Boche understands. But the Rhinelander at least may have been slowly learning another.

Paris, July 15, 1919.

III—ENGLAND AT PEACE

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

Our correspondent was called to the British army from Oxford in March, 1917, after eight weeks of undergraduate life. In the autumn of 1918, while Lieutenant of Infantry, he made an extensive tour of the United States as an attaché of the British University Commission, during which journey he contributed to The Outlook (issue of January 1, 1919) a delightful paper of impressions entitled "Hands Across the Sea." He has now returned to Oxford to complete his university course.—THE EDITORS.

THE sweets are back again in the shop windows at last—not the dull, pale things which during the war filled, or tried to fill, the sad windows of the confectioners, but bright, solid sweets, bursting with sugar, and bearing the good old English names of bull's eyes, barley sugar, acid drops, and treacle-toffee.

That is an epicurean way of starting an article, perhaps, but those bright-red lollipops that I see before me as I write have a significance which it is not easy to exaggerate, for they imply peace.

Their very size bespeaks prosperity, their very color betokens joy.

And joy is the order of the day now in England. We are not a hysterical people, but we know, I think, how to be happy. England for once is beflagged; the tragic little flags which during the war one could see in every street as a symbol of a lost son have gone, and the Union Jack is everywhere. Peace Night in London was an orgy of flags. But one could not but be struck by the difference between the American and the British ways of celebrating. I was in Chicago on Armistice Night, traveling with the British Universities Mission. Perhaps the plain statement of the fact is enough to an American, but as an Englishman one was simply swept off one's feet by a hurricane of noise and jubilation that seemed to shake the city to its young feet. In London, on Peace Night, what a difference! The difference between a game of baseball, where the spectators seem in almost as much danger as the victims of an air raid, and a game of cricket, where hardly a sound is heard except the monotonous meeting of bat and ball. However, we were certainly excited, and the first impulse of London was to join its shouts of praise with those of the King. A throng of nearly a hundred thousand gathered round Buckingham Palace. The King appeared on the balcony, followed by Queen Mary, the Prince of Wales, and the rest of the royal family. We sang "God Save the King," "The Star-Spangled Banner" (it is astonishing how familiar this tune is becoming to the British), and the "Marseillaise," and then the King stepped forward, and in a voice that could be distinctly heard by the suddenly silent crowd said, "Peace has been signed, and it has been Peace with Victory. I join you all in thanking God." Chicago itself could not have beaten the cheer that rose then. It was a significant commentary on those who believe that the Crown is losing its hold on the English people.

However, there is no doubt whatever that a wave of democratic feeling that is absolutely new and vigorous is sweeping over the country. Take, for example, the universities. The Union Debating Society at Oxford is probably more representative of the opinions of the University—that is, the opinions of young England—than any other institution. Gladstone, Salisbury, Asquith, the present Lord Chancellor, have all been President of it in their time. At this Society, by large majorities, during the course of last term we acclaimed Sinn Fein, we demanded self-government for India, we called for the abolition of hereditary titles (except of course the Crown), we "deplored any departure from the principles of President Wilson in the settlement of peace." A significant record when we remember that the majority of these eager young men who so violently call for freedom and equality have been fighting for five years. It shows that they can fight in peace as well as in war.

And among the audience of voters were some of your countrymen, for the streets of Oxford are now filled with the severe but smart uniform of the American Expeditionary Force. "We are getting to love them, these Americans," said an English girl to me; "they always say what they mean." Apparently they do, for she was married to one a few days later. Yes, Oxford has a decidedly New World flavor about it just now. My window looks out upon the Sheldonian Theater, the beautiful old round building which sheltered Charles I and his illegal Parliaments during the Civil War in 1645, and last week I watched the granting of degrees to some of the most distinguished men that Oxford has ever welcomed. It was a motley procession—first the Chancellor in his brightly colored robes, then a group of dons, and then Joffre, Pershing, Haig, and the First Sea Lord, followed by others hardly less distinguished. The velvet cap and long black gown looked strange clinging to the khaki of the American General, and as he walked slowly down the broad old street which has seen martyrs burned at the stake and has echoed to the sounds of the Cavaliers as they rode out to fight and die for the cause of their King against Cromwell and the yeomen of England, he must have been, I think, a little impressed, for he was a symbol in that greatest of all political or international ideals—an English-speaking fellowship.

And it is this which is really the main theme of this article. As I write, and look from my window on to the gray old walls of that greatest of all university libraries, the Bodleian, a troop of American soldiers come out of one of the colleges across the quadrangle and go slowly through the old arches out of sight. I hope they were not feeling homesick. I do not think they were. After all, is not all England jazzing? Can we not all speak your slang? London, too, can show, apart from three American comedies on its stage, John Drinkwater's play, "Abraham Lincoln"—perhaps the most successful serious play since the war.

It is everywhere, this feeling, from the new ice-cream shops that are springing up like little white islands in the darkness of Cheapside and the Strand to the new Anglo-American Club at Oxford. And the University again, I suppose, furnishes the most significant example, for here is a place where we can see the American's point of view—a large and ever-increasing club where we can read The Outlook, and "Life," and the Philadelphia "Public Ledger," and all the rest of them. It is a refreshing and an inspiring experience, and one that is sorely needed. Peace has brought England a crop of new papers, one of the most significant of which, in view of the democratic spirit which I have indicated, is the "Daily Herald," a paper with a large and increasing circulation devoted entirely to the interests of labor. Labor papers are becoming more and more influential with the growth of the Labor party, which bids fair to swamp all other parties over here at present, and the most interesting political speculations are being raised as to whether Mr. Lloyd George is definitely about to ally himself with the Labor party. It would appear distinctly probable.

But, apart from serious papers, Captain Bruce Bairnsfather, creator of Old Bill and "The Better 'Ole," has decorated London with posters for a new paper called "Fragments," edited by himself, in which his unique sense of humor will have full play. The war has given us many disagreeable things, but we may count the creation of Old Bill, whose popularity in America is almost as great as in England, among the good things which the war has produced, and it is a joy to think that this man, who has made England laugh in the darkest hours, will continue his jests week by week, and will laugh us back to peace.

Yes, we are laughing, and we are dancing—dancing from morning to night. "Ah! jamais les amants ne sont las de jaser," said Molière, and, just as it is safe to say that "Lovers never weary of gayety," so it is probably also safe to say that before men sang, before they painted their crudely beautiful pictures on the walls of the cave, before they carved their rough images from the rock, they danced. The first impulse we have when we hear wonderful music or when we see wonderful things is to express ourselves in rhythm. And so, under the stress of a great emotion, we are dancing once more. Blood has stopped flowing, the skies are clear again, London dances. This dancing mania is a psychological phenomenon which is universal after war. We saw it in the crowds of sansculottes who reveled in the Champ de Mars in the French Revolution, in Paris again after the Franco-Prussian War, in Vienna when the Allies were dealing the final blows to the crazy Empire of the Hapsburgs. But we are dancing for joy, and it is worthy of note that we are dancing, not the Viennese waltz, but the jazz. "The Blue Danube" has dried up forever, and "K-K-K-Katy" wanders triumphant along its banks.

And what of the future? Will England, when she has settled down once more to peace, when the swords have indeed been beaten into plowshares, will she regain her former prosperity and contribute to the advancement of civilization in as great a degree in the future as she has done in the past? There seems little reason to doubt it. That we have grim times to face we cannot deny. Economic complications are already thick upon us. Coal, which has suddenly been advanced in price by six shillings a ton, threatens to disorganize our whole industrial system. Cheap labor from Germany and the incredible resourcefulness and patience of the German nation form a factor in the world of commerce whose importance it would be difficult to overestimate. We are wavering between our cherished free trade and a system of Imperial preference. We shall not waver long. Free trade has left England in an infinitely superior economic position to any other of the European Allies after the war, and it is because the Empire has no need of such slight artificial bonds as Imperial preference that free trade will stay, for the Empire stands firm.

That Empire will soon no longer see in its center the throngs of American soldiers whom we have almost come to regard as part of ourselves. As I write, on Peace Day, General Pershing is even now marching through London at the head of the armies of the Allies. It is for the last time. Soon they will have gone. They came over in ships that were glaringly camouflaged in scarlet, yellow, and blue to outwit an arrogant enemy. They came over to strange lands, to face death and to find life. They will go back in ships that are brightly painted once more, with the cheers of London ringing in their ears. But if they take away from our little country the same love of England that I did of America as I watched the Statue of Liberty fade slowly away on the dim horizon, we will be well content.

BEVERLEY NICHOLS.

Balliol College, Oxford, July 24, 1919.

SPRUCE UP!

WHAT A SOLDIER DID FOR HIS HOME TOWN

BY ELIZABETH RENEHAN

THE day that Larry Gill enlisted in the Army of the United States—May 28, 1917, to be exact—the last thing he thought about was his home. It occurred to him to be a little sorry for his mother's possible loneliness and a little glad because of his father's certain pride, but beyond these things he didn't dwell on the matter. Larry was hardly an introspective youth.

It wasn't until he'd been in camp a week and had got so used to his khaki that he no longer felt conspicuous in it that he gave his first definite conscious thought to the place he'd called home all his life. Half a dozen rookies were discussing a companion who was reported to be phenomenally rich.

"Hear he's got a half-million-dollar house at Newport and a regular palace on Fifth Avenue," somebody vouchsafed.

"Maybe that's not the way to do it!" commented a second.

But Larry said nothing. This discussing of another man's manner of living had made him think of his own, and for upwards of two minutes Larry Gill, of Iowa, gave his undivided attention to recalling a "homey" little house, white-painted, green-shuttered, immaculate, in the center of a half-acre of smooth lawn with the dazzlingly white picket fence inclosing it. Larry had no doubts about the "dazzling whiteness"—since the tender age of ten it had been his especial job to produce that virgin hue each spring. It was white, all right.

Whereupon it struck Larry that he'd rather like to be at it again—whitewash pall and all.

"Oh, well," he reflected, with naïve American modesty, "Fritz can't last much longer, now we're in. Dare say I'll be back on the old job this time next year."

After that it got to be a sort of habit to picture the snug little house in Iowa. When he went to movies in the recreation huts, he found himself comparing houses with what he mentally termed "our place."

Going over on the transport he was amazed at the amount of his thoughts the little white house occupied. Somehow, he usually fell asleep thinking of it, and on the two occasions when submarines had been sighted a very clear picture of "our place" had flashed before his eyes. Sentimental? Not he—a fellow just naturally has to think about his home when he's away from it, doesn't he? Well, then!

They were going "over the top" for the first time.

After months of training and expectation they were fighting men. It was the zero hour. Everybody was tense. Everybody tried valiantly not to look the part. As they waited for the whistle blast that would send them scrambling up and out into No Man's Land toward the Boche lines every man Jack did his utmost to assume a "this-is-my-regular-job" manner. Larry prided himself that he was getting away with it fairly well when somebody—a scrubby little chap from North Carolina who had got married the day before he sailed—whispered in a slow drawl:

"Wondah if my wife's thinkin' about me? I reckon she's asleep at this ungodly hour."

Larry very much wanted to step on the North Carolinian. Just when you're trying to keep steady to have a chap go and get your ideas all muddled up that way! Because instantly there came to him the vision of a white house in the middle of a green lawn, with green shutters on the lower floor all closed and fastened—his father always attended to that every night the last thing. Presently his mother would come down after the sun got up and put on the coffee-pot and fry some of the fresh eggs she had gathered the night before—Larry had always gathered them when he was at home.

He could smell the coffee, could see the bright "tapestry paper" and flowered chintz curtains of the dining-room, where presently his father would enter just as his mother was bringing in the bacon and eggs and her own superior brand of yeast-powder biscuits.

Gee, this was a beastly hole! When would he get back to that—

The thin, sharp blast of a whistle pierced the quiet and Larry never finished the speculation. Days afterwards they told him about the great advance that had been made and the number of prisoners taken. It was three months before he got out of hospital. Larry thought about a great many things during those months; quite surprising things that had never before intruded themselves upon his consciousness.

"A penny for your thoughts," a busy nurse paused long enough to throw at him once when she noticed the thoughtful, far-away look in the boy's eyes.

Larry laughed sheepishly.

"I don't exactly know," he said, self-consciously. "A fellow thinks about such an awful lot when he can't do anything else. Guess I just lie here and sort of picture the things around home as much as anything else."

"Keep it up," she said over her shoulder as she hurried down between the long rows of cots. "It'll help a lot. It's one of the things that keeps you going, you know—remembering that you've got a home in the States to go back to."

When finally he was back in the trenches again the home picture came to him stronger than ever. Somehow Larry couldn't lose it. That girl in the hospital had been right; remembering was one of the things that kept a fellow going—remembering every little detail that you had been familiar with forever, without knowing that you noticed it until you got away and looked back. Gee, wouldn't there be a "whooping-up" time [the day a certain member of the A. E. F. hit a certain small town in the northern part of Iowa!]

After the armistice there was no checking Larry's imagination. Home was a certainty now. Not that Larry had a grouch on France.

"I've got no kick," was the way he summed up his overseas experience.

Still, America was America, and home was about the best little thing on the map these days.

Coming back on the transport there were all kinds of time to figure exactly how he'd find everything. If there was an early spring, the trees would just be budding; perhaps the peach trees in front of the house would be out. He hoped so—the white walls of the house with the red tin roof and the dark-green of the shutters looked pretty nifty when seen through the soft, feathery blossoms!

After he had got his discharge and had had the little red chevron sewed midway between shoulder and elbow on his left coat sleeve, proclaiming him again a free agent, he had exactly two hours to catch the next west-bound train.

At first it was so good just to be there—just to sit in a decent American car, to see a grinning porter, to watch the whirring blur of young green made by the Jersey fields—that he did not try to think. It was enough to be there; back home in God's country!

But after an hour his keen eye, accustomed to observing strange landscapes and practiced now in quick appraisal, began to pick out distinguishing features here and there. How shabby that house was with the lilac bushes in front! Nice little place, too—pity the people who owned it didn't take a little more interest. One coat of paint would make a different place of it. Catch his father letting a house run down like that!

Then there was the matter of fences. What an uncommon lot of them needed looking after—broken, out of repair, unkempt, they did little credit to the farmers whose land they marked off.

By this time it was beginning to dawn on Larry that things were looking rather down at the heel generally. There was a lack of spruceness that was out of the picture—the typical American picture that he had been carrying around with him for twenty months in a foreign land.

He turned to a middle-aged man sitting opposite.

"Do I imagine it," he asked, "or do all the barns around here need painting?"

The man grinned.

"Doesn't take imagination to think a place like that wants paint," he answered, pointing to a group of outbuildings—barn, granary, chicken-house, wagonshed—that they whisked past. "I dare

CURRENT EVENTS ILLUSTRATED

(C) Western Newspaper Union

LONDON'S GREAT VICTORY CELEBRATION

American troops are seen marching across Westminster Bridge, approaching the Houses of Parliament, in the recent great procession which signalized the coming of peace

(C) Press Illustrating Service

POTSDAM'S AUCTION OF THE KAISER'S HORSES

The downfall of Kaiserism is effectively illustrated in this view of the recent sale by auction of the favorite horses of the Imperial stables at Potsdam. The horse shown in the photograph is said to have been one of the Kaiser's favorite saddle horses

VICTORS AND VANQUISHED — SIGNIFICANT SCENES IN ENGLAND AND GERMANY

THE CITY OF MONTDIDIER,
FROM A WIN-DOW IN THE MAYOR'S OFFICE

This building, with one exception, is the only one left standing in the city

ON THE RIVER
MARNE, MIDWAY BETWEEN PARIS AND
THE SCENE
OF THE GREAT BATTLE OF
THE MARNE

A SOLDIER'S PICTURES OF WAR AND PEACE IN FRANCE

These two remarkable photographs were made by Arthur D. Chapman, of New York, late Master Signal Electrician, U. S. Signal Corps say, young man, a good deal of the map of Europe has been changed since those buildings were painted last. We've been fighting the war over here, you know, too," and he glanced at Larry's overseas equipment.

"Over here?" repeated the returned Larry, mystified.

"Surest thing you know," said the man. "We haven't painted because the Government needed paint and labor for ships. We haven't builded because the Government needed building materials and carpenters and plasterers and plumbers. We've worn our old clothes because wool was needed for uniforms, and we've taken money that we'd ordinarily spend on the upkeep of our property to buy bonds and Thrift Stamps. You bet, we're shabby! It doesn't take you chaps to discover it. We know it."

After that Larry had ample food for thought. It was all clear enough once it had been put up to him, though it wouldn't have occurred to him in exactly that light if his fellow-passenger hadn't started the train of thought.

Of course that was it—shabby! Here he'd been away for upwards of two years, seeing a land laid waste by the devastating hand of war, and it had not occurred to him that another devastating hand, commonly called wear and tear, had been at work in his own country.

Larry was perplexed. It was right that the country should have saved and sacrificed for its Army. It was right that the people at home should have fought in their way to back the men in khaki who fought otherwise. He was proud of the honestly won shabbiness, and yet—well, should a great Nation in the flush of a great victory be shabby?

His reverie was broken in upon by the slowing down of the train and the groaning of brakes. With a start he came to.

He was home.

He jumped to the platform of the familiar station and was greeted with hilarious exclamations and much back-thumping on the part of the station-master. So cordial was that individual and so absorbed was Larry that he did not notice the gaping hole in the floor of the platform until he tripped over it.

"I guess I'll have to see about fixin' that up," the station-master commented. "Couldn't do nothin' before—lumber's been so hard to get an' labor's harder. Y'see, it rotted out from the rain-spout gettin' a leak an' makin' a steady drip on it. I calc'lated to have the spout fixed right off, but, Lord bless you, there wan't a tinner left in town. Then the floor got to rottin' in consequence of the spout leakin'. If somethin' ain't done soon, I don't know what we'll do. Certainly is funny the way one thing leads to another."

When Larry swung into his own street, the shock was not so great as it might have been two days earlier had he suddenly been set down there. The trip from the East and the experience at the station had more or less prepared him.

Just as he had hoped, the peach trees in the front yard were in blossom—soft, fluffy, delicately pink. The odor of them came to him as he paused to take in the scene. But the house, through them, was not the gleaming white house of other springs. Obviously there had been no painting done since before Larry went away, and the yellowing walls, streaked with the storms of two winters, had a look of almost pathetic dilapidation. The picket fence had certainly not been white-washed since Larry himself had last performed the rites; two of the green shutters on the second floor of the house had blown down, and nobody had put them up again.

It was several hours before Larry caught his breath again. From the moment his "Hello, everybody!" had brought both his parents running to the porch there had been a constant flow of questions and answers, of exclamations and joyous nonsense.

But when supper was over the returned soldier noticed that the usually crisp curtains of the dining-room were anything but up to their old standard. They weren't exactly dirty; dragged was perhaps a better word. Looking through the open door into the parlor beyond, he saw the same neglected hangings there. His mother caught his gaze.

"The spring house-cleaning hasn't amounted to much this year," she said, half apologetically. "It is so hard to get anybody to do anything. All the girls have gone into factories since the war. I can't get anybody to help me, so a great deal is neglected. And that reminds me, Larry, I do wish you'd look up that man who used to do caning. He was drafted after you went away, but he may be back by this time, and as soon as he can come I want to have these dining-room chairs caned. Four out of the six," she went on, picking up one and displaying it to her son's gaze, "have broken through completely, and I haven't been able to get a soul in town to mend 'em. It didn't seem right to spend all that money when the country was at war and needed it for more important things. But I really must have 'em fixed now things are getting normal again."

That was the beginning. The pump-handle was wobbly and the very mischief to use—it had broken in the fall, his father explained, but it had not been replaced.

"Iron was so scarce, account of needing it for ships," the head of the house of Gill vouchsafed, "that your ma and I couldn't get anything that would fit at the hardware store and they told us they didn't expect any more in. So we just mended it up with wire and managed that way, though it's been pretty inconvenient."

When he asked about the shabbiness of the house, he was told that nobody in town had had their houses painted during the war—paint was needed for ships and camouflage, which made the price prohibitive, and painters were scarcer than hens' teeth.

That night Larry lay awake a long time and thought it all out. Just what had he come back to? He remembered the nights in the trenches and those weary, pain-racked days in hospital when he had lived on the thought of home. He remembered how he had pictured it—in all the fresh spick-and-spanness in which he had left it. Yet he was back, and nothing was as he had left it. Everything looked down and out, run to seed, depressing.

"We certainly don't look like winners," he said, again taking up the train of thought that had first occurred to him on the train. "It was right to put everything we had into the war while it lasted, but I'm hanged if it isn't time somebody got fixing up, now that the war's won. Our next job is to spruce up—that's it, spruce up."

Which soliloquy was the reason why, a week later, Larry Gill made the first speech of his life.

As he had feared, they gave him a "blow-out," just as his mother had written they were doing for all the boys who came back from France. There was a "spread" in the Town Hall to which a score of the most prominent citizens lent the dignity of their presence. Larry's Croix de Guerre with palms was passed round and his arm pumped and his back slapped until he wondered if being caught in a barrage had anything on being caught in the midst of admiring friends. After the banquet a lot more people came and there was a dance under the auspices of the local auxiliary of the Red Cross.

Toward the end of the evening somebody asked for a speech. "Tell us all about it, Larry," was the general request. Whereupon the returned warrior took the bit in his teeth. He stood up on the little platform at the end of the hall where he used to recite his "piece" at school commencements.

"You don't want me to tell you about the fighting," he said, slowly. "There've been a lot of war correspondents that have done that already. I dare say you know more about it than I do. But there is something I would like to say, and I think I can tell you about it in five minutes. Most of you know about the condition already. Perhaps you know more about it than I do, but you've got used to it gradually, while I, coming back suddenly after a long absence, can see it better."

There was a little stir among his hearers; everybody was beginning to wonder what Larry Gill was getting at, anyhow. What did he mean by condition?

"You people who know business methods and business terms," the returned soldier went on, "know that there are three general ways to spend money. A business man spends for construction, for operation, for maintenance. Since the United States went to war there have been billions of dollars spent in construction. Shoving everything else aside, the country has spent money and produced results in a way that has made the World sit up and take notice. We have put all our money, all our energy, all our labor, into construction and operation."

We've worked like a house afire. But in the way of maintenance we have done nothing. What wasn't aimed directly at winning the war we refused to do. And we were right. While the war lasted it was our job to make every resource of the country active for victory.

"Now the war is over, but patriotism isn't. The fighting has stopped and the need for wholesale and unheard-of production is over, but that doesn't mean that our duty to our country is over. On the contrary, in winning the war our duty has been only half done. If we stop here, we are leaving ragged ends, frayed out, that ought to be finished off.

"That finishing off process," the boy in khaki went on, gathering enthusiasm as the interest of his audience grew, "that finishing-off process means keeping on with work. It means maintenance. It means the help of every man Jack of you. Your houses, your public buildings, fences, roads, and civic improvements, have been neglected in order to win the war. Now the war is over, it's just as much your duty to turn to these neglected things and put them on their feet again as it was to save and buy bonds and wear old clothes the last two years. The good old U. S. A. needs one as much as it did the other.

"I didn't know about these things when I landed in New York less than two weeks ago. I had pictured America as I left it. I pictured this town and my home as I left them. A lot of my time over here was spent in thinking about things back here. And then I came back, and found that things weren't the same. Our country hasn't been desecrated and violated and laid waste, like France and Belgium. We have no such reconstruction on face as those nations have. But our country has in some degree gone to seed, as run down at the heel, has become hopelessly shabby.

"We haven't spent a thing on maintenance more than two years, and we are paying the penalty by loss of value in property and the things we own. How are we going to make up?"

There was a moment's silence in the Town Hall and everybody looked at Larry. Perhaps nobody was so surprised as he himself at his sudden oratorical turn. He'd never made a speech before, and certainly nobody had ever accused him of the ability to do so. But now he was holding his audience without effort, and the explanation was that Larry had found out something which he wanted these other people to know, and when a man has anything on his mind that he very much believes and very much wants other people to believe, two things usually follow: first, he finds it surprisingly easy to tell about his belief, and, secondly, he finds it still more surprisingly easy to make other people listen.

Larry went on:

"We can make up for the neglect of the last two years by an after-the-war campaign that'll be just as vigorous and just as far-reaching as were any of the emergency campaigns that took place during the fighting days. Then it was our patriotic duty to save. Now it is just as much a duty to patriotism to spend. Then you didn't buy new clothes because your Government needed wool for uniforms and money for bonds. Now you should buy new clothes. Your Government's fighting men need jobs, and it is your purchase and the purchase of your next-door neighbors and the purchases of all the millions of individual men and women in the United States that supply those jobs. It is the little dribbles of trade and business that, taken together, make a great stream—the stream of National prosperity.

"If every man and woman here in this hall, and every man and woman throughout this country, would buy and spend as wisely and as carefully as they saved and invested during the war, the country would have a different look inside of three months. If you people could only see that you owe it to your country to 'spruce up' as much as you owed it to her to buy Liberty Bonds, there would be no shabbiness left, and the men who are coming out of the Army would not have to hunt for jobs. Just by seeing the situation and doing your best, each one of you, to meet it, you will do away with anything like a labor problem. If men and women everywhere will start to repair the damages that time and neglect have made in two years, there will be enough immediate work to give every returning soldier something to do—in point of fact, there will be more work than workers.

"A man on the train told me," Larry continued, "that eighty per cent of the discharged soldiers of our Army have gone back to their old jobs, which were kept waiting for them. That means that jobs are needed for twenty per cent. I should say that twenty per cent won't go awfully far if the people begin in earnest to 'spruce up.' In other words, it will be a case of 'first come, first served,' and the men and women who aren't on the job pretty soon will find a scarcity of labor, and that will mean greater deterioration of property for every added month that they are obliged to put off repairs. If you've got a hole in your roof and the rain comes through, it may cost you $20 to fix it to-day. But if you let it run another month and there is a heavy storm in the meantime, the plaster of the ceiling and the wall-paper will be affected, and that will very likely mean double the amount of money in repairs.

"Some people say materials are expensive now and labor is high, and so they'll wait until these things come down. That sounds all right; but are they counting on the fact that for every week they wait their property is getting that much shabbier and repairs will cost that much more? For instance, if it costs $300 to fix up your house to-day and you allowed it to go without repairs until next fall, your putting off would very likely add $100 to the cost of fixing it then. The cost of plumbing and painting, of wall-paper and hardware and the like, would certainly not be decreased $100 even by falling prices. Consequently, it's a lot better business to tackle the job here and now before your property runs down any more rather than put the thing off in the uncertain hope that labor and materials may be less expensive in six months or two years or any other time limit you set. The country can't afford to wait. We're winners, and winners we've got to look. And, believe me, we don't look it now."

Well, they made all kinds of a fuss over Larry after that, and everybody predicted that he was a "coming man," and that it was young fellows of his type who made towns "sit up and take notice," and what a fine thing foreign experience had been for the young generation, and so on. They said, in point of fact, all the things that small towns do say about promising young men.

Fortunately for the town, however, its inhabitants didn't take it all out in talk. Then and there, when Larry's speech ended, it was suggested that a "Spruce Up Campaign" be inaugurated and that Larry be made chairman of the Committee on Organization. This the returned hero modestly declined, and the president of the National Bank, a much more suitable incumbent for the office, was duly appointed.

It took about two weeks to get things under way. The whole town was placarded with posters in red, white, and blue ink which read, "SPRUCE UP—LOOK LIKE A WINNER." The two newspapers lent their aid and gave columns to publicity. Shopkeepers made window displays that showed you what you needed to "spruce up" with, the Merchants' Association got down to brass tacks and used all its machinery to further the campaign, and the women's clubs—there were two—united with all the war work organizations and fairly buzzed with activity.

After that it was plain sailing. The town had caught the idea, which was all that was necessary. The particular modest domicile that Larry Gill had dreamed about through training camp, in the trenches, in hospital, and on shipboard was transformed into the object of his vision and made to fit into the picture that he had painted for himself. It looked at last as he had imagined it during his army life—precisely as he left it in the spring of 1917.

Of course it all happened very lately, and for the most part the "sprucing up" in that particular Iowa town is still going on. They are, so to speak, in the throes of a long-neglected spring house-cleaning.

They are pioneers, those people, and they're practicing an exceedingly wholesome sort of patriotism. They're working for prosperity precisely as they worked for victory. Is it likely that any city or town or village or rural settlement in the United States is less interested in the Nation's achievement than is Larry Gill's town? The way they gave their men and their dollars, the way they sacrificed their time and their comforts, would not indicate it. Nor are they apt to be behind Larry's people in "sprucing up."

THE BOOK TABLE: DEVOTED TO BOOKS AND THEIR MAKERS

THE NEW ERA IN AMERICAN POETRY<sup>1</sup>

MODERN American verse is acquiring a very respectable collection of critical commentaries. One of the latest and best additions to this growing library is Mr. Louis Untermeyer's "The New Era in American Poetry." Mr. Untermeyer has achieved a volume which is scholarly without being pedantic, and vividly alive without ever sinking into superficial cleverness.

Mr. Untermeyer happens to be very much more partial towards some of the alleged new poetry than is the present reviewer, but he holds no brief for isms and cults. He is catholic in his tastes, recognizing merit in divers schools and searching diligently to understand and interpret the purpose of the authors concerning whom he writes and the standards which they themselves have set for their work. His criticism is honest and frank, frequently instructive, and almost always stimulating.

Mr. Untermeyer's volume is composed largely of a series of articles on many of the best-known figures in American poetry. Very few of these chapters are marred by either careless analysis or hasty judgment. Even his briefest comments upon those writers whom he evidently regards as the less important figures in American poetry leave the impression upon the reader's mind that he has read and carefully digested all their works. Such a statement cannot be made in regard to Professor Phelps's recent volume on a similar theme.

"The New Era in American Poetry" contains many characterizations notable both for their brevity and their exactness. Of Edwin Arlington Robinson, for instance, Mr. Untermeyer writes:

Seldom buoyant and never brash, Robinson responds to other qualities that are considered less national but are no less local. His shrewd appraisals, his careful cynicism, his reticence that screens a vigorous psychology—these are the direct results of his distinctly Puritan inheritance. The sharp epithet, the condensation, the direct and simple speech—American poetry has been given a fresh character by these things. And it owes much of their use to the careful art of Robinson.

Of a poet of different caliber and worth he shrewdly says: "Aiken cannot shake off what might be called an adolescent underworld complex." Here is a Freudian truly hoist with his own petard.

With equal skill (and more particularity, it seems, than perhaps the subject-matter is worth) Mr. Untermeyer analyzes the ultra-radicals of the passing hour. In the first paragraph of his chapter on "Others" he says:

One of the most outstanding features in the work of several of our younger poets is a consistent distortion not only of past standards but of present values. This distortion is the natural consequence of an unnatural fear of formulas, both of phrase and idea, and exaggerated horror of the accepted pattern in any of its forms. As an expression of insurrectionary youth, as a scornful contempt hurled at a literary philistinism or the capitalist system or middle-class prejudices, this revolt is the sign of a healthy and creative discontent. But when, in an attempt to avoid the cliché at any cost, it becomes incoherent in metaphors that are more delicious than daring, when it pulls any casual image to pieces or turns a vagrant and merely bright emotion into a dark study, it is likely to be a confession of its own creative failure—an admission of an inability to work and play with the material of life. One does not have the right to demand continuous high spirits from the poetically young; one does hope, however, to be saved from the blasé retrospection and weary vision of crabbed youth.

This is sound and convincing criticism, and typical of much of the incisive reasoning in which this volume is so rich. But the keenness of so many passages in this volume makes the reader turn with bewilderment to one of the statements made in regard to the poetry of Edgar Lee Masters.

After quoting many extracts from Mr. Masters's "Spoon River Anthology," Mr. Untermeyer says:

In all of these excerpts it is easy to see where the element of poetry has strengthened and vitalized the conception. More than half of their power would have vanished had these portraits been printed as prose paragraphs. Observe this last one in that form:

LOUIS UNTERMAYER, AUTHOR OF "THE NEW ERA IN AMERICAN POETRY"

He then reprints as prose one of the epitaphs from the "Spoon River Anthology" and continues:

Aside from all technical considerations, it will be seen at once that Masters's original manner of presentation was not merely an effective but the only logical one. As prose, "Jonas Keene" is nothing but a rather dull statement. As poetry, it justifies itself—not only because it sharpens the lines to the reader but because it sharpened them for Mr. Masters.

As far as the present reviewer can see, Mr. Untermeyer has here virtually declared that the element of poetry is synonymous with mere typographical arrangement. With all due respect to Mr. Untermeyer, poetry is not the product of the composing-room. The element of poetry in Will Shakespeare and Walt Mason cannot be determined by any such method as Mr. Untermeyer has apparently accepted in his judgment of Masters. The present reviewer would be very much more dissatisfied with the author of "The New Era in American Poetry" if he thought that Mr. Untermeyer really meant what his words, taken at their face value, seem to imply.

A review of this volume should not close without at least one more word of praise. Too much cannot be said for the skill which Mr. Untermeyer has shown in the generous selection of typical poems from the authors whom he discusses to illustrate the various phases of their work. He has created a critical anthology of great value.

THE NEW BOOKS

HISTORY, POLITICAL ECONOMY, AND POLITICS

Cubans of To-Day. Edited by William Belmont Parker. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Money and Prices. By J. Laurence Laughlin, Ph.D. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

New Municipal Program (A). Edited by Clinton Rogers Woodruff. (National Municipal League Series.) D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Peace Congress of Intrigue (A). (Vienna, 1815.) Compiled by Frederick Freksa. Translated by Harry Hansen. The Century Company, New York.

The roots of the late war go back to the Congress of Vienna. There it was that Prussia laid the foundation for the military domination of Germany, that Poland knocked in vain for admittance, that the German Confederacy found no recognition for liberalism, that reaction in France was strengthened, and that the Hapsburgs obtained rule over Italy. The immense contrast between the two Congresses emphasizes the difference between government by arbitrary rule or by hereditary overlords and government by the people themselves. The Congress of a century ago was dominated by Alexander of Russia, who had dreamed of a League of Nations, but who had forgotten his dream. The Congress of to-day in its outcome will, we hope, be dominated by those who cannot forget such a dream. In the ultimate analysis, however, as the author of this valuable volume points out, both Congresses are based on force, but with this difference: at Vienna force was to serve the outworn institutions of the nobility and of divine right; now force is at last in the hands of men directly representative of the people.

Prussian Political Philosophy. By Westel W. Willoughby. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

The Professor of Political Science at Johns Hopkins has been adviser to the Chinese Government, and is now about to become adviser to the Polish Government. In the present volume he contrasts American and Prussian political ideals. Here in America we regard the people as the constitutional source of all political authority; we believe in really representative government. In practice Prussia has denied such doctrines. Professor Willoughby outlines the Prussian political philosophy which defends the denial to the people of their right to control their own government and which calls on them to subordinate their individual judgments to their rulers' pronouncements. Among the many instrumentalities available to the Prussian Government for inculcating its political philosophy is the educational system, which, from the primary school to the university, is a state agency. The author emphasizes the army General Staff, which has been able to dictate state policies not only with reference to matters military but also with reference to foreign affairs. We thus see that the Government's military arm (whose only legitimate function should be to carry out the civil Government's policies) has, like Frankenstein's monster, become stronger than its creator. This valuable volume should have had an index.

<sup>1</sup>The New Era in American Poetry. By Louis Untermeyer. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

History of Religions. By George Foot Moore, D.D., LL.D., Litt.D. International Theological Library. II—Judaism, Christianity, Mohammedanism. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

At this momentous turning-point in the world's history this account of three great missionary religions competing for world dominion is both timely and valuable. Cognate in origin, each believing in a divine revelation, in the creation of all things by a divine fiat, and in a way of salvation from divine wrath toward the ungodly, each claims to be the only way. Yet such fundamental affinities are so offset by antipathies due to the individuality of each that they are mutually incompatible and hostile. Professor Moore fills up this outline by exhibiting in copious detail the historical development of each in ancient, mediæval, and modern times. The religion he describes is that of intelligent and religious men. He finds and describes the same varieties in each of the three religions—sages, saints, scientists, hostile sects, mystics, Aristotelian philosophers, liberals and conservatives, reformers and pious persecutors. To know Christianity adequately one needs to know its competitors as here described.

Reunion in Eternity. By W. Robertson Nicoll. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

In this volume by the editor of the "British Weekly" the author hardly does justice to himself in the opening chapter in saying: "Depending entirely on the teaching of the New Testament, we propose to set down a few points which are generally admitted to be part of its unveiling." In point of fact, his quotations from the New Testament are slight, his quotations from other books abundant. In his second chapter, "Immortality without God," he quotes from such skeptical writers as Swinburne, Carlyle, and Buckle. His book is not so much an argument, either Scriptural or philosophical, for personal immortality as an interpretative account, with quotations, from a great variety of thinkers of different temperaments, of a world-wide faith in a personal immortality and its almost inevitable consequence, the immortality of love and the reunion of the loved ones in another life.

World's Debate (The). By William Barry. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

This English scholar and historian opposes "Catholic England to Heathen Prussia." He pays tribute to the work of the Roman Catholic Church. Himself an ardent Catholic, but having always lived in the company of men and women whose faith differed from his, what he says concerning the Catholic point of view in this war is worth heeding. He concludes that democracy and Christianity should recognize each other as by origin and spirit of the same nature. Both in style and in method of handling his subject he is original and forceful.

FICTION

Life at Stake (A). By Marcel Berger. Translated by Fitzwater Wray. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

A war story which describes realistically and rather drearily the discomforts and unpleasing life of a French poulu who, after being wounded, is forced to serve in the "auxiliaries." The thing is well done, but hardly seems worth doing.

Shadow of the Past (The). By F. E. Mills Young. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Trail of the Beast (The). By Ahmed Abdullah. The James A. McCann Company, New York.

A detective story. The action is in Paris, and the plot after the French type of which Gaboriau was the first exponent. But the "hero" is an American "sleuth." It is an exciting, dramatic tale. But we wish the author wouldn't begin sentences with "too"—as "Too, he had an impulse," etc.

EDUCATIONAL

Colleges in War Time and After (The). By Parke Rexford Kolbe. Introduction by Philander P. Claxton. (Problems of War and Reconstruction.) Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

Education by Violence. By Henry Seidel Canby, Ph.D. The Macmillan Company, New York.

German Conspiracy in American Education (The). By Gustavus Ohlinger. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

This little volume contains interesting evidence concerning German educational propaganda in America before and during the war. The most curious circumstance revealed by the author is that some of the propagandists should actually have dreamed of cutting our National culture loose from its stem and grafting it on a German stem. Mr. Ohlinger warns against a renewal of attempts to introduce German into the grade schools. In The Outlook for February 26 mention was made of such an attempt in Missouri.

Our Winter Birds. How to Know and How to Attract Them. By Frank M. Chapman. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

WAR BOOKS

Dardanelles Campaign (The). By Henry W. Nevinson. Illustrated. Henry Holt & Co., New York.

As we have noted in connection with such books as Brand Whitlock's "Belgium" and Ambassador Morgenthau's book on Turkey, the most satisfactory treatment of the great war so far has been in separate books relating to single phases and countries rather than in general histories of the war. Mr. Nevinson's book will undoubtedly remain the most complete, probably the final, book on the British failure in the Gallipoli campaign. He speaks very frankly of the lack of sound planning, of the timorous yielding of experts who should have pointed out the dangers more positively; but he tells also of the marvelous heroism and intrepidity of the Australian and British troops who fought a losing fight on the peninsula.

Padre in France (A). By George A. Birmingham. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Canon Hannay, whose Irish tales have delighted so many readers, now, still under his pseudonym, tells of his experiences as a British chaplain in Belgium and France. Sky Fighters of France: Aerial Warfare, 1914-1918. By Lieutenant Henry Farré. Translated by Catharine Rush. Illustrated. Houghton, Mifflin Company, Boston.

This book will at once take its place as one of the handsomest books yet issued about the war. As recording the experiences of an artist, this is altogether fitting. The score or more of reproductions of the artist's paintings are matched in vividness by the accounts of air battles, mostly told in conversational style as the result of 'talks and flights with the most famous "aces" during the memorable campaigns here described.

Social Studies of the War. By Elmer T. Clark. Illustrated. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Trailing the Bolshevik. By Carl W. Ackerman. Illustrated. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Mr. Ackerman is one of the best known and forceful of war correspondents. His present book has claim to attention, first, because it is a clear presentation of the conditions as he saw them in Siberia, and, secondly, because it is full of human interest and entertaining writing. The author traveled, he tells us, some twelve thousand miles with the Allies in Siberia. He stayed long enough in Omsk to record striking experiences with the refugees from Bolshevik cruelty and oppression who had been passing through that city literally by the millions.

Vagabonds of the Sea. The Campaign of a French Cruiser. By René Milan. Translated by Randolph Bourne. E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

Victory Over Blindness. How It Was Won by the Men of St. Dunstan's and How Others May Win It. By Sir Arthur Pearson, Bart., G. B. E. Illustrated. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Stories of Great Adventures. (Adapted from the Classics.) By Carolyn Sherwin Bailey. Illustrated. For the Children's Hour Series. The Milton Bradley Company, Springfield.

Woodcraft Boys at Sunset Island. By Lillian Elizabeth Roy and M. F. Hoisington. Illustrated. The George H. Doran Company, New York.

POETRY

By the Banks of Stillwater. By Paul Shivel. Vol. I. The Stillwater Press, Dayton, Ohio.

There is an appealing simplicity about all of Mr. Shivel's poetry which inclines his critics and his readers to overlook his many technical limitations. Crude and uneven in form though they frequently are, many of his poems attain to a dignity of spirit and outlook which is not often found. His attitude towards his art and his manner of speaking are well described and illustrated in the first stanza of his "Summer and Submission," included in the present volume:

"Content to serve with my fellows,
One of an infinite throng,
I have not denied my soul the joy
Of fellowship in song,
But finding men preoccupied,
Have waited and labor'd apart,
In ignorance, but with gratitude
And the peace of God in my heart."

Mr. Shivel is a Wordsworthian both in his virtues and his defects. As Edwin Arlington Robinson has succinctly put it:

"Some of Wordsworth lumbers like a raft," and so does much of "By the Banks of Stillwater." But through halting lines and unpoetic phrases there shows the portrait of a devout and courageous spirit, content with life and rejoicing in all its labors. We wish that "By the Banks of Stillwater" had been edited as critically as the author's previous slender volume in Houghton Mifflin's "New Poetry Series." Perhaps, however, had this volume passed through such a winnowing it would have failed to present as complete and satisfying a picture of the man whose life it represents.

"By the Banks of Stillwater" is the first of a series of three volumes, of which two are yet to appear. It is interesting to note that Mr. Shivel is his own typesetter and publisher. Typographically his volume is eminently well done.

WEEKLY OUTLINE STUDY OF CURRENT HISTORY

BY J. MADISON GATHANY, A.M.

HEAD OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY AND AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP IN
THE SCARBOROUGH SCHOOL, SCARBOROUGH-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK

Based on The Outlook of August 20, 1919

Each week an Outline Study of Current History based on the preceding number of The Outlook will be printed for the benefit of current events classes, debating clubs, teachers of history and of English, and the like, and for use in the home and by such individual readers as may desire suggestions in the serious study of current history.—THE EDITORS.

[Those who are using the weekly outline should not attempt to cover the whole of an outline in any one lesson or study. Assign for one lesson selected questions, one or two propositions for discussion, and only such words as are found in the material assigned. Or distribute selected questions among different members of the class or group and have them report their findings to all when assembled. Then have all discuss the questions together.]

I—INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Topic: Shantung.

Reference: Pages 601–604.

Questions:

1. What is the story of Shantung as outlined by Mrs. Wright? 2. What, too, are some of China's objections to the Shantung arrangement as Mrs. Wright sees them? 3. Make as many comparisons as you can between the question of Shantung and that of Alsace-Lorraine. Give reasons for agreeing or disagreeing with Mrs. Wright's attitude on these questions. 4. What reasons does Mr. Wheeler give for upholding the decision of the Peace Conference about Shantung? 5. Which of these writers, in your opinion, has presented the Shantung question more convincingly? Reasons. 6. State and discuss your personal belief as to whether the Peace Conference should have given Japan a foothold in China. 7. The main fact is that Japan has been granted certain rights in China. How do you think this whole matter could be finally settled with as little national prejudice and hatred as possible? 8. What have you learned from Mrs. Wright and Mr. Wheeler about Japan and China and the people of these countries? 9. State and discuss four propositions found in or suggested by these articles. 10. Talk for five minutes on "The Future of Japan." 11. Two very valuable books to read on the Far Eastern situation are "The Far East Unveiled," by Fred-eric Coleman (Houghton Mifflin), and "The Mastery of the Far East," by A. J. Brown (Scribners).

II—NATIONAL AFFAIRS

A. Topic: Labor Troubles; The B. R. T. Strike; The Shopmen's Strike; President Wilson and the Shopmen; Strikes.

Reference: Pages 593, 594; 597–599.

Questions:

1. Make a summary of the causes of labor troubles as found in these references and list the results indicated. 2. Name the essential industries of our country. Would you favor a law making strikes in these industries a criminal offense? Discuss at length. 3. Explain the seriousness and the significance of "any action which brings the authority of authorized representatives into question or discredits it." Illustrate fully. 4. Make clear just what is meant by the factory system. Discuss its advantages. Has it any disadvantages? If so, name them. Do you think people generally would be more contented had it never been introduced? Reasons. 5. Some think trade unions and labor organizations are an industrial curse. What is your opinion of them? State your reasons. 6. Discuss the attitude you believe business corporations and private business men should hold toward wage-workers. 7. If you owned a business, would you be willing to share the profits with your employees and grant them a voice in the management of your business? Explain why or why not. 8. Write an editorial of about three hundred words on the relation of work and thrift and the present industrial situation. 9. Two suggestive books are "Democracy in Reconstruction," by Schafer and Cleveland (Houghton Mifflin), and "Industry and Trade," by Bishop and Keller (Ginn).

B. Topic: Andrew Carnegie—Wealth-Maker, Knower of Men, Wealth-Giver.

Reference: Pages 596, 597.

Questions:

1. Give all the facts you can about the life and deeds of Andrew Carnegie. 2. How do you account for his success? Which had more to do with his success, Mr. Carnegie's personal qualifications or the industrial and social conditions of his time? Give reasons for your opinion. 3. Mr. Carnegie believed it a disgrace to die rich. Discuss whether it would be a good thing for America if the inheritance privilege should be entirely abolished. What are some of its evils? 4. James Russell Lowell believed that democracy was a form of society in which a man could climb "from a coal pit to the highest position for which he is fitted." Is the United States such a democracy? Discuss and illustrate. 5. What lessons do you see in the life of Andrew Carnegie?

C. Topic: Radicalism in the Making.

Reference: Pages 599, 600.

Questions:

1. What does Professor Davenport mean by "the movement towards agrarian radicalism" in the Northwest? How does he account for it? 2. Explain the trend of things that lead Senator Davenport to conclude that "there is need of a party of constructive liberalism." Do we need a new political party?

III—PROPOSITIONS FOR DISCUSSION

(These propositions are suggested directly or indirectly by the subject-matter of The Outlook, but not discussed in it.)

1. Labor is never an economist. 2. The law of supply and demand is a thing of the past. 3. The workman should be considered a machine.

IV—VOCABULARY BUILDING

(All of the following words and expressions are found in The Outlook for August 20, 1919. Both before and after looking them up in the dictionary or elsewhere, give their meaning in your own words. The figures in parentheses refer to pages on which the words may be found.)

Venire, astute, virus, obtuse (600).

Copyright by Clinedinst, Wash.

ROOSEVELT'S OWN LETTERS

The diplomacy of those great days in the White House, where skill and humor are mirrored now at last in this greatest of all magazine features in the SEPTEMBER SCRIBNER'S.

From 150,000 letters written by Roosevelt while he was President, Mr. Joseph Bucklin Bishop, who worked with Mr. Roosevelt over his plans for a biography, has woven the story that sums up our national life over that period. No such letters ever were written before, and no such story has ever been possible.

Read Theodore Roosevelt's Own Letters in the

SEPTEMBER SCRIBNER'S

Don't Miss Them. Mail this Coupon Now

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE, 507 Fifth Ave., New York City
Gentlemen:

I enclose $4.00. Send SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE for twelve months, beginning with the..... issue, to

Name.....

Address.....

.....Digitized by Google.....

Shakespeare's "Seven Ages of Man"

pay tribute to

HORLICK'S The Original Malted Milk

From across every sea and land have come thousands of grateful letters (a few are reproduced in opposite column) to the Horlick offices, paying tribute to Horlick's Malted Milk. Mothers of contented babies, soldiers after a campaign, explorers back from the ice fields, high tension business and professional workers, invalids and the aged—all tell of the different needs that "Horlick's" has satisfied.

"Horlick's" has proved itself to be an excellent food for every age of Shakespeare's "Seven." It is so complete in itself as to contain every element of nutrition necessary to sustain life—even of the most robust—and yet it is perfectly digestible by the delicate stomach of the infant and the invalid.

The Original Round Package for over a third of a century

Avoid Imitations and Substitutes

1st

"First the infant in the nurse's arms"

"Words fail to express how grateful I am to Horlick's Malted Milk. My babe was given up; it was said she would not live through the night. But the next morning it still lived, and while we anxiously watched it, a neighbor persuaded us to try 'Horlick's.' It was like putting oil on the wick of a dying lamp; she improved rapidly, and is now the joy of the house"

2d

"Then the school boy with his shining morning face"

"I raised five children on 'Horlick's,' and they all love it still. It can't be beat as a nutritious lunch between meals for a growing boy or girl"

3d

"Then the soldier seeking reputation at the cannon's mouth"

"Clara Barton of the Red Cross in her stories of the Spanish American War tells how Colonel Roosevelt asked the Red Cross to sell him some supplies for some sick men in his regiment, but she declined. 'We cannot sell them, but you can have them for asking.' 'Oh, then I do ask for them'—'All right, what is on your list?' The list was Horlick's Malted Milk, etc. Colonel Roosevelt slung the heavy sack over his shoulder, and trudged off through the jungle"

4th

"And then the lover with his ballad"

"Horlick's growth as a fountain favorite has been marvelous. A constant stream of young couples in the afternoon and evening call for Horlick's Malted Milk, chocolate or plain. 'Horlick's' is a favorite lunch hour drink around universities with the students. A glass making a meal, they find it very economical and healthful"

5th

"And then the justice full of wise saws"

"When I need an invigorator as the result of my work I drink a cup of 'Horlick's.' I have used it constantly for several years, and find it cannot be beat for weak stomach, as a diet. In fact, it is all that is claimed for it"

6th

"The sixth age with spectacles on nose"

"I am 50 years old, and consider it a fortunate day when a friend induced me to try a cup of Horlick's Malted Milk. I used it with benefit and pleasure two or three times a day. It is delicious and has done me a world of good"

7th

"Last scene of all that ends this eventful history"

"I could not do without it. It surely is a sleep producer and I am a nervous person, but Horlick's Malted Milk has helped me greatly. I have learned by experience that 'Horlick's' is as excellent for well people as for invalids"

Trial sample mailed upon request

HORLICK'S MALTED MILK CO., Racine, Wis., U. S. A.

McCutcheon's Fall and Winter Catalogue is ready

Thirty-two pages of the very best values to be found at "The Linen Store," selected with care from our comprehensive stocks.

Reg. Trade-Mark

The McCutcheon illustrated Fall and Winter Catalogue will delight the hearts of shoppers.

There are eight pages of Pure Linen Handkerchiefs.

There are six pages of attractive, moderate-priced Table Linens, including McCutcheon Damask Linens and beautiful Fancy Linens.

There are three pages of Household Linens of well-known McCutcheon quality at outstandingly moderate prices.

Then there are pages of new Neckwear, Sweaters, Lingerie, Negligees, Knit Underwear, Corsets, Hosiery and Children's Underwear, Dresses and Suits.

And, finally, a page of selected Haberdashery for men of discriminating tastes.

Send for this new catalogue and let it solve your shopping problems. Mailed free on request.

James McCutcheon & Co.
Fifth Avenue, 34th and 33d Sts., N. Y.

There are 3 ways of getting The Outlook

One is to drop over every Wednesday evening to the home of some friend who subscribes for it.

One is to buy it at the newsdealer's every week for 10 cents a copy.

The other is to send $4 for a year's subscription to

The Outlook Company
381 Fourth Avenue, New York

"MARE NOSTRUM"

The publication recently in The Outlook of "The Hermit of Amerongen," by Blasco-Ibáñez, has suggested to me the propriety of some further notice of the distinguished Spanish author, in view of the fact that an English translation of his latest novel, "Mare Nostrum," is just appearing from the press.

The publication in America, last year, of the excellent translation by Mrs. Charlotte Brewster Jordan of the Spanish novel of Vicente Blasco-Ibáñez, entitled "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," is a curious illustration of the sudden leap into popularity which sometimes comes to a writer previously unknown in a foreign country, although widely known in his own. "I awoke one morning and found myself famous," said the author of "Childe Harold"—and Blasco-Ibáñez might well have said the same of his phenomenal success with American readers. For at the time of the publication of "The Four Horsemen" in this country he had already written many novels and was widely known and celebrated, not merely in Spain, but also throughout Europe; but, though many of his earlier works had already appeared here and in England, their translation seems to have attracted so little attention that it is safe to say that the author was practically unknown in this country until rediscovered by the translator of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse." Very suddenly came the phenomenal success which has made the name of the author and his scholarly translator known throughout the land. This success has led the reading public to look with eagerness for the appearance of the author's latest work, "Mare Nostrum" (Our Sea), just published in an English translation, which keeps up the standard set in the earlier companion work.

"Mare Nostrum," like "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," has to do with the great world war which has just come to a close, but it deals with a different phase. In the other story the scene is on the land—in Argentina and on the great battlefield of the Marne. The new novel is concerned with the submarine activities of the Germans in the Mediterranean Sea, and at the same time with their elaborately organized spy system, in which feminine wiles play a prominent part—so much so that one is constantly reminded while following their criminal complications and intrigues of the French dictum, "Cherchez la femme."

But, apart from the interest of the story, with its incidents of plot and many scenes of thrilling adventure, there is much interest attaching to its framework and varied background. There are many vivid character portraits, many charming pictures of sea life with delightful presentation of the mythological divinities of the ocean; and not merely these, but also elaborate excursions among what I may call the fauna and flora that haunt its mysterious depths.

As regards the translation of his work into a foreign language, a great author must naturally feel some concern. A good English translation is not the easy work that some suppose it to be. Any tyro may dig out some kind of version by plodding over grammar and dictionary. But an author has a right to something more than a bald, literal, wooden translation. Each language has its own peculiar idioms which call for the highest skill in their rendition into another tongue.

Having read "The Four Horsemen" in

"Mare Nostrum" (Continued)
the original Spanish, carefully comparing original and translation, I have found these excellences so abundantly displayed in the countless felicities of the translation that it is a real satisfaction to learn that the authorized translation of "Mare Nostrum" has been intrusted to one who has already shown herself so competent to handle sympathetically the difficult Spanish originals of Vicente Blasco-Ibáñez.
WILLIAM HYDE APPLETON.
Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS
AND THE SENATE

I
If the writer doesn't always agree with The Outlook, he always finds it honest in the expression of its views.
Now I hope it is worth while to say, in these important hours our country is living through, that I think your editorial "The League of Nations in the Senate" is the fairest, most honest, candid, sincere, non-partisan, statesmanlike, patriotic, man-to-man talk on the subject I have read or heard.
I wish every American would read it.
Cleveland, Ohio. G. C. GRIFFITH.

II
I have just read your editorial on "The League of Nations in the Senate." Your argument has not convinced me that the Senate should ratify the present Covenant so far as we know it. Self-preservation is the first law of nature, and the preservation of our free institutions, our sovereignty, and our Monroe Doctrine is the first duty of our Senate—their sworn duty. It is true that our President has deserted the White House for six months and devoted his time to making a new map of Europe and weaving a Peace Treaty and League of Nations, which he will urge the Senate to ratify. The President's conduct in joining the Big Four in Paris at the Peace Conference and taking an active part in fixing the boundaries of the European nations is contrary to the principle of the Monroe Doctrine, and will tend to undermine this important principle of our foreign policy if our Senate ratifies his action. It is therefore important, at this critical time, that our Senate should show European nations that we will not support our President when he violates the Monroe Doctrine. The duty of the Senate is to keep within their Constitutional power, and to refuse to follow the President when he urges them to ratify a League made by and for Europe.
I hope our Senators will be wise enough at this time to do no more than ratify a treaty of peace with Germany.

JOHN E. KUHN.
Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

Don't Wear a Truss

Brooks' Appliance, the modern scientific invention, the wonderful new discovery that relieves rupture, will be sent on trial. No obnoxious springs or pads.

Brooks' Rupture Appliance

Has automatic Air Cushions. Binds and draws the broken parts together as you would a broken limb. No salves. No lies. Durable, cheap. Sent on trial to prove it. Protected by U. S. patents. Catalog and measure blanks mailed free. Send name and address today.

Brooks Appliance Co., 471D State St., Marshall, Mich.

DR. G. E. BROOKS

Wheat Bubbles

In Milk

Airy, crisp and toasted grains, puffed to eight times normal size. Flaky and flimsy—four times as porous as bread.

Never was a whole wheat made so enticing, never so digestible.

On All Fruits

Puffed Rice

Puffed Rice is fragile, flavory grains which seem to melt away at a touch. Mixed with fruit they form a delightful blend. They add what crust adds to a shortcake, or to tarts and pies.

Too many homes serve Puffed Grains for gala breakfasts only. They seem too good for every-day enjoyment. Too many housewives, after breakfast, put Puffed Grains away.

That's a great mistake. These are all-hour foods.

All food cells are exploded by Prof. Anderson's process—by shooting from guns—these grains are steam exploded. Every food cell is blasted so digestion is easy and complete.

Puffed Wheat

Puffed Rice

Corn Puffs

All Bubble Grains—Each 15c Except in Far West

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers

Digitized by Google

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT

The Financial Department is prepared to furnish information regarding standard investment securities, but cannot undertake to advise the purchase of any specific security. It will give to inquirers facts of record or information resulting from expert investigation, and a nominal charge of one dollar per inquiry will be made for this special service. All letters of inquiry should be addressed to THE OUTLOOK FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York.

COMMENT ON CURRENT FINANCIAL TOPICS

THE "HAPPY VALLEY" RAILWAY CORPORATION

SIX per cent is certainly a fair return on an investment, properly secured, so the investor should be contented; fair rates are all the shipper of commodities can ask for, so there is no argument there. Increased wages to all operators and finally an equal division of any surplus, after charges, with the lenders of capital, or with the public using the roads, sounds agreeable to those most concerned. With all further questions of differences eliminated and every one working in harmony, there would be Utopia, but probably the plan is too fabulous and visionary to be operative and practical.

However, we notice that commissions which shall "act as boards of conciliation" to settle wage disputes are of the first essentials, and a corporation created to direct and operate all railways as a single system in an emergency must be formed at once, for it must be ready at all times to give expert advice to the sub-commissions and possess full powers over an equitable allocation of equipment and be able to continue such methods as have been found successful under Government control and to discard all forms and manners out of date, which it alone will be able to determine.

This plan does away with Government ownership of railways which would have increased the public debt enormously, but still places the roads under Federal control and supervision. The problem seems to be solved. It is only a matter of much detail to put the plan into execution, and this should not take over

25,000 Investors Have Never Lost a Dollar

THESE are the investors who have purchased first mortgage bonds, safeguarded under the Straus Plan. Every bondholder has always been paid in cash on the day due, principal as well as interest, without loss or delay.

The number of these investors is growing by thousands each year, as more and more bond-buyers learn of the merits of the Straus Plan, and our clients tell their friends what satisfactory investments these bonds are.

Every investor should post himself on the merits of the Straus Plan and its rigorous, just safeguards, to which are directly due the record of this House and of these bonds.

Write today for our booklet, "Safety and 6%," and for our current Investment Guide, describing a well diversified variety of sound and attractive first mortgage bonds, to net 6%, in $1,000 and $500 amounts. Ask for

Circular No. I-905

S.W. STRAUS & CO.

Established 1882

NEW YORK
150 Broadway

Incorporated

CHICAGO
Straus Building

DETROIT
Penobscot Bldg.

MINNEAPOLIS
Metropolitan Bank Bldg.

SAN FRANCISCO
Crock & Bldg.

PHILADELPHIA
Stock Exchange Bldg.

ST. LOUIS
Boatman's Bank Bldg.

MILWAUKEE
First National Bank Bldg.

BOSTON
Shawmut Bank Bldg.

Thirty-seven Years Without Loss to Any Investor

Financed largely by public utility bonds, American electric companies in 12,500 communities turn night into day, supplying illumination to 7,000,000 American homes. Other public utility companies are constantly weaving a closer fabric of telephone and telegraph wires throughout the country. Thanks to public utility companies, 50,000 miles of electric railways reach out from cities, improve real estate values and draw town and country together both socially and commercially. Needed by the people, backed by the people, the great public utilities represent the investment and the savings of the people.

Bonds—How to choose them

SUPPOSE you have money to invest and are looking for Public Utility bonds or other types of investment securities of high character.

Before buying you will naturally wish experienced advice. A representative of The National City Company, schooled in our business and competent to discuss your particular investment needs, is within easy reach.

We have correspondent offices in 50 leading cities, prepared to submit to you Local, National, and Foreign Bonds and Short Term Notes.

Consultation with us on investment matters, it should be made clear, involves no obligations on your part. We are gladly at service when you wish to put your money into bonds. Also feel free to call upon us when you have investment questions to ask or wish specific facts about a particular bond issue.

Meanwhile, we shall be pleased to send you our current list of investment securities, if you will write for Z-107.

You will find a National City Company Correspondent Office in 50 of the leading cities of the country.

In each of these offices you can purchase Government, Municipal, Railroad, Industrial and Public Utility Bonds of the highest character.

Each of these offices is equipped to render unusual service to investors generally, and to bond buyers in particular.

The National City Company

National City Bank Building, New York

BONDS
SHORT TERM NOTES
ACCEPTANCES

FINANCING TRADE OVERSEAS

Great nations of the world are today mobilizing all their credit and resources in the race for foreign trade.

The United States occupies a commanding position in many of the best markets. Special credit machinery has been organized to meet the nation's foreign trade requirements. By means of acceptances, business men in this country can better finance trade overseas in the face of competition.

The National Shawmut Bank of Boston is in a strong position to assist American manufacturers and shippers engaged in foreign trade. We finance shipments, negotiate credits, and handle collections everywhere. We maintain direct connections with trade centers all over the world.

Shawmut Service is comprehensive and eminently practical. It meets every particular need of export and import business.

THE NATIONAL SHAWMUT BANK of Boston

Resources over $200,000,000

Correspondence invited. Our booklets on "Acceptances" and "The Webb Law" explain methods of financing and developing foreign trade. Write for copies.

Financial Department (Continued).

twenty years or so if the public as well as the operators and the investors will co-operate in harmony and sympathy with such patience as has not been known before. Let us hope that the vision of those who believe this matter to be simple may not be confused or distorted if upon closer inspection it evolves itself into a mirage. God speed!

"LIBERTY BONDS ACCEPTED AS CASH"

Through the Liberty Loan campaigns a great effort has been made to teach people to invest their savings in small amounts at a fair interest return. Now much of the work of this thrift education is being undone by concerns which plead for patronage by agreeing to accept Liberty Bonds as cash. In many cases a long period of self-denial is quickly forgotten and investments are gladly exchanged for luxuries we could not otherwise afford to purchase out of income. The coupon is so small—only $2.13, we say—and September 15 is still a long way off, and then we have to wait until March 15, 1920, for another $2.12! And in thus utilizing Liberty Bonds as currency we contribute, all unknowingly perhaps, to the prevailing inflation and the continued high prices of commodities.

When the time arrives that we feel justified in exchanging our hard-earned savings for merchandise or in hypothecating our Liberty Bonds as collateral for speculative possibilities, let us consider well if after all our weeks of saving in an attempt to learn the meaning of thrift we can with jaunty indifference forget our lesson and act the part of the spendthrift—if only for one purchase. If we decide that we can afford just this one time to revert to our old habits of extravagance, or if we feel that we can excuse ourselves by reason of that pressing need, we should not trade our bonds for articles of questionable value, but sell them

6% Investment Secured by Real Estate and 14-Story Steel Fireproof Building

Located in business center of large important city.

Cash cost of property nearly 2½ times this loan.

Net earnings will be over 3 times interest.

Borrower is entirely responsible.

First mortgage bonds of $500 and $1,000.

Maturities 2 to 10 years.

Ask for Circular No. 1035-Z

Peabody,
Houghteling & Co.
(ESTABLISHED 1865)

10 South La Salle Street
Chicago, Ill.

Branch Offices: Detroit, Cleveland,
Milwaukee, St. Louis

Oils and Peace

Value of Oil.
Oil Production.
Recent Development.
Oil Consumption.
Market for Oil.
The Mexican Situation.
South American Fields.
Gasoline Yield.
Oil Securities.

The basic facts are authoritatively interpreted in this new booklet. Sent without obligation to anyone interested in investments.

Booklet 2-HH
Free on Request.

DUNHAM & Co
Investment Securities
43 Exchange Place New York
Telephones 1980-5 Hanover

Financial Department (Continued).

at current market prices through well-established banking houses or ask our local banker to sell them for us. If your bond is quoted 93.10 or 93.34, that means "and accrued interest," and you know you are getting value received in prices regulated by supply and demand, but if you accept a new oil security of questionable merit, or a clock, or imitation pearl necklace, or a piece of furniture absolutely unnecessary for your comfort except to satisfy your vanity, can you be at all reasonably certain that you obtain in exchange 93.34 and accrued interest?

The rich and provident will buy your bonds and lay them aside for old age, but you—the small investor—will be the possessor of some few articles, worn and out of date, and a remorseful sense of guilt and lack of foresight.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE

Satan certainly found mischief for idle minds in the promulgation of false reports of imminent financing by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

It is most regrettable that a true American should for the purpose of creating amusement circulate a false rumor in regard to the stock of an American enterprise. The American Telephone Company is not anticipating any new immediate financing, and there is little doubt that the directors will have declared the regular two dollars dividend before this issue of The Outlook reaches its readers.

STEEL PRODUCTION

A strike among steel employees is not feared by manufacturers. Wages have been more than doubled the past five years and many employees have been aided in acquiring stock of the companies over a period of some fifteen years, from which they now receive a fair income.

"A strike in this industry would tie up a large portion of this country's business, put an end to new construction, and force prices to a much higher level, and thus destroy the advantage we now enjoy over Europe in the matter of exports," is the well-expressed opinion of one of the heads of the largest steel companies.

In order that steel manufacturers shall not be hampered by a large tonnage of low-priced future business, and owing to the belief of a probability of higher costs, the present tendency is not to place too far ahead orders for steel, in the belief that a waiting policy at the moment will not greatly interfere with current production, and future bookings may be made at a later date at more attractive prices to the manufacturer.

Investors In Forty-Seven States

and several Foreign Countries buy our 6% First Farm Mortgages and Real Estate Gold Bonds. Our investments are of the conservative kind and appeal to those seeking safe, sound time-tried investments for their funds. 35 years' experience. Write for pamphlet "B" and offerings.

E. M. LANDER & CO., Grand Forks, N. D.
Est. 1883. Capital and Surplus $500,000.00

DANFORTH FARM MORTGAGES

represent the highest type of investments. They have stood the test of war and business depression since 1890—40 years, and always worth 100%. Interest paid promptly at maturity.

FARM MORTGAGE BONDS in $500 and $1,000 denominations
For further information regarding our Farm Loans and Bonds write for Booklet and Investors' List No. 58.

A-G-Danforth-&Co
BANKERS Founded A.D. 1853
WASHINGTON ILLINOIS

We Recommend For Investment
STATE OF LOUISIANA
Port Commission 5% bonds.

Back of Your Bond

MUNICIPAL bonds offered by Halsey, Stuart & Co., are the tax-secured promises-to-pay of states, cities, towns, districts and other taxing bodies. They are issued for the construction of needed improvements as, for instance, harbor and wharf facilities in the case of the State of Louisiana Port Commission 5's, which issue is representative of our Municipal offerings.

Municipal bonds have for years been a favorite investment among the most conservative investors—savings banks, insurance companies, trustees of estates, and individual investors who place safety first in the choice of their investments. Such bonds are in even greater favor today because income derived from them is exempt from the Federal Income Tax.

For the larger investor to whom the tax-exemption feature is an item of importance as well as for investors generally who are more concerned with the safety of their investments than their interest return, we recommend Municipal Bonds.

List OM-5, descriptive of our current offerings, will be sent upon request.

HALSEY, STUART & CO.

INCORPORATED—SUCCESSORS TO

N. W. HALSEY & CO., CHICAGO
CHICAGO NEW YORK PHILADELPHIA BOSTON
200 S. LA SALLE ST. 40 WALL ST. LAND TITLE BUILDING 30 STATE STREET
MILWAUKEE DETROIT ST. LOUIS
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG. FORD BUILDING SECURITY BLDG.

Our pamphlet "BONDS OF MUNICIPALITIES" describes in detail this form of investment.

You may have a copy without charge by requesting our nearest office for Booklet OM-6

We advise the purchase and are making a Specialty of U. S. Government Bonds and are prepared, at any time, to buy or sell large or small lots

We have prepared a circular on investment securities which we shall be glad to send you on request

Kidder, Peabody & Co.

115 Devonshire St.
Boston

17 Wall Street
New York

Digitized by Google

The Great Task of Construction

With the coming of peace the Bell System faced an enormous construction program. Conditions arising from war resulted in the wiping out of the reserve equipment normally maintained, and necessary to give prompt connection to new subscribers. The release of industry and accumulated growth of population now makes telephone demands almost overwhelming.

Telephone construction, including buildings, switchboards, conduits, cables and toll lines, must, from its inherent nature, be undertaken in large units. A metropolitan switchboard, with its tens of thousands of parts, may require from two to three years to construct and install.

Only great extension can meet the present excess burden of traffic and provide for future requirements. Extension which cares for immediate demand, only, is uneconomical and calls for continuous work of such a character as to be frequently detrimental to the service.

During the war the Bell System devoted all its margin to the needs of the Government. The great task of getting back to normal pre-war excellence of operation requires the reestablishment of an economic operating margin capable of taking care of a larger growth than has ever before confronted the Bell System.

Construction is being pushed to the limit of men and materials; while every effort is being made to provide the best, present service.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

One Policy

One System

Universal Service

HELP WANTED!

Are you in need of a Mother's Helper, Companion, Nurse, Governess, Teacher, Business or Professional Assistant?

The Classified Want Department of The Outlook has for many years offered to subscribers a real service. A small advertisement in this department will bring results.

The rate is only ten cents per word, including address.

Department of Classified Advertising,
THE OUTLOOK, 381 Fourth Ave., New York

BY THE WAY

The confusion of tongues that the war has caused is hit off in the following conversation reported in an exchange: "When two Americans meet on the street of any Rhineland town, this dialogue results: 'Bon jour, Buddy. Where were you gestern abend?' 'Last evening? Why, I was schlafen.' 'Schlafen nix!' 'I hope to step in your mess kit if I wasn't schlafen. Where were you?' 'Schokolade party, and s-o-m-e time, take it from me. Three fräuleins—swell janes—beaucoup cognac, and piano spielen. Krank head dies morgen.'"

Some newspapers publish a column of medical advice for their readers. Queer remedies are occasionally suggested. Can any one beat this from a New England daily: "My son had over 17 boils on the back of his neck. He took this remedy: Put one tablespoonful of old-fashioned Indian meal in a glass of water, stir, let stand over night. In the morning drink the water. Do so for three nights, skip three, then do the same again until you have taken it nine times. It cured him and he did not have any more for 12 years, then had one. He took this remedy again and had no more."

Apropos of things medical, a subscriber sends this "squeblet":

Hooter: "D'ye know about this disease they call auto-infection?"

Rooter: "Sure. Dad's got it bad. Three new machines this summer."

Over thirty thousand workmen have for months been engaged in rebuilding the railways of northern France. These roads were systematically destroyed by the Germans, but in this, as in other things, their efficiency overreached itself. The thoroughness of the devastation will, according to an article in the "Railway Age," make it possible to correct faults that existed before the war. Stations are being more conveniently located, grade crossings are in many cases being eliminated, and many other improvements are being made. The Germans will of course have to pay for these reparations—at least to the extent of their ability.

Who has written the most ingenious example of the limericks that end in abbreviated words whose pronunciation (or mispronunciation) is to be filled out by the reader? Many would vote for O. Henry, one of whose effusions of this kind is as follows:

"An old woman who lived in Fla.
Had some neighbors who always ha.
Tea, sugar, and soap,
Till she said, 'I do hope
I'll never see folks that are ha.'"

The "bluffer" who has sufficient nerve often succeeds where the modest man with a direct appeal would fail. A story in point is told of an ingenious bluff that brought results during the war. A Red Cross worker approached a wealthy friend and showed him three silver dollars, meanwhile juggling them in his hand. "How many dollars do you see?" "Three," was the prompt reply. "Wrong; I say there are four. If I am wrong, will you contribute a thousand dollars to the Red Cross?" "Certainly," was the confident reply. "Well, give it, then," was the conclusive retort; "of course I'm wrong."

Did fate ever show a more ironical twist than in the following story related in a newspaper concerning the late J. Edward Addicks, the "Napoleon of Gas"? After his financial downfall, when creditors sought him in his cheap flat in Hoboken, an unpaid gas bill for $14 was found on the floor of his living-room!

By the Way (Continued)

American architects who like the appearance of a thatched roof have usually now to be content with a "thatched roof effect" or "thatched roof style" on their houses. The current "House Beautiful" contains a picture of a handsome dwelling with such a roof made of shingles. Men who know how to construct a real thatched roof have become very scarce in this country.

"The Writer" prints the following extract from a country paper as a sentence that gets a great many facts together in a small space:

Mrs. Henry Severance, who so barely escaped breaking her hip or other bones last Wednesday when she fell off the step ladder on to the porch floor, as a string broke that she was trying to pull up the rose branches with, to fasten up near the ceiling, is slowly gaining, and manages pretty well, with crutches, to get around the dining-room.

Colored men object strongly to the use of the word "nigger" in characterizing them. This is brought out strikingly in an article in the "Atlantic Monthly" by a white Army officer, John Richard, about his experiences with colored soldiers. "Sometimes," he says, "from a corporal, in a fit of irritation, one would hear, 'Yo' big black nigga'; but let an officer use that word and good-by to his influence! The thing he needed most was a transfer to another regiment. I have never tried it, nor have I heard it tried." The word is characterized in the dictionaries as "a word once in good use, but now vulgar and opprobrious."

British timber dealers are preparing to transport timber by raft to England around Cape Horn, so "Shipping" states. The first raft, to be built in British Columbia, will contain 2,000,000 feet of lumber. It will be equipped with Diesel oil motors. Father Neptune will probably give a terrible tussle to the first raft that tries to round his stormiest cape, but the projectors of the enterprise are confident that they can "get by."

The Japanese word for "Good-morning" sounds like "O-hi-o." A Japanese student in an American college, the story goes, told this to an American student. "That's easy to remember," was the comment; "it's the name of one of our States." Next morning the American met his Japanese comrade. "Ah, Mr. Matzuyama," he said, "Illinois!"

Food prices at present seem high, but they are nothing compared with prices in Alaska during the gold fever. A recent book says that at Dawson in 1898 sugar was seventy-five dollars a sack, flour a dollar a pound, eggs a dollar and a half each. But the money came as easily as it went. A man who was low in funds happened to get a paper with news about the Spanish-American War at a time when no newspapers had been received for several weeks. He read a few choice items to a crowd about the post office and then announced that he would read the rest in a hall near by at one dollar a head for admission. Five hundred men crowded in.

No. 2
American Sportmen Series. Painted for Remington UMC by
F. A. Levenson

The Test of Service

WHEN the man behind America's practical idealism gets a chance to indulge his own interests, he knows how to appreciate service. He has specialized in it.

That is why there is now such great demand for Remington UMC Wetproof Shot Shells, the first completely waterproof.

Remington
UMC
for Shooting Right

Just buy the same Remington UMC "Arrow" or "Nitro Club" Smokeless Steel Lined Speed Shells you have so long depended on for shooting right.

Without additional cost to you they are now exclusively protected against wet by the wonderful Wetproof process, invented and developed by Remington UMC during the war.

No matter how exposed to wet, in body, crimp and top wad they will stay firm and smooth as when fresh from the loading machine. Work them through your modern Remington UMC Autoloading or Pump Gun and they will slide just as smoothly and fire as surely and with the same superior pattern and penetration for which Remington UMC Speed Shells are famous.

Sold by your dealer, the live Remington UMC merchant whose store is your community Sportmen's Headquarters—one of more than 82,700 in this country.

THE REMINGTON ARMS UNION METALLIC CARTRIDGE COMPANY, Inc.

Largest Manufacturers of Firearms and Ammunition in the World

WOOLWORTH BUILDING

NEW YORK

Tours and Travel

CHRYSANTHEMUM SEASON

in the Far East

Join the AMERICAN EXPRESS tour under personal escort leaving San Francisco October 17 for a wonderful visit to Japan and China at the best season of the year.

ROUND-THE-WORLD extension of same tour. Write for itinerary.

AMERICAN EXPRESS

Travel Department

65 Broadway, New York
23 West Monroe St., Chicago
Market and 2d Sts., San Francisco

JAPAN

Are you interested in it?

If so, write to Secretary

JAPAN HOTEL ASSOCIATION

Care Traffic Dept.

IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS
TOKYO

for 120-page Guide Book Free

Hotels and Resorts

CONNECTICUT

THE WAYSIDE INN

New Milford, Litchfield Co., Conn.
In the foothills of the Berkshires. Open all the year. An ideal place for your summer's rest. 2 hours from New York. Write for booklet.
Mrs. J. E. Castle, Proprietor.

MAINE

YORK CAMPS LOONLAKE, MAINE

In famous Rangeley region in heart of mountains facing lake. Private log cabins with open fire and baths. Central dining-room. Golf within easy reach; garage. Boating, bathing, fishing, mountain climbing. Farm one mile from camp furnishes fresh vegetables, eggs, poultry, certified milk. Booklet. J. LEWIS YORK, Prop.

MASSACHUSETTS

Brooks Mansion

89 Mt. Vernon Street
Boston, Mass.

American plan. Select family hotel; quiet, residential section; excellent table; elevator; near theaters and shopping district; homelike. Tourists accommodated—$1.40 per day and up. Suites—Two rooms and bath; single and double rooms.

HOTEL PURITAN
Commonwealth Ave., Boston
THE DISTINCTIVE BOSTON HOUSE
Globe Trotters call the Puritan one of the most homelike hotels in the world.
Your inquiries gladly answered and our booklet mailed.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

THE LESLIE

A quiet, cozy little home by the sea.
PRIVATE BATHS. Descriptive booklet.

If you are tired and discouraged come to Blink Bonnie, Northfield, Mass. You'll find, after a stay here, be ready to meet your winter duties. Write to S. Jean MacKenzie

Hotels and Resorts

MASSACHUSETTS

Rock Ridge Hall, Wellesley Hills, Mass. Fine location. Large, breezy, screened piazza. Running water in bedrooms. Private baths. Eggs, berries, cream, chicken. Rates moderate.

NEW YORK CITY

The Margaret Louisa

of the Y. W. C. A.

14 East 16th St., New York

A homelike hotel for self-supporting women. Single rooms $1.00 per night. Double rooms (2 beds) $1.40 per night. Restaurant open to all women. Send for circular.

HOTEL JUDSON 53 Washington Square
adjoining Judson Memorial Church. Rooms with and without bath. Rates $2.50 per day, including meals. Special rates for two weeks or more. Location very central. Convenient to all elevated and street car lines.

NEW YORK

CAMP LINGERLONG

On Pine Lake. Includes 500 acres of wild-Adirondack Mountains. Hunting, fishing, swimming, canoeing, tennis, middle horses. Tramps to surrounding mountain peaks, Lake George and Lake Champlain. Bathing. Excellent meals. Spring water. Cabins and tents $14, $16 and up. Private parties entirely isolated. References required. Manager, ROYDEN BARBER, Clemons, N. Y.

ADIRONDACKS

INTERBROOK LODGE AND COTTAGES

Keene Valley, N. Y.
On direct trail to Mt. Marcy, very heart of Mts. Illustrated booklet giving description of Keene Valley and the Lodge sent on request. $15 and $18 a week. M. E. LUCK.

WYOMING

Ranch Home for Young Men

To Spend Fall and Winter

Horseback riding and sunshine in Wyoming.
WYMAN & SONS, Trapper Lodge, Shell, Wyo.

Health Resorts

EYRIE INN

Autumn in the Highlands of the Hudson
Tompkins Cove, N. Y. H. QUARR

Crest View Sanatorium

Greenwich, Ct. First-class in all respects, home comforts. H. M. HIRSHCOCK, M.D.

"INTERPINES"

Beautiful, quiet, restful and homelike. Over 20 years of successful work. Thorough, reliable, dependable and ethical. Every comfort and convenience. Accommodations of superior quality. Disorder of the nervous system a specialty. Fred W. Seward, Jr., M.D., Fred W. Seward, Jr., M.D., Goshen, N. Y.

LINDEN The Ideal Place for Sick People to Get Well
Daylesford, Pa. An institution devoted to the personal study and specialized treatment of the invalid. Massage, Electricity, Hydrotherapy. Apply for circular to ROBERT LIPPINCOTT WALTER, M.D. (date of The Walter Sanatorium)

Country Board

Overlooking Ocean

All winter proposition. Responsible retired professional gentleman, having large house within hour of New York City, desires few others of equal standing to join in co-operative plan in living simply and sanely and in accord with the reasonable features only of the noted health resorts of Europe and America. Those really ill or believing they need medical attention need not respond. But any feeling that such conditions can without undue expense easily be avoided may find it advantageous to address 871, Outlook.

WANTED—In Hartford, Conn.
One person as permanent paying guest in quiet private home. $15 terms. 808, Outlook.

Real Estate

ARIZONA

For Rent for the Winter Months

An Up-to-date Ideal Ranch for well people to have good time. Fine climate and riding. W. R. LADD, Oracle, Ariz.

CONNECTICUT

For Sale or Rent

Charming house in ideal New England village.
Three hours from New York. A. M. I., Mrs. J. S. CLARK, 1142 Madison Ave., New York.

NEW YORK

FOR SALE 14-room house at

Nyack, N. Y.
Corner plot, 105x165. Gas, electricity, open plumbing, hot-water heat, garage, flowers, fruit, vegetables. $6,000. Inquire P. W. BARCOCK, 11 Broadway, New York.

Real Estate

NEW HAMPSHIRE

FOR SALE

Site and Buildings of Successful Camp
Beautiful, safe, secluded. On well-known New Hampshire lake. Price moderate. Address Camp, P. O. Box 1,592, Philadelphia, Pa.

For Sale, Furnished
$1,000

Old farmhouse, 7 rooms. Large living-room with fireplace, spring water. About 20 acres. Fine for summer camp. Address Box 21, Washington, N. H. (35 miles from Boston).

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

WANTED—50 Outlook readers to represent this publication this summer—and all through the year. If you like. You can easily earn $10 a week and more, simply by using an hour or two a day of your spare time. If you want extra spending money—and everybody does—write us for details of the Outlook's co-operative profit plan. Simply address Representatives' Division, Desk K, The Outlook, 351 Fourth Ave., New York City.

WANTED—A party to buy a half interest in a blueberry tract in Washington County, Maine. $6,000 required. Good interest on investment. Good references given and references required. Inquire of Hillard C. Schoppe, 41 Fifth St., Bangor, Maine.

NOVELTY GIFTS

PANDORA GIFT BOXES. Filled with wonderful little surprises; for children and grownups. Price $2. L. Babcock, 79 Haven Ave., New York City.

HELP WANTED

Business Situations

RAILWAY traffic inspector, $110 a month to start and expenses. Travel if desired. Unlimited advancement. No age limit. Three months' home study. Situation arranged. Prepare for permanent position. Write for booklet CM27 Standard Business Training Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

WANTED—Young, educated, unmarried woman not nurse or matron, to help entertain and do shopping for women patients at small private hospital for mild mental and nervous affections. Wages $40 monthly and maintenance. State age, education, and give references. Address George H. Torney, M.D., 200 South St., Brooklyn, Mass.

Companions and Domestic Helpers
DISTILLERS, cafeteria managers, governesses, matrons, housekeepers. Miss Richards, Box 5, East Side Station, Providence, R. I.

WANTED—MOTHER'S HELPER or WORKING HOUSEKEEPER. No maids kept, but outside help is furnished. Home has all modern conveniences. Reply to Mrs. Estabrook, Deerfield, Mass.

WANTED—Young woman (Protestant) as attendant in boarding school. School required. References. Address Box 205, Brattleboro, Vt.

WANTED, September 1, woman of intelligence and refinement to help in housework and be one of family living in Maplewood, N. J. Some knowledge of cooking. No heavy work. Salary adequate. Send reply to Mrs. O. G. Cochran, South Fairlee, Vermont.

GENTLEMAN AND WIFE wanted to live with widow in her home in country on trolley near Worcester, Mass., and share maintenance. 7,287, Outlook.

WANTED—Woman of culture and experience with children to take charge of home of foreign missionary in China—widower with young children. Pleasant home. Servants. Missionary salary and expenses. Should be over forty years of age. 7,288, Outlook.

WANTED—Competent, reliable woman, Protestant, as working housekeeper in family of two adults and child of four years. No laundry work. Good home for right woman, preferably one not over forty-five. Write fully, with wages expected, to Box 73, Princeton, N. J.

WOMAN of refinement and education to supervise care of three and half year old boy. Nurse also employed. College woman preferred. One capable of taking entire charge of house when parents are absent and who will realize her responsibility. Excellent home and liberal wages. In reply give full details. All answers confidential. 7,291, Outlook.

CAPABLE, practical woman, used to and fond of children, assist mother with growing family, three of children in school. Two maids kept. Must be strong, active. References. Good home. $50-$60. Write Mrs. W. L. Sweet, 203 Clinton Ave., New Brighton, Staten Island.

WANTED—Experienced child's nurse to take charge of two young children in Washington. 7,286, Outlook.

WANTED—Trustworthy, intelligent, and refined woman to take care of baby 2 years old. References required. Good home and excellent wages. Position open September 15. For particulars address Mrs. Herbert A. Treat, Wayne, Pa.

CAN offer to refined, companionable young woman pleasant home in Moultrie, N. J. Small family. Duties: Assist in care of two-year-old boy. State age, experience with children, and religious beliefs. 7,278, Outlook.

WANTED—Christian woman to take charge of boarding-hall in Southern colored school. Send recent photograph, references, and salary desired. Address Methodist, 7,278, Outlook.

YOUNG or middle-aged woman for care of two children. Must have reference and must be good needlewoman. State salary. 7,283, Outlook.

WIDOW with four young children wishes comfortable mother's helper, 35 years or under, to assist in care of children and in light housework. Maid kept. Box 385, Haverford, Pa.

HELP WANTED

Companions and Domestic Helpers

WANTED—Couple active, industrious, is talking to run small particular inn located in desirable Vermont village. Woman dainty cook, man good gardener and helper. Permanent home. Only A1 people considered. 7,301, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

WANTED—Competent teachers for public and private schools. Calls coming every day. Send for circulars. Albany Teachers' Agency, Albany, N. Y.

WANTED, August 24, governess for child four years old. American, Protestant. One who can speak French preferred. Permanent position if satisfactory. 7,178, Outlook.

WANTED—Young man as resident tutor and companion for two boys, 12 and 17, to live in private house with family and have general supervision of boys' studies and door sports. Possibly include three others from near by. Excellent accommodations. Give qualifications, references, and salary. 7,284, Outlook.

TUTOR WANTED for young boy, to cover period of one or two years. Must be well educated, of refined manners, and with satisfactory references. Recent college graduate preferred and French and English applications will be considered. Will live with family. Address, giving references, C. K. Bushner, 61 Broadway, New York City.

WANTED—Competent nursery governess for two girls ages 5 and 7. To go to Sher Hills. English preferred. References required. R. P. Nash, Easthampton, Long Island.

INQUIRIES already coming in for teachers in all subjects for 1919. International Manual and Educational Agency, Carnegie Hall, N. Y.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Business Situations

GENTLEMAN, exceptionally able, experienced, and energetic, desires management of exclusive inn, club, etc. Excellent taste and judgment in furnishing and remodeling. 7,262, Outlook.

PHYSICIAN recently discharged from the service, desires administrative position, institution, insurance, or business concern. Twelve years in previous position. 7,288, Outlook.

Companions and Domestic Helpers

EDUCATED young woman, social secretary, traveling, general companion, experienced automobilist, desires position, related to her education. References. Interview, 30, 7,277, 182 Beaumont St., Manhattan Beach, N. Y.

WANTED—Position in children's home by ex-army nurse experienced in care and training of children and institutional management. 7,284, Outlook.

LADY, many years' experience chaperoning and supervising education of young girls, this country and abroad, desires position as homemaker in school or residential chambers in private family. Would travel. Highest references exchanged. 7,286, Outlook.

CHURCH visitor, by experienced woman with Red Cross home nursing and first aid certificates. T. M., 7,277, Outlook.

LADY of refinement with 14-year-old daughter desires position as matron, homemaker, or managing housekeeper September 1. References. 7,278, Outlook.

CULTURED Protestant young woman of experience as companion, assistant in home or governess. 7,280, Outlook.

EXPERIENCED woman wants management linen. Hotel, private or public institution. 7,284, Outlook.

COMPANION. Teacher going West this September would accompany child or adult to their destination. References. 7,284, Outlook.

AVAILABLE October 1 as traveling companion lady, 28, of ability and personality; refined, adaptable, good reader, vocalist. Can drive automobile, typewriter, keep accounts, file, correct manuscripts. Understands management of home and garden. Minimum salary, $1,500. References exchanged. 7,290, Outlook.

Teachers and Governesses

FRENCH woman, Ph.D., long experience in best colleges of U. S. and France, with assume whole responsibility of children's education and home. Adequate salary expected. 7,285, Outlook.

KINDERGARTNER wishes position in private school. Experience. References. 7,288, Outlook.

EDUCATED young woman desires position as governess. Child three to six years preferred. Experienced. Address 7,288, Outlook.

NURSERY governess, English, open to engagement September 15. Kindergarten as first grade. Read physical care. WBS and sub-normal children. Willing to travel. References. 7,278, Outlook.

COLLEGE graduate wishes position as home. Experienced teacher and housekeeper. Can sew. Fond of children. Cleveland vicinity preferred. 7,282, Outlook.

MISCELLANEOUS

WANTED—Young women to take six months' course in nursing. Frances Furber Memorial Home, New Brunswick, N. J.

MISS Guthman, New York shopper, send anything on approval. Service free. References required. 300 West 98th St.

EARN PIN-MONEY AT HOME—There are almost endless ways. Pin-money suggestions. 25 cts. Success Club, 79 New Ave., New York City.

M. W. Whitman & Co. Shopping Agent established 1881. No charge; prompt delivery. 44 West 23d St., New York.

EXPERIENCED teacher makes specialty of helping parents select schools in any part of country. Not connected with any institution. Reasonable charge. Hempstead Turnpike, 78 Second Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

8. M.

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLERSON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

Published Weekly

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS

GERMANY TO-DAY

DISINTEGRATING GERMANY

BY GREGORY MASON

STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

SLACKER AMONG NATIONS

BY ALEXANDER GREEN

WHAT THE WORLD OWES GERMANY AN EDITORIAL

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google

Advertisers, heed the lesson
of the war!

Concentration

- 1-Concentration of power
won victory
- 2-Concentration of thought on mail advertising wins with a selected list
- 3-Concentration on Strathmore Quality Papers makes the selective list successful

Strathmore  Papers

The Strathmore Paper Co., of Mittineague, Mass., will be glad to send "Selective Mailings" on your request

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

Published Weekly
WITH ILLUSTRATIONS

“BABUSHKA”

A PERSONAL IMPRESSION OF
CATHERINE BRESHKOVSKY

BY ANNE O'HAGAN

THE IRISH AND THE ENGLISH
AT CLOSE QUARTERS

BY FRANK DILNOT

THE BREAK-UP OF AUSTRIA-HUNGARY

BY GREGORY MASON

STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

WEDNESDAY, MAY 14, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google

AFTER a fire these nurses can only await orders. The hospital is being hurriedly emptied of patients. Some bed-ridden patients will die from exposure, lack of care and the temporary loss of prescriptions. These are conditions no city can imagine until it has been through them.

Quick plans now for the victims

THIS is what happens when a hospital burns. Nurses are driven out by the fire—nerves shaken—under orders to wait—endless suspense—while plans are slowly shaping in the minds of officials out of the panic and chaos.

There are hurry calls for cots, quarters, medicines, supplies, more nurses, more doctors, vehicles, wheel chairs. Making lists of the rescued, gathering records and addresses.

All are emergency plans—temporary plans!

The whole sickening catastrophe could have been avoided by using just a little plain commonsense humanity beforehand. It would not have cost one fiftieth the effort needed to care for the dead and living victims. Compassion, belated, is a mighty poor virtue.

Take these Plain Facts

Some five billion dollars of business property has been protected from fire by automatic sprinklers. State Industrial Commissions are guarding the lives of factory employees by requiring this unfailing protection in business property. The Government insisted on war industries being so protected.

Makeshift fire protective measures are the most that you will find in hundreds upon hundreds of hospitals. To the minds of fire protection experts, they all are a mere mockery of safety when the fire actually starts and spreads in the most horrible and unexpected ways.

In twenty minutes a board of trustees can make complete plans to forestall this danger. They can vote "against any consideration whatever of suggestions or measures of safety, until a system of automatic sprinklers is decided upon which will prevent fires; put out any fire, anywhere, any time, before it can endanger health or lives."

Read—"Fire Tragedies and Their Remedy."

Over two thousand schools burn a year, besides scores of hospitals and asylums. There is a remedy for this condition.

Any individual, trustee or official will find in "Fire Tragedies and Their Remedy" the unvarnished truth and a path of imperative social service. Write for it today. Address General Fire Extinguisher Company, 289 West Exchange Street, Providence, R. I.

GRINNELL

AUTOMATIC SPRINKLER SYSTEM

When the fire starts the water starts

Digitized by Google

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, and the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS
A. S. BURLINSON Postmaster General

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

VENIZELOS: KINGDOM- MAKER AND KING-BREAKER: THE FUGITIVE WHO BECAME A GREAT EUROPEAN STATESMAN

PERSONAL IMPRESSIONS
BY MAJOR BARNES OF THE RED CROSS

AN INTERVIEW
BY MR. MASON, THE OUTLOOK'S STAFF CORRESPONDENT

WEDNESDAY, MAY 21, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google

The only way
you can discharge an Iver Johnson is to pull the trigger all the way back

You often read of tragedies caused by the accidental discharge of revolvers. Perhaps this is why you haven't a revolver in your home.

Do you know that an accident is impossible with an Iver Johnson? The only way you can discharge it is to pull the trigger all the way back.

IVER JOHNSON SAFETY AUTOMATIC REVOLVER

—the only safe revolver for the home. There is nothing to fear from an Iver Johnson for the man or woman who owns it. Its safety is automatic and sure. There are no levers to adjust or forget to adjust. It simply can't go off unless you want it to. You can even "Hammer the Hammer" without discharging an Iver Johnson revolver.

Iver Johnson Revolvers embody the simplest, safest principles of mechanism and construction. No flat springs in an Iver Johnson—all springs are made of the finest piano wire, drawn tempered—they will last a lifetime. And the perfect rifling of the barrel means straight shooting.

The Iver Johnson shown here has the "Western" Walnut Grip. Other models have "Perfect" Rubber and Regular Grips.

IVER JOHNSON'S ARMS & CYCLE WORKS

193 River Street, Fitchburg, Massachusetts

99 Chambers St., New York

717 Market St., San Francisco

Three Booklets Free

We have three booklets which are well worth reading by anyone interested in firearms, bicycles, or motorcycles. Indicate which books you want: A—"Firearms," B—"Bicycles," C—"Motorcycles."

"Hammer the Hammer"

Buy an Iver Johnson
this Spring
Have fun;
gain health;
save money.
Iver Johnson
Superior
Roadster, $53.
Other Models,
$27.50 to $60.

Digitized by Google

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLISON, Postmaster General

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

IN THE GRIP OF BOLSHEVISM

BY ALESSANDRO H. CARASSO

---

A LATE CONFESSION

A STORY BY ELSIE SINGMASTER

WEDNESDAY, MAY 28, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
331 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google

Copyright U.S.A. 1919 by
The B.V.D. Company

*If it hasn't this
Red Woven Label*

MADE FOR THE
B.V.D.
BEST RETAIL TRADE

(Trade Mark Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. and Foreign Countries)

*It isn't B.V.D.
Underwear*

*A lot of comfort is worth a little insistence
Therefore-Insist upon getting
B.V.D.*

B.V.D. quality can only be obtained in B.V.D. Underwear

THE B.V.D. COMPANY,
New York.

B. V. D. Coat Cut Undershirt and Knee
Length Drawers, $1.00 the garment.

B. V. D. Sleeveless Closed Crotch Union
Suits, (Pat. U. S. A.), $1.75 the Suit.

Copyright U.S.A. 1917 by
The B.V.D. Company

Remember, all Athletic Underwear is not B.V.D.

Copyright U.S.A. 1917 by
The B.V.D. Company

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

IN THIS ISSUE

A FORMER PRISONER OF THE BOLSHEVISTS

TELLS WHAT BOLSHEVISM HAS DONE TO RUSSIA

THE WAR'S LEGACY—IS IT SOCIALISM?

THEODORE H. PRICE ANSWERS
THIS QUESTION

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google

FIRE drills are good, but not infallible. In spite of the drill, when a real fire burst out, this little boy, stricken with senseless panic, hid in a dark cloakroom.

Who is supposed to guard the lives of school children anyway ?

"NOW, Willie, be careful when you cross the tracks."

Mother stands in the doorway, watching her little boy running down the street.

And then, turning to father she says, "I always worry till I think he is safe inside the school-house door."

But once safely inside that door, Willie is supposed to be out of danger for the next six hours at least. Unthinking parents never stop to consider the daily fire menace that exists in school buildings.

You have a hazy idea that school buildings are safe because somebody told you so. "Fire drills" and "fire escape" sound safe enough—fine—until the flames are leaping through the window.

Take these Plain Facts

Some five billion dollars of business property has been protected from fire by automatic sprinklers.

State Industrial Commissions are guarding the lives of factory employees by requiring this same unflinching protection in business property.

The United States Government insisted on war industries being so protected.

School fires start in mysterious out-of-the-way places, and smolder along unnoticed in a vacant room or closet. Then suddenly there comes a terrible roaring and in a few moments the whole building bursts into flame.

Investigate conditions in your school yourself. Don't let anyone assure you that your school is safe enough till you understand what that safety means. Don't fool yourself because the doors open outward and the stairway is of iron.

You could provide a dozen, yes fifty minor "safeguards" and only find when the schoolhouse is burned up, that all these superficial methods of protection will never accomplish one-tenth what the Grinnell Automatic Sprinkler System will. The Automatic Sprinkler System equals a hundred firemen right there, always on the job.

As soon as a fire starts in any place in the building, these automatic firemen come into action and drown the fire before it becomes a menace.

Read—"Fire Tragedies and Their Remedy"

Any individual, trustee or official will find in "Fire Tragedies and Their Remedy" the unvarnished truth and a path of imperative social service. Write for it today. Address General Fire Extinguisher Company, 289 West Exchange Street, Providence, R. I.

GRINNELL

AUTOMATIC SPRINKLER SYSTEM

When the fire starts the water starts

ANNUAL OUT-OF-DOORS NUMBER

NOTICE TO READER
When you find reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine and it will be placed in the hands of our subscribers, editors or writers.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLINSON, Postmaster General

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 11, 1919

THE FUTURE OF AERO-NAUTICS

BY ALAN R. HAWLEY
PRESIDENT OF THE AERO CLUB OF AMERICA

THE DAY'S OUTING — "THAT 'LL TASTE GOOD!"

VACATIONS
WITH A CAMERA

BY HENRY HOYT
MOORE

WITH SIX PHOTOGRAPHS
BY THE AUTHOR

LA PARMACHENE BELLE!
A STREAM, A SUPERSTITION, AND A SERMON
A STORY BY JOSEPH H. ODELL

Digitized by Google

For Example

Take radiator construction as an example of GMC thoroughness. This vertical-tube, continuous fin core is the most efficient known. It does not depend on solder for assembly strength. It is firmly bolted together. It rests on two brackets bolted to the chassis frame; no springs or dashpots are used.

1 GMC; 1 Driver, Displace 16 Horses; 4 Drivers; 4 Wagons

One GMC and one driver are doing the work that 16 horses, 4 drivers and 4 wagons used to do for the New Dells Lumber Company, Eau Claire, Wisconsin.

Starting at 7 o'clock in the morning, this GMC truck makes 20 to 30 trips a day, delivering green mill wood over town under all conditions of weather.

It hauls  $3\frac{1}{2}$  tons at a load and is always on the job.

Estimate the cost of feeding, stabling, grooming and harnessing 16 horses. Figure the upkeep of four wagons.

Then figure the wages of four drivers, and consider the employment problem involved.

This is a typical example of GMC truck utility. Your business may be different, but among the GMC models, ranging from  $\frac{3}{4}$  ton to 5 tons, is one admirably fitted for your work.

Behind every GMC is the backing of the General Motors Truck Company and its policy of plain, honest quality.

Let your next truck be a GMC.

GENERAL MOTORS TRUCK COMPANY

One of the Units of the General Motors Corporation

Pontiac, Michigan

Branches and Distributors in Principal Cities

GMC TRUCKS

(518)

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLERSON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

WHAT THE JUGOSLAVS WANT

BY NICHOLAS PASITCH

FIRST DELEGATE TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE OF THE KINGDOM OF SERBS, CROATS, AND SLOVENES

AN AUTHORIZED INTERVIEW WITH GREGORY
MASON, OF THE OUTLOOK STAFF

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 18, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

The Dictaphone clears your desk hours earlier

A clear desk, a clear conscience, and a week-end of needed change and recreation. The greatest help and joy to the busy business man is The Dictaphone, because it enables him to finish his letter-writing early in the day, giving him more time for thinking, planning and organizing.

The Dictaphone is always ready to take your letters when you are ready to dictate. It helps you to get that much needed outside recreation which keeps the body fit and the brain clear.

15-Minute Demonstration

A fifteen-minute demonstration in your office, on your own work, will be given for the asking. Write today.

THE DICTAPHONE

Registered in the U. S. and Foreign Countries

Dept. 118-F, Woolworth Building, New York City

Branches Everywhere

Write for Booklet, "The Man at the Desk"

There is but one Dictaphone, trade-marked "The Dictaphone," made and merchandised by the Columbia Graphophone Company

"The Shortest Route to the Mail-Chute"

The Outlook

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A.S.BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

THE CASE OF CHINA

BY DR. C. T. WANG

DELEGATE OF THE CHINESE REPUBLIC TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE

AN AUTHORIZED INTERVIEW WITH GREGORY MASON

STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE OUTLOOK

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 25, 1919

PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY

FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR

381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

"Yes, dear, I asked for B.V.D. and here's the label"

*Copyright USA 1919 by
The B.V.D. Company*

*Copyright USA 1919
The B.V.D. Company*

*Ask your wife how long
B.V.D. wears!
She checks the laundry!*

B.V.D. quality can only be obtained in B.V.D. Underwear

*If it hasn't this
Red Woven Label*

(Trade Mark Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. and Foreign Countries)

*It isn't B.V.D.
Underwear*

*Copyright USA 1919
The B.V.D. Company*

B. V. D. Coat Cut Undershirts and Knee
Length Drawers. $1.00 the Garment.

B. V. D. Sleeveless Closed Crotch Union
Suits (Pat. U. S. A.) $1.75 the Suit.

THE B. V. D. COMPANY
NEW YORK

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. RICHESON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

BY WILLIAM G. McADOO

FORMER SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

WEDNESDAY, JULY 2, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

General Motors Trucks

—and Business Extension

WHEN furniture dealers depended upon horse delivery it was considered a good day's work to put a load of furniture into the house of a customer ten miles away.

Today, Summerfield & Hecht, one of Detroit's big retail furniture firms, have a regular delivery radius, by GMC Trucks, of 75 miles—and the round trip of 150 miles can be made in a day.

Summerfield & Hecht bought GMC Trucks because they wanted their 75-mile deliveries to be as dependable as their city deliveries—bought them because they knew that to carry heavy furniture up hill and down dale over country roads, they needed trucks with stamina.

GMC Trucks have stamina because of the way in which they are built and of what they are built. Compare them point for point with any truck that sells for less or for more.

And behind every GMC Truck stands the great General Motors Corporation, insuring against "orphanage," insuring service and parts readily secured during the full, long life of every GMC Truck. GMC on a truck is like U. S. A. on a bond.

Write, stating your line of business and we will send you a booklet dealing with GMC Trucks in your line.

GENERAL MOTORS TRUCK COMPANY

One of the units of the General Motors Corporation

PONTIAC, MICHIGAN, U. S. A.

Branches and Distributors in Principal Cities

(577)

Radius Rods

go on every size truck that we build. Without them the driving axle must push the load through the rear springs. With them the push is transmitted direct from the axle to the truck frame as it should be.

Our booklet "From Radiator to Tail Light" is a guide to intelligent truck-buying which every prospective truck buyer should have. Free upon request.

75 MILES
TO DETROIT

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING- NO ADDRESS.
A.S.BURLESON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

"OUR TROUBLE IS NOT SO MUCH THAT OUR WANTS HAVE MULTIPLIED AS THAT OUR VANITY LEADS US TO TRY AND SATISFY THEM IN UNUSUAL AND EXPENSIVE WAYS"

IN "SOME HOMELY ECONOMICS," IN THIS ISSUE, THEODORE H. PRICE SUGGESTS HOW TO MEET THE COST OF LIVING HALF-WAY

AND ELSIE SINGMASTER CONTRIBUTES ANOTHER STORY

WEDNESDAY, JULY 9, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

THE joy of the open road belongs in fullest measure to those who have little concern about their tires.

Firestone's place in the scheme of travel is to give you safety, comfort, freedom from trouble, and an easy conscience regarding expense.

In this bigger cord tire, with the new non-skid tread, the Firestone Organization makes possible better travel than ever at lower cost. It is the finest expression of the Firestone creed—to deliver most miles per dollar.

FIRESTONE TIRE & RUBBER COMPANY
Firestone Park Akron, Ohio

Branches and Dealers Everywhere

Firestone

With an Original Four-Color Portrait of Theodore Roosevelt, Suitable for Framing

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

A ROOSEVELT CELEBRATION

ON THE FOURTH OF JULY DESCRIBED

BY TRAVERS D. CARMAN

ROOSEVELT AS A PRACTICAL POLITICIAN

AN INTERPRETATION

BY BRANDER MATTHEWS

WEDNESDAY, JULY 16, 1919

PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY

FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR

381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

NOTICE TO READER

When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.

NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.

A. S. BURLISON, Postmaster General.

“What is packing anyhow?”

Our salesmen frequently comment on how often their friends, outside the business, ask the question—“What is Packing?”

Some of the ideas as to the meaning of the word are very amusing in their vagueness and it is very seldom that the average man realizes just what a big part this product plays in the efficiency and economy of the industrial machinery that is making the world better for us all.

So for all its seeming insignificance the story of what packing is would seem to be well worth telling and well worth reading by anyone.

* * *

AS a starter, consider Packing as something like the “washer” in your kitchen faucet. It prevents leakage—or ought to.

Now whenever steam is put to work—or water, gas, brine, or ammonia—packing is needed. It is needed to prevent leakage where gleaming rods slide smoothly in and out of cylinders, for leakage here means not only loss of steam or water, but actual waste of power.

And inside the cylinders of pumps, packing again saves power. With perhaps two hundred pounds pressure on one side of the piston, and a vacuum on the other, piston packing prevents leakage past the piston.

And sheet packing, cut or molded into gaskets, prevents leakage at joints of surfaces or piping.

So, fundamentally, packing guards against leakage.

But when it works against moving surfaces, packing is subject to wear—or it goes “dead,” and loses its elasticity. This means replacement, shut down machinery and expense. So the buyer of packing must ask not only “Will it prevent leakage?” but also “How long will it last?”—which of course depends on the material and workmanship put into it.

And there’s a third question, which the engineer will ask if you don’t, “How much friction does it cause?” For some packings prevent leakage merely by filling up the packing space as solidly as possible. Naturally such packing binds the moving rod—sometimes even scores it—and acts more or less as a brake. It is such serious faults as this that Johns-Manville has overcome through intelligent packing design.

So packing is not a thing to be bought at random—the right choice will save money by preventing leakage, by conserving power, and by its longer life.

As the pioneers in packing development we have placed packing design on a scientific basis, and out of experience, observation and facts have established a complete and standardized line that meets every plant requirement from among the minimum number of packings. Only in this way can packing be made to give a maximum of service for a minimum of cost.

Here is a partial list of Johns-Manville Packings: Sea Rings for outside packed Rods; Service Sheet, an all-around-the-plant sheet packing; Universal Piston for inside packed pumps; Kearsarge boiler, man and hand-hole gaskets; Mogul Coil Packing for valve stems and small rods; Siegelite Sheet for packing oils, gasoline and naphtha.

H. W. JOHNS-MANVILLE CO., New York City. 10 Factories—Branches in 63 Large Cities

JOHNS – MANVILLE

Serves in Conservation

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

BLASCO-IBÁÑEZ

AUTHOR OF THE WAR NOVEL
"THE FOUR HORSEMEN OF THE APOCALYPSE"

MAKES SOME SUGGESTIONS AND PREDICTIONS ABOUT

WILHELM—LATE KAISER

"THE HERMIT OF AMERONGEN"

WEDNESDAY, JULY 23, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google

GREAT! You'll Say It Is! The New "TEA FOIL" Package!

It's soft and pliable—decreases in size as the tobacco is used—tobacco does not cake in the package—no digging it out with the finger. Keeps the tobacco in even better condition than tin. Now, don't you owe it to yourself to buy a package and give Tuxedo a trial? — Not quite as much tobacco as in the tin, but—

10<sup>c</sup>

RIZ LA — the lightest, thinnest, finest, strongest cigarette papers in all the world. Roll a Tuxedo cigarette with RIZ LA CROIX.

Finest Burley Tobacco
Mellow-aged till perfect
Plus a dash of Chocolate

Tuxedo

The Perfect Tobacco for Pipe and Cigarette

Guaranteed by
The American Tobacco Co.
INCORPORATED
Digitized by Google

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLISON, Postmaster General.

BACK-FIRING AGAINST BOLSHEVISM

BY LIEUTENANT JOHN M. OSKISON

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE KAISER

BY VERNON KELLOGG

WHEN GERMANY YIELDED

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE
FROM ELBERT F. BALDWIN

"PAPA YANK"

A STORY—BY FULLERTON L. WALDO

WEDNESDAY, JULY 30, 1919

PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY

FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR

381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

A schoolgirl and a Civil War veteran find a certain thing in common.

Bab, the sub-deb, did not write this, but a real schoolgirl did. Her name we naturally can't tell, but she lives in Montclair, New Jersey, and she wrote this theme as part of her work in 9th Grade English. It was sent to us by her teacher.—The Outlook.

BOOK REPORT

It was Monday, and, true to its name, was "blue." Only four more days until the dreaded book report, and, as the poets say, "fear was clutching at my throat."

That afternoon I frantically rushed to the library. For a whole hour I scanned the book list and the loaded shelves (loaded with books of every description, except what I sought).

Tuesday morning I timidly inquired of Miss H— for a possible suggestion. The suggestion was forthcoming in the shape of an "Outlook." I was disgusted.

An "Outlook" of all things. Nevertheless I took it home and, curled up in a Morris chair, I started to digest my "book-report" book, or, more truthfully, magazine.

Suddenly I started; why, to my surprise I was actually interested! I read further.

The first thing that I read was an article on "The American Indian and the War," or something to that effect. I liked it.

A page of cartoons next caught my eye and I appreciated the clever truths hidden in pictures.

My small brother came bounding in from school and asked who the man with the horse was. I explained the photograph to the best of my ability and together we explored the whole pictorial section; also a few of the most interesting advertisements.

I wondered vaguely who edited this clever booklet and, turning to the front, found that Mr. Abbott was responsible.

It really was such an interesting magazine of current news that I was greatly surprised when I found it sold for the small amount of ten cents a copy.

The arrangement is also very unique; first come the shorter editorials discussing questions of the day; following that, the cartoons; then the longer articles taking up in detail subjects of interest to all.

I am afraid I cannot state the number of hours I put on the reading for I read it by fits and starts but I should say, roughly speaking, about four hours.

This letter came to The Outlook some two weeks ago from Waverly, New York, in answer to a notice that the writer's subscription was due to expire.

*The Outlook Company,
New York.*

Gentlemen:

The within duly received and, by proxy, carefully read. It is really refreshing to hear from The Outlook. For years I have been a much interested reader of this magazine. All you say or that anyone can possibly say of The Outlook would be only a vain attempt to paint the lily.

Yes, I have purchased bonds and War Stamps, have contributed to the Red Cross, war chests, Belgian, Syrian and Armenian Relief Funds, etc., yet the $4 to which you so delicately allude is still on hand and would be at once forthcoming for The Outlook were it possible for me, under existing conditions, to enjoy or utilize its wealth of information, so carefully selected and served in such appetizing form.

Let us become better acquainted. I am a veteran of the Civil War, 83 years of age (not 83 years old), totally blind, and, therefore, unable to read The Outlook, being entirely dependent upon my faithful wife for all the information I receive from the outside world. We live alone. The cares of this world and deceitfulness of the profiteers occupy so much of her time that even with the Daylight Saving Law in effect little is left for literary work. One by one I have had to drop my journals. You can hardly imagine what this deprivation means to me now that there is so much to be done; enemies within and without to combat, so much sophistry to uncover. It is comforting to know that such a valiant, fearless, dependable champion of the right as The Outlook is still at its post; its watchword, "They shall not pass." What a magnificent country would be ours could all our immense resources, material and intellectual, be devoted to the right, justice, true progress, with politics and self-interest eliminated. I feel that we may rely upon The Outlook to help with the achievement of this much to be desired object.

Regretting for reasons given my inability to follow you in your glorious course, I remain, with fondest memories,

Yours very truly,

It is the earnest hope of The Outlook that they find it in common with you.

✓

The Outlook

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLERSON, Postmaster General.

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

THE NEW NATION OF ASIA

THE FIRST OF TWO ARTICLES ON SIBERIA BY CHARLES W. HOLMAN, WHO HAS TRAVELED FOUR THOUSAND MILES AND SPENT SEVEN MONTHS IN STUDYING THE COUNTRY AND ITS PEOPLE

---

THE NEW GREAT THING

A STORY OF ADVENTURE BY KEENE ABBOTT

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 6, 1919

PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY

FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR

381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google

The use of The Outlook in the teaching of Current History Civics English and Rhetoric

has been increasing amazingly within the past few years. Hundreds of schools and colleges are finding this compact, concise, straight-spoken illustrated weekly journal of current events of inestimable value.

One instructor, for instance, writes:

"The students have taken up The Outlook study with such zest and earnestness, and they seem to be deriving a great deal of benefit and profit from the weekly assignments."

Another says:

"It has proven excellent for our exercises in Current History, and I hope to extend the use of it next year still further."

And still another:

"Permit me to say that the class is delighted with The Outlook. They have used other periodicals previously and volunteer the information that The Outlook is the best."

And another:

"The Outlook has been entirely satisfactory and will be continued next term. The other weekly we used will not be used again, as it suffered in comparison with your paper."

Perhaps such expressions would be of less importance were it not for the fact that in the last seven years the use of The Outlook in schools and colleges as an aid in the teaching of Current History, Civics, English, and Rhetoric has increased 1,191%—eleven hundred and ninety-one per cent.

We shall be glad to send you an explanatory pamphlet—it is on the presses now and will be ready for mailing shortly—which gives a complete outline of suggestions for the use of The Outlook in class-room work. You will find it, we believe, of real value. It would be better to give your school address, as the mailing may be delayed until early in September.

The Outlook's special class-room rates are also announced and explained in this pamphlet.

There is no charge and there is no obligation. Simply drop a line of inquiry to

The Outlook Company, 381 Fourth Ave., New York

✓

The Outlook

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

A REPUBLICAN LEADER

WILL HAYS AND THE HUMAN SPIRIT IN POLITICAL LEADERSHIP

BY FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

---

THE REUNION OF RUMANIANS

AUTHORIZED INTERVIEWS WITH M. BRATIANO,
THE RUMANIAN PREMIER, AND WITH M. VAÏDA, A DELEGATE TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE

BY GREGORY MASON

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 13, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

YOU need only to see this Firestone new standard oversize Cord Tire, in comparison with others, to know that it gives more mileage—it is so much bigger.

Take the five-inch tires and compare:—thirteen per cent more material, eighteen per cent more air space, six per cent wider section for Firestone than the average of the other four brands best known. And Firestone has the advantage over every one of these tires on each point mentioned.

How can Firestone give so much more for the money? For one thing, ninety per cent of Firestone workers own stock in the company. They are financially interested in giving you such value as will make you a permanent Firestone customer. And the Firestone organization in Singapore, selecting choicest rubber and shipping direct, means another saving. Result—most miles per dollar.

Firestone

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLINSON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

SHANTUNG

SHOULD THE PEACE TREATY HAVE GIVEN JAPAN A FOOTHOLD THERE?

A DISCUSSION PRO AND CON

BY EVERETT P. WHEELER AND ELIZABETH WASHBURN WRIGHT

---

WHAT DOES THE NEGRO WANT?

BY R. H. LEAVELL

A SOUTHERNER FINDS IN A NORTHERN HIGH SCHOOL
AN ANSWER TO THIS QUESTION

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 20, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

*Suggestions for Using
The Outlook
in the Teaching of Current History
Civics
English and Rhetoric*

THIS is the title of a pamphlet giving a complete outline of suggestions for the use of The Outlook in class-room work which will be mailed free of charge to any instructor or teacher in the United States.

Those interested in the teaching of Current History, Civics, English or Rhetoric will find it, we believe, of real value, and we urgently recommend that you send for it. It would be better to give your school address, as the pamphlet will not be ready for mailing until the first of September.

The Outlook's special class-room rates are also announced and explained in this pamphlet.

There is no charge and there is no obligation. Simply drop a line of inquiry to

The Educational Director

The Outlook Company

381 Fourth Avenue, New York City

NOTICE TO READER
When you finish reading a magazine bearing this notice, place a 1-cent stamp on this notice, mail the magazine, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, sailors or marines.
NO WRAPPING—NO ADDRESS.
A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

The Outlook

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL
OF CURRENT EVENTS

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE
FROM FOREIGN LANDS

GERMANY — THE BALKANS — ENGLAND

---

SPRUCE UP!

WHAT A SOLDIER DID FOR HIS HOME TOWN

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 27, 1919
PRICE: TEN CENTS A COPY
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR
381 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Here are a few representative schools and colleges that use The Outlook in regular class-room work

These institutions, and hundreds besides, are finding this compact, concise, straight-spoken illustrated weekly journal of current events of inestimable value in the teaching of Current History, Civics, English, and Rhetoric. During the last seven years the use of The Outlook in schools and colleges has increased 1,191%—eleven hundred and ninety-one per cent.

Kern County Union High School... Bakersfield, Cal.
State Normal School... Los Angeles, Cal.
University of Colorado... Boulder, Col.
Yuma County High School... Wray, Col.
Wesleyan University... Middletown, Conn.
St. Margaret's School... Waterbury, Conn.
Central High School... Washington, D. C.
Mercer University... Macon, Ga.
Aurora High School... Aurora, Ill.
Rock Island High School... Rock Island, Ill.
University of Illinois... Urbana, Ill.
Indiana University... Bloomington, Ind.
Culver Military Academy... Culver, Ind.
Iowa State College... Ames, Iowa
Randalia High School... Randalia, Iowa
Kansas State Agricultural College... Manhattan, Kans.
Wichita High School... Wichita, Kans.
Louisiana State University... Baton Rouge, La.
Cony High School... Augusta, Me.
Hebron Academy... Hebron, Me.
National Park Seminary... Forest Glen, Md.
Thurmont High School... Thurmont, Md.
Groton School... Groton, Mass.
Central High School... Springfield, Mass.
Dana Hall... Wellesley, Mass.
Northwestern High School... Detroit, Mich.
Fairbank Public School... Fairbank, Minn.
Waseca High School... Waseca, Minn.
Lexington High School... Lexington, Mo.
State Normal School... Maryville, Mo.
Dillon High School... Dillon, Mont.
Columbus High School... Columbus, Neb.
State Normal School... Wayne, Neb.
Wells High School... Wells, Nev.
Exeter High School... Exeter, N. H.
Richards High School... Newport, N. H.
Blair Academy... Blairtown, N. J.
East Orange High School... East Orange, N. J.
Newark State Normal School... Newark, N. J.
New Mexico Military Institute... Roswell, N. M.
The Misses Masters' School... Dobbs Ferry, N. Y.

St. Paul's School... Garden City, N. Y.
Oyster Bay High School... Oyster Bay, N. Y.
Vassar College... Poughkeepsie, N. Y.
Syracuse University... Syracuse, N. Y.
Washington Irving High School... New York City
University of North Carolina... Chapel Hill, N. C.
St. Mary's School... Raleigh, N. C.
Public Schools... Enderlin, N. D.
Ohio University... Athens, O.
Woodward High School... Cincinnati, O.
East Technical High School... Cleveland, O.
North High School... Columbus, O.
Central High School... Tulsa, Okla.
Myrtle Point High School... Myrtle Point, Ore.
State Normal School... Bloomsburg, Pa.
William Penn Charter School... Philadelphia, Pa.
Peabody High School... Pittsburgh, Pa.
Pennsylvania State College... State College, Pa.
Cranston High School... Auburn, R. I.
Hope Street High School... Providence, R. I.
Voorhees Institute... Denmark, S. C.
Wofford College... Spartanburg, S. C.
Canton High School... Canton, S. D.
Lynchburg High School... Lynchburg, Tenn.
Maryville College... Maryville, Tenn.
Garland High School... Garland, Tex.
Sevier High School... Richfield, Utah
University of Utah... Salt Lake City, Utah
Fair Haven High School... Fair Haven, Vt.
Montpelier High School... Montpelier, Vt.
Hampton Normal Institute... Hampton, Va.
Portsmouth High School... Portsmouth, Va.
Westhampton College... Richmond, Va.
Ballard High School... Seattle, Wash.
North Central High School... Spokane, Wash.
State Normal School... Glenville, W. Va.
Triadelphia High School... Wheeling, W. Va.
Kemper Hall... Kenosha, Wis.
Madison High School... Madison, Wis.
Douglas Public Schools... Douglas, Wyo.

We shall be glad to send you an explanatory pamphlet—it is on the presses now and will be ready for mailing shortly—which gives a complete outline of suggestions for the use of The Outlook in class-room work. You will find it, we believe, of real value. It would be better to give your school address, as the mailing may be delayed until early in September.

The Outlook's special class-room rates are also announced and explained in this pamphlet.

There is no charge and there is no obligation. Simply drop a line of inquiry to The Educational Director

The Outlook Company, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York

